DISSERTATION

ON THE GOSPELS.

THE inſpired books which were written after the aſcenſion of Chriſt, are commonly called Η ΚΑΙΝΗ ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ; a title which was early borrowed by the church from Scripture, and authorized by St. Paul himſelf. See Matth. xxvi. 28. Gal. iii. 17. Heb. viii. 8. ix. 15, &c. This title admits of a two-fold interpretation. According to the paſſages of Scripture from which it is taken, it ſhould doubtleſs be rendered, THE NEW COVENANT; in which view it ſignifies, "A book containing the terms of the New Covenant between God and man:" But, according to the meaning of the primitive church, which gave this title, it muſt be rendered, "The New Teſtament;" it being certain, that the firſt Chriſtian writers uſed the word Διαθηκη in that ſenſe; and in this view it ſignifies, "That book wherein the Chriſtian's inheritance is ſealed to him, as a ſon and heir of God; and wherein the death of Chriſt, as a teſtator, is related at large, and applied to our benefit."

The Sacred Writers make uſe of no title to denote the collective books of the New Teſtament. They ſometimes refer to their former Epiſtles, but never mention the whole collection of their writings, which was not then formed. They were handed about ſingly among the Chriſtians; and it was natural to defer the collection of them into one volume, till after the deceaſe of thoſe holy men, from whom the church had reaſon ſtill to expect more inſpired writings whilſt they lived[*].

Some bold men have denied the antiquity and genuineneſs of theſe books; but nothing can be more groundleſs than what they have thrown out: For, Firſt, the Stile of the Sacred Writers is ſo different, both in the Goſpels and Epiſtles, that it is impoſſible to conceive theſe works could have been forged and written by the ſame hand. Secondly, in order to invent writings, and aſcribe them to perſons who lived ſome centuries ago, it is neceſſary to have an underſtanding and judgement, and a knowledge of hiſtory and antiquity, beyond the powers of man; or the inventor muſt commit frequent errors. Now the writings of the New Teſtament are unexceptionable in this reſpect; and the better we are acquainted with Jewiſh, Roman, and Grecian antiquities and cuſtoms, the more we diſcern their agreement with the New Teſtament; even in ſome circumſtances ſo minute, that they would probably have eſcaped the moſt circumſpect impoſtor. Thirdly, the moſt ancient Fathers, even thoſe who were contemporary with the Apoſtles, quote the books of the New Teſtament, and aſcribe them to the authors whoſe names they now bear. Fourthly, there are ſome very old verſions of the New Teſtament; the Latin at leaſt ſeems to have been done in the firſt century; and the Syriac verſion is generally thought not to have been leſs ancient[†]

But, if theſe writings are as ancient as is ſuppoſed, they certainly carry with them an undeniable mark of their divine original: For the Epiſtles of St. Paul in particular refer to certain miraculous gifts, which are ſaid to have been imparted by the impoſition of hands, and to have been conferred by God, in confirmation of the oral and written doctrine of the Apoſtles. If theſe Epiſtles are ancient and genuine, and written by St. Paul to the churches to which they are addreſſed, then none can deny theſe miracles; but if theſe miracles be true, then the doctrine, and the book in confirmation of which they were wrought, are divine; and the more certainly ſo, as there is no room for deception. A Juggler may perſuade me that he performs miracles, but he can never perſuade me and a whole body of men of ſound intellects, that he has communicated to us the gift of working miracles, and ſpeaking foreign languages, unleſs we can work the miracles, and ſpeak the languages[‡].

The writings of the Apoſtles which have been tranſmitted to us, were all written in Greek, except perhaps the Goſpel of St. Matthew, and the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, which many learned Commentators believe to have been firſt written in the Hebrew dialect, then uſed at Jeruſalem. But, if that were the caſe, the Hebrew text being loſt, the Greek tranſlation has the authority of an original. The Greek language was at that time known to almoſt half the world; it was therefore the proper language for thoſe books, which were to be read, as far as poſſible, by the whole race of mankind: And this language had been already conſecrated by the Septuagint verſion of the Old Teſtament; that is, the words and phraſes of it had by uſe obtained that determinate and peculiar ſignification which they were to bear in Theology; ſo that the Greek was better adapted to expreſs divine truths clearly and preciſely, than any other weſtern language. Thoſe Jews who ſpoke Greek, corrupted it, as our Jews do the modern languages, with their own: Hence aroſe that which ſome call "the Helleniſtic dialect;" into which the Old Teſtament is tranſlated by the LXX: and this is throughout the language of the New Teſtament, which is intermixed with Hebrew and Syriac phraſes. There are, however, into the New Teſtament, many elegant and pure Greek phraſes, which have been uſed by the beſt and moſt ancient writers, and are peculiar to the Greek language. Hence, in order to underſtand the New Teſtament fundamentally, it is neceſſary to be well acquainted with the ancient Greek claſſics; though a clearer light may be derived from the oriental languages, the Septuagint verſion, and the works of the Greek fathers, than from the beſt claſſic authors *. There is no foundation for preſuming that the New Teſtament contains any language properly called Vulgar; for though our Saviour paſſed for the ſon of a carpenter, and moſt of his diſciples were fiſhermen; and though the Spirit of God uſually leaves every writer to his own ſtile; yet, according to the conſtitution of the ancient Jewiſh ſtate, no certain concluſion can be drawn reſpecting any man's meanneſs, from his following a mechanical employment. And it appears from thoſe paſſages in the New Teſtament, in which Jeſus is called Rabbi even by his enemies; that he was conſidered as one who profeſſed literature, and his diſciples as the ſtudents or ſcholars of a profeſſor, who were not ſuppoſed to make uſe of the vulgar ſtile †.

[‡] See this point fully and admirably diſcuſſed in Dr. Whitby's General Preface to the ſecond volume of his Commentary.

The writers of the New Teſtament frequently quote paſſages from the Old, either in proof of their doctrine, or to ſhew that the predictions of prophets are fulfilled: ſometimes they only borrow certain phraſes of the Old Teſtament, thereby to convey their own thoughts upon very different ſubjects. Theſe quotations are chiefly taken from the verſion of the LXX: It is therefore of great uſe to be well acquainted with this verſion. The Apoſtles uſe it, even in inſtances where the Greek interpreter miſtakes the ſenſe, but where the miſtake does not affect their argument. See Matth. xv. 8, 9. 1 Cor. x. 8. They do not, however, always adhere exactly to the words, but ſometimes change them; a liberty, in which the ancients muſt be indulged, ſince, for want of books, they frequently quoted from memory ‡.

The original manuſcripts of the New Teſtament, or the firſt copies of each book, either written by the Apoſtles with their own hand, or dictated by them, are none of them extant at preſent. Tertullian (in his book De Preſcriptionibus) appeals to many originals ſubſiſting in his time; and Peter, an Alexandrian biſhop of the fourth century, refers to an original MS of St. John's Goſpel, preſerved and worſhipped at Epheſus: But true criticiſm being then unknown, and it being common for ſuperſtition and deceit to affix old names to new things, it is clear that the teſtimony of theſe men cannot be relied upon. Although it be undeniable that the firſt Chriſtians beſtowed great pains upon the copies of the New Teſtament, yet nothing leſs than a repeated miracle could poſſibly prevent the admiſſion of ſome errors, and the increaſe of them with a multiplication of copies. This is manifeſt from the many Errata remaining in books, which are printed with the greateſt care, and reviſed with the utmoſt accuracy: We are not to conclude, however, that the Chriſtian faith is ſhaken, or rendered uncertain, by the many various readings which are found in the New Teſtament: On the contrary, it has been the opinion of judicious men, that the large collection of them made by Dr. Mill, hath removed many doubts which might ariſe in reading the New Teſtament, about the genuineneſs of paſſages, which contain important articles of faith. Moſt of the various readings are only trifles, which do not even alter the ſenſe of the words; others alter indeed the ſenſe of the paſſage, but the alteration does not affect any article of faith: And others again, ſhake a ſingle argument for a doctrine; but the ſame doctrine is taught clearly in other paſſages, which have no various reading. The collectors therefore of the various readings of the New Teſtament deſerve the thanks of all ſenſible divines; and their ſucceſſors will deſerve further thanks. Without ſuch collection we rely upon a ſingle MS, or a ſingle edition; and upon which can we ſecurely rely?—Is the tranſcriber, or editor, or printer, whom we follow implicitly, directed by the Spirit of God always to chuſe the right reading? What rational man will affirm this? And it muſt be admitted that ſome paſſages, otherwiſe obſcure, have been illuſtrated by a reading which the diligence of theſe learned men hath diſcovered. As the ſources of falſe readings are various, ſo we muſt decide upon them from their probable ſources: However, the MSS of the New Teſtament are the pureſt fountains from which the true and genuine reading muſt be drawn. All printed editions are either taken from former editors, or from MSS; and they have no further authority than as they correſpond to the MSS from which they are taken. By MSS of the New Teſtament we mean only thoſe, which are prior in date to the invention of printing; the two principal of which are, the Vatican, and the Alexandrine: But on this ſubject, we refer to the Authors in the margin §.

Another fountain, from which we are to derive the genuine readings of the New Teſtament, is in the ancient Verſions. The Syriac and Latin Verſions are older than the moſt ancient Greek MSS we have, and therefore they evidence the readings of thoſe more ancient MSS from which they were tranſlated. Whenever it can be fully aſcertained from the verſion what was the reading in the MS uſed by the tranſlator, then his reading is of the ſame weight as if it had ſtood in a MS of his age. But there are impediments to our attainment of this certainty, and conſequently it requires the utmoſt caution in collecting readings from the verſions. It is particularly neceſſary, in the oriental verſions, to uſe great circumſpection in drawing readings from the ſubſequent Latin tranſlations, which we find in the Polyglot. Dr. Mill and ſeveral others have been frequently miſled by this; and as ſome verſions have by length of time undergone alterations, we muſt take care not to put thoſe alterations upon a level with the ancient verſion itſelf, nor to alledge them in evidence of a reading. It is moreover to be obſerved, that all tranſlations are not from the original text, but from other verſions; ſuch therefore have no right to a ſeparate voice in determining the authenticity of the original text, ſince they only ſhew what reading was expreſſed by the verſion from which they were taken.

Dr. Bentley's Phileleutherus Lipſienſis, and the admirable edition of the New Teſtament by Wetſtein, in 2 vols. folio.

For inſtance, all the Spaniſh, French, and German tranſlations of the New Teſtament, of the ſixteenth century, were taken from the Latin verſion; if therefore all theſe ſhould confirm one reading, yet their united voice would amount to no more than the ſingle voice of the Latin verſion.

A third ſource of various readings is diſcovered in the writings of the Fathers, who ſometimes quote paſſages of the New Teſtament; but as they do not always quote the whole paſſage, but only ſome words which ſerved their purpoſe; as they ſometimes interpolate a word in the paſſage they quote, by way of explanation; and as they, like other ancient writers, quote merely from memory, and therefore inaccurately; they are not much to be relied on, when the Greek MSS vary from their readings, and when they themſelves do not atteſt that they are quoting the paſſage verbatim: And even in this caſe it is not ſafe to follow them blindly, ſince their teſtimony amounts to no more than this,—that ſome MSS of their time had the reading which they quote.

As we have ſo conſiderable a number of MSS of the New Teſtament, ſome of which are of very great authority, and written in parts of the world extremely remote from each other; and as the verſions we have are ſo ancient and ſo different, it appears almoſt incredible that the true reading of any paſſage ſhould be totally loſt: And therefore we ſhould be very backward to agree to the authority of a reading, which is not to be met with in any copy or verſion, but ariſes merely from critical conjecture. There is no ſuperſtition in this opinion with reſpect to the New Teſtament, ſince we ſhould form the ſame judgement in the caſe of any profane book, of which we had an equal number of copies and tranſlations.

It may be proper to make ſome remarks, under this head of various readings, reſpecting the Punctuation of the New Teſtament, upon which, as appears in the courſe of our Annotations, the meaning of the Sacred Writer very much depends. The whole of this ſubject may be reduced to the following propoſitions; Firſt, our point, colon, comma, and note of interrogation are modern, and of no authority. Secondly, the Apoſtles probably denoted by a point, or a blank, where the ſenſe of a diſcourſe terminated. Thirdly, whoever deſires to know, with ſome degree of probability, where theſe points or blanks were placed, muſt conſult the MSS before the time of Jerome, of which we have two at the moſt; and the verſions, (if there be more than one) which were made from MSS of that antiquity:—And even this will lead him no further than to a ſmall degree of probability. Fourthly, the beſt rule of determining the proper place of a point or ſtop in the New Teſtament, is to follow the direction of common ſenſe, in explaining the paſſage. If it be aſked, whence come the preſent points in the New Teſtament? Their hiſtory is briefly this: In the fourth century Jerome began to add the comma and colon to the Latin verſion; and they were then inſerted in many more ancient MSS. In the fifth century Euthalius, a deacon of Alexandria, divided the New Teſtament into lines: In the eighth century, the ſtroke was invented, which we call a comma; and in the ninth, the Greek note of interrogation was firſt made uſe of. At the invention of printing, the editors placed the points arbitrarily, probably without beſtowing the neceſſary attention; and Stephens in particular varied his points in every edition. Even the blank ſpaces at the ends of words are not ancient: the Greeks formerly wrote their words without any ſeparation; and the moſt ancient MSS of the New Teſtament are written in this manner*.

Thoſe ancient manuſcripts commonly divided the New Teſtament into three books; of which the firſt contained the four Goſpels, the ſecond all the Epiſtles, and the third the Revelation of St. John. The Acts of the Apoſtles were uſually annexed to the Epiſtles: It was very ſeldom that one tranſcriber copied the whole New Teſtament, or more than a ſingle book; hence we have ſo many copies of the Goſpels, and ſo few of the Revelation of St. John. The ancients divided the New Teſtament into two kinds of chapters, ſome longer, and ſome ſhorter; the longer ſort of chapters were called in Greek τίτλοι, and in Latin Breves, and the table of the contents of each brevis, which was prefixed to the copies of the New Teſtament, was called breviarum; the ſhorter chapters were called κεφαλαιον, capitulum; and the liſt of them was called capitulatio. This method of dividing is of very great antiquity; and Pere Simon refers to one of the earlieſt fathers of the church, who makes mention of it. But there were formerly many of theſe diviſions, though none of them was received by the church in general: One of theſe diviſions, however, was more approved than the reſt; for Euſebius regulates his canon of the four Goſpels by it; and Jerome likewiſe made uſe of it. According to this diviſion, all the Evangeliſts together made 217 breves, and 1126 capitula. The diviſion of the Epiſtles was later; and all that is obſervable in them is, that the number of the chapters is continued in one ſeries throughout St. Paul's Epiſtles, becauſe they are conſidered as one book. But this whole diviſion was laid aſide, and the famous Cardinal Hugo introduced the chapters now in uſe. This eminent commentator lived in the twelth century, and publiſhed a Bible Cum poſtellâ: This is the firſt Bible divided into chapters; which he ſubdivided again, by adding in the margin the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, for the convenience of quotations and references. It ſhould be obſerved on this head, that our chapters are only helps, for the more eaſily finding paſſages quoted; but that whoever reads the Bible by ſingle chapters will be often in the dark, and at a loſs for the ſacred writer's meaning, ſince the chapters often end abruptly, in the midſt of a connection.

The ancients had two kinds of verſes; one of which they called Στιχοι, and the other Ρῆματα: The ϛιχοι were only lines, which contained a certain number of letters; and therefore often broke off in the middle of a word. It was by theſe ſtichi, or lines, that the ſize of books was meaſured. In order to underſtand this, we ſhould have a clear idea of the ancient manner of writing: They divided their leaves very exactly by lines, upon which they wrote; each leaf had the ſame number of lines, and each line the ſame number of letters. We ſtill diſcover in ſome manuſcripts the lines by which they wrote; it was eaſy by this means to determine with great accuracy the ſize of books. Ρηματα were lines which were meaſured by the ſenſe, it being a common method of dividing diſcourſes, to write in one line as many words as might be in ſome degree intelligible when joined together: theſe united were called rhema; we ſhould call them a comma, or ſentence. P. Simon has given us an ancient written liſt, in which the rhemata in each of the writers of the New Teſtament are numbered with great exactneſs, and the total is 18,612. It was the cuſtom formerly to place theſe liſts at the end of books, that the reader might ſee whether any thing had been omitted by the copyiſts; and in this reſpect it may be affirmed, that if the primitive Chriſtians did not number the words, they numbered the letters of the New Teſtament. The Verſes into which the New Teſtament is now divided, are more modern, and an imitation of the diviſion of the Old Teſtament. Robert Stephens, the firſt inventor, introduced them in his edition of the year 1551. He made this diviſion on a journey from Lyons to Paris; and, as his ſon Henry tells us, in the preface to the Concordance to the New Teſtament, "He made it, inter equitandum;" that is, moſt probably, "When he was weary of riding, he amuſed himſelf with this work at his inn." This wild and indigeſted invention of the learned printer was ſoon introduced into all editions of the New Teſtament, and it muſt be confeſſed, that in quoting and conſulting the Bible, there is great uſe in the diviſion into verſes; at leaſt no Concordance could have been made, had not the New Teſtament been ſubdivided into leſſer parts. But the Interpretation of this Sacred Book has ſuffered greatly by this diviſion; for, not to mention that Stephens often ends a verſe at the wrong place, againſt the ſenſe of the paſſage, the diviſion itſelf is quite contrary to the nature of the Epiſtles, which are connected; whereas ſeparate verſes appear, to the eye of the learned, and to the minds of the unlearned, as ſo many detached ſentences: Hence aroſe the cuſtom of explaining each verſe ſeparately, which ſometimes produced a very falſe interpretation. It is to be wiſhed that the verſes had been formed, not from the ſenſe, but from the number of letters, like the ſtichi of the ancients; for in that caſe they could not have done ſuch violence to the meaning of the author. However, it is now become neceſſary,—unleſs we reſolve to render uſeleſs all the theological works hitherto publiſhed,—to abide by Stephens's diviſion; and only to take care, in editions of the New Teſtament, not to break off the line with the verſe. The verſes may be continued without interruption, and the Bible be rendered equally uſeful for references, by printing the numbers in the margin; as hath been done by Bengelius, in his very valuable edition of the New Teſtament[*].

We come now to thoſe individual books inſpired by God, which together are called, "The Canon of the New Teſtament," becauſe they contain a Rule of faith and manners. We receive them as divine writings, unanimouſly tranſmitted to us by the primitive church, which was beſt qualified to judge of them: But this teſtimony of the primitive church is not the principal, nor the only ground we have to believe their divine inſpiration. There are, beſides theſe, various books ſtill extant, which ſome ſuperſtitious perſons, or even hereticks, have conſidered as divine, and falſely aſcribe them to Chriſt himſelf, or to his Apoſtles, or to their diſciples: Each of theſe pieces has had its idolater; and ſome ſecret enemies to religion have reproached our church for not ſubmitting to the divine authority of books which have the aſſent of antiquity. But it ſhould be obſerved, that the aſſent of the ancients alone is not ſufficient; that the unanimous teſtimony of the whole church is requiſite; and that the ſame is wanting to theſe apocryphal books. But then it may be aſked, why do we believe thoſe books to be divine, which are in our editions of the New Teſtament, and reject the reſt?—Now in anſwer to this, we will lay down three marks, as characteriſtical of the divinity of a book. In the firſt place then, "That book, which is written by one who pretends that either all his writings, or at leaſt this in particular, are divinely inſpired, and corroborates ſuch pretence by miracles, is to be accounted divine." No one can deny this poſition, without denying, in general, that there is any divine revelation; and it might eaſily be proved, even to one who denies Revelation. By a Miracle we mean, "An effect, which cannot be derived from the laws of motion in the material world, at the ſame time that it ſurpaſſes all power of men; ſo that no human underſtanding can diſtinguiſh, whether it proceeds immediately from God, or from thoſe finite ſpirits, which are greatly ſuperior to us." This idea of miracles is authorized by the Holy Scriptures, which aſcribe ſome of the miracles to which they appeal not immediately to God, but to Angels, who execute his will. See John v. 4. i. 51. where Chriſt thus deſcribes the miracles, which he intended thenceforward to perform. Miracles are the only ſign by which God can declare his revelations to be divine, and diſtinguiſh them from the pretences of impoſtors and enthuſiaſts; for it is not ſufficient that a pretended revelation neither contradicts reaſon nor itſelf, ſince in that caſe every conſiſtent natural theology might ſet up for a divine revelation. Either therefore God muſt make it impoſſible for himſelf ever to give a revelation to men, or to lay any commands upon us which philoſophy does not already diſcover to be his will; and he muſt at the ſame time diſcharge us from all obligation to obey a command, or to believe an aſſurance revealed by him;—Or, he cannot permit a finite being to perform miracles or ſupernatural works, in atteſtation of falſhood. If this were permitted, it would immediately become impoſſible for men to diſtinguiſh between a real and a pretended divine revelation; and conſequently, they could never be obliged to believe or obey a divine revelation. And is it credible that God would diſcharge man from this duty to himſelf, by permitting falſe miracles? eſpecially as a revelation from God is ſo expedient to man?—If moreover we conſider, that many miſchievous miracles would be performed in the world, if a Spirit at enmity with God and us had the power of working miracles; and if, upon conſulting experience, we find that no ſuch miracles are wrought; we ſhall be the more clearly convinced, that no deceiving Spirit is permitted by God to work miracles. As therefore man cannot perform miracles, or acts above the power of man; and as God doth not permit evil ſpirits to perform them; it follows, that a revelation confirmed by miracles is divine.

Now the Apoſtles of Jeſus Chriſt were the authors of moſt of the books of the New Teſtament, which we account divine; and they pretend to be more than prophets, aſſuring us that Chriſt promiſed them a divine inſpiration, when they ſpoke in defence of his Goſpel,—how much more in their permanent writings! See Matth. x. 19. Mark xiii. 11. Luke xii. 11. xxi. 15. John xiv. 16, 17. xv. 26, 27. xvi. 7—15. 1 Theſſ. v. 19. All theſe aſſurances Chriſt confirmed by miracles, which are recorded by credible perſons and eye-witneſſes; which are confeſſed by the ancient adverſaries of religion, both Jews and heathens; and which they attempt to invalidate, by repreſenting them as Magic. Theſe aſſurances therefore, and all their conſequences, are to be accounted divine truths; ſo that whatſoever the Apoſtles witneſs in writing concerning Chriſt, is inſpired by God, whether it be doctrine or fact. The Apoſtles too themſelves ſupported this pretence of the divine inſpiration of their words and writings, by undeniable miracles; conſequently, we are bound to honour all thoſe writings which proceed from them, as divine books[†].

Our ſecond criterion is this; "When a book which pretends to be divine contains circumſtantial prophecies, which have been fulfilled, and not a ſingle falſe prophecy can be ſhewn therein; that book muſt be received as divine, unleſs it contradicts natural religion." By prophecies we mean predictions of ſuch events, as no human underſtanding could foreſee; and predictions, not of a ſingle point, but a circumſtantial prophecy: and as it is poſſible that many circumſtances might accidentally come to paſs, the characteriſtic of a prophet is, that not one of the circumſtances he foretold as to be fulfilled, remains unaccompliſhed. Upon theſe conditions we aſſert, that prophecies fulfilled are a very probable evidence of the divinity of a book. It cannot be denied that many future events depend upon ſo many thouſand unknown cauſes, and may be prevented or changed by ſo many unexpected incidents, that no one is qualified to foreſee them with certainty; except only that great Being, who ſurveys all the innumerable minutiæ of the world, which are interwoven and entangled with each other. Beſides, it is very incredible that a circumſtantial prediction ſhould come to paſs in all reſpects without exception, by mere accident; but as it is not abſolutely impoſſible, or implies no direct contradiction, for a pretended prophecy to be fortuitouſly accompliſhed, the prophecies which have been fulfilled are only a very probable, not, ſtrictly ſpeaking, a certain evidence, of the divinity of a book. We may venture, however, to aſſert upon logical grounds, that the higheſt degree of probability differs very little from what is properly called certainty; and that an argument which is probable in the higheſt degree, is even thought equal to a demonſtration; becauſe our limited underſtanding is not ſo ſubject to err in matters probable, which are generally objects of ſenſe, as in an abſtracted demonſtration. I know, for inſtance, with probability, that there was a king of France, called Louis the 14th, who waged great wars; and I know for certain that the aggregate ſquare of the two ſides of a rectilinear right-angled triangle is equal to the ſquare of its hypothenuſe; or, I know for certain that there is a God: Yet I ſhould deſerve to be confined as a lunatic, if I entertained the leaſt doubt that there was a Louis the 14th, or if I do not as confidently believe this probable, as well as that certain truth. The reader will eaſily apply this criterion to the Sacred Writings; particularly to the prophecies of our Saviour reſpecting Jeruſalem, thoſe of St. Paul, 2 Theſſ. ii. 1 Tim. iv. and thoſe of St. John in the Book of Revelation *.

We obſerve, as a third criterion, that as the primitive church was better qualified to judge which books were divine, which not, than we, who know not whether the authors were prophets, whether they pretended that their books were of divine inſpiration, or mere human compoſitions; or what judgement the Apoſtles formed of their fellow-labourers and diſciples; it follows, "that the teſtimony of the primitive church is of great weight, if we find nothing material which contravenes it." We mean not the partial teſtimony of ſome doctors, but the general aſſent given to a book by the whole church; for there have always been credulous perſons, who have received human writings as divine; but it is incredible that the whole church of the firſt century committed an error of this kind, ſince we know the care with which ſhe diſtinguiſhed, and ſometimes too ſuſpiciouſly, the canonical from the apocryphal books of the New Teſtament. By a general aſſent, we do not mean the aſſent of all, who were ever called Chriſtians: it is well known that ſome heretics rejected many books, merely becauſe they contradicted their errors; and theſe are not to be admitted in evidence at all. The propoſition demands too another reſtriction: If the primitive church had unanimouſly received a book as divine, of which we either knew not the author, or had no other evidence of his being a prophet, the unanimous teſtimony of the church would not prove that book to be divine; at leaſt the teſtimony muſt be conſidered as doubtful: for though we receive ſome books of the Old Teſtament as divine, without knowing the author; yet it is not becauſe we have an abſolute faith in the teſtimony of the Jewiſh church, but becauſe Chriſt and his Apoſtles have, by their infallible teſtimony, authenticated the writings which the Jews received as divine; ſo that our faith is not in that church, but in Chriſt and his Apoſtles.—We proceed then to the proof of our propoſition. If a book be extant, written by a fellow-labourer of the Apoſtles, of whom we have probable grounds to believe that he had extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, and was a prophet, it is in ſome degree probable that his book, which contains a teſtimony concerning Chriſt might be inſpired: But who ſhall lead us to any further certainty in this?—They only who lived neareſt to his time, and knew whether the books had been pretended to be divine, either by him, or by the Apoſtles. If they agree in their teſtimony, and declare his book to be of divine authority, there can be no reaſon for not believing their teſtimony †.

The queſtion then is, what books have been unanimouſly received as divine by the primitive church. We need not collect the ſeveral teſtimonies of the fathers of the two firſt centuries, as this has been already done ſo copiouſly and ſatisfactorily, by the indefatigable Dr. Lardner; nor ſhall we appeal to the councils, which determine the canonical books of the New Teſtament; for though the councils ſhew what books have been declared divine by a majority of votes, yet we know not how great the majority was, or how large the number of diſſentients. Euſebius gives us the light we want in this matter; he divided the books which claim a divine inſpiration into three claſſes: Firſt, Ὁμολογουμενα, that is, thoſe which are univerſally received as divine. It is in behalf of theſe alone, that we would venture to alledge the teſtimony of the church; and we need not plead it in behalf of the reſt: In this claſs Euſebius places the four Goſpels, the Acts of the Apoſtles, all St. Paul's Epiſtles, and the firſt of St. John and St. Peter. We need no more, and ſhall now apply this to the Goſpels of St. Mark and St. Luke, and to the Acts of the Apoſtles. Theſe books were not indeed written by Apoſtles, but by ſuch aſſiſtants of theirs, as moſt probably had extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt. The whole primitive church accounted theſe books divine; and there is not a ſingle father to be named, who was of a different opinion. Nay, even moſt of the heretics acknowledged their divine authority; and none can be excepted, but ſuch as believed the moſt ridiculous Goſpels, or Lives of Chriſt. What room is there then to doubt of this teſtimony?

The ſecond claſs, according to Euſebius, were Αντιλεγομενα, that is, writings received as divine by the majority, but rejected by ſome. In this claſs he places the Epiſtles of James and Jude, the ſecond and third of John, and the ſecond of Peter. Now our reaſons for believing the divine authority of theſe are, not becauſe ſome have accounted them divine, but becauſe it can be ſufficiently proved that they were written by thoſe Apoſtles. If it be ſaid that this amounts at laſt to the partial teſtimony of the church, we anſwer, that the teſtimony of the ancients is valid in matters of hiſtory, though it may be exceptionable in matters of opinion: for in hiſtorical facts they might know the truth, and do certainly, if they be honeſt men, report the truth; but in their judgement of the divine inſpiration of a book they might be might be miſtaken, even if they were the moſt honeſt men in the world. The Νοϑα, or ſpurious pieces, form the third claſs; in which Euſebius reckons the Acts of St. Paul, the Shepherd, the Revelation of St. Peter, the Epiſtle of Barnabas, and the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions. He mentions it as doubtful whether the Revelation of St. John, and the Goſpel of the Hebrews belong to this claſs; and adds, that the ſpurious pieces are quoted by moſt writers of the church. The matter being thus ſtated, we need not be aſked, why we do not acknowledge the laſt claſs of writings to be divine? and why we receive the ῾Ομολογȣμενα as ſuch? Surely there is an immenſe difference between the unanimous and the partial teſtimony of the church *.

We have obſerved, that the firſt book of the New Teſtament, as it ſtands divided in the MSS, comprehends the four GOSPELS: The word ΕΥΑΓΓΕΛΙΟΝ has three ſignifications, which it is neceſſary to diſdiſtinguiſh;—a ſecular, a biblical, and an eccleſiaſtical ſignification: The bare confuſion of theſe has been the occaſion of errors. Some, for inſtance, by confounding theſe ſenſes, have been led to aſcribe a Goſpel to St. Paul, and to pretend that he dictated St. Luke's Goſpel, becauſe we read Rom. ii. 16. "According to my GOSPEL." In the profane Grecian authors Ευαγγελιον ſignifies any "good meſſage," or joyful tidings; but in the New Teſtament it is confined to the ſenſe of "the glad tidings of the actual coming of the Meſſiah," and is even oppoſed to the prophecies concerning Chriſt, Rom. i. 1, 2. So St. Mark writes, ch. i. 1—4. The beginning of the Goſpel was John the Baptiſt; and our Saviour thought the enquiry of John, "who he was," ſufficiently anſwered, when, after referring him to his miracles, he adds, "the poor have the Goſpel preached unto them;" that is, the coming of the Meſſiah is proclaimed to the poor: Matth. xi. 5. The church has affixed a new ſenſe to the word, by giving to the lives of Chriſt the name of Goſpels. This is the ancient and modern title of the four Goſpels; and the eccleſiaſtical name of the authors is that of "Evangeliſts."

We ſhall not take upon us to determine, why the number of the Goſpels is four, and not three or five; ſome of the Fathers have in their way accounted for it from the four winds: But though we have no opinion of any myſtery in the number, yet there ſeem to be good reaſons why the hiſtory, which was to be the ground of our faith, is related by more than one witneſs. It adds credibility to ſo important a hiſtory; eſpecially as the ſeveral hiſtorians plainly appear not to have conſulted each other. If St. John had read the former Goſpels, (as moſt probably he had) yet he relates very few things in common with them. If we only compare John vi. 21. with the other Evangeliſts, and John xix. 14. with Mark xiv. 25. we ſhall obſerve that the ſeeming contradiction might have been avoided by a ſingle word, if St. John had taken any pains to agree exactly with the other Evangeliſts. Theſe ſeeming contradictions among the Evangeliſts,—which however are reconcileable,—are no blemiſh, but rather a conſiderable advantage to us, as they afford us an argument, that they did not write in concert. When ſeveral perſons report the ſame facts, of which they were eye-witneſſes, without borrowing them from each other, it is impoſſible to avoid ſome ſeeming contradictions. We appeal to any experienced lawyer, whether he would not ſuſpect the truth of an examination, in which four, or any number of witneſſes, had given exactly the ſame anſwers to the interrogatories? And if they ſhould agree in the language too, there would be ground to ſuſpect that the examiner had drawn up the depoſitions himſelf; and had either not interrogated the witneſſes at all, or had ſuggeſted to them the anſwers, in order to carry his point. And the ſeeming contradiction of ſeveral eye-witneſſes, is eaſily accountable from this circumſtance, That each of them did not obſerve every tranſaction, but only perhaps a ſingle one; which may perplex the judge or the reader in reconciling them.

But if the queſtion be repeated more cloſely, why the number of the Evangeliſts is exactly four, we muſt look for the reaſons of it not in the number, but in other circumſtances. That which St. Matthew wrote, (as is ſuppoſed, in the Hebrew) was abridged, and written in Greek by St. Mark: Theſe two amount to no more than one witneſs. St. Luke was providentially hindered from reading St. Matthew; thus we have two witneſſes who knew nothing of each other's writing; and the world is at liberty to give a ſeparate hearing to each of them, and ſtrictly to examine whether their teſtimony agrees upon the whole. If both theſe witneſſes of ſo circumſtantial a hiſtory, notwithſtanding all ſeeming contradictions, are perfectly reconcileable, without having conſulted together, or read each other, then they cannot at leaſt have forged the hiſtory, unleſs we ſuppoſe a third to have forged and dictated it to them. But Matthew and Luke ſtand clear of this ſuſpicion: Who could impoſe upon them a forged life of Chriſt? ſince one of them was conſtantly attendant upon his perſon, and the other had a familiar intercourſe with many eye-witneſſes of the facts he recorded. St. John was added to theſe, not to increaſe the number of witneſſes, nor, ſtrictly ſpeaking, as an hiſtorian; but as a polemick, who confutes certain errors, from the life of Chriſt, and at the ſame time relates ſome moſt important miracles and diſcourſes, which had been omitted by his predeceſſors. Theſe are the reaſons why Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John wrote their Goſpels; and hence we have four Evangeliſts.

One of the moſt frequent apparent contradictions among the Evangeliſt, relates to the circumſtance of time, the ſame fact being reported earlier by one than by another: This apparent contradiction ariſes from hence, that the Evangeliſts did not write in chronological order. No hiſtorian is bound to relate every thing exactly in order of time, unleſs he is writing a journal, which is the moſt tedious and diſagreeable kind of hiſtory: In writing a perſpicuous, and at the ſame time an agreeable narration of facts, it is neceſſary ſometimes to relate, together with an event, its conſequences in after-times; and when the writer reaches theſe times and conſequences, to return back to the ſource of them; or he is obliged now and then to connect facts which are ſomewhat related, though in point of time they are very far aſunder. It is particularly uſual in Biography to diſregard the order of time, in relating the moſt remarkable circumſtances of a life. The Evangeliſts write much in the ſame order as other hiſtorians; none of whom, even the greateſt and moſt celebrated, have perfectly obſerved chronological order.

An Harmony of the Goſpels is a book, whoſe object is to remove the ſeeming contradictions of the Evangeliſts, and ſo to point out the true chronolo-

St. MATTHEW's Goſpel was written before the other three. His name in Hebrew is מתתי, Metti; or, contracted, מתי. He was alſo called Levi, and was the ſon of Alpheus: Not of that Alpheus or Cleophas, (for theſe are one name) who was a kinſman and diſciple of Jeſus, and the father of James, Joſes, Simon, and Judas; for we have not the leaſt trace in St. Matthew, of his being related to Chriſt. His profeſſion, and call to his apoſtolick office, are ſet forth Matth. ix. 9. Mark ii. 14. and his converſe with Chriſt enabled him to write a credible hiſtory of his life and actions. As he has the firſt place in all copies of the New Teſtament, we may conclude him to have been the firſt of the four Evangeliſts. If regard had been had to precedency of rank, St. John muſt have been placed firſt; but, they are ranked with a view to the order of time in which each of them wrote. Euſebius affirms that this Goſpel was written in the year 41, which makes it the firſt of all the books of the New Teſtament. He is followed by Euthymius and Theophylact, by moſt of the ſubſcriptions of St. Matthew's Goſpel, and an Arabick life of St. Matthew. Nicephorus places it in the 15th year after the aſcenſion; that is, in the 49th year after the birth of Chriſt: And Irenæus reports that St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel about the time when Paul and Peter preached at Rome, which dates it about the year 61.

"I muſt confeſs, ſays Mr. Michaelis, that the opinion of Irenæus ſeems to me the moſt probable; not only as he is the moſt ancient of thoſe who give us the circumſtance of time, but for many other reaſons. St. Luke ſeems (as will appear hereafter) not to have ſeen St. Matthew's Goſpel when he wrote his own: which is hardly poſſible, if St. Matthew's had then been written twenty-two years; eſpecially as St. Luke was in the mean time at Jeruſalem. It is beſides the common error of the fathers to magnify the antiquity of writings, rather than to detract from it." Dr. Mill and Dr. Lardner concur nearly with Michaelis; only the latter thinks that St. Matthew's Goſpel was written in Greek about A. D. 64. It is the general opinion of theſe, and almoſt all other critics, that the three firſt Evangeliſts had not ſeen each other's Goſpel: But an ingenious writer has lately compared the ſeveral Goſpels together in the original language, and thinks he has diſcovered ſtrong internal proofs of the contrary; as well as of a much more early date for St. Matthew's Goſpel. "It is the unanimous opinion of antiquity, ſays he, that St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel for the ſervice of the Jews in Paleſtine, with a view to confirm thoſe who believed, and to convert, if poſſible, thoſe who believed not. The ſtructure and genius of his Goſpel countenance and corroborate this opinion; for he begins with the genealogy of Chriſt from Abraham; refers often to Jewiſh cuſtoms; relates the moſt of our Saviour's diſcourſes againſt Jewiſh errors and ſuperſtitions; quotes the greateſt number of paſſages from the Jewiſh Scriptures; anſwers the moſt conſiderable Jewiſh objections, and frequently makes uſe of the terms and phraſes of the Jewiſh theology. Theſe marks of its being primarily intended for the benefit of the Jews ſtand as it were on the ſurface of his Goſpel, and are obvious to every reader who is tolerably acquainted with the original. But if we look a little deeper, we ſhall find that it abounds with other characters, ſtrongly expreſſive of the ſame deſign. To introduce us to the knowledge of theſe characters, it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that in penning their Goſpels the ſacred hiſtorians had a conſtant regard, as well to the circumſtances of the perſons for whoſe uſe they wrote, as to the ſeveral particulars of Chriſt's life which they were then writing. It was this that regulated the conduct of their narration, that frequently determined them in their choice of materials; and, when they had choſen, induced them either to contract or enlarge, as they judged expedient: In ſhort, it was this that modified their hiſtories, and gave them their different colourings. Now if the Goſpels were thus modelled to the ſtate, temper and diſpoſition of the times in which they were written, then are we furniſhed with certain criteria, by which we may judge of their reſpective dates; for thoſe times whoſe tranſactions accord with the turn of the diſcourſes related in the Goſpel hiſtories, are in all probability the very times when the Goſpels were written.

If we bring St. Matthew's to this teſt, and examine it by the foregoing principle, it will manifeſtly appear to have been penned at a time, when the church was labouring under a heavy perſecution: For it contains many obvious references to ſuch a ſtate; and many dexterous applications both to the injurious and the injured party. As to the injured and perſecuted Chriſtians, the Evangeliſt informs them, That their afflictions were no more than they had been taught to expect, and had promiſed to bear; ch. x. 21, 22. 24, 36. that however unreaſonable their ſufferings might be, they were uſeful and profitable; ch. v. 11—xxiv. 9, 13. that a puſillanimous deſertion of the faith would expoſe them to greater calamities, ch. x. 28, 32, 33, 39. that if it ſhould be their fate to ſuffer martyrdom at laſt for their religion, it was infinitely better to continue faithful to their truſt, than by a baſe compliance to incur His diſpleaſure, in whoſe hands are the iſſues not only of this life, but alſo of that which is to come; ch. xvi. 25, 27.—x. 28. On the other hand, to calm the paſſions of the enraged Jews, and win them over to the profeſſion of the Goſpel, he labours to ſoften their prejudices, and to engage them to the practice of meekneſs and charity; ch. ix. 13. He reminds them of the repeated puniſhments of their forefathers, for their cruel and barbarous treatment of the prophets, and aſſures them, that a ſtill more accumulated vengeance was reſerved for themſelves, if they obſtinately perſiſted in the ways of cruelty; ch. xxiv. 2, &c. Theſe, and ſuch like arguments, St. Matthew has inſerted in the body of his Goſpel, by way of comfort to the afflicted Chriſtians, and as a warning to thoſe who oppreſſed and injured them. But theſe arguments evidently refer to a ſtate of diſtreſs and perſecution: And therefore the church muſt be ſuppoſed to labour under ſuch a ſtate when the Evangeliſt advanced and urged them. Now the greateſt perſecution ever raiſed againſt the church, while it conſiſted only of Jewiſh converts, was that which was firſt begun by the Sanhedrim, and afterwards continued and conducted by Saul with implacable rage and fury. During theſe ſeverities, which laſted in the whole about ſix years, the members of the Chriſtian church ſtood in need of all the ſupport, comfort, and aſſiſtance, that could poſſibly be adminiſtered to them. But what comfort could they poſſibly receive, in their diſtreſſed condition, comparable to that which reſulted from the example of their ſuffering Maſter, and the promiſe he had made to his faithful followers? This example, therefore, and theſe promiſes, St. Matthew ſeaſonably laid before them for their imitation and encouragement. For now, towards the cloſe of this dangerous period, it is moſt likely that he wrote his Goſpel; and delivered it them as the anchor of their hope, to keep them ſtedfaſt in this violent tempeſt. This opinion is not only conformable to the circumſtances of the times, and the tenor of the Goſpel, but is alſo ſupported by ancient teſtimony: For Coſmas of Alexandria, who wrote in the beginning of the ſixth century, informs us, that a perſecution being raiſed on the death of Stephen, which obliged St. Matthew to depart from Judea, the believers entreated him to leave with them a written inſtruction, for the regulation of their lives; with which requeſt he complied, and wrote his Goſpel. The author of the Imperfect Work on St. Matthew, formerly ſuppoſed to be St. Chryſoſtom, ſeems to intimate the ſame thing. From hence it appears to have been a common notion, that St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel before the end of that firſt perſecution, which raged in Paleſtine after the death of the martyr Stephen. He muſt therefore have written early; and if he wrote ſo early as the year 38, the ſecond of Caligula, and the fifth from our Saviour's aſcenſion, then it is eaſy to ſee why he did not continue his hiſtory beyond that remarkable event. Nor is it leſs evident why he affixed no marks or dates to any of the tranſactions he has recorded. They were then recent, and too well known to ſtand in need of ſuch ſpecification[*]."

Thus far Dr. Owen, whoſe Obſervations on the other Evangeliſts we ſhall have Occaſion to mention as we proceed.

We are next to enquire, in what language St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel. All the Fathers, and all the ſubſcriptions at the end of that Goſpel, which mention the language, report, that St. Matthew wrote it in Hebrew, for the benefit of the Chriſtians dwelling in Judea. By "Hebrew," is not meant the language of the Bible, but the dialect in uſe at Jeruſalem; which was a mixture of Hebrew and Chaldee. The Romaniſts commonly follow the Fathers in this matter; which none of them has diſcuſſed with ſo much learning, as Pere Simon, in his Critical Hiſtory of the New Teſtament. Many, however, maintain the contrary opinion, and believe that St. Matthew wrote in Greek: Perhaps their chief reaſon is the groundleſs prejudice, that all the books of the New Teſtament were written in Greek, and the apprehenſion of danger from admitting that the original text of an inſpired book is loſt, and only a tranſlation preſerved. But, in an hiſtorical queſtion, we are certainly bound to give credit to the unanimous teſtimony of the ancients, unleſs it manifeſtly appears to be fabulous. This obligation increaſes upon us, if we conſider, that it is merely from the teſtimony of antiquity that we know this Goſpel to have been written by St. Matthew, and therefore to be a divine book. If we refuſe our belief to the concurrent teſtimony of the ancients, how can we juſtly maintain the divinity of this book upon the ſame teſtimony?

We may obſerve further, that beſides the united teſtimony of the Fathers, it is unaccountable, if St. Matthew wrote in Greek, why St. Mark ſhould abridge him. The ſize of St. Matthew's Goſpel could not be his motive; but if he wrote in Hebrew, then a Greek abſtract or abridgement of him might be of uſe. But, if we have loſt the original text of St. Matthew, and have only a Greek tranſlation now extant, we certainly cannot aſcribe divine inſpiration to the words: However, we have the ſatisfaction to find that the principal facts related by St. Matthew are mentioned by the other Evangeliſts, and that St. Mark was moved by the Holy Ghoſt to give us a full and authentick abſtract of the Hebrew Goſpel of St. Matthew. Add to all this, that the Greek tranſlation is not very eaſy; but follows the original text ſo cloſely, that it is more Hebrew than Greek; inſomuch, that ſometimes the Greek conſtruction is wrong: For inſtance, ch. ii. 6. τῆ Ιȣδα; iv. 15. Hence it is not difficult to conjecture in doubtful places, what was the original word uſed by St. Matthew, if we are acquainted with the Chaldee and Syriac languages, thoſe excellent helps to the right explanation of St. Matthew's Goſpel. The original Hebrew Goſpel of St. Matthew muſt not be confounded with his Goſpel in the Syriac New Teſtament, which is a mere tranſlation; as is alſo the Hebrew Goſpel publiſhed by Munſter and Tillet. Euſebius relates that Pantenus, a Chriſtian Philoſopher, who reſided at Alexandria about the year of Chriſt 184, found in the Indies a Goſpel of St. Matthew, ſaid to have been carried thither by St. Bartholomew. In the year 488 there was found in the Iſle of Cyprus, upon the breaſt of St. Barnabas, a copy of St. Matthew's Goſpel, written by St. Barnabas himſelf, upon a ſort of wood very hard and precious. In the third century Count Joſeph found at Tiberias an Hebrew Copy of St. Matthew's Goſpel, in a private place, where the Jews kept alſo the Goſpel of St. John, and the Acts of the Apoſtles tranſlated from the Greek into Hebrew.

St. Matthew in writing his Goſpel had chiefly in view, to ſhew us the royal deſcent or genealogy of Jeſus Chriſt, and to repreſent to us his life and converſation among the children of men. None of the Evangeliſts enter ſo far into the particulars of the actions of their great Lord and Maſter; enumerate ſo many rules for the conduct of life; or give ſo many leſſons of morality. St. Matthew has all the characters of a good hiſtorian; truth and impartiality, clearneſs of narration, propriety and gravity of language: He is ſerious without formality or ſtiffneſs, plain with dignity, and agreeably copious, particularly in his relation of our bleſſed Saviour's divine diſcourſes and wonderful works[†].

We have hitherto no ſatisfactory account of St. MARK, the author of the ſecond Goſpel. The ancients in general agree, that he was a familiar companion of St. Peter, who, in his firſt Epiſtle, ch. v. 13. mentions Mark, and calls him "his ſon." Poſſibly this may be the ſame Mark, who is elſewhere mentioned in the New Teſtament, and who might very well be a companion of St. Peter, since Peter was ſo well acquainted in the family of his mother, Acts xii. 12—14. and St. Paul had taken him as a companion in his Travels. Theſe circumſtances thus concurring, it is highly probable that Mark,—the Evangeliſt,—the ſon of Peter,—and the fellow traveller of Paul, were one and the ſame perſon. His name was John Mark, Acts xii. 12. Mark being only a ſurname, which probably he aſſumed in compliance with the Jewiſh cuſtom, whilſt he travelled amongſt the Heathens, to whom his Hebrew name of John would have appeared too foreign. His mother's name was Mary; ſhe dwelt at Jeruſalem, and the Chriſtians aſſembled at her houſe. Mark was alſo "Couſin to Barnabas," Col. iv. 10. and had accompanied him and Paul in their firſt travels among the Gentiles; but he ſoon ſeparated from them, Acts xiii. 13. which occaſioned a diviſion between Paul and Barnabas, when the latter took Mark along with him in another journey; Acts xv. 36—40. However, St. Paul had a better opinion of him afterwards, when Mark lived at Rome, about the time of St. Paul's impriſonment; for he reckons him among his "fellow labourers," Philem. 24. and it appears from Col. iv. 10. that he had thoughts of ſending him to Coloſſus.

St. Mark then, conſidered in an human light, was a very credible witneſs of the life of Chriſt: He was, ſtrictly ſpeaking, "an Evangeliſt;" that is, a preacher ſent by the Apoſtles to Jews and Gentiles, without being confined to any particular church. What Timothy was to Paul, Mark was to Peter and Barnabas; and at laſt he bore the ſame relation to St. Paul himſelf. It was uſual for ſuch Evangeliſts to have extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt; which is evident from 1 Tim. iv. 14. 2 Tim. i. 6. Hence it is highly probable, that St. Mark wrote by inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt; and as the primitive church has tranſmitted to us his Goſpel, as a book of divine authority, without ever entertaining the leaſt doubt of his inſpiration, we have no grounds to conſider it as a merely human compoſition. But, there is a more important witneſs of the inſpiration of St. Mark than the primitive church: Clemens Alexandrinus mentions, in the ſixth book of his "Hypotypos," that "St. Mark wrote his Goſpel at the requeſt of ſome Chriſtians at Rome; and that when Peter heard this, he expreſſed his ſatisfaction at the deſire of knowledge among the Roman Chriſtians, and ordered the Goſpel of St. Mark to be thenceforward read in the churches."

St. Mark is univerſally allowed to have had St. Matthew's Goſpel before him; and the learned writer above-mentioned (Dr. Owen) is of opinion, that he had alſo that of St. Luke. The Goſpel of theſe two Evangeliſts were written,—that of St. Matthew with particular reference to the Jews,—that of St. Luke with a view to the Gentiles: But when Chriſtianity had gained further ground, he thinks the ſerious profeſſors of it might wiſh to ſee the Goſpel exhibited in a more ſimple form. Accordingly, St. Mark wrote his hiſtory at the requeſt, and for the uſe of the Chriſtian converts at Rome; his Goſpel therefore is a plain and compendious narrative, diveſted of almoſt all peculiarities, and accommodated to the uſe of the Chriſtians in general. As the other two Evangeliſts had been ſo full in their accounts of our Saviour's birth and infancy, this gives us a ſufficient reaſon for St. Mark's paſſing over that period of the hiſtory, and confining his narrative to the time of our Lord's publick miſſion: And as this had been ſo well related already, he had little more to do, than to abridge the two former Goſpels; varying ſome expreſſions, and inſerting ſome additions, which he probably had from St. Peter. Whoever compares St. Mark with the other two Evangeliſts, will find that he copies largely from both, and takes one or other of them conſtantly for his guide; but chiefly St. Matthew. The Order, which is his own, is cloſe and well connected. In his account of facts he is clear, exact, and critical; for he wrote for the peruſal of a learned people; and he proceeds with caution, as it were to preſerve his Goſpel from all objections.

His Exordium is ſingular; for, whilſt other Evangeliſts ſtile our Saviour, "the Son of Man," he calls him expreſly, "the Son of God:"—An auguſt title, more likely to engage the attention of the lordly Romans. With this ſame view, probably, he omits ſuch particulars, as might be of more uſe to his countrymen than to foreigners; as, the genealogy of Chriſt,—the maſſacre of the children of Bethlehem,—the account of Jeſus's birth,—and in general, the quotation of certain prophecies of the Old Teſtament. On the other hand, he adds ſome things for the ſake of the Gentiles, to enable them the better to underſtand the hiſtory of Chriſt. Thus, in ch. vii. 2. he explains what was the meaning of "defiled," or "common," among the Jews; and in ver. 3, 4. inſtructs his readers in the Jewiſh cuſtoms; which was unneceſſary in St. Matthew: In ch. xv. 21. having mentioned Simon the Cyrenian, he adds, that "he was the father of Alexander and Rufus," becauſe both theſe perſons reſided at Rome, and were known to the Roman Chriſtians; Rom. xvi. 30. and poſſibly the "young man" mentioned in ch. xiv. 51, 52. was a Roman, whoſe curioſity might lead him to know the cauſe of the tumult, and who being a ſtranger, might be the ſooner ſuſpected, and therefore apprehended. He had perhaps often told the ſtory at Rome, and the Evangeliſt thought proper to confirm it. In this light it makes a good argument. All internal marks of this ſort confirm the report of the ancients, that St. Mark wrote his Goſpel chiefly for the uſe of the Romans.

The Date of it is uncertain; but Mr. Michaelis thinks it probable, that it was written at the time of St. Paul's impriſonment at Rome, where St. Mark was then reſident. "The time when he wrote it, ſays Dr. Owen, appears to have been about the end of the year 62 or 63, the ninth of the Emperor Nero; when the church ſtood in need of all the conſolations of religion, to ſupport it under the afflictive weight of a moſt dreadful and cruel perſecution." The Greek language was at that time more in vogue at Rome, than the French is among us; inſomuch, that the moſt familiar letters of Auguſtus, which are ſtill extant, are commonly either in Greek, or intermixed with Greek: We are not therefore to wonder that St. Mark wrote his Goſpel in that language. When St. Paul wrote his Epiſtle to the Romans, he wrote it in Greek; and why ſhould not St. Mark have done the ſame? If he intended it ſhould have been of univerſal uſe, he could not have done otherwiſe: And as we are told that the Apoſtles in their travels left the Goſpels behind them, in thoſe countries wherein they preached; if St. Mark had written his in Latin, it would not have been intelligible in all the countries where he preached; but if written in Greek, it might have been underſtood univerſally. It would be ridiculous to appeal to the copy of St. Mark's Goſpel exhibited at Venice,—though ſaid to have been written with St. Mark's own hand,—as an evidence either of his writing in Latin or Greek, becauſe the letters are ſo obliterated, that though ſome are of opinion it was written in Greek, yet there are others equally poſitive that it was written in Latin. Miſſon, however, informs us, that he diſcovered in it the letters Δ and Σ, which are peculiarly Greek, and the Greek prepoſition KATA. That the Latin verſion was very ancient, and perhaps done by the ſame perſons who tranſlated the other Goſpels, (as appears by the reſemblance they bear in ſtile) is very probable; but when we ſay more, we ſay more than we ought, or can prove.

St. Mark, as was before obſerved, follows the ſteps both of St. Matthew and St. Luke; and ſometimes interprets and explains them: Like his great Maſter St. Peter, he has a comprehenſive, clear, and beautiful brevity: His ſtile comes up to what the beſt criticks demand of an hiſtorian; it is majeſtick and grave, as well as ſimple and unaffected: He ſometimes uſes the repetition of words of the ſame original and like ſound, though ſparingly; and when he does, it appears graceful and becoming. This divine writer, notwithſtanding his brevity, makes ſome noble reflections; and we may ſay with truth of his Goſpel, that, conſidering the copiouſneſs and majeſty of the ſubject, the variety of great actions, and their ſurpriſing circumſtances, the number of ſound morals, and curious remarks comprized in it, it is one of the ſhorteſt and cleareſt, the moſt marvellous and ſatisfactory hiſtories in the world [*].

The Goſpel according to St. LUKE is generally allowed to have been written by that "beloved phyſician," who is mentioned by St. Paul, Coloſſ. iv. 14. and whom he expreſly aſſerts to have been "a Gentile:" Conſequently he was neither one of the ſeventy diſciples, nor an eye-witneſs of our Saviour's miracles, as hath been ſometimes ſuppoſed; but we know that he was intimately converſant with apoſtolical perſons. That St. Luke travelled with St. Paul to Rome, and there aſſiſted him for ſome time, appears from Acts xxviii. 13—16. Col. iv. 14. and Philem. 24. From thence he is ſaid to have gone into Africa, and to have preached the Goſpel at Thebes in Egypt: His intercourſe with the Apoſtles, and eye-witneſſes of the works of Chriſt, renders him an unexceptionable evidence as a man; eſpecially ſince he aſſures us that he inveſtigated every thing diligently, ακριβῶς, and had drawn it from the fountain head, ανωθεν: ch. i. 3. And it is no more an objection to the divinity of his book, that he wrote from the information of others, than it is to the inſpiration of Moſes, that he took his firſt book from ancient records, and ſometimes refers to other books: Numb. xxi. 27. And therefore we may well receive the univerſal teſtimony of the Chriſtian church, that St. Luke, under the direction of the Holy Ghoſt, committed to writing thoſe particulars, which he had received from infallible witneſſes.

The ancients affirm that St. Luke wrote later than St. Matthew and St. Mark; but Dr. Owen (as hath been already hinted) thinks that St. Mark wrote laſt of the three. He fixes the date of St. Luke's Goſpel in the year 53, the third of the emperor Claudius. St. Jerome aſſerts that he penned it on the borders of Achaia and Bœotia, which ſhould ſeem to be at the time when he was attending St. Paul in his travels through Greece, under whoſe care and inſpection he probably wrote it. It is agreed to be this Evangeliſt, whom that Apoſtle expreſly ſtiles "The brother whoſe praiſe is in the Goſpel;" 2 Cor. viii. 18. and that St. Luke wrote agreeably at leaſt to St. Paul's ſenſe, will be evident to any one who compares Luke xxii. 19, 20. with 1 Cor. xi. 23—25. where the Apoſtle and Evangeliſt have both uſed the very ſame words in Greek, to deſcribe the inſtitution of the Lord's Supper. This coincidence ſhews the agreement of their ſentiments, whichever of them is ſuppoſed to have written firſt.

St. Matthew's Goſpel being intended chiefly for the Jews, it was highly expedient that ſome inſpired apoſtolical perſon ſhould write ſuch an hiſtory of our Saviour's life, as might ſatisfy the enquiries, and be adapted to the ſituation of the Gentile converts. This accordingly appears to have been the peculiar view of St. Luke in his Goſpel; for, writing to thoſe who were far remote from the ſcene of action, and ignorant of Jewiſh affairs, it was requiſite for him to deſcend to many particulars, and touch on many points, which would have been unneceſſary when writing to the Jews. Hence he begins his hiſtory ſo much further back than the reſt, and is ſo careful in ſpecifying times and places: Hence he gives the genealogy of Chriſt, according to his natural deſcent from the Virgin Mary, and carries it up to Adam; ſhewing that he was that "ſeed of the woman," who was promiſed for the redemption of the whole world.

With regard to the general conſtruction of St. Luke's Goſpel, it ſeems to be formed nearly on the ſame plan with that of St. Matthew, whoſe very words are ſometimes copied. Indeed, as the Gentile converts ſuffered the ſame things from their countrymen, that the Jewiſh Chriſtians did from the Jews, it was neceſſary that St. Luke ſhould adopt much the ſame points of inſtruction, both to ſupport the poor perſecuted Chriſtians, and to ſoften and convert their malicious adverſaries; of whom the Jews reſiding in the ſeveral countries were ſtill the chief. But as the rage and envy of the Jews proceeded now from another cauſe, (for they perſecuted the Gentile Chriſtians for laying claim to the privileges of the Goſpel) we accordingly find St. Luke's narrative peculiarly adapted to remove their prejudices, and obviate their objections; to enlarge and mollify their minds, and to deter them from their malicious proceedings.

St. Luke, it is univerſally agreed, wrote in Greek; and, (as appears from the beginning both of his Goſpel, and of the Acts of the Apoſtles,) at the requeſt of a Chriſtian of diſtinction, whoſe name was Theophilus. He calls him Κρατιστε, or "excellent;" as we addreſs certain perſons with the title of "excellency." The ſame Greek title is given to the Roman governor, Acts xxiii, 26. xxiv. 3. xxvi. 25. and was equivalent to the Latin "Optimus," or "Optimas," which the Romans addreſſed to their principal ſenators of the moſt ancient families. Michaelis thinks that this Theophilus was ſome nobleman, who dwelt in Upper Egypt, and that St. Luke's Goſpel was written about A. D. 63, in that country near Thebes, which he ſuppoſes St. Jerome miſtook for Thebes in Bœotia. He obſerves, that the Syriack ſubſcription repreſents this Goſpel to have been publiſhed at Alexandria in Egypt; and imagines that many things in it were particularly expreſſed with a view to refute the falſhood of the "Egyptian goſpel," (of which we have a fragment in Fabricius's Codex Apocryphus) an erroneous narrative, whence Mahomet is ſuppoſed to have extracted many of thoſe falſe particulars of our Saviour's hiſtory, which he has inſerted in his Coran. St. Luke mentions that he was determined to draw up an authentick account of the life of Chriſt, becauſe "many had taken in hand, to ſet forth in order a declaration of thoſe things which are moſt ſurely believed:" He muſt, therefore, ſays Michaelis, have had ſome exception to theſe "many;" elſe he would hardly have been prevailed upon to write upon the ſame ſubject, which they had "ſet forth" already. This ſacred writer is very remarkable for the elegance, eaſe, and perſpicuity of his ſtile, which many Criticks upon the New Teſtament have greatly commended, and ſet forth in its full perfection [†].

The Goſpel of St. JOHN is univerſally agreed to have been written after all the reſt, with a view of completing whatever was deficient in them. We have ſpoken at large concerning it in the introductory note to that Goſpel; to which therefore we refer our readers, as well as to Lampe's Prolegomena, his comment on St. John, and to the writers before quoted.

We have now ſeen, in our account of the ſeveral Evangelical writers, at what time [‡], and with what view they wrote: From whence we obſerve the truth of Euſebius's aſſertion, "that they were all compoſed on ſpecial and urgent occaſions." Theſe Goſ-pels are by no means to be looked upon as ſo many detached pieces, but rather as one complete ſyſtem of divinity, ſupported by the ſtrongeſt proofs whereof the ſubject is capable, and defended againſt all the objections which either the Jews or Gentiles, or even its more dangerous heretical profeſſors could make to the truth and certainty of it. If we read them with due attention, and in the order they were written, we ſhall find them improving one upon another, and yet all conſpiring to the ſame end; that is, to a perfect repreſentation of the religion revealed by Chriſt.[*]

It is well known, that the firſt converts to Chriſtianity, deſirous of preſerving the memory of the things tranſlated by our Saviour, collected and digeſted all the reports they heard into hiſtories, which they called "Goſpels." Amongſt theſe were two of principal note; the one ſtiled "The Goſpel according to the Hebrews;" the other "The Goſpel according to the Egyptians." Both theſe Goſpels were pretended to have been compoſed by thoſe who were eye-witneſſes, and miniſters of the word, and were held in great veneration by the perſons to whom they were addreſſed. In this ſtate of things, when many and different Goſpels appeared, all claiming an equal authority, how were the true ones to be diſtinguiſhed from the falſe?—The abſurdities in them, it is true, might be ſufficient to deſtroy their credit with judicious men; but the generality then, as in all times, took things upon truſt; and indeed, if this was not the caſe, it is hard to conceive how ſeveral articles could gain belief, which paſſed current among the primitive Chriſtians. Since then there was little likelihood that they ſhould diſtinguiſh for themſelves, it was incumbent on the Evangeliſts to do it for them: —And they did it effectually; for they appriſed the world, that there were many ſpurious Goſpels abroad; but, as they deemed them worthy of no regard, ſo they wiſely took no notice of them: However, they carefully directed their diſciples to the true ones, and recommended them to their peruſal in an eſpecial manner. The three former Goſpels met with the ſanction and approbation of St. John, and were appointed to be read in the churches; afterwards, when he wrote his Goſpel, it was uſhered into the world with the knowledge, approbation, and perhaps teſtimony of all the Aſiatick Biſhops. Thus the true Goſpels were not only diſtinguiſhed from the falſe, but the prior ones continually received additional light, ſtrength, and confirmation from thoſe which followed, till at length the whole evangelical hiſtory was finally cloſed, and the evangelical canon eſtabliſhed upon the firmeſt ground, by the moſt venerable authority. For it is evident St. John cloſed the hiſtory of Chriſt, when he added his own to the three Goſpels; and leſt Chriſtians ſhould be deceived, by vain pretences to more perfect accounts than are there to be met with, he wiſely guarded them from receiving any other Goſpel, even though they ſhould chance to contain ſome real facts, not mentioned by himſelf or the other Evangliſts. "There are many other things," ſays he, "which Jeſus did, the which, if they ſhould be written every one, I ſuppoſe that even the world itſelf could not contain the books that ſhould be written." ch. xxi. 25. "But though there are many other things which Jeſus did in the preſence of his diſciples, which are not mentioned in this book of the four Evangeliſts which is here compleated, yet "theſe things" that are now written are ſufficient to anſwer the purpoſe intended; namely, "that you might ſee reaſon to believe, that Jeſus is the Chriſt, the Son of God; and that believing, you might have life through his name; (ch. xx. ver. 30, 31.) —therefore look no further." This rule the apoſtolic fathers religiouſly obſerved; for they always refer to the genuine Goſpels, and never, that we know of, to the apocryphal or ſpurious ones [*]. However,—not to rely on their teſtimony only,—in full proof of the credibility of the Goſpel hiſtory, we will give ſome reaſons ſufficiently demonſtrative of that credibility; and then cloſe our Diſſertation with remarks on the inſpiration of the Sacred Scriptures.

Now the firſt argument in proof of the credibility of the Goſpel hiſtory is, That the writings which contain that hiſtory were publiſhed very near the times in which Jeſus Chriſt is ſaid to have lived. This appears from what hath gone before; and this being the caſe, they muſt be allowed to contain a true hiſtory of the life of Chriſt; for had any thing been told of him that was not conſiſtent with the knowledge of his countrymen then living, it was in every one's power to have diſcovered and expoſed the fraud. The great tranſactions of Chriſt's life, as they ſtand recorded in the Goſpels, were of the moſt public nature, in which all the inhabitants of Judea were concerned, eſpecially the prieſts and rulers: His miracles are affirmed to have been performed openly, often before crowds, and in great towns, as well as in remote corners; nay, in the temple itſelf, under the immediate eye of the grandees, and that during the ſpace of four years. Perſons of all ranks and all ſects are introduced acknowledging the truth of them: His enemies, however bitter, did not deny them; but aſcribed them to the aſſiſtance of demons. Even the chief prieſts and Phariſees themſelves are ſaid to have confeſſed one to another, "That he did many miracles, and that if they let him alone, all men would believe on him." In ſome inſtances, the ſubjects of his miracles were carried before the magiſtrates, whoſe examination rendered thoſe miracles more public and unqueſtionable. On one occaſion, five thouſand people, and on another four thouſand, are ſaid to have been miraculouſly fed by him; many of whom muſt have been ſtill alive when the Goſpels appeared. He was tried by the ſupreme council of the Jews, examined by the tetrarch of Galilee and his captains, condemned by the Roman governor, and put to death at the metropolis, on the chief religious ſolemnity of the Jews, before all the people, who were come up from the different quarters of the country to worſhip. If theſe, and the like particulars found in the Goſpels had been fictitious, it was natural to think that the Jews, not only in their own country, but every where elſe, would have diſclaimed the facts both in converſation and writing, upon the firſt appearace of the books which aſſerted them. For it would then have been eaſy to have confuted them, the perſons of whom ſuch falſhoods were told being many of them alive; and by ſo doing, they might have ſuppreſſed the Chriſtian religion at once, which moſt of them looked upon with abhorrence, as an impious ſchiſm, diametrically oppoſite to the inſtitutions of Moſes. Yet it does not appear that any of them proceeded in this manner; neither Jew nor Gentile, in the earlieſt ages, attempting to fix the ſtain of falſhood on the Evangeliſts, or to diſprove any of the facts contained in their hiſtories. The truth is, the Goſpels were permitted to go abroad every where, without being called in queſtion by any perſon; which could be owing to no other cauſe than to the general belief which then prevailed, and to the particular perſuaſion of every individual capable of judgeing in ſuch matters, that all the paſſages of the Goſpel hiſtory exhibited things certain and indubitable.

First, according to Mr. Michaelis, with whom Mill and Lardner for the moſt part agree; and ſecondly, according to the more novel Scheme of Dr. Owen.

A ſecond argument to prove the credibility of the Goſpel hiſtory is, That the principal facts contained in that hiſtory, are vouched not only by all the Chriſtian writers now remaining, from the earlieſt ages down to the preſent times, but by the Jewiſh writers alſo, and even by the heathens themſelves. For, that Jeſus Chriſt lived in Judea, under the reign of the emperor Tiberius, Tacitus, Suetonius, and the younger Pliny expreſly teſtify; that he gathered diſciples, was put to death in an ignominious manner by Pontius Pilate, procurator of Judea; and that after his death he was worſhipped as a God, the ſame authors affirm. Nor are theſe things denied either by Porphyry, Julian, or any of the ancient enemies of Chriſtianity: on the contrary, they plainly acknowledge that miracles were done by Jeſus and his Apoſtles; and by aſcribing them to the power of magic, or the aſſiſtance of demons (which was the ſolution given by Chriſt's enemies in his own life-time) they have left us no room to doubt the ſincerity of their acknowledgments. The writers likewiſe of the talmudical books among the Jews, acknowledge the principal tranſactions of the life of Chriſt; for they durſt not contradict, nor even pretend to doubt of facts ſo univerſally known: they imputed them, ridiculouſly enough, to Chriſt's having in his poſſeſſion the true manner of writing the name Jehovah, which they ſaid he ſtole out of the temple. In ſhort, as Grotius has well expreſſed it, "there is no hiſtory in the world more certain and queſtionable than this, which is ſupported by the concurrent teſtimony, not to ſay of ſo many men, but of ſo many different nations; divided indeed among themſelves in other particulars, but all agreeing to acknowledge the truth of the matters contained in the Goſpels."

In the third place, the Goſpels are credible, becauſe The principal facts contained in them are confirmed by Monuments of great and public notoriety, ſubſiſting in every Chriſtian country at this very day. For inſtance, Baptiſm in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt,—the rite, by which from the beginning men have been initiated into the profeſſion of Chriſtianity,—keeps up the remembrance of Chriſt's having taught thoſe ſublime truths, concerning the Father Almighty, the Eternal Son, and the Ever-bleſſed Spirit, with which the world is now enlightened, as the Goſpel informs us. The Lord's Supper, celebrated frequently by all believers, keeps up a perpetual memory of the death of Chriſt.—The ſtated obſervation of the firſt day of the week, in honour of Chriſt's reſurrection on that day from the dead, hinders that great event from falling into oblivion. And as theſe monuments perpetuate the memory, ſo they demonſtrate the truth of the facts contained in the Goſpel hiſtory; for if Jeſus Chriſt neither lived, nor taught, nor wrought miracles, nor died, nor roſe again from the dead, it is altogether incredible that ſo many men, in countries ſo widely diſtant, ſhould have conſpired together to perpetuate ſuch an heap of falſhoods, by beginning the obſervation of thoſe inſtitutions of Baptiſm, the Lord's-ſupper, and the Sabbath; and it is no leſs incredible, that by continuing the obſervation of them, they ſhould have impoſed thoſe falſhoods upon their poſterity.

Nor is this all; the truth of the Goſpel hiſtory is demonſtrated by a monument of greater fame ſtill; I mean The ſudden converſion of a great part of the world from Judaiſm, and from the many different forms of heatheniſm to Chriſtianity; effected in all countries, notwithſtanding the ſword of the magiſtrate, the craft of the prieſts, the paſſions of the people, and the pride of the philoſophers were cloſely combined to ſupport their ſeveral national forms of worſhip, and to cruſh the Chriſtian Faith. Had this overthrow of the religions then ſubſiſting been brought to paſs by the force of arms, the influence of authority, or the refinements of policy, it had been leſs wonderful; whereas, having been accompliſhed by the preaching of twelve illiterate fiſhermen and their aſſiſtants, who were wholly deſtitute of the advantages of birth, learning, and fortune; and who by condemning the eſtabliſhed religions of all countries, were every where looked upon as the moſt flagitious of men, and oppoſed accordingly with the utmoſt virulence by all;—it is inconceivable how the world could have been converted, had the facts been falſe which theſe preachers aſſerted. And what makes this monument of the truth of our Lord's hiſtory ſtill more remarkable is, that the world was thus converted in an age celebrated for the height to which learning and the polite arts were carried by the Greeks and Romans, the moſt renowned maſters of the ſciences: Nay, which is ſtill further remarkable, almoſt the very firſt triumphs of the Chriſtian religion were in the heart of Greece itſelf; nor could Rome, the ſeat of wealth and empire, reſiſt the force of truth. Let it be obſerved too, that it was not the lower ſort of people only in thoſe countries who firſt became Chriſtians: among the early converts we find men of the higheſt rank and character, ſuch as Sergius Paulus, proconſul of Cyprus; Eraſtus, treaſurer of Corinth; Dionyſius, a member of the Areopagus at Athens; nay, and the domeſtics of the emperor himſelf; all of them perſons whoſe education qualified them to judge in an affair of this kind, and whoſe offices and ſtations rendered them conſpicuous. In proceſs of time, it was not a ſingle perſon of figure in this city or that nation who obeyed the Goſpel, but multitudes of the wiſe and learned, the noble and the mighty, in every country; who, being fully convinced of the truth of the Goſpel, and impreſſed with the deepeſt ſenſe of Chriſt's dignity, worſhipped him as God, notwithſtanding he had been puniſhed with the ignominious death of a malefactor, and they themſelves had been educated in the belief of other religions:—To deſert which they had not the ſmalleſt temptation from views of intereſt, but rather the contrary; inaſmuch as by becoming Chriſtians, they denied themſelves many gratifications in which their own religions indulged them; loſt the affections of their deareſt friends, who perſiſted in their ancient errors; and expoſed themſelves to all manner of ſufferings in their perſons, reputation, and fortunes. Add to this, that although the converſion of the world was ſudden, it was not on that account unſtable, or of ſhort continuance; for the Chriſtian religion has remained to this day in full vigour, during the courſe of almoſt eighteen hundred years, notwithſtanding its enemies every where ſtrenuouſly attacked it, both with arguments and with arms.

Upon the whole, monuments ſo remarkable ſtill ſubſiſting in the world, loudly proclaim the Truth of the Goſpel hiſtory, becauſe their original cannot be accounted for on any ſuppoſition but this, That the reports contained in the Goſpel concerning the doctrine, miracles, death, reſurrection, and aſcenſion of Jeſus, after the ſtricteſt ſcrutiny which thoſe who lived neareſt to the time and place of action could make, were found to reſt on proofs not to be gainſaid: and to entertain the leaſt ſuſpicion of the contrary, is to ſuppoſe, that when the Goſpel was firſt preached, all mankind in every country had renounced the common principles of ſenſe and reaſon.

In the fourth place, the Character of the Evangeliſts, both as writers and men, renders their hiſtory credible in the higheſt degree: They were eye-witneſſes and miniſters of the word; that is, of the things which they preached and wrote; relating ſcarce any thing but what they either ſaw, or heard, or performed themſelves. Now, theſe being all matters obvious to ſenſe, in judging of them neither acuteneſs of genius, or depth of learning were neceſſary; but only a ſound underſtanding, a faithful memory, and organs of ſenſe rightly diſpoſed. Wherefore, though the Evangeliſts were illiterate men, the ſubject of their Goſpels being for the moſt part matters falling under the cognizance of Senſe, and in many of which they were actors themſelves, they could not poſſibly be miſtaken in them; and as they could not themſelves be deceived in the things of which they wrote, ſo neither can it be imagined that they had any deſign to deceive the world: for it is well known that impoſtors always propoſe to themſelves ſome reward of their fraud,—Riches, or honour, or power: If ſo, thoſe who think the Evangeliſts impoſtors ought to ſhew what advantages they promiſed, or could promiſe to themſelves, by impoſing upon the world. It is well known that they oppoſed themſelves to all the religions then in being, and required the expreſs renunciation of them under the ſevereſt penalties; and by ſo doing, made all the world their enemies. Hence it came, that, inſtead of amaſſing riches, or wallowing in luxury, the firſt Chriſtians, but eſpecially "the ringleaders of the ſect of the Nazarenes," as they were called, the Apoſtles and Evangeliſts, were every where oppreſſed with poverty, hunger, nakedneſs, wretchedneſs. Inſtead of high offices of truſt and power, the bittereſt perſecutions awaited them in all places; and death itſelf, in its moſt terrible forms. Nor did theſe things befal them beyond their own expectations, by reaſon of croſs accidents thwarting well-laid ſchemes: They well knew what was to happen: their Maſter had foretold it to them again and again, and they themſelves expected no other. Can it then be imagined, that with the known loſs of all that is dear in life, with the conſtant peril of death, and with the certain proſpect of damnation, a number of men, in their right wits, ſhould have propagated what they were ſenſible was a groſs falſhood, and have perſiſted in the fraud even to death, ſealing their teſtimony with their blood. This ſurely is a pitch of folly whereof human nature is incapable; and therefore we muſt acknowledge, that the Evangeliſts, and all the firſt witneſſes of our Lord's miracles and doctrine, who by the Providence of God were generally thus brought to ſeal their teſtimony with their blood, were fully perſuaded of the truth of what they publiſhed in their ſermons and writings. It is not to the purpoſe to reply, that enthuſiaſts have ſuffered perſecution, and even death, in ſupport of falſe opinions; for though a perſon's dying for his opinions proves not their truth, it certainly proves the martyr's perſuaſion of the truth of his opinions. Let this be granted in the caſe of the Evangeliſts, and the controverſy is at an end: for if they themſelves really believed what they wrote, and could not poſſibly have any intention to deceive us, their Goſpels muſt undoubtedly be true; the things contained in them being generally matters obvious to ſenſe, which enthuſiaſm could by no means diſcolour, and in judging of which, perſons of the meaneſt capacities could not be deceived.

We obſerve, in the laſt place, that the perfect agreement ſubſiſting between the Goſpels, rightly underſtood, and the modeſty wherewith they are written, are circumſtances which greatly heighten their credibility. The apparent inconſiſtencies obſervable in ſome of the narrations, when compared together, prove undeniably that the Evangeliſts were in no combination to make up their hiſtories, and deceive the world. In many inſtances theſe inconſiſtencies are of ſuch a kind, as would lead one to believe that the ſubſequent hiſtorians did not compare the accounts of particular tranſactions which they were about to publiſh, with thoſe that were already abroad in the world: Each Evangeliſt repreſented the matters which are the ſubject of his hiſtory, as his own memory, under the direction of the divine Spirit ſuggeſted them to him; without conſidering how far they might be agreeable to the accounts which his brethren-hiſtorians had already given. At the ſame time, the eaſy and full reconciliation of theſe inconſiſtencies, which ariſes from a proper knowledge of the Goſpels, and of the manners and cuſtoms of antiquity, admirably diſcovers the ſober ſpirit of truth, by which thoſe writers were guided in every part of their narrations.

Moreover, the modeſty with which the Evangeliſts have written their hiſtories is very remarkable; for none of them ſingly has related all the tranſactions of our Lord's Life; neither do they all together relate the whole of them. So far are they from giving a complete hiſtory, that but a few of the particulars upon the whole are preſerved, even among them all: And ſuch things as they have thought fit to mention, though above meaſure great and wonderful, they have not painted with the gaudy colourings of rhetoric, or heightened with the magnificence of pompous language; but have told them with a ſimplicity unexampled in ſo great a ſubject. And as they have not ſtudied human eloquence in the compoſition of their hiſtories, ſo neither have they followed human prudence in the choice of their ſubjects; for although they muſt have been ſenſible that the tranſactions they were about to relate were not likely to be believed by the generality, being many of them oppoſite to the eſtabliſhed courſe of nature; yet it is evident they were at no pains to conſider what particulars were leaſt liable to exception, nor ſo much as to obviate the difficulties which aroſe from them. "It does not appear (ſays an able writer) that it ever came into the mind of the Evangeliſts to conſider how this or that action would appear to mankind, or what objections might be raiſed againſt them: But, without any attention to this, they lay the facts before you; at no pains to think whether thoſe facts would appear credible or not. If the reader will not believe their teſtimony, there is no help for it; they tell the truth, and attend to nothing elſe."

It likewiſe merits particular attention, that through the whole of their hiſtories the Evangeliſts have not paſſed one encomium upon Jeſus, or upon any of his friends; nor thrown out one reflection againſt his enemies; although much, of both kinds, might have been done, and no doubt would have been done by them, had they been governed either by a ſpirit of impoſture or enthuſiaſm. Chriſt's Life is not praiſed in the Goſpel; his death is not lamented; his friends are not commended; his enemies are not reproached: But, every thing is told naked, unadorned, indirectly, juſt as it happened; and all who read are left to judge, and make reflections for themſelves:—A manner of writing, which abundantly proves that the hiſtorians had real copies before them whence to draw; and into which they never could have fallen, had not their minds been under the guidance of the moſt ſober reaſon, and deeply impreſſed with the dignity, importance, and truth of their ſubject.

By the force of theſe, and arguments like theſe, the Goſpel hiſtory has gained a belief next to univerſal in ages paſt; and by theſe it ſtands at preſent firmly eſtabliſhed againſt the manifold violent attacks of its enemies, who, with unwearied application, are aſſaulting it on all ſides. But vain are their aſſaults: Strongly built on this ſolid foundation, it fears not ſubverſion, it is aſſured of perpetuity: And while men are capable of diſcerning truth, it will be believed and received to the end of the world*.

It is a plain Corollary from what has been ſaid, That if the Goſpel hiſtory be true, the Chriſtian religion is divine; from whence alſo, the Inſpiration of that hiſtory follows with no leſs certainty. By “Inſpiration” we mean, with Dr. Doddridge, “any ſupernatural influence of God upon the mind of a rational creature, where it is formed to any degree of intellectual improvement beyond what it would, at that time, and in thoſe circumſtances, have attained in a natural way; that is, by the uſual exerciſe of its faculties, unaſſiſted by any ſpecial divine interpoſition.” Thus, if a man were inſtantaneouſly enabled to ſpeak a language which he had never learned, how poſſible ſoever it might have been for him to have obtained an equal readineſs in it by degrees; few would ſcruple to ſay, that he owed his acquaintance with it to a divine inſpiration: Or, if he gave a true and exact account of what was doing at a diſtance, and publiſhed a particular relation of what he neither ſaw nor heard, as ſome of the prophets did; all the world would own, if the affair were too complex, and the account too circumſtantial to be the reſult of a lucky gueſs, that he muſt be inſpired with the knowledge of it; though another account, equally exact, given by a perſon on the ſpot, would be aſcribed to no inſpiration at all.

Of this ſupernatural influence on the minds of men, there are various ſorts and degrees: If a perſon be diſcourſing, either in words or writing, and God do miraculouſly watch over his mind, and, however ſecretly, direct it in ſuch a manner, as to keep him more ſecure from error in what he ſpeaks or writes, than he could have been merely by the natural exerciſe of his faculties, We ſhould ſay, he was inſpired; even though there ſhould be no extraordinary marks of high genius in the work, or even though another perſon, with a ſtronger memory, or relating a fact more immediately after it happened, might naturally have recounted it with equal exactneſs. Yet ſtill, if there was in this caſe any thing miraculous, we muſt, on the principles above, allow an inſpiration; and I would call this, to diſtinguiſh it from other and higher degrees, “An inſpiration of ſuperintendency.”

If this influence ſhould act in ſuch a degree, as abſolutely to exclude all mixture of error, in a declaration of doctrines or facts ſo ſuperintended, we might then call it, “A plenary ſuperintending inſpiration;” or, more briefly, “A full inſpiration.”

Now, from what has been obſerved, it follows, that a book, the contents of which are entirely true, may be ſaid to be written by a full inſpiration, even though it contain many things which the author might have known and recorded, merely by the uſe of his natural faculties, if there be others which he did not ſo well know, or could not without miraculous aſſiſtance have ſo exactly recollected; Or if on the whole, a freedom from all error would not in fact have been found, unleſs God had thus ſuperintended or watched over his mind and pen. And in regard to ſuch a production, it would be altogether inpertinent and inſignificant to enquire, how far did natural memory, or natural reaſon operate, and in what particular facts or doctrines did ſupernatural agency prevail. It is enough, if I know that what the author ſays or writes is true, though I know not particularly how he came by this or that truth: For my obligation to receive it ariſes from its being known truth, and not merely from its being made known this or that way: And ſhould God miraculouſly aſſure me, that any particular writing contained nothing but the truth; and ſhould he at the ſame time tell me, it had been drawn up without any miraculous aſſiſtance at all; though I could not then call it inſpired, I ſhould be as much obliged to receive and ſubmit to it, on its being thus atteſted by God, as if every ſingle word had been immediately dictated by Him.

It will further follow from what is ſaid above, that a book may be written by ſuch full inſpiration as we have deſcribed, (though the author being left to the choice of his own words, phraſes, and manner,) there may be ſome imperfection in the ſtile and method, provided the whole contents of it are true; if the ſubject be ſo important, as to make it conſiſtent with the divine wiſdom miraculouſly to interpoſe, to preſerve an entire credibility, as to the exact truth of facts recorded, and doctrines delivered as divine. If, indeed, God were repreſented as declaring ſuch a book to be intended by him as an exact ſtandard for logick, oratory, or poetry, every apparent defect in either would be an internal objection againſt it; But if it be repreſented only as intended to teach us truth, in order to its having a proper influence on our temper and actions; ſuch defects would no more warrant or excuſe our rejecting its authority, than the want of a ready utterance, or a muſical voice, would excuſe our diſregard to a perſon, who ſhould bring us competent evidence of his being a meſſenger from God to us.

This kind of inſpiration, is that which we aſſert to the ſacred books of the New Teſtament; and this without any exception or limitation, as they came out of the hands of the Apoſtles; though we allow it is poſſible they may in this or that particular copy, and in ſome minuter inſtances, which now perhaps affect all our remaining copies, have ſuffered ſomething by the injuries of time, or the negligence of tranſcribers, as well as printers: Which, that they have in ſome particulars ſuffered, is as notorious a fact, as that there is a written or a printed copy of them in the world; yet is at the ſame time a fact, which no man of common ſenſe or honeſty can ſeriouſly urge againſt their authority.

* See Macknight's Preliminary Obſervations; Addiſon's Evidences, &c. Leſlie's Short Method with the Deiſts; Hartley's Obſervations, vol. 2. Allix on the Sacred Scriptures; and Bp. Gibſon's 3d Paſtoral Letter.

Now we aver, that the full inſpiration of the New Teſtament, in the ſenſe above ſtated, follows from the acknowledged truth of the hiſtory which it contains, in all its leading and moſt important facts.

The teſtimony of the primitive Chriſtian writers, not only to the real exiſtence of the ſacred books in thoſe early ages, but alſo to their divine original, affords, no doubt, a ſtrong argument of their inſpiration; and another of great force may be drawn from the Internal Characters of divine inſpiration, with which every page of the New Teſtament abounds, and which render the book itſelf, if conſidered as detached from all external evidence whatever, a compendious demonſtration of its own ſacred original, and conſequently, of the certainty of that religion which it teaches. But the grand proof of the inſpiration of the New Teſtament, and that which appears above all others moſt convincing, is to be drawn from the credibility of its leading Facts: For, allowing theſe facts to be true; allowing that Jeſus Chriſt ſo lived, preached, died, and roſe again, as is recorded in the New Teſtament; allowing the truth of what is related in the Acts of the Apoſtles, reſpecting the aſcenſion of Jeſus, the effuſion of the Holy Spirit, and all its wonderful conſequences upon the firſt preachers and propagators of the Goſpel; it is impoſſible to doubt that God inſpired and directed the pens of theſe holy men, who were appointed by him to deliver down in authentick records the memory of facts ſo important and extraordinary. The more the reader dwells upon this topick, and enlarges upon the particulars of the Goſpel hiſtory, the more force he will perceive in it: particularly if he conſiders, on the one hand, the expreſs and comprehenſive promiſes of the immediate guidance and aſſiſtance of the Holy Spirit, which our Redeemer made to the Apoſtles and firſt preachers of his Goſpel; and on the other, the peculiar language in which the Apoſtles, themſelves ſpeak of their preaching and writings, and the high regard they challenge to each. This laſt argument will ſtrike the reader in proportion to the degree in which he reflects upon the true character of theſe excellent men, and eſpecially upon that modeſty and humility in which they bore ſo bright a reſemblance of their divine Maſter. Let him aſk himſelf what he would think of any miniſter of Chriſt now, ſuppoſing him ever ſo eminent for learning, wiſdom, and piety, who ſhould aſſume to himſelf ſuch an authority:—Suppoſe ſuch a man, under the influence of no ſuch miraculous guidance, to ſay,—not with reference to what he might quote from others, but with regard to his own dictates,—" The things which I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord: He that deſpiſeth, deſpiſeth not man, but God: We have the mind of Chriſt: He that heareth not us, —that receiveth not our dictates in religion,—is not of God:" Suppoſe, I ſay, ſuch a language as this to be uſed publickly by any Chriſtian miniſter now on earth, and you muſt neceſſarily ſuppoſe his character from that hour overthrown. Men would immediately and juſtly unite in demanding miraculous proofs to verify ſuch aſſertions; or in condemning with proper indignation ſuch a claim unſupported by them. Surely then no one will charge the holy Apoſtles with a conduct, of which we ſhould not ſuſpect any wiſe and good man now upon earth! and which, if we ſaw in any of our friends, our charity and reſpect for them would incline us to inquire after ſome marks of lunacy in them, as its beſt excuſe.

It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that by the ſame mode of arguing we may deduce from the genuineneſs and credibility of the Old Teſtament (which we hope is fully proved in our Diſſertation on the Pentateuch) that It alſo was written by a ſuperintendant inſpiration. This we may argue, not merely or chiefly from the Tradition to this purpoſe, ſo generally and ſo early prevailing in the Jewiſh church, though that is conſiderable; nor even from thoſe very ſignal and glorious Internal Evidences of various kinds, which every competent judge may eaſily ſee and feel; but from ſurveying the Character and circumſtances of the Perſons by whom the ſeveral books were written, in compariſon with the Genius of that diſpenſation under which they lived and wrote. This may, in all the branches of the argument, be proved in this way with the greateſt eaſe and ſtrength, concerning Moſes and his writings; and when the authority of the Pentateuch is eſtabliſhed, that of the moſt material ſucceeding books ſtands in ſo eaſy and natural a connection with it, that few, we apprehend, have been found, at leaſt ſince the controverſy between the Jews and the Samaritans, who have in good earneſt allowed Moſes to have been a meſſenger from heaven, and denied the inſpiration of the prophets, and of the books which we receive as written by them.

There is however, one argument for the inſpiration of the Old Teſtament intirely independent on all the former; that, I mean, which is derived from the Genuineneſs and Credibility of the New Teſtament. Our Lord and his Apoſtles were ſo far from charging the Scribes and Phariſees (who on all proper occaſions are cenſured ſo freely) with having introduced into the ſacred volume any merely human compoſitions, that, on the contrary, they not only recommend a diligent and conſtant peruſal of the Scriptures, as of the greateſt importance to mens eternal happineſs, but ſpeak of them as divine oracles, and as written by the extraordinary influence of the Holy Spirit upon the minds of the authors. Now, as the Jews always affirmed that the teſtimony of an approved prophet was ſufficient to confirm the miſſion of one who was ſupported by it; ſo every reaſonable man muſt readily conclude, that no inſpired perſon can erroneouſly atteſt another to be inſpired: and indeed the very definition of " plenary inſpiration," as ſtated above, abſolutely excludes any room for cavilling on ſo plain a head.

From what has been advanced, let me intreat the reader ſeriouſly to conſider, what ſort of an impreſſion it ought to make upon us, to think that we have ſuch a book; a book written by a full divine inſpiration; that, amidſt all the uncertain variety of human reaſonings and conjectures, we have a celeſtial guide through the labyrinth; that God hath condeſcended to take care that we ſhould have a moſt authentic and unerring account of certain important, though very diſtant facts, many of which were wrought with his own hand; and with theſe facts, ſhould have a ſyſtem of moſt weighty and intereſting doctrines, to the truth of which he makes himſelf a witneſs. Such a book muſt appear an ineſtimable treaſure to every reflecting mind, and it certainly calls for our moſt affectionate acknowledgment, that God ſhould confer a favour like this on any of his creatures; much more on thoſe, who, by abuſing in too many inſtances their natural light, had made themſelves ſo unworthy of ſupernatural.

From this view of the inſpiration of Scripture we may alſo infer our obligation to ſtudy it with the greateſt attention and care; to ſearch in the moſt diligent and impartial manner into its genuine ſenſe, deſign, and tendency; without which all our conviction of its divine authority will avail us nothing before God. We ſhould therefore always remember, that in conſequence of all theſe important promiſes, we are indiſpenſably obliged to receive with calm and reverent ſubmiſſion the dictates of Scripture; to make it our oracle, and in this reſpect, to ſet it at a due diſtance from all other writings whatſoever; as it is certain there is no other book in the world which can pretend to equal authority, and produce equal or comparable proofs to ſupport ſuch a pretenſion.

On the whole, let me intreat every reader, whatſoever his rank in life, or his proficiency in learning, with due attention to conſider the practical deſign of theſe ſacred oracles: Whatever difficulties may ariſe in ſome points of doctrine, of this there can be no controverſy,—That the great deſign of the New Teſtament, in perfect harmony with the Old, is to call off our minds from the preſent world; to eſtabliſh us in the belief of a future ſtate; to form us to a ſerious preparation for that ſtate, by bringing us to a lively faith in Chriſt; and, as the genuine effect thereof, to a filial love for God, and a fraternal affection for each other: Or, in one word,—and a weightier and more comprehenſive ſentence was never written,—to teach us, "that denying ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, we ſhould live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly in this preſent world; look for that bleſſed hope, even the glorious appearance of the great God and our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt!" Titus ii. 12, 13. To his Almighty hands may our ſouls be committed, by a faith productive of theſe glorious fruits; and under the influences of his Spirit, may we wait for his mercy unto eternal life! Amen*!

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO SAINT MATTHEW.

CHAP. I.

The genealogy of Chriſt from Abraham to Joſeph: he was conceived by the Holy Ghoſt, and born of the Virgin Mary, when ſhe was eſpouſed to Joſeph. The angel ſatisfieth the anxious thoughts of Joſeph, and interpreteth the name of Jeſus.

THE book of the generation of Jeſus Chriſt, the ſon of David, the ſon of Abraham.

2 Abraham begat Iſaac; and Iſaac begat Jacob; and Jacob begat Judas and his brethren;

3 And Judas begat Phares and Zara of Thamar; and Phares begat Eſrom; and Eſrom begat Aram;

4 And Aram begat Aminadab; and Aminadab begat Naaſſon; and Naaſſon begat Salmon;

5 And Salmon begat Booz of Rachab; and Booz begat Obed of Ruth; and Obed begat Jeſſe;

6 And Jeſſe begat David the king; and David the king begat Solomon of her that had been the wife of Urias;

7 And Solomon begat Roboam; and Roboam begat Abia; and Abia begat Aſa;

GOSPEL] Signifies God's, or good tidings; and is of the ſame import with the original word εὐαγγέλιον. See Luke ii. 10. The Goſpel, according to St. Matthew, ſignifies, the hiſtory of the good tidings preached by Jeſus Chriſt, as it is related by St. Matthew, one of his immediate diſciples and followers; who was the firſt Evangeliſt, and who, it is generally agreed, wrote his Goſpel for the uſe of the Jewiſh converts at Jeruſalem, as ſome ſuppoſe about the year of our Lord 48 or 49; but as others, with more ſhew of probability, about the year 38. We enter not, however, into a diſcuſſion of this matter, as intending at the concluſion of this work to give a diſſertation on the writers of the Goſpels, &c.

Chap. I. Ver. 1. The book of the generation] The account of the deſcent, or genealogy. Wat. Commentators are divided with regard to this phraſe; ſome ſuppoſing, that it means, and ſhould be rendered, The hiſtory of the life of Jeſus Chriſt; and that it is a general preface to St. Matthew's Goſpel; while others, and I think with greater probability, render it with Dr. Waterland, An account of the genealogy, and conceive it merely as the introduction to the genealogy following. See the note on Gen. v. 1. As St. Matthew wrote for the Jews, he deduces the genealogy of Chriſt only from Abraham, and brings it down from him through David, to ſhew his title to the kingdom of Iſrael; while St. Luke, who wrote for the uſe of the Gentile converts, deduces the genealogy from Adam. See Gen. xxii. 18. Pſ. ii. But concerning theſe genealogies, and the variations in them, we will ſpeak when we come to St. Luke, ch. iii. 23. St. Matthew gives to Jeſus the name of Chriſt, which ſignifies anointed, and marks out the royal, ſacerdotal, and prophetical office; anſwering to the name of Meſſiah, by which the Redeemer was always known and ſpoken of by the Jews. One right way of eſtimating things, ſays Dr. Heylin, is by our want of them. If we look into ourſelves, we ſhall find a want of Chriſt in all his offices; for, before ſome conſiderable proficiency in religion, men find themſelves, as it were, at a diſtance from God, alienated from him, and incapacitated for that free acceſs to the Creator, which, it ſhould ſeem, an intelligent being might naturally hope for. Hence we want a mediator, an interceſſor; in a word, a Chriſt, in his prieſtly functions. This regards our ſituation with reſpect to God. With reſpect to ourſelves, we find a total darkneſs, blindneſs, ignorance of God, and the things of God: Here we want a Chriſt in his prophetic office, to enlighten our minds, and teach us the whole will of God: We alſo find within us a ſtrong miſ-rule of appetites and paſſions, and diſcordant intereſts, blindly eſpouſed: For theſe we want a Chriſt, in his regal office, to govern our hearts, and eſtabliſh his kingdom within us. Calmet obſerves, that as the Jewiſh converts, for whom this Goſpel was principally written, had no doubt of the divinity of the Meſſiah, St. Matthew did not judge it neceſſary to dwell here upon that ſubject. He contents himſelf with giving an account of his incarnation and birth, of a virgin; not that theſe truths were diſputed by the faithful, but becauſe they had been gainſaid by the credulous and hardened Jews. St. John, on the contrary, who wrote amongſt the Gentiles, applied himſelf to ſet forth and make known the divinity of the Saviour; for this was the point to which they made the ſtrongeſt objections.

Ver. 3. Judas begat Phares and Zara of Thamar] It is remarkable that only four women are mentioned in this genealogy, and all of them branded in the ſacred ſtory with a mark of infamy; Thamar for inceſt, Rachab for fornication, Ruth for heatheniſm, and Bathſheba for adultery; perhaps the Holy Spirit deſigned to obviate the cavils of the Jews, who entertained low thoughts of Chriſt, becauſe he was born of ſo mean a mother; for they could not but ſee the abſurdity of ſuch a prejudice, when they conſidered that their moſt illuſtrious heroes ſprang from women, whoſe actions rendered them infinitely meaner than the mother of our Lord: Her ſpotleſs character, and unaffected piety, were nobler ornaments than all the boaſted gifts of fortune. We may juſt obſerve, that the Hebrews do not commonly mention women in their genealogies, except as here, when ſome particular reaſon obliges. He who came into the world to ſave ſinners, and to call all men, the juſt and unjuſt, to partake of his ſalvation, did not diſdain to have ſinners numbered amongſt his anceſtors; and therefore no ſinner ſhould deſpair of his mercy. See Macknight and Calmet.

Ver. 5. Rachab] See the note on Joſh. ii. 1. Dr. Doddridge obſerves, that though it is not expreſly ſaid that this perſon was Rahab of Jericho, commonly called the harlot, yet there can be no room to doubt, as we know ſhe was cotemporary with Salmon, and may conclude that ſhe, as all the other women mentioned in this liſt, was a remarkable perſon. Now there was no other of that name, eſpecially of this age, of whom the compiler of this table could, ſo far as we can judge, ſuppoſe his reader to have any knowledge. It does not appear from the genealogies which are extant in the Old Teſtament, that Salmon married Rahab; St. Matthew therefore had this, in all probability, out of ſome genealogical tables kept by the Jews, who have to this day a tradition among them, that Rahab was married to one of the princes of Iſrael.

Ver. 6. Solomon, of her that had been, &c.] In the original it is, By her of Urias; a mode of expreſſion common both amongſt the Greeks and Romans. See the note on 2 Sam. xii. 24.

8 And Aſa begat Joſaphat; and Joſaphat begat Joram; and Joram begat Ozias;

9 And Ozias begat Joatham; and Joatham begat Achaz; and Achaz begat Ezekias;

10 And Ezekias begat Manaſſes; and Manaſſes begat Amon; and Amon begat Joſias;

11 And Joſias begat Jechonias and his brethren, about the time they were carried away to Babylon:

12 And after they were brought to Babylon, Jechonias begat Salathiel; and Salathiel begat Zorobabel;

13 And Zorobabel begat Abiud; and Abiud begat Eliakim; and Eliakim begat Azor;

14 And Azor begat Sadoc; and Sadoc begat Achim; and Achim begat Eliud;

15 And Eliud begat Eleazar; and Eleazar begat Matthan; and Matthan begat Jacob;

16 And Jacob begat Joſeph the huſband of Mary, of whom was born Jeſus, who is called Chriſt.

17 So all the generations from Abraham to David, are fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away into Babylon, are fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into Babylon unto Chriſt, are fourteen generations.

18 Now the birth of Jeſus Chriſt was on this wiſe: When as his mother Mary was eſpouſed to Joſeph, before they came together, ſhe was found with child of the Holy Ghoſt.

19 Then Joſeph her huſband being a juſt man, and not willing to make her a publick example, was minded to put her away privily.

Ver. 10. 2 Kings xx. 21. 1 Chron. iii. 13.—V. 11. Some read, Joſias begat Jakim, and Jakim begat Jechonias.—V. 12. 1 Chron. iii. 16. 17.—V. 18. Luke i. 27. Luke i. 35.—V. 19. Deut. xxiv. 1.

Ver. 8. Joram begat Ozias] It is undeniably evident from 2 Chron. ch. xxii. and following, that three princes are here omitted. If this table was taken from any records amongſt the Jews, as moſt probably was the caſe, the Evangeliſt is not reſponſible for the exactneſs of it. There are inſtances of the like omiſſions in other genealogies. See Ezra vii. where, by comparing that chapter with 1 Chron. vi. it is found that five generations are left out. But if he himſelf drew it up, we may well ſuppoſe that it was by ſome peculiar divine direction, that the ſin of Jehoram is thus animadverted upon even to the fourth generation: His intermediate deſcendants being thus blotted out of the records of Chriſt's family, and overlooked as if they had never been. See Doddridge, L'Enfant, and Beauſobre.

Ver. 11. Joſias begat Jechonias, &c.] Dr. Doddridge renders this verſe thus, after the reading of the Bodleian and other manuſcripts, notice of which is taken in the margin of our Bibles; And Joſiah begat Jehoiachim and his brethren; and about the time of the Babyloniſh captivity Jehoiachim begat Jechoniah: A reading, which ſeems abſolutely neceſſary to keep up the number of fourteen generations. Inſtead of the time they were carried away, &c. in this and the next verſe, Dr. Waterland reads, the time of the tranſmigration, or carrying away: and ſo ver. 17.

Ver. 13. And Zorobabel begat Abiud] Among the ſons of Zorobabel, (which ſignifies a ſtranger in Babylon) reckoned up 1 Chron. iii. there is no mention of Abiud, or his poſterity; but as the Jews were very careful to keep genealogical tables of their families, St. Matthew had, in all likelihood, what he mentions here out of ſome authentic genealogies preſerved in the family of Joſeph, whoſe anceſtors, from Zorobabel, are likewiſe omitted in the genealogies extant in the Chronicles, becauſe, in all probability, their condition was but mean and obſcure.

Ver. 16. Jacob begat Joſeph] It is a maxim among the Jews that the family of the mother is not called a family; all their pedigrees are reckoned and deduced from the father. This is the reaſon why St. Matthew hath here ſet down the genealogy of Joſeph; and thus Jeſus Chriſt is the ſon of David, becauſe Joſeph's marriage with Mary, gave to Jeſus Chriſt a right to all the privileges which a child that was born of ſtrange parents was intitled to by adoption, and which were granted by law to the poſterity of a man who had married his brother's widow. It is moreover very probable, that Mary was an only daughter and an heireſs, and conſequently obliged to marry in her own family. See Numb. xxxvi. 7, 9. So that by giving the genealogy of Joſeph, St. Matthew gives at the ſame time that of Mary. He is called the huſband of Mary; for the names of huſband and wife were given by the Jews to perſons who were only betrothed. See Gen. xxix. 21. Deut. xxii. 24. Some copies however read, Joſeph, to whom the Virgin Mary was betrothed. It is added at the end of this verſe, who is called Chriſt; i. e. who is known by that name, and is really the Chriſt, or the Meſſiah. Compare Luke i. 32, 35. For to be called is a frequent Hebraiſm, to expreſs that the perſon ſpoken of ſhall really and effectually be what he is there called, and actually fulfil that title: So ver. 23. it is ſaid, They ſhall call his name Emmanuel; which is no common appellation of Chriſt, but indicates his nature and office; a deity incarnate, who by his ſpirit dwells in the hearts of the faithful. See L'Enfant, and Heylin.

Ver. 17. So all the generations. &c.] St. Matthew, deſigning to ſhew that Jeſus was the Meſſiah, begun his genealogy at Abraham, to whom the promiſe was originally made, that in his ſeed all the families of the earth ſhould be bleſſed: But the ſucceſſion of Chriſt's anceſtors downward, naturally reſolves itſelf into three claſſes; namely, firſt of private perſons, from Abraham to David; next of kings, from David to Jehoiachim; and then of private perſons again, from the Babyloniſh captivity, when an end was put to the royal dignity of our Lord's progenitors in the perſon of Jehoiachim; who, though he was born twenty-ſix years before the captivity, and really ſwayed the ſceptre, is properly enough reckoned among the private perſons, from the captivity to Chriſt; becauſe the Babylonians ſtripped him of his dignity, and reduced him to the condition of a private man. It is obſervable that in the ſecond clauſe, the ſacred writer does not ſay, all the generations, as knowing that for good reaſons he had omitted three belonging to that interval; but only that the whole number of thoſe which he had named was fourteen, as they really were. See Macknight, and Whitby.

Ver. 18. Now the birth of Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] Now the birth of Jeſus Chriſt was in this manner; literally, was thus; not only the birth, but the conception of Chriſt, and what preceded it, are here included, in the word γέννησις, which ſome critics have unwarily confuſed with the word γένεσις, uſed in the firſt verſe of this chapter. Among the Jews there was a conſiderable ſpace of time (generally a year, or ſix months) between the betrothing and wedding, and during this ſpace of time it was that Mary was found with child by the power of the Holy Ghoſt. See Luke i. 27. The laſt clauſe of the verſe is better rendered by ſome, She was found to be pregnant, or with child by the Holy Ghoſt.

Ver. 19. Being a juſt man] A good-natured man. Wat. Dr. Doddridge obſerves very well, that it is without any good reaſon that this text is often aſſigned as an inſtance, that the word δίκαιος, is uſed to ſignify, merciful or good-natured. If we conſider the information which Joſeph might have received from perſons of ſuch an extraordinary character as Zecharias and Elizabeth, who would certainly think themſelves obliged to interpoſe on ſuch an occaſion, and whoſe ſtory ſo remarkably carried its own evidence with it; beſides the intimation given by the prophecy of Iſaiah, and the ſatisfaction he undoubtedly had in the virtuous character of Mary herſelf;—we muſt conclude, that he would have acted a very ſevere and unrighteous part, had he proceeded to extremities without ſerious deliberation; and that putting her away privately would in theſe circumſtances have been the hardeſt meaſure which juſtice would have ſuffered him to take. He was therefore determined not to make her a public example; παραδειγματίσαι, which poſſibly refers to that exemplary puniſhment inflicted by the law on thoſe who had violated the faith of their eſpouſals, before the marriage was compleated. See Deut. xxii. 23, 24, where it is expreſsly ordered, that a betrothed virgin, if ſhe lay with another man, ſhould be ſtoned. We may ſuppoſe however, that the infamy of a public divorce, though ſhe had not been ſtoned, may alſo be expreſſed by this ſame word. But then there was a private kind of divorce, in the bill for which, delivered before two witneſſes only, no reaſon for the divorce was aſſigned; the dowry was not forfeited as in the former caſe, and the woman conſequently was not ſo much defamed. Joſeph thought upon this laſt method of proceeding: Ignorant as he then was of the divine conception in Mary, there was doubtleſs a conflict in his breaſt from oppoſite conſiderations. Juſtice ſhewed, on the one hand, what was due to himſelf; on the other, what was due to one of Mary's character. In juſtice to himſelf, he would not cohabit with one whom he ignorantly thought to be defiled; in juſtice to Mary, he would not give up to the rigor of the law a perſon hitherto ſo blameleſs. His purity muſt not conſort with ſuppoſed pollution; therefore he would put her away; Her character was in all other reſpects ſuch, that ſhe ought not to be expoſed to public infamy; therefore he would put her away privately. While he was 20 But while he thought on theſe things, behold, the angel of the LORD appeared unto him in a dream, ſaying, Joſeph, thou ſon of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her, is of the Holy Ghoſt.

21 And ſhe ſhall bring forth a ſon, and thou ſhalt call his name JESUS: for he ſhall ſave his people from their ſins.

22 (Now all this was done that it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken of the Lord by the prophet, ſaying, 23 Behold, a virgin ſhall be with child, and ſhall bring forth a ſon, and they ſhall call his name Emmanuel, which, being interpreted, is, God with us.)

24 Then Joſeph, being raiſed from ſleep, did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him, and took unto him his wife:

25 And knew her not till ſhe had brought forth her firſt-born ſon: and he called his name JESUS.

CHAP. II.

The wiſe-men out of the eaſt are directed to

Ver. 20. Luke i. 35. Gr. begotten.—V. 21. Luke i. 31. Acts iv. 12.—V. 23. Iſai. vii. 14. Or, his name ſhall be called.—V. 25. Exod. xiii. 2.

thus deliberating with himſelf, and innocently in danger of doing wrong, To give us a remarkable inſtance of the care which God takes of good men, both in affording them direction, and keeping them from ſin, that God graciouſly interpoſed for the direction of Joſeph, and aſſociated him with Mary in the moſt glorious charge that ever creature was dignified with; even the tuition and care of the Saviour. See Heylin, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 20. The angel of the Lord] Probably Gabriel, who had been ſent to Zecharias and Mary. That Joſeph's ſcruple did not proceed, as ſome of the fathers ſuppoſe, merely from veneration, appears from the reaſon given why he ſhould take Mary, which in that caſe would have been the only reaſon againſt it. Dr. Waterland reads the next clauſe, Joſeph, thou deſcendant, &c. Scruple not the taking of Mary thy wife. The laſt phraſe, Is of the Holy Ghoſt, means, "Hath been formed by the Holy Ghoſt." See Pſ. cxviii. 23. in the margin. It is obſervable that the angel reminds Joſeph of his deſcent from David, as it were to awaken his hopes, and to raiſe his thoughts to the great event which was now about to open to his view.

Ver. 21. Thou ſhalt call his name Jeſus] That is, He ſhall be God the Saviour; for he ſhall prove that glorious and divine perſon, the long-expected Meſſiah, intended by God to ſave his people, even all that truly believe in him, both from the puniſhment and from the dominion of their ſins; by procuring an ample pardon for them, and raiſing them, after a life of holineſs on earth, to a ſtate of complete perfection and happineſs. Bp. Pearſon ſeems to have ſet the etymology of the name Jeſus, in the cleareſt light in his large diſcourſe upon it, where he endeavours to prove that Jah, one of the names of God, enters into the compoſition of the Hebrew name Joſhua, to which Jeſus anſwers; a derivation, which plainly ſhews how Chriſt's being called Jeſus, i. e. God our Saviour, was in effect an accompliſhment of the prophecy, that he ſhould be called Emmanuel; for what elſe ſays the biſhop, is God with us, than God our Saviour?—Well therefore hath the Evangeliſt conjoined the prophet and the angel, aſſerting that Chriſt was therefore named Jeſus, becauſe it was foretold he ſhould be called Emmanuel. The angelical God the Saviour, being in the higheſt propriety the prophetical God with us. See Pearſon on the Creed, p. 69—71. and Doddridge.

Ver. 22. (Now all this was done, &c.] Now by theſe events was fulfilled that which, &c. Wat. This ſounds as if the prophecy was the cauſe of the event predicted; but, generally ſpeaking, things do not come to paſs becauſe they are foretold, but are foretold becauſe they certainly will come to paſs. The difficulty here lies in the particle that, put for the Greek ινα, which does not always ſignify the cauſe, but ſometimes the event or conſequence. The Evangeliſts ſo often uſe it in this latter ſenſe, that there will be frequent occaſion to have recourſe to it; and therefore the reader will do well to bear this remark in mind. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that the phraſe, it might be fulfilled, and the like, were frequently deſigned and underſtood to mean no more than that ſomething anſwered alike in both caſes. There was an aptneſs or ſuitableneſs in the cauſe, the parts or circumſtances of one event to the other. Even to this day the Jews in their comments ſay, That is it which was ſpoken, and to fulfil, upon relating a ſimilar fact, and not the ſame referred to in the prophet they cite; ſo that we muſt not always underſtand this phraſe as applicable to immediate prophecies only. See Wetſtein, Hammond and Heylin.

Ver. 23. Behold, a virgin, &c.] To what we have ſaid on this prophecy in its proper place, Iſai. vii. 14. may now be added, that it is not poſſible to underſtand it of any other perſons than of Jeſus Chriſt and the Bleſſed Virgin, in whom alone it is completely and literally fulfilled: But Bp. Chandler hath with ſo much learning and ability explained this text to the ſatisfaction of all rational perſons, that I have nothing more to do than to refer my reader to the 237th and following pages of his Defence of Chriſtianity. See alſo Green's fourth letter to Mr. Collins, and Uſher's Annals, A. M. 3262. The laſt clauſe of this verſe ſeems to ſupply us with a full proof that St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel in Greek, and not in Hebrew, as many writers have ſuppoſed.

Ver. 24. Being raiſed from ſleep—bidden him] Awaked out of ſleep—directed him. Wat.

Ver. 25. And knew her not, till, &c.] But did not cohabit with her, before, &c. Wat. Some may infer from this paſſage, that Mary had other children afterwards; but the original here only excludes the time preceding the birth, without any conſequence as to the future. Thus Michal had no child until the day of her death. 2 Sam. vi. 23. where the LXX has ἑως, as in the text. Nor do the words that follow in the Evangeliſt alter the caſe;—Her firſt-born ſon; for there may be a firſt-born without a ſecond; and the commentators abound with inſtances wherein the term firſt-born is uſed, though there are no ſubſequent children. On what terms Joſeph and Mary afterwards lived, is of ſo little conſequence to us, that I cannot but wonder, ſays Dr. Doddridge, it ſhould have been the ſubject of ſo much debate amongſt Chriſtans. The preſent paſſage ſurely is clear enough, wherein the Evangeliſt, in the plaineſt manner aſſerts, that Joſeph cohabited not with Mary, till ſhe was delivered of her wonderful ſon, who is truly the firſt-born amongſt his brethren, and which alone was of conſequence for Chriſtians to know. For the reſt, one would conceive that nothing but the ſuperſtition of papiſts could have introduced an opinion ſo contrary to Scripture and common ſenſe, as that Mary lived with Joſeph for ſo many years, and yet denied the common duties of a wife. Heinſius and ſome others would connect the word ἕως and παρέλαβε; reading and knew her not, in a parentheſis;—And took unto him his wife—(though he knew her not) till ſhe had brought forth, &c.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. I.

As all our hopes depend upon the ſalvation purchaſed by Jeſus Chriſt, it is moſt ſatisfactory to obſerve how convincing the evidence is, that he is the true Meſſiah, the Son of God, and the Son of Man, in whom the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and the promiſes made to the fathers were fulfilled.

When we ſurvey ſuch a ſeries of generations as this before us, it is obvious to reflect, how, like the leaves of a tree, one paſſeth away, and another cometh; Yet the earth ſtill abideth, and with it the goodneſs of the Lord, which runs on from generation to generation, the common hope of parents and children. Of thoſe who formerly lived upon the earth, and perhaps made the moſt conſpicuous figure, how many are there whoſe names have periſhed with them; how many, of whom only the name is remaining! Thus are we paſſing away, and thus ſhall we ſhortly be forgotten: Happy, if while we are forgotten of men, we are remembered by God. Happy, if our names, loſt on earth, are at length found written in the Book of Life.

Never was any daughter of Eve ſo dignified as the Virgin Mary; yet was ſhe in danger of falling under the imputation of one of the worſt of crimes. We find not however that ſhe tormented herſelf about it; but, conſcious of her own innocency, ſhe kept her mind calm and eaſy, and committed her cauſe to him who judgeth righteouſly; and like her, thoſe who are careful to keep a good conſcience, may chearfully truſt God with the keeping of their good name.

We have in Joſeph an excellent pattern of gentleneſs and prudence (ver. 19.): In an affair which appeared dubious, he choſe, as we ſhould always do, rather to err on the favourable than on the ſevere extreme; he was careful to avoid any precipitate ſteps, and in the moments of deliberation God interpoſed, to guide and determine his reſolves. It is good for us, to think, to reflect on things as Joſeph did. Were there more of deliberation in our cenſures and judgements; there would be more of mercy and moderation in them.

The angel appeared to Joſeph in a dream (ver. 20.). When we are moſt quiet and compoſed, we are in the beſt frame to receive the notices of the divine will. Extraordinary direction, like the preſent, is not to be expected by us; but God hath ſtill methods of making known his mind in doubtful caſes, by hints of providence, debates of conſcience, and advice of faithful friends. We ſhould therefore from each of theſe (ſtill applying the general rules of the written word;) take direction from God in all the ſteps of our life, and more particularly the great concerns of it.

With what wonder and pleaſure muſt Joſeph have received the glad tidings ſo honourable to Mary, ſo ſatisfactory to himſelf!—With what pleaſure ſhould we alſo receive them! For we too are informed of Jeſus, who came to ſave his people from their ſins. How important and glorious a ſalvation! Bleſſed JESUS! anſwer thy character, in delivering us not only from ſin's condemning, but from its reigning power. May our ſouls bow to EMMANUEL, our incarnate God, and gratefully adore that wonderful condeſcenſion,—God and man united in one Chriſt, that God and man may be forever reconciled. See Burkitt, Doddridge, Oſtervald, Henry, &c. whom we mention here once for all, as the authors principally referred to on theſe occaſions.

Chriſt by a ſtar: they worſhip him, and offer their preſents. Joſeph fleeth into Egypt, with Jeſus and his mother. Herod ſlayeth the children: himſelf dieth. Chriſt is brought back again into Galilee, to Nazareth.

NOW when Jeſus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wiſe-men from the eaſt to Jeruſalem,

2 Saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have ſeen his ſtar in the eaſt, and are come to worſhip him.

3 When Herod the king had heard theſe things, he was troubled, and all Jeruſalem with him.

4 And when he had gathered all the chief prieſts and ſcribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Chriſt ſhould be born.

5 And they ſaid unto him, In Bethlehem of Judea: for thus it is written by the prophet,

6 And thou Bethlehem in the land of Juda, art not the leaſt among the princes of Juda: for out of thee ſhall come a Governor that ſhall rule my people Iſrael.

7 Then Herod, when he had privily called the wiſe-men, enquired of them diligently what time the ſtar appeared.

8 And he ſent them to Bethlehem, and ſaid, Go, and ſearch diligently for the young child; and when ye have found him, bring me word again, that I may come and worſhip him alſo.

9 When they had heard the king, they departed; and lo, the ſtar which they ſaw in the eaſt, went before them, till it came and ſtood over where the young child was.

10 When they ſaw the ſtar, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.

11 And when they were come into the houſe, they ſaw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down, and worſhipped him: and when they had opened their treaſures, they preſented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincenſe, and myrrh.

Chap. II. Ver. 1. Bethlehem of Judea—wiſe men, &c.] Eaſtern magi. Wat. Bethlehem was a ſmall town in the tribe of Judah, which lay on the ſouth of Jeruſalem; there was a city of the ſame name in Galilee, which belonged to the tribe of Zebulun, Joſh. xix. 15. and this is the reaſon why the former is here called Bethlehem of Judea. In the days of Herod the king, is an Hebraiſm for the time of king Herod, the Great; who was at firſt tetrarch or governor of Judea, and afterwards declared king of the ſame country. See Joſeph. Hiſt. Jud. l. xiv. c. 3. and l. xvii. c. 10. The evangelical and apoſtolical hiſtory begins with Herod the Great, and ends with Agrippa, the laſt king of the Jews. Concerning theſe magi, or wiſe men, four things are pretty generally agreed; That they were Perſians, or Parthians; that they were prieſts, or miniſters of religion; that they frequently travelled into different countries; and that they applied themſelves very much to the contemplation of the ſtars, or rather to aſtrology. As to the title here given them, it is certain that the word Μάγοι was not appropriated in ancient times to ſuch as practiſed wicked arts; but frequently was uſed to expreſs philoſophers or men of learning; and thoſe particularly who were curious in examining the works of nature, and in obſerving the motions of the heavenly bodies. Compare Daniel ii. 2, 27. and v. 11. Septuagint, and ſee Wetſtein, and Doddridge.

Ver. 2. Saying, &c.] Saying, where is this king of the Jews, who is now born? Wat. There does not ſeem to be any need of ſuppoſing with ſome of the fathers, that the wiſe men knew the ſignification of this ſtar which they ſaw while they were in the eaſt, by comparing it with Balaam's prophecy, Numb. xxiv. 17. or Daniel's, ch. ii. 44. ix. 25. Nor can we think, as Grotius ſeems to intimate, that they diſcovered it by the rules of their art. It is much more probable that they learned it by a divine revelation, by which it is plain they were guided in their return. See ver. 12. It was a common obſervation among the ancients, that the appearance of a new ſtar denoted either the birth or death of great men. Chalcidius, in his comment upon Plato, mentions the appearance of this ſtar in a very remarkable manner; "as foretelling the deſcent of a God upon earth, for the preſervation of mankind, and as occaſioning ſome wiſe men amongſt the Chaldeans to go in ſearch of him, and pay him adoration;" that is, the ſame obeiſance as was uſed to be paid by the eaſtern nations to their monarchs; for ſo the original word is elſewhere and here to be underſtood; and therefore Doddridge and others render it, And are come to proſtrate ourſelves before him.

Ver. 3. He was troubled] Alarmed. Wat. Our tranſlation ſuits well to Herod, jealous for his crown, but not to the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, who were oppreſſed by him; and (according to their notions of a Meſſiah) would conceive hopes of their deliverance from the news of his death. The original word ταρασσω ſignifies only a great emotion; whatever the cauſe be, whether of joy, or fear, or admiration. We find it in the laſt ſenſe, of admiration, Judith xiv. 7. See Heylin, and Mintert on the word.

Ver. 4. And when he had gathered, &c.] And having aſſembled. Wat. All the chief prieſts, muſt comprehend here not only the high-prieſt, for the time being, and his deputy, with thoſe who formerly had borne that office; but alſo the heads of the 24 courſes, as well as any other perſons of peculiar eminence in the prieſthood. See 1 Chron. xxxiv. 6. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 14. The ſcribes of the people, mean the rabbies or doctors, who explained the law to the people. See Michaelis's introduction to the New Teſtament.

Ver. 5. In Bethlehem of Judea, for thus, &c.] For a full explanation of this paſſage, we refer to the notes on Micah v. 2, &c. juſt obſerving with Dr. Doddridge, that when this and ſeveral other quotations from the Old Teſtament, which we find in the New, come to be compared with the original, and even with the Septuagint, it will plainly appear that the apoſtles did not think it neceſſary always to tranſcribe exactly the paſſages they quoted, but ſometimes contented themſelves with giving the general ſenſe, in ſome little diverſity of language.

Ver. 7. Then Herod, &c.] Then Herod having privately ſent for the magi, inquired of them the exact time, when, &c. Wat.

Ver. 8. Search diligently for, &c.] Make exact inquiry about, &c. Wat. It is an amazing thing that ſo ſuſpicious and artful a prince as Herod, ſhould put ſuch an important affair on ſo precarious a footing; when, if he had not gone himſelf, it would have been ſo eaſy, under pretence of doing honour to theſe learned ſtrangers, to have ſent a guard of ſoldiers with them, who might, humanly ſpeaking, without any difficulty, have ſlaughtered the child and his parents on the ſpot. Perhaps he might have been unwilling to commit ſuch an act of cruelty in the preſence of theſe ſages, leſt their report of it might have rendered him infamous abroad: or rather, we muſt refer it to a ſecret infatuation, with which God, whenever he pleaſes, can confound the moſt ſagacious of mankind. See Doddridge and Calmet.

Ver. 10. When they ſaw the ſtar] The editors of the Pruſſian Teſtament add very properly—thus ſtanding ſtill, which the ſenſe evidently requires; for the Evangeliſt ſays, that upon the appearance of the ſtar the wiſe men went directly into the houſe where Jeſus was. Dr. Doddridge reads A ſtar or meteor; becauſe, ſays he, no ſtar could point out not only a town, but a particular houſe. The original, in the concluſion of this verſe, is remarkably emphatical, They rejoiced with a joy which was exceeding great.

Ver. 11. And fell down and worſhipped him] Proſtrating themſelves they adored him. Heylin. The original word for treaſures ſignifies not only a collection of rarities and precious things, but alſo whatever ſerves to hold them. Here it ſignifies the veſſels or boxes, wherein theſe ſages had put the preſents they deſigned for the King of the Jews. It was the cuſtom of their country to offer preſents to the illuſtrious perſonages whom they came to viſit, as appears from many paſſages of the Old Teſtament; (ſee Gen. xliii. 11, 25. 1 Sam. ix. 7, 8. x. 27. 1 Kings x. 22. Pſ. lxxii. 10. and Prov. xviii. 16.) and Maundrell, Chardin, and many other writers of the beſt credit, aſſure us, that the cuſtom is yet retained. One cannot help noting how ſeaſonable and providential an aſſiſtance this was, to furniſh Joſeph and Mary for ſo long and expenſive a journey as that into Egypt; a country where they were intirely ſtrangers, and yet were to abide there for ſome conſiderable time. Several commentators have obſerved a ſignificancy and propriety in theſe gifts; which, whether true or not, is at leaſt ingenious. They offered him, ſay they, gold as a King, paying him tribute; frankincenſe, as a God, for they honoured God with the ſmoke of incenſe; and myrrh, as a man that ſhould die; for myrrh was uſed in embalming dead bodies. See Doddridge, L'Enfant, and Henry.

12 And being warned of God in a dream, that they ſhould not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.

13 And when they were departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joſeph in a dream, ſaying, Ariſe, and take the young child, and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word: for Herod will ſeek the young child to deſtroy him.

14 When he aroſe, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt:

15 And was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken of the Lord by the prophet, ſaying, Out of Egypt have I called my ſon.

16 Then Herod, when he ſaw that he was mocked of the wiſe-men, was exceeding wroth, and ſent forth, and ſlew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coaſts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently enquired of the wiſe-men.

17 Then was fulfilled that which was ſpoken by Jeremy the prophet, ſaying, 18 In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, becauſe they are not.

19 But when Herod was dead, behold, an angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream to Joſeph in Egypt, 20 Saying, Ariſe, and take the young child and his mother, and go into the land of Iſrael: for they are dead which ſought the young child's life.

21 And he aroſe, and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Iſrael.

22 But when he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judea in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither: notwithſtanding, being warned of God in a dream, he turned aſide into the parts of Galilee:

23 And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth: that it might be fulfilled

Ver. 12. Ch. i. 20.—V. 15. Hoſ. xi. 1.—V. 17. Jer. xxxi. 15.—V. 22. Ch. iii. 13.

Ver. 12. And being warned of God in a dream] And being divinely warned in a dream not to go back to Herod, they returned, &c. Wat.

Ver. 13. Into Egypt] There were great numbers of Jews in Egypt: ſome fled thither in the time of Jeremiah, ſee ch. xlviii. and great numbers were brought there afterwards, on account of the temple of Onias. We may juſt obſerve, once for all, that the particle ἰδοὺ, behold, is a frequent Hebraiſm in the Evangeliſts, which commonly is but an expletive, though ſometimes it is emphatical. The angel, would be rendered more properly an angel.

Ver. 15. That it might be fulfilled, &c.] So that now was fulfilled that which, &c. Wat. Mr. Manne, in his elaborate and elegant diſſertation on the birth of Chriſt, advances very conſiderable arguments to prove that He was born in the ſpring, A. U. C. 747. Jul. P. 4707. and that Herod died about the paſſover, A. U. C. 750. Jul. P. 4710. probably towards the end of March. Doddridge rather inclines to place the birth of Chriſt in September or October, A. U. C. 749. and to conclude that Herod died in March, A. U. C. 751. See Joſeph. Ant. l. xiv. c. 28, &c. The reader will remember the general obſervation that has been made on ch. i. 22. reſpecting the phraſe, that it might be fulfilled, and will refer to what we have ſaid on Hoſea xi. 1. concerning this text; which Grotius, Heinſius, and many of the beſt critics, both ancient and modern, underſtand as a mere alluſion. See Calmet on the verſe. The editors of the Pruſſian Teſtament obſerve, that the words, out of Egypt, &c. belong, in their proper and literal ſenſe, to the people of Iſrael, as appears from the beginning of the verſe in Hoſea. Comp. Exod. iv. 22, 23. Numb. xxiv. 8 St. Matthew applies them to Jeſus Chriſt, according to the method of the Jewiſh doctors, who ſuppoſed that ſeveral particulars in the Old Teſtament related to the Meſſiah typically, though, in a literal ſenſe, they referred to other matters.

Ver. 16. Then Herod when he ſaw, &c.] Perceiving that he was mocked by the magi—ſlew all the children—entring on the ſecond year and under, according to the time which he had exactly learned, &c. Wat. and Knatchbull. The word ἐνεπαίχθη, rendered mocked, ſignifies properly to be played with, and well expreſſes the view in which the pride of Herod taught him to regard this action, as if it were intended to expoſe him to the deriſion of his ſubjects, and to treat him as a child, rather than as a prince of ſo great experience and renown. Haman's rage againſt Mordecai is expreſſed by the LXX in the ſame terms as Herod's anger is here. See Eſth. iii. 5. v. 9. It is probable that Herod in his paſſion ordered the ſlaughter of the infants, as ſoon as he perceived that he was diſappointed in his expectation of the return of the wiſe men; leſt otherwiſe the child, of whom he was ſo jealous, might be removed: and as his cruelty extended even to thoſe who had entered on the ſecond year, which is expreſly ſaid to be according to the time of which he had got exact information from the ſages; it muſt be natural to conclude from hence, that it was not till ſome conſiderable time after the birth of Chriſt that he was viſited by the wiſe men; even though we ſhould allow the firſt appearance of the ſtar to have been, as ſome ſuppoſe, about the time of Chriſt's conception. The truth is, it is very difficult to determine the exact period of time when the wiſe men paid their viſit to Chriſt; though it appears to me moſt probable from the 11th verſe that it was at the time of his nativity. See Sir Norton Knatchbull, and Bedford's Chronology, p. 740. The reader will find at the end of Bp. Chandler's vindication of his defence, a piece which well deſerves his peruſal, intitled, The ſlaughter of the children in Bethlehem, as an hiſtorical fact in St. Matthew's Goſpel, vindicated, &c.

Ver. 17, 18. Then was fulfilled, &c.] Then, &c.—a cry heard, weeping, and great mourning, &c. Wat. See for an explanation of this text the notes on Jer. i. 15. Dr. Doddridge underſtands this alſo as an alluſion: "And I look upon it, ſays he, as a ſure argument, that a paſſage in Scripture, whether prophetical, hiſtorical, or poetical, may, in the language of the New Teſtament, be ſaid to be fulfilled, when an event happens to which it may with great propriety be accommodated." This, it is true, is a very eaſy method of evading the difficulties ariſing from obſcure paſſages in Scripture; but the note above referred to will convince the reader, that this paſſage may, with ſtrict propriety, be underſtood as a prophecy of that event to which the ſacred hiſtorian applies it.

Ver. 19. But when Herod was dead] It will be well worth the reader's while to peruſe the particular and affecting account which Joſephus has given of the dreadful death of this inhuman tyrant, whom God ſo remarkably made a terror to himſelf, as well as to all about him. See Antiq. l. xvii. c. 6. Jewiſh war, l. i. c. 33. and Univ. Hiſtory, vol. x. p. 638.

Ver. 20. Who ſought the young child's life] Greek. Who ſought the ſoul; an Hebraiſm, of which our verſion gives the ſenſe. See 1 Kings xix. 10, 14. Exod. iv. 19. to which laſt paſſage the angel ſeems to allude. It is an ingenious conjecture of Mr. Manne, that Antipater, the ſon of Herod, who, at the time when Chriſt was born, was heir apparent to his crown, and was a prince ſo cruel and ambitious, that he had procured the death of his two elder brothers to clear his way to the ſucceſſion, would very probably be an active counſellor and inſtrument, in ſeeking the deſtruction of the new-born Jeſus, and in adviſing the ſlaughter of the infants; and as this Antipater died but five days before Herod, both might be referred to in theſe words of the angel, they are dead. See Manne's diſſert. p. 74. Doddridge, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 22. Archelaus] He was the ſixth ſon of Herod, and the moſt cruel of all thoſe who ſurvived him. He cauſed 3000 citizens to be murdered at one time in the temple. Herod in his will appointed him his ſucceſſor, and beſtowed upon him the regal authority; but Auguſtus gave him only the title of Ethnarch, or prince of the nation; of which however he deprived him afterwards, and ſent him into baniſhment for his tyranny and cruelty. Galilee belonged to the juriſdiction of Antipas, another of the ſons of Herod, and who was himſelf afterwards called Herod. See ch. xiv. 1. He was of a much milder diſpoſition than Archelaus, and was then upon ſuch hoſtile terms with him, that there was no danger of his giving up Joſeph and Mary into his power. The reader, the better to underſtand this part of the ſacred ſtory, will do well to read Joſephus, or the Univ. Hiſt. as above referred to.

Ver. 23. A city called Nazareth] Which was a ſmall town of the lower Galilee, near the frontiers of the tribes of Zebulon and Iſſachar. In the deſcription of the Nazarites given Numb. vi. we learn that he which was ſpoken by the prophets, He ſhall be called a Nazarene.

CHAP. III.

John preacheth: his office, life, and baptiſm: he reprehendeth the Phariſees, and baptizeth Chriſt in Jordan.

IN thoſe days came John the Baptiſt, preaching in the wilderneſs of Judea,

2 And ſaying, Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

3 For this is he that was ſpoken of by the prophet Eſaias, ſaying, The voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths ſtraight.

4 And the ſame John had his raiment of camels hair, and a leathern girdle about his

Ver. 23. Judg. xiii. 5. 1 Sam. i. 11.——V. 1. Mark i. 4. Luke iii. 2. Joſh. xiv. 10.—V. 2. Dan. ii. 44.—V. 3. Iſai. xl. 3. Mark i. 3. Luke iii. 4. John i. 23.—V. 4. Mark i. 6. 2 Kings i. 8. Zech. xiii. 4.

was firſt to abſtain from wine and all vinous liquors; ſecondly, to let his hair grow; thirdly, not to defile himſelf with the dead. Now in each of theſe particulars, as we have obſerved on the 21ſt verſe of that chapter, the Nazarite was a lively type of Chriſt; whoſe extraordinary endowments, as man, were not from any natural cauſes, but from above, even from the ſpirit of God: who was inveſted with all power and authority, of which hair was an emblem; (See Judg. xvi. 17, 20, 22. Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 7. in the Greek) and who was entirely ſeparate from dead works, from ſin and ſinners. It would be needleſs, and far exceed my preſent bounds, to quote the prophecies wherein the Meſſiah is deſcribed as endowed with theſe high qualifications. Many of the predictions concerning Chriſt may be reduced to one or other of theſe heads; and in order to turn the attention of men to him as the true Nazarite, in whom the type was completely fulfilled, it is remarkably obſerved here by St. Matthew, that he came and dwelt at Nazareth; that what was ſpoken by the prophets might be fulfilled, he ſhall be called; i. e. ſhall be truly and juſtly Ναζωραῖος, a Nazarite; ſo the Vulgate, Nazaræus. Thus, whilſt the Jews and Romans were calling him in contempt the Nazarene, the providence of God was at the ſame time pointing him out to mankind as the true Nazarite, from the circumſtance of his dwelling in that city which had been prophetically, with a view, no doubt, to this important event, called Nazareth, or the city of the Nazarites; even as Pilate, by the inſcription on our Lord's croſs, proclaimed him both to Jews and Gentiles to be the Saviour, the king of the Jews; though doubtleſs he intended by it to ridicule and expoſe his pretenſions. See John xix. 19, 20. and Parkhurſt on the word נצר nezer. It may be proper juſt to obſerve that there are other and different expoſitions given of this prophecy; The editors of the Pruſſian Teſtament agree with the margin of our Bible, and think that the paſſage referred to, is either Judg. xiii. 5. where Sampſon, a type of the Meſſiah, is ſpoken of; or Iſaiah xi. 1. where the Meſſiah is ſtiled the netzer or branch; while Wetſtein, Doddridge, Macknight, and many others, ſuppoſe that the expreſſion refers to the mean and deſpicable circumſtances of the Meſſiah, and the reproachful manner wherein he was treated, agreeable to ſeveral prophetical paſſages of Scripture. But Houbigant is of opinion that the Evangeliſt refers to the bleſſings of Jacob and Moſes, in each of which Joſeph, as a type of the Meſſiah, is called Nezir, or Nazarite. See Gen. xlx. 26. Deut. xxxiii. 16. and Houbigant's note on the laſt place.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. II.

THE love of our redeemer for a mean and private life appears from the firſt moment of his birth, in the choice which he makes of Bethlehem.

Thoſe who are neareſt to Chriſt very often know him not, when thoſe who are further off, ſeek and adore him. How great was the faith of theſe wiſe men, and how illuſtrious a teſtimony did they bear to the dignity of our Lord's perſon! Surely the readineſs they ſhewed, and the fatiguing journey they ſo willingly undertook to pay their adoration to their infant Saviour, ſhould awaken in our ſouls an anxious concern, not to be excelled by them in duty and devotion to this divine Lord, now that we enjoy the better and more abiding light of his Goſpel, that glorious day-ſpring from on high. With what chearfulneſs ſhould we preſent ourſelves, and all we have to him! opening the treaſuries of our hearts, and offering before him the valuable preſents of humble faith and adoring love!

It is not to be ſuppoſed that God would have guided theſe wiſe men in this extraordinary manner, merely to pay a tranſient compliment to Jeſus; their proſtrations, no doubt, expreſſed religious adoration, as well as civil reſpect; and it is not unlikely, that their report might in due time make way for the reception of the Goſpel, in the country from whence they came. Gentiles as they were, we cannot help looking upon them as the firſt-fruits of the nations to Chriſt. This circumſtance of the ſacred hiſtory affords a beautiful emblem of that glorious ſtate of the Chriſtian church, foretold by the prophets, when the Gentiles ſhould come down to its light, and ſages and kings to the brightneſs of its riſing, when the abundance of the ſea ſhould be converted to it, and the wealth of the Gentiles conſecrated to its honour.

We may obſerve here how Jews and Gentiles conferred together about Jeſus Chriſt. The Gentiles know the time of his birth by a ſtar; the Jews know the place of it by the Scripture; and ſo they are capable of informing one another. It would contribute much to the increaſe of knowledge, if we were thus mutually to communicate what we know. Men grow rich by bartering and exchange; ſo, if we have knowledge to communicate to others, they will be ready to communicate to us. Thus many ſhall diſcourſe, ſhall run to and from, and knowledge ſhall be increaſed. Even an Herod, you may remark, conſults the prieſts and teachers of the law in matters of religious concernment. The prieſt's lips ſhould keep knowledge, and the people muſt inquire the law at their mouth; and to inſpire us with reverence for the oracles of God, theſe prieſts preſume not to anſwer the queſtion, but by a reference to the Scriptures of truth.

How very conſpicuous did the wiſdom and power of divine providence appear in the preſervation of the infant Jeſus! and in thwarting the vile hypocriſy, and execrable cruelty of the tyrant Herod! There is no underſtanding, or wiſdom, or counſel againſt the Lord: No ſcheme ſo artfully diſguiſed that he cannot penetrate it; or ſo politicly formed, that he cannot with infinite eaſe confound it.

To what perplexity and grief might theſe ſages have been brought, had they been made even the innocent inſtruments of an aſſault on this holy child! But God delivered them from ſuch an alarm, and happily guided their return, (ver. 12.) ſo that through his care and favour they carried home, in the tidings of the New-born Meſſiah, far richer treaſures than they had left behind. Thus ſhall they, who in all their ways acknowledge God, by one method or another find that he will graciouſly direct their paths!

We may remark how God in his providence makes the cruelty of a Herod ſubſervient to the publication of his ſon's birth, and to the accompliſhment of his deſigns with reſpect to him. He reduces within the order of his goodneſs, the greateſt diſorders of human wickedneſs. He makes that Egypt which was once the ſeat of perſecution and oppreſſion to his choſen people, a refuge to his Son; and thus all places will be to us what the providence of God ſhall be pleaſed to make them.

How many inſtructive leſſons may we derive from this inhuman maſſacre of the innocents at Bethlehem! We are taught from hence, that afflictions are not always arguments of guilt, ſince innocent children were made a ſacrifice to the ambition of a cruel tyrant: That we ought to be ready to part with what is dear to us as our own children, whenever they may become inſtruments of God's glory: That what oppreſſion ſoever innocence meets with from the hands of wicked men, it is for the good of thoſe who ſuffer it: That the conduct of thoſe parents who neglect the education and inſtruction of their children in Chriſtian and virtuous principles, exceeds the cruelty of an Herod:—He only deprived little innocents of this life; they expoſe their own bowels to eternal death! And that to be true diſciples of Chriſt, we muſt become as little children in the frame and temper of our minds; without which we cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven. "Mortify therefore, and kill in us all vices, great God of our ſalvation; and ſo ſtrengthen us through thy grace; that by the innocency of our lives, and the conſtancy of our faith, even unto death, we may glorify thy holy name, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord!"

Chap. III. Ver. 1. In thoſe days] That is, while Jeſus was yet at Nazareth, where he dwelt till he entered on his public miniſtry, in the thirtieth year of his age. It is uſual with authors to denote the times they are ſpeaking of in an indeterminate manner. St. Luke in the paſſage of the margin has ſpecified this period very particularly; and as he has given us a more full and exact account of John the Baptiſt than St. Matthew, we ſhall refer our readers to the notes on his Goſpel. The wilderneſs of Judea was not a place wholly void of inhabitants; but hilly, and not ſo fruitful, or ſo well inhabited as the reſt of Judea; though there were ſeveral cities in it. Joſhua reckons ſix. See Joſh. xv. 61, 62. St. John was born and had been brought up in this wilderneſs. Compare Luke i. 39, 40.

Ver. 2. Repent ye] This was only the ſubſtance and reſult of his preaching. The kingdom of heaven, and the kingdom of God, are but two phraſes for the ſame thing, agreeably to the ſtyle of the Hebrews; who frequently uſed the word heaven to denote God himſelf, who dwells there. Hence what is here called by St. Matthew the kingdom of heaven, is by St. Mark and St. Luke called the kingdom of God; Mark i. 15. Luke vi. 20. The kingdom of heaven therefore ſignifies here the kingdom of God, which was founded and eſtabliſhed by Jeſus Chriſt: The kingdom of grace here, introductory to the kingdom of glory hereafter; and this expreſſion is founded on Dan. ii. 44. vii. 13, 14. Now, as the kingdom of heaven was to be opened by the preaching of the Goſpel, John the Baptiſt rightly ſays, that it was at hand; ſince Jeſus Chriſt entered on his public miniſtry about ſix months after. See Luke iii. 2, 3. The demand of repentance ſhewed that this was a ſpiritual kingdom, and that no wicked man, how politic or brave, how learned or renowned ſoever, could poſſibly be a genuine member of it. See Whitby, L'Enfant, Doddridge, and Heylin, p. 19. For the next verſe we refer to the notes on Iſai. xl. 3.

Ver. 4. His raiment of camel's hair] The Jews uſed to wear hairy

loins; and his meat was locuſts and wild honey.

5 Then went out to him Jeruſalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan,

6 And were baptized of him in Jordan, confeſſing their ſins.

7 But when he ſaw many of the Phariſees and Sadducees come to his baptiſm, he ſaid unto them, O generation of vipers! who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?

8 Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance:

9 And think not to ſay within yourſelves, We have Abraham to our father: for I ſay unto you, that God is able of theſe ſtones to raiſe up children unto Abraham.

or coarſe garments in time of ſorrow and humiliation. See Matt. xi. 21. The Nazarites did the ſame till they had fulfilled their vow. It was alſo a dreſs ſometimes worn by the prophets; Zech. xiii. 14. 2 Kings i. 8. Rev. vi. 12. xi. 3. In all theſe reſpects, it ſuited John the Baptiſt, as he preached repentance, as he was a prophet, and as he imitated the auſterity which was practiſed by the Nazarites. He wore too a leathern girdle, as did ſome of the old prophets, and in particular Elijah, whom John the Baptiſt repreſented in habit, as well as in ſpirit and office. See 2 Kings i. 8. and compare Heb. xi. 37. Matt. xi. 14. His food was locuſts, the eating of which was allowed by the law, and cuſtomary in the eaſtern parts of the world, as we have ſhewn in the note on Lev. xi. 22. Sir Norton Knatchbull, and ſome others, not attending to this particular, have ſuppoſed that the original word ακριδες, implies not locuſts, but a plant, the buds of which ſomething reſemble aſparagus. But it is undeniable that the word both in the LXX and elſewhere, generally ſignifies the animal which we call a locuſt. See Mintert on the word. The wild honey was ſuch as he found in the holes of rocks and trees; for bees were very numerous in Paleſtine. Joſephus, ſpeaking of the fountain by Jericho, ſays, "There are by it, many ſorts of palm-trees, the better ſort of which, when they are preſſed, yield an excellent kind of honey, not much inferior in ſweetneſs to other honey. The country alſo produces honey from bees." See Jewiſh War, book iv. chap. 8. ſect. 3. Hence ſome have conceived, that the honey whereupon St. John fed, was of that kind which is found upon, and preſſed from the leaves of trees in Syria. St. John made uſe of cloathing and food which was mean and eaſily procured, not through poverty, for he was the only ſon of a prieſt, but of his own free choice; that the ſeverity of his manners might correſpond with his doctrine; which enjoined frequent faſtings and abſtinence on his diſciples, ch. ix. 14. and alſo that by this means he might ſtrengthen both his body and mind, and prepare himſelf to meet with intrepidity dangers, and death at the laſt. See Wetſtein, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 5. And all the region round about Jordan] As the river Jordan runs through a vaſt tract of land, it cannot be ſuppoſed that all they who lived neareſt it came to John's baptiſm. By all the region, &c. St. Matthew therefore muſt mean ſome of thoſe countries near Jordan, which bordered upon Judea, as the plain of Jordan, which is by the LXX called the country about Jordan. The novelty of a prophet's appearance in Iſrael; the family of John, the circumſtances of his birth, the extraordinary character which he had maintained for ſtrict and undiſſembled piety, all concurred, no doubt, with the time of his appearance, and the people's impatient deſire of the Meſſiah's arrival, and uneaſineſs under the Roman yoke, to draw ſuch vaſt multitudes after him. See Calmet, and Doddridge.

Ver. 6. Were baptiſed of Him] There were two kinds of baptiſm in uſe among the Jews; one was that of the prieſts at their conſecration, Lev. viii. 6. The other was that of the heathens proſelyted to the Jewiſh religion. It was therefore no unheard-of rite, which the Meſſiah's harbinger made uſe of. His countrymen were well acquainted both with the thing itſelf, and with its ſignification: They knew that it denoted ſome great change, either in the opinions or practices of thoſe who ſubmitted to it, and implied a promiſe of acceptance with God, on the part of him who adminiſtered it. Moreover they had been led by a paſſage in their ſacred books, Zech. xiii. 1. to expect that either the Meſſiah himſelf, or ſome of his attendants, would baptiſe; as is evident from the queſtion which the meſſengers of the Sanhedrim put to the Baptiſt: John i. 25. Why baptiſeſt thou then, if thou be not that Chriſt, &c.? They muſt have known therefore that John's baptiſm repreſented purification both of heart and life, as neceſſary even to Jews themſelves, before they could become the ſubjects of ſo holy a prince as the Meſſiah; and that it was a ſolemn obligation binding thoſe who received it to lead ſuch lives. Hence, as Dr. Whitby obſerves, they are miſtaken, who think John's baptiſm the ſame in kind with that which Chriſt afterwards inſtituted for the admiſſion of diſciples into his church. The difference between the two was conſiderable; Firſt, John did not baptiſe either in the name of Chriſt, or of the Holy Ghoſt, much leſs did he baptiſe them with the Holy Ghoſt, a circumſtance mentioned by himſelf as what remarkably diſtinguiſhes Chriſt's baptiſm from his. Secondly, They who were baptiſed with John's baptiſm, did not profeſs their faith in the Meſſiah, as actually come, neither did they receive his baptiſm in teſtimony of their entertaining that belief; for, after having adminiſtered it, he exhorted his diſciples to believe on Him who was to come. Therefore his baptiſm could not initiate men into the Chriſtian church. See Acts xix. 4, 5. Thirdly, John's was the baptiſm of repentance, whereby all who had a ſenſe of their ſins, and profeſſed repentance, were promiſed pardon, and exhorted to believe in the Meſſiah, who was ſoon to appear; or it was a waſhing with water to ſhew the Jews, that they might be cleanſed both from their prejudices and vices, in order to their becoming fit members of the Meſſiah's kingdom. Accordingly we read, that they who were baptiſed confeſſed their ſins. This confeſſion of ſins was abſolutely required as a condition without which there could be no expiation, Lev. vi. 21. no remiſſion of them; 1 John i. 9. If thoſe who were baptiſed had committed any great crime or ſcandalous offence, they were to make a public and open confeſſion of it, as appears from Acts xix. 18. Otherwiſe this confeſſion implies only a general acknowledgement that they were ſinners; that they repented of their ſins, and were reſolved to forſake them. See Whitby, Macknight and L'Enfant.

Ver. 7. Phariſees] A Jewiſh ſect ſo called from a Hebrew word ſignifying ſeparated, or ſet apart, becauſe they diſtinguiſhed themſelves from the reſt of the Jews, by pretending to a greater degree of holineſs and piety than the generality of them did; and by ſome particular obſervances. The Sadducees were another Jewiſh ſect, ſo named from Sadoc, the founder of it. The moſt authentic account of theſe ſects may be ſeen in Joſephus's Antiq. b. xviii. c. 1. and Jewiſh War, b. ii. c. 8. All writers of Jewiſh antiquities deſcribe them largely, but none better than Dr. Prideaux; Connect. vol. ii. p. 335. and the editors of the Pruſſian Teſtament, in their excellent introduction, which is tranſlated into Engliſh, and well deſerves the peruſal of all who would thoroughly underſtand the New Teſtament. It is manifeſt from St. John's reproof of theſe Phariſees and Sadducees, that they did not come to his baptiſm with true faith; or elſe that they fancied that baptiſm alone could procure them the remiſſion of their ſins. See Luke vii. 29. Matt. xxi. 25. from which paſſages it appears, that the Phariſees did not receive the baptiſm of John. It is alſo evident, from Luke iii. 7. that there were among the multitude ſome perſons of no better diſpoſitions than the Phariſees; ſince the baptiſt gives them the ſame reproof, calling them, ye brood of vipers, as Dr. Waterland very properly renders it. "As to this term of reproach, I take the reaſon of it, ſays Dr. Heylin, to be as follows: It is a probable conjecture, that men (quatenus animals) have each a peculiar reſemblance to ſome peculiar ſpecies of animals; which may be the reaſon, why Jeſus is called the Lamb of God, or the Divine Lamb: and his diſciples, or thoſe who are in ſuch a ſtate as renders them capable of becoming ſuch, are named Sheep; as, on the other hand, the politic Herod is called a fox, and perſons noted for an inſiduous, ravenous, profane or ſenſual diſpoſition are called reſpectively, ſerpents, dogs, wolves, and ſwine; which terms, when they occur in the Goſpel, are not the random language of paſſion, and "calling names," as we ſpeak; but a judicious deſignation of the perſons meant by them; for it was fitting that ſuch men ſhould be denoted by their proper ſignature, either for a caution to others, or a warning to themſelves. The Baptiſt had probably both theſe ends in view, when he called theſe Phariſees and Sadducees a brood of vipers. As they were perſons of a public character, it was proper that the world ſhould be informed what kind of men they were, to prevent the infection of their bad example; and upon their own account, it was proper to deſcribe them to themſelves, and denominate them (mere animal-men as they were, 1 Cor. ii. 14.) by their animal properties; becauſe, being already hardened in the uſe of religious ordinances, if they were not thus roughly dealt with, and alarmed by a true ſenſe of their dangerous condition, they would probably abuſe baptiſm, as they had other holy inſtitutions, to quiet their conſciences, which were now ſomewhat awakened, and ſtruck as with a panic fear, upon the general concourſe to the preaching of St. John.—From the wrath to come, means not only from the Gehenna, ch. v. 29. but alſo from the dreadful calamities which were ready to fall on the Jewiſh nation.

Ver. 8. Fruits meet for repentance] Worthy of repentance, that is: "Do ſuch works as may manifeſt the truth and ſincerity of your repentance." See Acts xxvi. 20. and comp. Epheſ. v. 9.

Ver. 9. Think not to ſay, &c.] Dr. Whitby has ſhewn fully how great was the preſumption of the Jews, on their relationſhip to Abraham. Munſter upon this text quotes a remarkable paſſage from the Talmud, wherein it is ſaid, "That Abraham ſits next the gates of hell, and doth not permit any wicked Iſraelite to go down into it." Theſe Jews might perhaps pervert the promiſe in Jer. xxxi. 35, 36. to ſupport this vain and dangerous confidence, in oppoſition to the moſt expreſs and aweful threatenings; particularly Deut. xxx. 19, &c. L'Enfant, with many other expoſitors, 10 And now alſo the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and caſt into the fire.

11 I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but he that cometh after me, is mightier than I, whoſe ſhoes I am not worthy to bear: he ſhall baptize you with the Holy Ghoſt, and with fire:

12 Whoſe fan is in his hand, and he will throughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

13 Then cometh Jeſus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.

14 But John forbad him, ſaying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comeſt thou to me?

15 And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid unto him, Suffer it to be ſo now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteouſneſs. Then he ſuffered him.

16 And Jeſus, when he was baptized, went up ſtraightway out of the water: and lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he ſaw the Spirit of God deſcending like a dove, and lighting upon him:

Ver. 10. Ch. vii. 19. John xv. 6.—V. 11. Mark i. 8. Luke iii. 16. John i. 15, 26. Acts i. 5. xi. 16. xix. 4. Iſai. iv. 4. Mal. iii. 2.—V. 12. Mal iii. 3.—V. 13. Mark i. 9. Luke iii. 21. Ch. ii. 22.—V. 16. Iſai. xi. 2. xlii. 1. Luke iii. 22. John i. 32, 33.

is of opinion, that the Baptiſt hints here at the call of the Gentiles, which was occaſioned by the unbelief of the Jews; and that he alludes to Iſai. li. 1. &c. But it ſeems moſt probable, that the Baptiſt, taking his ideas from the objects before him (as we ſhall find in the courſe of this work was familiar with our bleſſed Saviour), intended to ſay thus much only to the Phariſees: "I declare it unto you, as a certain and ſolemn truth, that God is able, of theſe very ſtones, here before your eyes, which he can animate and ſanctify whenever he ſees fit, to raiſe up thoſe, who, tho' not deſcended from human parents, ſhall be, in a much nobler ſenſe than you, children of Abraham, as being made the heirs of his faith and obedience: and he would ſooner work ſuch a miracle as this, than ſuffer his promiſe to fail, or admit you to the bleſſings of his approaching kingdom, merely becauſe you have the abuſed honour to deſcend from that peculiar favourite of heaven." See Doddridge.

Ver. 10. And now alſo the axe, &c.] The axe is already laid to the root of the trees: every tree then, &c. Wat. "There is now no more time for delay: God is going to offer the laſt diſpenſation of repentance and mercy; which, if you accept not, his vengeance hangs over you; deſtruction will ſpeedily overtake you." See Iſai. x. 33, 34. It may be proper to obſerve, once for all, that in Scripture language, what is very ſure and very near, is ſpoken of as if it were already done; accordingly the Baptiſt ſpeaks here in the preſent tenſe. So Chriſt ſpeaks of himſelf, as if he were already in poſſeſſion of his glory while upon earth; John xvii. 24. See alſo John iii. 18. Epheſ. ii. 16. and Heb. xii. 22, 23. L'Enfant obſerves, that this verſe contains a prophecy of the total ruin and deſtruction of the temple, the city, and the nation of the Jews, which happened forty years after the death of Jeſus Chriſt.

Ver. 11. I indeed baptiſe you] This is the anſwer which John made to the queſtion put to him, John i. 19. in which he ſhews what difference there was between him and the Meſſiah. "I indeed, ſays he, baptiſe you with water, to bring you to repentance; for they who were baptized, not only declared that they had repented of their ſins, but they bound themſelves never to commit the like again, and to lead a life of holineſs and virtue;" which is the meaning of the Baptiſt in this place; and this is the new life. Rom. vi. 4. whereto people engaged themſelves when baptiſm was adminiſtered to them. He that cometh after me, ſays he, (namely Jeſus Chriſt, who entered on his miniſtry about ſix months after John, and was about ſix months younger; See Luke i. 36.) is mightier than I; whoſe ſhoes, &c. a proverbial and humiliating expreſſion, meaning, "whoſe loweſt ſervant I am not worthy to be," and denoting the great ſuperiority of Jeſus Chriſt above John. He ſhall baptize you with the Holy Ghoſt; the effuſion of which on the day of Petecoſt, St. John ſtyles a baptiſm; ſhewing thereby the copiouſneſs and abundance of it: and indeed it was a glorious effuſion over the church, of which Jeſus Chriſt was the author; Acts ii. 2, 33. He adds, and with fire; becauſe the Holy Ghoſt deſcended on the apoſtles in the ſhape of fire, and had the ſame power and virtue as that element of purifying, enlivening, &c. We may juſt obſerve that in the Greek it is, Baptiſe you in water,—in the Holy Ghoſt; words which well expreſs the ceremony of baptiſm, which was at firſt performed by plunging the whole body in water, as alſo the copious effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt on the day of Pentecoſt. See L'Enfant, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 12. Whoſe fan is in his hand, &c.] This expreſſion is taken from the prophetical writings. See Lev. xxvi. 23. Iſai. xli. 16, &c. Dr. Shaw obſerves, that in the eaſtern countries, after the grain is trodden out, they winnow it, by throwing it up againſt the wind with a ſhovel; the τὸ πτύον, here; and Luke iii. 17. rendered a fan, or van, top cumberſome a machine to be thought of. The text ſhould rather run; whoſe ſhovel or fork is in his hand; for this is a portable inſtrument, and is agreeable to the practice recorded, Iſai. xxx. 24. where both the ſhovel and the van are mentioned, as the chaff that is thereby carried away before the wind, is often alluded to in Scripture. See Travels, p. 139. To underſtand the Baptiſt's meaning right, we ſhould obſerve, that in this verſe he deſcribes the authority of Chriſt's miniſtry, as in that preceding he had deſcribed the efficacy of it. "The Meſſiah is infinitely mightier than I; not only as he will, beſtow on you the miraculous gifts of the ſpirit, will purify and enliven your ſouls, and kindle in your hearts pious and devout affections; but alſo as he has power to reward them who obey him with eternal life, and to puniſh ſuch with everlaſting deſtruction who reject him. See Macknight. There is, in what the Baptiſt here declares, as Dr. Doddridge remarks, an evident alluſion to the cuſtom of burning the chaff after winnowing, that it might not be blown back again, and ſo be mingled with the wheat; and though it may in part refer to the calamities to come upon the Jewiſh nation for rejecting Chriſt, as Bp. Chandler, L'Enfant, and others have obſerved; yet it ſeems chiefly to intend the final deſtruction of ſinners in hell; which alone is properly oppoſed to the gathering the wheat into the garner. Dr. Heylin underſtands the paſſage in a very different ſenſe, as implying the total purification of our ſinful nature, through the grace of Chriſt; and to keep up the metaphor he reads, He ſhall baptize you with holy wind and fire. Though I have no doubt that the expoſition above given is the true one, yet there is ſomething ſo ingenious as well as inſtructive in that of Dr. Heylin, that I cannot help referring my reader to it, as aſſured he will find great ſatisfaction in the peruſal. See his Lectures, vol. i. p. 24. Inſtead of, Purge, &c. Dr. Waterland reads, Cleanſe—and gather the wheat into his garner, &c.

Ver. 13. To be baptiſed of him] By this he intended to do an honour to John's miniſtry, and to conform himſelf to what he appointed for his followers. It was for this laſt reaſon, that he drank of the ſacramental cup. See Diodati. And certainly our Lord's baptiſm tended to promote the ends both of his own miſſion and of his forerunner's, as it eſtabliſhed the authority of both. It eſtabliſhed John's miſſion; great honour being done him by the Meſſiah's receiving his baptiſm. It eſtabliſhed our Lord's miſſion alſo; for after he was baptiſed, the teſtimonies of the ſpirit, and voice from Heaven, were given him in the preſence of the multitude aſſembled at Jordan. That theſe teſtimonies ſhould have been given him on this occaſion, rather than on any other, was fit, becauſe it was an auguſt manner of opening our Lord's miniſtry; was the moſt public occaſion that could be found, and pointed him out as the Meſſiah to the Baptiſt, who was thereby qualified for the principal duty of his miſſion. See Macknight.

Ver. 14. But John forbad him] But John refuſed him. Wat. See the note on John i. 31. Doddridge and others have it, Would have hindered or prevented him, ſaying, I have need to be baptiſed of you, and do you come to me? But Jeſus was in his own perſon to paſs through, and ſanctify all ſtates; and although the laſt ſtage wherein virtue attains its higheſt purity, was his reſerved province with regard to others, yet he himſelf began in the firſt; ſo that there was no kind or degree of moral goodneſs wherein he did not excel. He was, if I may ſo ſpeak, at the head of every form in the ſchool of virtue. He had in all things the pre-eminence, as his apoſtle declares. To this end, he practiſed the virtues of every rank and condition. He accordingly appeared among the penitents at Jordan; and when John objected to his ſuperior character, incompatible, as he thought, with ſuch condeſcenſion, Jeſus replied, Let it be ſo for the preſent, for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteouſneſs; δικαιοσύνη, Juſtice; which, taken in general, as it commonly is in Scripture, ſignifies a combination of all the virtues, and is uſed as a compendious name for all duty; becauſe, to give each thing its due, and treat it according to its deſert, which is the office of juſtice, comprehends the whole of religion and morality. All juſtice is a Greciſm for "all kinds of juſtice." So we have in the next chapter all ſickneſs and all diſeaſe, i. e. all kinds of ſickneſs, and all kinds of diſeaſe. See more in Dr. Heylin's Diſcourſe concerning Juſtice, p. 31. The editors of the Pruſſian Teſtament define all righteouſneſs by "whatever befits us, and is ſuitable to our employment and profeſſion." To fulfil righteouſneſs, and to fulfil the law, ſays Wetſtein, is "to fulfil thoſe things which the law enjoins, and which are eſteemed juſt and laudable."

Ver. 16. The heavens were opened to him] i. e. To John; to whoſe view, as well as to that of the Saviour, this wonderful viſion was preſented. St. Mark has ſo expreſſed it, as plainly to refer the ſeeing it to Chriſt; and John the Baptiſt has in another place aſſured us, that he ſaw it, and took particular notice of it, as the ſign he was directed to obſerve, as the diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic of the Meſſiah 17 And lo, a voice from heaven, ſaying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed.

CHAP. IV.

Chriſt faſteth, and is tempted. The angels miniſter unto him: he dwelleth in Capernaum, beginneth to preach, calleth Peter and Andrew, James and John, and healeth all the diſeaſed.

THEN was Jeſus led up of the Spirit into the wilderneſs to be tempted of the devil.

Ver. 17. John xii. 28. Pſ. ii. 7. Iſai. xlii. 1. Ch. xii. 18. xvii. 5. Luke ix. 35. Eph. i. 6. Col. i. 13. 2 Pet. i. 17.——V. 1. Mark i. 12. Luke iv. 1.

ſiah. See John i. 32, 34. This verſe might be rendered with more propriety, And Jeſus, being baptized, had juſt gone out of the water, when lo! the heavens were opened unto him: εὐθὺς, rendered ſtraightway in our verſion, not denoting the quickneſs of Chriſt's coming out of the water, but the immediate opening of the heavens after it. See Blackwall's ſacred claſſics, vol. i. p. 89. The Spirit of God is ſaid here to have deſcended like a dove: in St. Luke it is added, σωματικῷ εἴδει, in a corporeal form; a phraſe which might have been uſed with propriety, though there had not been, as is generally ſuppoſed, any appearance of the ſhape of the animal here mentioned, but only a lambent flame falling from heaven, with a hovering, dove-like motion, which Dr. Scott and others ſuppoſe to have been all. But Juſtin Martyr ſays expreſly, that it was in the form of a dove; adding, that all Jordan ſhone with the reflection of the light; and Jerome calls it, the appearance of a dove. It reſembled a dove, ſays Wetſtein, both in appearance and flight. See Hammond, and Whitby.

Ver. 17. This is my beloved Son] As both Mark and Luke have it, Thou art my beloved Son, one would be inclined to follow thoſe copies of St. Matthew, which agree with them, rather than the more common reading. See Mills and Wetſtein. Chemnitz, however, and ſome others, imagine that both ſentences were pronounced, the voice uttering the words, Thou art my beloved ſon, &c. while the Spirit was deſcending, as if they had been directed to Jeſus alone; and that after the Spirit reſted on Jeſus, the voice, ſpeaking to the Baptiſt and the multitude, ſaid, This is my beloved Son, &c. On this ſuppoſition, which, without doubt, renders the miracle very remarkable, the words of the preceding verſe may be well referred to the Baptiſt, as we have there obſerved. Ἀγαπητὸς is frequently uſed by authors to denote an only Son, and the LXX make uſe of it when the word in the Hebrew ſignifies only, Gen. xxii. 12. Zech. xii. 10. and elſewhere. The original word εὐδόκησα, expreſſes an intire acquieſcence in what one loves and approves. This paſſage is taken from Iſai. xlii. 1. with very little variation. See Pſ. xliv. 4. and xliii. 3. Wetſtein, and L'Enfant; and for more in the Reflections. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that we have here a glorious manifeſtation of the ever bleſſed Trinity; the Father ſpeaking from heaven, the Son ſpoken to, and the Holy Ghoſt deſcending upon Him.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. III.

It is ſurely matter of unſpeakable thankfulneſs, that the kingdom of heaven ſhould be erected amongſt men; that the great God ſhould condeſcend ſo far as to take to himſelf a people from our ſinful world, and appoint his own Son to be the Governor of that kingdom: How happy are we that it is preached among us, and we are called to it! It ſhould be our great care to become not only nominal, but real members of it.

Repentance is the true preparation for the kingdom of heaven. We ſhould therefore every moment be prepared for it, becauſe this kingdom is every moment approaching nearer to us. If this kingdom is a kingdom of love, the repentance which prepares us for it muſt likewiſe be a repentance of love; that is, evangelical repentance, which flows from a ſight of Chriſt, from a ſenſe of his love, and the hope of forgiveneſs through him. Kindneſs is conquering; abuſed kindneſs is humbling and melting. The language of the truly penitent heart is, "What a wretch was I, to ſin againſt ſuch grace! againſt the law and love of ſuch a kingdom!"

He who preaches repentance, ought to perform it himſelf, and to join the outward part to the inward: this perſuades more than words. All is ſingular in St. John, (ver. 4.) not to attract the eſteem and praiſes of men, but to awaken their attention: with an awful ſeverity of manners and of doctrine, he was ſent before Chriſt to prepare his way. It is neceſſary that the law ſhould introduce the Goſpel; but the terrors of Moſes and Elijah ſhould render the mild and bleſſed Redeemer ſo much the more welcome to our ſouls. St. John preaches in the wilderneſs: No place is ſo remote as to exclude us from the viſits of divine grace; nay, commonly the ſweeteſt intercourſe which believers enjoy with heaven, is when they are withdrawn furtheſt from the noiſe and diſtractions of the world.

Behold the dreadful danger of all hypocrites, and unfruitful hearers of the word, whatever their pretences, or their external privileges may be! Miſerable they who ſhall be found in their ſins! Their covenant relation to Abraham, their baptiſm with water, their mere external profeſſions will avail them nothing: God will abandon them to unquenchable flames.

Warn'd by this aweful notice, may we forſake our ſins, and bring forth the proper fruits of repentance: And that we may be prepared for the great and final trial, let us be earneſt in our applications to our gracious Redeemer, that as we are baptiſed with water in his name, he would alſo baptiſe us with the Holy Ghoſt and with fire! That by the operations of his bleſſed Spirit, he would enkindle and quicken that divine life, that ſacred love, that flaming, yet well-governed zeal for his glory, which diſtinguiſhes the true Chriſtian from the hypocritical profeſſor, and is indeed the ſeal of God ſet upon the heart, to mark it for eternal happineſs.

Our Lord's ſubmitting himſelf to baptiſm, ver. 13. ſhould teach us a holy exactneſs and care in the obſervance of thoſe poſitive inſtitutions, which owe their obligation merely to a divine command; for thus alſo it becometh us to fulfil all righteouſneſs; "every thing juſt and needful in itſelf, as well as every thing meet, decent, regular, exemplary, and of good report."

Behold we at this baptiſm, the ſacred Three, diſtinctly appearing in characters of perſonal and divine glory, and concurring in the great deſign of ſalvation! How inconſiderable and unworthy are the beſt of men, compared with Chriſt! And what exalted and endearing thoughts ſhould we have of him, as the Son of God, and a Saviour of ſinners; and as the beloved of the Father, who makes us accepted in him!

The heavens were opened when Chriſt was baptiſed, to teach us, that when we duly attend on God's ordinances, we may expect communion with him, and communications from him. What an encomium was that which was heard from the opening heavens: This is my beloved Son, in whom I delight! How poor are all other kinds of praiſe! To be the delight and joy of God, this is praiſe indeed; this is true glory; this is the higheſt, brighteſt light that virtue can appear in.

That virtue is the object of divine complacence, as it is a moſt important truth, ſo it is obvious to all: For it is a principal article of natural religion, which hereby offers to every virtuous mind a ſure foundation, whereon to build hopes and confidence in the Creator. And hence the poet, with great propriety, has put it into the mouth of dying Cato; when, ſtanding anxiouſly on the brink of life, perplexed with the intricate ways of Providence in this ſtate, and dubious of a future, to ſtop the agitation of his mind, fluctuating in theſe uncertainties, he ſays,

> Here will I hold. If there's a pow'r above us,
> (And that there is, all nature cries aloud
> Through all her works) he muſt delight in virtue;
> And that which he delights in, muſt be happy.

God muſt delight in virtue, for the ſame reaſon that He delights in himſelf: For virtue is his own image and likeneſs, which, extinct in the firſt Adam, and revived in the ſecond, even Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, began her myſterious courſe at his incarnation, and went on gradually through all her proceſs, with the higheſt perfection in each degree; till ſhe had finiſhed the firſt ſtage, which is called the juſtice of the law, at his baptiſm by John, when the Almighty Father pronounced audibly to the lower world his approbation. See more in Dr. Heylin.

Chap. IV. Ver. 1. Then was Jeſus led up, &c.] Then, i. e. immediately after his baptiſm, was Jeſus led, or borne by a ſtrong impulſe of the Spirit on his mind, (See Luke iv. 14.) into the wilderneſs: which Mr. Maundrel is of opinion was the wilderneſs near Jordan; a miſerable and horrid place, according to his account, conſiſting of high barren mountains; ſo that it looks as if nature had ſuffered ſome violent convulſions there. Our Lord probably was aſſaulted in the northern part of it, near the ſea of Galilee; becauſe he is ſaid, Luke iv. 1. to be returning, or going back to Nazareth, from whence he came to be baptiſed. See Mark i. 9. Hither Chriſt retired to prepare himſelf for the diſcharge of his great office; and obtained ſo muchthe greater glory from hence, That he conquered the devil in a wilderneſs, who ſubdued our firſt parents in paradiſe, where with joint ſtrength they ought to have reſiſted him, and might eaſily have overcome him. Chriſt, the ſecond Adam, was to remedy all the evils of the fall. The word διαβόλου ſignifies properly a ſlanderer, or a falſe accuſer, and anſwers to the Hebrew Satan: It is found in the Scripture only in the ſingular number, and ſignifies that evil ſpirit who tempted our firſt parents; and who is repreſented in the ſacred writings as the head of the rebellious angels, and the adverſary of all good men. See 1 Theſſ. iii. 5. 1 Pet. v. 8. The exiſtence of good and bad ſpirits, is the plain doctrine of Scripture; and we muſt be perfect Sadducees, to doubt or deny the being of either, upon the faith and credit of the divine word. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that a late ingenious writer has endeavoured to ſhew that this very remarkable tranſaction was not real, but viſionary; grounding his arguments upon the many difficulties which occur to our underſtandings in the literal account of it. I conceive that by the ſame arguments it would be eaſy to prove almoſt any part of the ſacred ſtory to be viſionary. There is no intimation of any thing of this ſort in the ſacred hiſtorians; the detail of facts is plain, and in their uſual manner: It is poſitively ſaid, that Jeſus was led up, that he faſted, that he hungered, &c. &c. Nor does there appear any thing in the letter whereupon to ground the idea, that what is here related was not real. That the whole event was moſt wonderful and

2 And when he had faſted forty days and forty nights, he was afterward an-hungred.

3 And when the tempter came to him, he ſaid, If thou be the Son of God, command that theſe ſtones be made bread.

4 But he anſwered and ſaid, It is written, Man ſhall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

5 Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and ſetteth him on a pinnacle of the temple,

6 And ſaith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, caſt thyſelf down: for it is written, He ſhall give his angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they ſhall bear thee up, leſt at any time thou daſh thy foot againſt a ſtone.

Ver. 4. Deut. viii. 3.—V. 5. Neh. xi. 18. Iſai. xlviii. 2. Ch. xxvii. 53.—V. 6. Pſ. xci. 11.

extraordinary, we readily allow; and may as readily allow, that from the very ſhort narration we have of it, it is not poſſible for us to enter compleatly into the whole meaning and purport of it. But this ſhould be no objection againſt our receiving and acknowledging the truth of the fact; which, the more miraculous it is, the more it requires the ſubmiſſion of our faith, and the humble adoration of our minds. See more on ver. 8. and Farmer's inquiry into the temptation of Chriſt.

Ver. 2. And when he had faſted forty days] So much greater was Jeſus than Adam. Jeſus, worn down by faſting and hunger, oppreſſed with want, and in a wild howling wilderneſs, overcame the devil; by whom Adam was overcome in full ſtrength, and abounding with all things. It was uſual for perſons to prepare themſelves for any ſacred office by faſting, and prayers ſo intenſe, as to cauſe a neglect of common food. See Acts xiii. 3. xiv. 23. The number forty is remarkably diſtinguiſhed in Scripture: Moſes and Elijah faſted forty days. See alſo Numb. xxvi. 1. Sam. xvii. 6. Gen. l. 3. Jonah iii. 4. Ezek. iv. 6. It is a very juſt remark of Dr. Whitby, that to inſtitute, or to pretend to keep a faſt for forty days, in imitation of this example of our Lord, is to place morality in numbers, and introduce an endleſs heap of ſuperſtitious follies; for it is certain, that ſo great and ſo long abſtinence is inconſiſtent with the frailty of our nature, and ſo can be no duty. Better here is the note of Theophylact and others, that "we are then eſpecially to expect temptations, when we are alone, and when we are in ſtraits and exigencies, from which we ſee no ordinary way of deliverance:" which was the caſe of Chriſt, he being hungry in the wilderneſs, and fed at laſt only by angels miniſtering to him.

Ver. 3. When the tempter came to him, he ſaid, &c.] We may infer from Mark i. 13. that during the forty days which Jeſus ſpent in the wilderneſs, he was expoſed to ſeveral other temptations beſides thoſe mentioned here: and therefore Dr. Doddridge very well tranſlates and paraphraſes the paſſage thus; "Juſt at that time, when he was very hungry, and intirely unprovided with food, the tempter coming to him, in a viſible form, putting on an human appearance (as one that deſired to inquire farther into the evidences of his miſſion) ſaid, if thou art the Son of God, &c." It is only in the original, if thou art Son of God, without any article; but it ſeems to be properly inſerted in our verſion, becauſe the miracle which the devil required of Jeſus, was not that he might ſhew himſelf to be a child of God; but the Son of God, i. e. the Meſſiah. The Jews were perſuaded that the Meſſiah was to be the Son of God; and they commonly applied to him Pſ. ii. 7. and 2 Sam. vii. 14. By comparing ſeveral paſſages in the New Teſtament, it appears, that in the language of the Jews, the words Meſſiah and Son of God, were of the ſame import. See Matt. xxvi. 63. Luke xvii. 66. 70. John i. 41. 44. 45. and Matt. xvi. compared with Mark viii. 29. Luke ix. 20. Chriſt was tempted in all things, Heb. iv. 15. and as the things which ſollicit us to ſin may be referred to three kinds, pleaſures, honours, and riches, (1 John ii. 16.) Chriſt being tempted by all theſe, came off victorious. When he aſked not God that the ſtones might be made bread, he ſhewed his conqueſt over pleaſure, or the animal appetite; when he caſt not himſelf down from the temple, he ſhewed his triumph over vain-glory; and in the third temptation, expreſſing his contempt of the goods of this world, he ſhewed that nothing in this life could conquer his piety and regard to God. See L'Enfant and Wetſtein. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt words, command theſe ſtones to become bread.

Ver. 4. But by every word, &c.] But by every thing which the mouth of God ſhall ordain. Pruſſian Teſtament. The original, to which our verſion is agreeable, is an Hebrew expreſſion, taken from Deut. viii. 3. Whatever proceedeth out of the mouth, is the ſame as whatever God appoints or commands. Word is not in the Hebrew, but only in the LXX, whom the Evangeliſt hath here followed. Dr. Heylin is of opinion, that the diabolical temptation did not, perhaps could not begin, till after Jeſus had faſted forty days; and then, when the firſt fervours of the new ſtate he was entered upon were conſiderably abated; when his new abilities of body and mind were greatly exhauſted by ſo long an abſtinence; when nature languiſhed, and hunger called for the needful repair of food; then the tempter found acceſs to him. It ſhould be obſerved, that in the ſtyle of Scripture, feeding, feaſting, and faſting, are applicable to the mind as well as to the body. The mind has its hunger and thirſt. It feeds and ruminates on thought; and when it fails of a due ſupply, it palls, and ſickens, and ſtarves for want of entertainment. Now the forlorn wilderneſs was as barren of what could recreate the mind, as of what could feed the body. Here Jeſus ſojourned, in perpetual ſilence and ſolitude, with no entertainment of ſenſe, no ſecular occupation, no amuſement, no uſeful thoughts or imagination, to paſs the irkſome hours. His faſt there was total; total, I mean, as to the animal part, which, waſted with long want of neceſſary refreſhment, at laſt pined with hunger; and this hunger would naturally be attended with ſadneſs, dejection of ſpirits, or other diſorders, which debilitate the mind, and lay it open to temptation. It was then the tempter came to him, and ſaid, if, &c. So the Evangeliſt briefly relates the ſubſtance of this firſt temptation; which certainly was then diſplayed with all the colourings of reaſon; and, which, by way of illuſtration, and only to ſhew, what might be ſuggeſted on the occaſion, may be thus repreſented: "If you really are the Son of God, and the voice you imagine to have heard from heaven be no deluſion, aſſert your prerogative: do not let a Son of God ſtarve; Vindicate your Sonſhip, and juſtify your father's goodneſs; who has not given you the miraculous powers you think yourſelf endow'd, with for nothing. If theſe powers are to be uſed, when ſo reaſonably as now? Can any one want them more? Can any one deſerve them better than you do? Conſider what you owe to yourſelf and your father's glory, if you be indeed his Son. His ſpirit, as you deem, led you into this inhoſpitable wilderneſs;—for what?—To periſh here?—and ſo to fruſtrate all the prophecies which you conceive yourſelf deſtined to accompliſh, and deprive men of the ſalvation you undertake to earn for them?—For your own ſake, for their ſake, for the ſake of your Father's glory, which is ſo highly intereſted in your preſervation, hearken to the juſt calls of nature in you: Speak but the word; bid theſe ſtones become bread." Jeſus anſwered, Man, &c. The quotation is very appoſite: for it is taken from Deuteronomy, where Moſes, recapitulating to the Jews the hardſhips and temptations with which they had been exerciſed in the deſart, the more effectually to remind them of the great leſſon he was to inculcate, ſays, Thou ſhalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee theſe forty years in the wilderneſs to humble thee, and to prove thee [the original here is the ſame word, which, in other places, is rendered, to tempt thee], to make known what is in thine heart; whether thou wouldeſt keep his commandment or no: and he humbled thee, and ſuffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna [a food before unknown] that he might make thee know, that Man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord; &c. i. e. whatever God appoints, or by whatever way he pleaſes. This anſwer, we ſee, was fully to the purpoſe, and ſo deciſive as not to admit a reply; yet the adverſary, though baffled, did not deſiſt, but renewed the attack with a ſecond temptation: whereby it ſhould ſeem, that he hoped to take advantage from the total reſignation wherewith Jeſus confided in the divine protection, ſo as to drive him into ſome exceſs. See Houbigant on Deut. viii. 3.

Ver. 5. Then the devil taketh him, &c.] The original word παραλαμβάνει, ſignifies no more than to lead, to take along with one; as in the LXX. Numb. xxii. 41. xxiii. 20. 27. 28. See Matt. xvii. 1. That it hath no other ſenſe in this place, and alſo in the eighth verſe, is plain from Luke iv. 5. 9. By the Holy City is meant Jeruſalem, which is frequently ſo called. The heathen writers often call thoſe cities holy, in which any of their deities were ſuppoſed to hold their ſpecial reſidence, and from whence their oracles were delivered. Inſtead of pinnacle, Dr. Doddridge very properly reads battlement; obſerving that though pinnacle agrees very well with the etymology of the Greek word (πτερύγιον, Wing. Wat.) Yet, according to its uſe among us, it leads the Engliſh reader to imagine, that he ſtood on the point of a ſpire. The truth is, that the roof of the temple was flat, and had a baluſtrade round it, which in ſome parts was ſo exceeding high, that one could hardly bear to look from it. See Deut. xxii. 8. and Joſeph. Antiq. l. 15. c. 11. Somewhere on the edge of this battlement, we may ſuppoſe, was the ſcene of this temptation. We muſt not imagine, that the devil took Jeſus Chriſt, and diſpoſed of him as he would; but only that our bleſſed Saviour, who yielded to the temptation, was pleaſed to do what the devil required of him. It is a common thing to ſay, a perſon does a thing, when he orders or cauſes it to be done.

Ver. 6. If thou be the Son of God] The Jews were undoubtedly right in thinking the Meſſiah is ſpoken of by Daniel, ch. vii. 13, 14. But they fell into a groſs miſtake, when, interpreting that paſſage literally, they believed the Meſſiah would actually come in the clouds of heaven, and wreſt the kingdom from the Romans. See Matt. xxiv. 30. The Phariſees however, had the deſtruction of the Romans, and the miraculous erection of a temporal empire in view, when they required our Lord to ſhew them a ſign from heaven; Matt. xvi. 1. And the people in general were ſo ſtrongly impreſſed with the belief of it, that they overlooked all the proper proofs of Chriſt's miſſion, and re-

7 Jeſus ſaid unto him, It is written again, Thou ſhalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

8 Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and ſheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them;

9 And ſaith unto him, All theſe things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worſhip me.

10 Then ſaid Jeſus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou ſhalt worſhip the Lord thy God, and him only ſhalt thou ſerve.

11 Then the devil leaveth him, and behold, angels came and miniſtered unto him.

12 Now when Jeſus had heard that John was caſt into priſon, he departed into Galilee;

Ver. 7. Deut. vi. 16.—V. 10. Deut. vi. 13. x. 20. 1 Sam. vii. 3.—V. 11. Heb. i. 14.—V. 12. Mark i. 14. Luke iii. 20. iv. 14, 31. John iv. 43. Or, delivered up.

jected him, becauſe he did not confirm it by that ſign. John vii. 27. Howbeit we know this man whence he is; but when Chriſt cometh, no man knoweth whence He is: "No man knoweth from what particular place he ſhall firſt come;" for the doctors thought that though the Meſſiah was to be born at Bethlehem, he was immediately to be conveyed thence, and concealed, till Elijah the Tiſhbite came from heaven, and prepared matters for his reception; after which he was to be manifeſted in a miraculous manner: And as they expected that the Meſſiah was to come in the clouds of heaven, they thought his firſt appearance was to be in the temple; grounding this opinion on Mal. iii. 1. Pſ. cx. 2. Iſai. ii. 3. Now the ſecond temptation, conſidered in the light of this popular error, had conſiderable ſtrength in it; for the tempter's meaning was, "Since thou art the Son of God, thou ſhouldſt caſt thyſelf down from hence into the courts below, where the numerous worſhippers, ſeeing thee borne up by angels, will immediately acknowledge thee as the Meſſiah coming to them in the clouds of heaven: For it is written, he ſhall give his angels charge, &c. Had not this been the devil's meaning, there was not the leaſt reaſon for carrying Jeſus to Jeruſalem, and ſetting him on the battlements of the temple. He might as well have bidden him caſt himſelf down from any precipice in the wilderneſs, or from the turret of any neighbouring town; where the interpoſition of angels in his preſervation, would have been as conſpicuous a proof to himſelf of his Meſſiahſhip, as in the holy city of Jeruſalem. It may be objected indeed, that the text cited by no means promiſes a viſible interpoſition of miniſtering ſpirits for the preſervation of the Meſſiah, as this ſenſe of the temptation ſeems to require. But the anſwer is, that there was nothing to hinder the father of lies from putting an artful gloſs upon a text of Scripture in order to delude: as if he had ſaid, "Since God hath promiſed that his angels ſhall bear good men up in their hands, the Meſſiah may well expect the ſame favour, eſpecially when it is neceſſary for the erecting his kingdom.—And further, the tempter's argument would have the more weight, if, as is probable, he was now transformed into an angel of light, and feigned a willingneſs to aſſiſt Jeſus in the undertaking. See Macknight, Sherlock on Prophecy, appendix, p. 304. and the notes on Pſ. xci. 11.

Ver. 7. It is written again] Or alſo. So πάλιν here elegantly ſignifies, in oppoſition to the quotation which the tempter had made; which was indeed very imperfect: But many, after St. Jerome, have obſerved, that Satan made his advantage of quoting Scripture imperfectly and by ſcraps. The cauſe of truth, and ſometimes of common ſenſe, hath ſuffered a geat deal by thoſe who have followed his example. Jeſus repels his attack by Scripture alſo; which, like that cited in his former anſwer, again relates to the children of Iſrael, exerciſed in circumſtances not unlike his own, in the wilderneſs, when, murmuring and impatient for want of water, as they had been before for want of food, they tempted the Lord, ſaying, Is the Lord among us, or not? See Exod. xvii. 7. They queſtioned his preſence with them, and wanted proofs of it by a new miracle. To tempt, is to try, and the trial they would make argued their doubt and diſtruſt. See the note on Deut. vi. 16. The perfect faith of Jeſus excluded all diffidence, and therefore would not admit any act on his part whereby to put the divine goodneſs to the teſt, ſince he already had the fulleſt aſſurance of it. "I will not provoke the Lord, either by acting otherwiſe than he has appointed, or by requiring proofs of his power and veracity, after ſuch as are ſufficient, and have already been given." See Heylin, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 8. Again, the devil taketh him, &c.] The adverſary, enraged, as it ſhould ſeem, with his ill ſucceſs in the two former attempts, caſts off all diſguiſe in this. He ſpeaks no more of Son of God; but deſperate, and thence impudent and audacious, he offers at once his whole ſtock of gaudy trumperies, all worldly power, dominion and glory, and arrogantly ſets the price at which they are to be purchaſed. This appears not ſo much a temptation, as an inſult upon Jeſus, who reſented it accordingly. Le Clerc is of the ſame opinion with the author referred to on verſe 1. that what is here related, may more ſafely be conceived to have happened to Chriſt in a viſion or dream, than really; but this, ſays Dr. Whitby, is a vain dream and a viſion of his own brain; and that which robs us of all the practical improvement of our Lord's temptation. For, why ſhould Chriſt have been led into a wilderneſs to have this dream or viſion? Did he faſt only in a viſion forty days and forty nights? Or, why is it ſaid, that he afterwards was hungry? Why is it ſaid, that the devil ſpake to him, ſet him on a pinnacle, upon an high mountain, &c. &c? and looks it not far more odd to give the devil power over the fancy of our Lord, to raiſe ſuch imaginations in him, and ſuggeſt ſuch dreams to him, than barely to give him that power over our Lord's body, which neither did nor could do him any hurt? I obſerve again, that as God cauſed Moſes to ſee the whole land of promiſe from the top of Nebo, either by ſtrengthening his eyes to ſee it thence, or elſe by repreſenting it to him as it were in a large plan or map all the valleys round about him; ſo might the devil, in the valleys round about that high mountain upon which Chriſt ſtood, make a large draught of the ſtately edifices, guards and attendants of kings, appearing in their ſplendor, viſible to the eyes of Chriſt; which appearance could not be ſo well made to him, or advantageouſly ſeen, had he been in a plain. Wetſtein is of opinion, that the devil might point out the kingdoms of the world to him, in ſome ſuch manner as this, "Turn thy eyes to the eaſt, There is the kingdom of the Perſians, to whom thy anceſtors were ſubject, and the kingdom of Arabia, rich in gold, in frankincenſe and myrrh: Turn to the ſouth, there is the kingdom of Egypt, where the deſcendants of the patriarchs ſuffered ſo long and ſevere a ſervitude: Turn to the weſt, there you ſee Tyre and the iſles, abounding in merchandize and wealth; you ſee Rome, the queen and empreſs of the world: On the north, you ſee Syria, whoſe king Antiochus once profaned the temple, and brought ſuch evils on the Jews; you ſee Galilee, whoſe fertility you know, and where you have hitherto lived in obſcurity." Thus the devil pointed out to Jeſus the kingdoms of the world, and their grandeur. Macknight, with ſeveral others, is of opinion, that this proſpect was confined to the land of promiſe; and that the mountain of Nebo, from whence Moſes had a proſpect of the whole land, was very probably that from whence the devil ſhewed our bleſſed Saviour all the kingdoms of the world, that is, the whole land of promiſe; for ſo the word is uſed, in the literal ſenſe at leaſt, of Romans iv. 13. The land of promiſe, in its largeſt ſignification, reached from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean, eaſt and weſt, and from Egypt on the ſouth, to beyond Sidon northwards, Deut. xi. 24. In Joſhua's time, that extant of country contained thirty diſtinct principalities, beſides the Philiſtines and Sidonians, as Spanheim obſerves; and even in our Lord's time it comprehended ſeveral kingdoms, ſome of which are mentioned Luke iii. 1. All theſe the devil pointed out to Jeſus in the temptation; taking particular notice of their glory; that is, their great and opulent cities, their rich fields, their hills covered with wood and cattle, their rivers rolling through fertile valleys, and waſhing the cities as they paſſed along; and promiſed to put him in poſſeſſion of the whole inſtantly, if he would fall down and worſhip him. By confining this proſpect to the land of promiſe, the third temptation will appear to have had a peculiar force. The devil, that he might know whether Jeſus was the Meſſiah, offered to give him all the kingdoms of the land to which the Meſſiah had an undoubted right; ſee Pſalm ii. 8. lxxii. 8. He hoped thus to have enticed him to commit idolatry; thinking, if he was not the Meſſiah, he would eagerly embrace this, as the ſpeedieſt way of accompliſhing his deſign.

Ver. 9, 10. All theſe things will I give thee] "If thou art the Son of God, take care to be eſteemed as ſuch; if the kingdom of the Jews is deſtined for thee, add to it other kingdoms: ſeize the preſent occaſion, which is the moſt deſirable; comply with the preſent terms which are the moſt eaſy: fall down, and pay me homage." He requires to pay him that honour which the Satrapes or inferior kings were accuſtomed to pay to the king of the Perſians, who was therefore called, "the king of kings." The word ὕπαγε, get thee hence, plainly expreſſes the authority of Jeſus over Satan, as well as his deteſtation of ſo vile a ſuggeſtion. See the note on Luke iv. 6.

Ver. 11. Miniſtered unto him] The word διακόνειν, ſignifies to ſerve or wait upon in general, and ſo to wait at table. See chap. viii. 15. Luke xvii. 8, &c. as one celeſtial ſpirit might have been abundantly ſufficient for the relief of our Lord's neceſſities, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the appearance of a number of them upon this occaſion was to do him the more illuſtrious honour, after this horrible combat with Satan, to which, for wiſe and good reaſons, he was pleaſed to condeſcend. See Doddridge, and the Reflections.

Ver. 12. Now when Jeſus had heard, &c.] John the Baptiſt was not impriſoned till after the temptation of Jeſus Chriſt. Between theſe two events, there happened what is related in the three firſt chapters of St. John's goſpel. It is commonly ſuppoſed, that the miniſtry of John the Baptiſt laſted but about eighteen months at moſt, and that he was in priſon a year after Jeſus Chriſt's baptiſm. We will juſt tranſcribe out of St. John's goſpel, for the ſake of connection, what is here omitted in the hiſtory of Chriſt. He went from Nazareth into Judæa, where he was baptized by John, Mark i. 9. from Judæa he returned into Galilee, John i. 43. ii. 1. He went again into Judæa, and there celebrated the paſſover at Jeruſalem, John ii. 13. He baptized in Judæa while John was baptizing at Enon, John iii. 22. All this time John was at liberty, ib. ver. 24.

13 And leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is upon the ſea coaſt, in the borders of Zabulon and Nephthalim:

14 That it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by Eſaias the prophet, ſaying,

15 The land of Zabulon, and the land of Nephthalim, by the way of the ſea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles:

16 The people which ſat in darkneſs, ſaw great light; and to them which ſat in the region and ſhadow of death, light is ſprung up.

17 From that time Jeſus began to preach, and to ſay, Repent; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

18 And Jeſus, walking by the ſea of Galilee, ſaw two brethren, Simon called Peter, and Andrew his brother, caſting a net into the ſea: for they were fiſhers.

19 And he ſaith unto them, Follow me, and I will make you fiſhers of men.

20 And they ſtraightway left their nets, and followed him.

21 And going on from thence, he ſaw other two brethren, James the ſon of Zebedee, and John his brother, in a ſhip with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and he called them.

22 And they immediately left the ſhip and their father, and followed him.

23 And Jeſus went about all Galilee, teaching in their ſynagogues, and preaching the Goſpel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of ſickneſs, and all manner of diſeaſe among the people.

24 And his fame went throughout all Syria: and they brought unto him all ſick people that were taken with divers diſeaſes and torments, and thoſe which were poſſeſſed with devils, and thoſe which were lunatick, and thoſe that had the palſy; and he healed them.

25 And there followed him great multitudes of people, from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jeruſalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan.

Ver. 17. From that time, &c.] Namely of his departure into Galilee. Jeſus had already preached at Jeruſalem and in Judea: See John iv. 3. and the note on ver. 12. But St. Matthew having omitted this part of the evangelical hiſtory, dates the beginning of Chriſt's miniſtry from his preaching in Galilee. John the Baptiſt gave notice that the coming of the Meſſiah was at hand: Jeſus Chriſt declares that he is come; and orders his apoſtles to publiſh the ſame great truth to the world. See L'Enfant. Though Chriſt, as legiſlator and Lord, could have commanded his ſubjects, yet he choſe rather, by the milder methods of perſuaſion, to teach and inſtruct them. See ver. 23. and on ch. v. 11, 12. It is the peculiar buſineſs of Chriſt to eſtabliſh the kingdom of heaven in the hearts of men. Yet he himſelf begins his preaching in the ſame words with John the Baptiſt, becauſe the repentance which John taught, ſtill was and ever will be the neceſſary preparation for that inward kingdom. But that phraſe is not only uſed with regard to the individuals, in whom this kingdom is to be eſtabliſhed, but alſo with regard to the Chriſtian church, in the whole body of believers. In the former ſenſe, it is oppoſed to repentance; in the latter to the Moſaic diſpenſation. See more in Heylin, p. 42.

Ver. 18. And Jeſus walking, &c.] Reſpecting the calling of Peter, &c. ſee the notes on Mark i. Inſtead of fiſhers, Dr. Waterland reads fiſhermen. It appears from John i. 35. that they had already acknowledged Jeſus for the Meſſiah, upon the teſtimony of John the Baptiſt.

Ver. 21, 22. Ship] Bark, or boat. Wat.

Ver. 23. Synagogues] This is a general word, which in its original meaning ſignifies both civil and eccleſiaſtical aſſemblies, and alſo the places where theſe aſſemblies were kept. Here, as alſo chap. xiii. 54. and almoſt all through the New Teſtament, it is taken for the places or buildings were the Jews met to pray, and to hear the interpretation of the law and the prophets, and this is the common acceptation of the word ſynagogue. It is manifeſt from Acts xv. 21. that there had been of a long time ſynagogues in each city, and that the Jews were accuſtomed to meet therein every ſabbath day. Theſe ſynagogues had ſeveral heads and officers, who performed different functions: That of the Scribes was to teach and inſtruct the congregation; but it is evident from Acts xiii. 15. that after the reading of the law and the prophets, the heads of the ſynagogue deſired ſuch learned and grave perſons as happened to be there to make a diſcourſe to the people; and by virtue of this cuſtom it was, that Jeſus Chriſt and St. Paul were allowed to preach in the ſynagogues: Acts ix. 20. xiv. 1. See L'Enfant and Beauſobre, and the authors referred to on chap. iii. 7. Reſpecting the different diſeaſes, poſſeſſions, &c. mentioned in this and the next verſe, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more particularly when we come to thoſe miracles of our Lord, where they are diſtinctly deſcribed. The Goſpel, i. e. the glad tidings, or joyous meſſage, is the proper name of our religion, and will be amply verified as ſuch to all who cordially embrace it. See Heylin, and more on this ſubject in the Reflections.

Ver. 24. Torments, &c.] Pains; demoniacs, lunatics, and paralytics. Wat.

Ver. 25. From Decapolis] A country of Paleſtine, ſo called becauſe it contained ten cities; concerning the names of which the learned are not agreed. It bordered upon Syria, a province near Galilee, and extended on both ſides of Jordan and the lake of Tiberias. It formerly belonged to the half tribe of Manaſſeh. See Joſeph. Jewiſh War. b. iii. c. 16. and Pliny's Nat. Hiſt. l. v. c. 18. Inſtead of beyond, Dr. Waterland reads about Jordan.

REFLECTIONS ON OUR LORD'S TEMPTATIONS, &c.

To have a juſt notion of this extraordinary event, we muſt conſider it in two lights. Firſt, as it was permitted by God. Secondly, as it was executed by the tempter.

The reaſons for which God permitted his Son to be tempted of the devil were ſuch as theſe: 1. That he might become a faithful and merciful high-prieſt, one who can ſuccour his people in time of need, and pity them when they happen to fall by temptation. The apoſtle aſſigns this reaſon expreſsly, Heb. ii. 17, 18. iv. 15. 2. That his example might be a complete pattern of all the virtues: Jeſus, like a wiſe and valiant general, underwent himſelf all the hardſhips attending his ſervice, that we his ſoldiers might be animated to ſuſtain them together with him. He has gone before us, not only in poverty and reproach, and contempt of ſenſual pleaſure, but was given up to be tempted of the devil, that his people might not be diſmayed by ſuch diſpenſations of providence, but be taught to expect them, eſpecially after having had proofs of the divine love and manifeſtations of his preſence. Alſo that we might know both what ſort of an enemy we have to encounter, and the kind of temptations he will aſſault us with; particularly that there is no impiety or wickedneſs ſo groſs, but he will tempt even the beſt of men to commit it.

Farther, it was deſigned to ſhew us, that the devil, though a ſtrong enemy, may be overcome, and by what means; and to ſtir us up to conſtant watchfulneſs. Hence this conflict, though managed in the ſight of God and the angels only, was in due time made public for the inſtruction of mankind. 3. That our Lord might with the greateſt advantage begin and carry on his miniſtry, in the courſe of which he was to accompliſh the ſalvation of men, it was neceſſary he ſhould firſt vanquiſh the ſtrongeſt temptations of the old ſerpent, who had formerly brought ruin on mankind. His ſuſtaining the temptations of the devil, therefore, when he entered on his miniſtry,

CHAP. V.

Chriſt beginneth his ſermon on the mount: declaring who are bleſſed, who are the ſalt of the earth, the light of the world, the city on an hill, the candle: that he came to fulfil the law. What it is to kill, to commit adultery, to ſwear: exhorteth to ſuffer wrong, to love even our enemies, and to labour after perfectneſs.

AND ſeeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain: and when he was ſet, his diſciples came unto him:

2 And he opened his mouth, and taught them, ſaying, teaches us, that no man is ſo rightly qualified to preach the Goſpel, as he who by temptation has been fortified againſt luxury, ambition, pride, luſt, covetouſneſs, and ſuch like paſſions, with which the devil overthrows the minds of the ſimple.

Ver. 1. Mark iii. 13, 20.

On the other hand, the motives which induced the devil to undertake this temptation, might be, 1. His general deſire of ſeducing men to ſin: 2. Some particular end which he propoſed to accompliſh thereby. It is reaſonable to believe that God's gracious intention to ſave the world by his Son, was not entirely concealed from the evil ſpirits. If ſo, they might be led by the prophecies to conjecture, that this was the period fixed in the decrees of heaven for the advent of God's Son. That the devils are acquainted with the Scripture is evident from the citation which we find the tempter making out of the Pſalms on this occaſion. Beſides, they might be confirmed in their opinion, by the general expectation of the Meſſiah, with which the eaſt was now filled. If therefore they had any how received intelligence of the wonderful things which accompanied the birth of Chriſt; or, having been witneſſes to the deſcent of the Spirit upon him at his baptiſm, ſome of them had heard the voice from heaven declaring him the Son of God; they could not but have a great curioſity to know whether he was really the grand perſonage ſo long expected by men.

The reſolution of this point was undoubtedly of the greateſt moment to them; becauſe the part they were afterwards to act, in carrying on their own projects for deſtroying the human race, depended in a great meaſure upon it. Wherefore, all the time Jeſus was in the wilderneſs, the chief of the evil ſpirits, as being beſt qualified for the undertaking, beſet him with a multitude of temptations, in order, if poſſible, to diſcover who he was: The form in which two of his temptations run, ſeems to favour this conjecture: If thou be the ſon of God, command that this ſtone be made bread.—If thou be the Son of God, caſt thyſelf down from hence. Beſides, unleſs the tempter had been in doubt as to the character of Jeſus, it is not to be imagined that he ſhould have attempted to ſeduce him at all.

His conduct in the preſent inſtance is a lively example of what St. Peter has told us, 1 Pet. v. 8. Your adverſary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, ſeeking whom he may devour: The malice, the cruelty, and the fury with which the evil ſpirit attacks mankind, is but faintly repreſented by the fierceneſs of the moſt ravenous wild beaſts. The devil, on this occaſion, ſeems to have aſſaulted our Lord in ſome viſible form, and with an audible voice. He could hardly do it otherwiſe, the human nature of Jeſus being incapable of ſinful thoughts. Commonly, however, his ſtrongeſt temptations are thoſe wherein he leaſt appears; for example, when he ſuggeſts evil imaginations, in order to raiſe evil deſires. A man, therefore, in ſuch caſes, ſhould enter into himſelf, and with the help of the Spirit of God, ſhould courageouſly expel thoſe deteſtable ſentiments, the devil's auxiliaries, by which he takes and keeps poſſeſſion of the ſoul. And as for the aſſaults which he makes upon us by means of things without us, they muſt be ſuſtained and repelled by a firm rereſolution, as waves by a rock. The Chriſtian has good encouragement thus to exert himſelf with vigour; for his maſter has ſhewed him, that there is in the word of God ſufficient armour to preſerve him invulnerable againſt all the firey darts of the adverſary. Farther, as Chriſt, after having vanquiſhed the devil, was miniſtered unto by angels, His followers, who endeavour to do their duty, ſhall have ſuch aſſiſtance as is neceſſary to their continuing immoveable amidſt the rudeſt ſhocks of temptation, or to their riſing again after they are thrown down. They may be amidſt legions of devils, but their integrity ſhall be happily preſerved; for the angels of God ſhall miniſter unto him. See Macknight.

We obſerved on ver. 23. that the Goſpel is glad tidings, a joyful meſſage: And could we effectually repreſent the full purport of this JOYFUL MESSAGE, ſo as to make you ſenſible what a ſolid and ſuperlative happineſs it imports, your hopes muſt preſently be raiſed, and all your deſires engaged in purſuit of the promiſed good: But though all men inceſſantly ſeek after happineſs, yet they are commonly ſo miſtaken in their notions of it, that theſe heavenly tidings make no impreſſions on them.

Conſider we then, that happineſs of every kind requires a proper diſpoſition for its enjoyment. Without bodily health we cannot reliſh the pleaſures of ſenſe; and, for the ſame reaſon, without virtue, which is the ſoul's health, we cannot participate of ſpiritual joys. To judge, therefore, what intereſt we have in the Goſpel, or glad tidings of the kingdom of God, conſider the holy angels, who are its native inhabitants: They, doubtleſs, are happy in the ſupreme degree; but their happineſs is the reſult of a more intrinſic part of their character, viz. holineſs. And this brings to my mind a fine ſaying of a modern writer:

Then, to be good, is to be happy; angels
Are happier than men, becauſe they're better.

They are perfectly happy, becauſe they are perfectly holy. Now holineſs conſiſts in having only pure deſires: i. e. juſt deſires: They cannot deſire any thing but what is juſt, fit, and proper for them: And thence, although their deſires may be various, yet they can never be (as in the human race) inconſiſtent; but, being excited with due ſubordination and harmony among themſelves, they are all fully gratified. In a word, duty and pleaſure are the ſame in heaven. The angels have all they can wiſh, becauſe they can wiſh only for what they ought to have. And the more intenſe their deſires are, the higher are their virtues, and the greater their beatitude.

Things are quite contrary in the preſent ſtate of the human nature; for holineſs there is ſo diſtinct a thing from the gratification of our natural deſires, that it principally conſiſts in denying them. Our natural deſires, viz. our appetites and paſſions, are often unjuſt, and ſo exorbitant, that, for the ſake of our own eaſe, and the little happineſs which can be found here, we are bound to reſiſt and ſubdue them. And herein (quite oppoſite to the angelical nature) conſiſts the human excellence. To refrain from what we wiſh; to chooſe what we are averſe to; to reject the poiſonous ſweet, and prefer the wholeſome bitter; to ſtrive againſt ſloth and voluptuouſneſs, with other numberleſs follies, to which we are prone, and climb the arduous rugged paths of duty; Theſe are our firſt taſk, in which we ſhall often miſcarry. But this will not always be the caſe: We ſhall not always be left to our own miſmanagement; for, if we perſiſt in doing the beſt we can, God will at length take us under his more immediate government, and, by a faithful ſervice, we ſhall enter into his kingdom.

This momentous truth is the genuine Goſpel of Chriſt: Such are the glad tidings he publiſhes; aſſuring us, that God's kingdom is acceſſible, is near; ſo that all may enter it, who will make their way to it through the works of repentance.

Chap V. Ver. 1. And ſeeing the multitudes] And ſeeing ſuch a multitude: Heylin: Who ſuppoſes this verſe to be immediately connected with the laſt of the preceding chapter. It does not appear in what part of Galilee this mountain was ſituated; and if the cure of the leper, which Chriſt performed at his deſcending from it, was wrought in the confines of ſome other city, and not of Capernaum, there is no reaſon to ſuppoſe, as moſt expoſitors do, that it was in the neighbourhood of Capernaum. See ch. viii. 1, 2. Luke v. 12. Maundrell ſays, that what is now called the mount of the Beatitudes, is a little to the north of mount Tabor. Travels, p. 115. And if this be its true ſituation, it muſt be at ſome conſiderable diſtance from Capernaum. Doddridge is of opinion that this diſcourſe was different from, and previous to that which St. Luke has given us in the ſixth chapter of his Goſpel, though many of the ſentiments and expreſſions are the ſame. It is however more generally thought that theſe diſcourſes are the ſame. And it appears from Luke vi. 12, 17. that our Saviour having gone up to the top of the mountain to pray, coming down from thence, he ſtood on a plain and even part of the ſame mountain, from whence he could eaſily be heard. So Moſes firſt aſcended mount Sinai alone, and afterwards accompanied by the elders, from whence the law was promulged by God. Jeſus ſat down, according to the cuſtom of the Jewiſh doctors, when they taught. His diſciples, mean, not merely the twelve apoſtles, who were not yet choſen under that character, but all thoſe in general who followed Jeſus Chriſt. See Luke vi. 13. John ix. 27. and in moſt places in the Acts the Chriſtians are called diſciples.

Ver. 2. And he opened his mouth] This phraſe denotes ſpeaking in a ſolemn and authoritative manner, intimating the importance of what is going to be delivered, and is not always uſed as a pleonaſm. Comp. Judg. xi. 35, 36. Job iii. 1. xxxiii. 2. Matth. xiii. 35. Acts viii. 35. x. 34. In order to enter into the beauty of this diſcourſe, it is neceſſary to conſider it as addreſſed not merely to the apoſtles, but to Chriſt's diſciples in general, and to vaſt numbers of people, who, affected with the ſight or fame of his miracles, were now aſſembled around him; probably expecting, that he would immediately declare himſelf the Meſſiah, and full of thoſe falſe notions of his kingdom, which ſo generally prevailed. Mr. Blair, in his excellent diſcourſes on this ſermon, has ſhewn beyond all others, how directly the beginning of it is levelled againſt theſe prejudices; calculated, as the whole of it is, to correct thoſe erroneous notions of the Meſſiah's kingdom, which were ſo common, and which would prove ſo pernicious to thoſe who were governed by them. He has alſo obſerved, as it is very neceſſary to do, what a beautiful correſpondence there is between the characters deſcribed in theſe beautitudes, and the bleſſings connected with them. Jeſus began his ſermon with the doctrine of happineſs; a ſubject which the teachers of wiſdom have always conſidered as the principal thing in morals; and for that reaſon they have laboured to give their true diſciples an idea of it. Moſt of the Jews ſeem to have conſidered the enjoyments of ſenſe, as the ſovereign good. Riches, mirth, revenge, women, conqueſt, liberty, 3 Bleſſed are the poor in ſpirit: for their's is the kingdom of heaven.

4 Bleſſed are they that mourn: for they ſhall be comforted.

5 Bleſſed are the meek: for they ſhall inherit the earth.

6 Bleſſed are they which do hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs: for they ſhall be filled.

7 Bleſſed are the merciful: for they ſhall obtain mercy.

Ver. 3. Luke vi. 20. See Prov. xvi. 19. xxix. 23. Iſai. lvii. 15.—V. 4. Iſai. lxi. 3. Luke vi. 21.—V. 5. Pſ. xxxvii. 11. See Rom. iv. 13.—V. 6. Iſai. lv. 1. lxv. 13.—V. 7. Ch. vi. 14. Mark xi. 25. 2 Tim. i. 16. James ii. 13.

ame, and other things of the ſame kind, afforded them ſuch pleaſures, that they wiſhed for no better in the Meſſiah's kingdom, which they all conſidered as a ſecular one: Even the diſciples themſelves, who afterwards were made apoſtles, long retained this notion of a temporal kingdom; having followed their maſter firſt with a view to the honours, profits, and pleaſures attending the poſts which they expected under him. Therefore, to ſhew his hearers in general, and his diſciples in particular, the groſſneſs of their error, our Lord declared that the higheſt happineſs of men conſiſteth in the graces of the ſpirit, becauſe from the poſſeſſion and exerciſe of them, the pureſt pleaſures reſult: pleaſures, which ſatisfy the great God himſelf, and conſtitute his ineffable felicity. See Wetſtein, Doddridge, and Macknight.

It may be proper, before we enter upon this diſcourſe, to obſerve, once for all, that whoever examines the diſcourſes of our Lord with attention, may find in them a certain character and way of ſpeaking, in a great meaſure peculiar to himſelf. This manner, by which our Saviour's diſcourſes are diſtinguiſhable, conſiſts in raiſing matter of inſtruction and moral reflection from the objects which preſented themſelves to him and his audience while he was ſpeaking. Hence his ſermons to the multitude, and his converſation with his diſciples, allude perpetually to the time of the year, to the place where he is, to the objects that ſurround him, to the occupation and circumſtances of thoſe whom he addreſſes, or to the ſtate of public affairs, &c. Thus the bleſſed Jeſus in the ſpring went into the fields, where he ſat down on an eminence, and made this diſcourſe, which is full of obſervations ariſing from things which preſented themſelves to his view. Hence, when he exhorts his diſciples to truſt in God, he bids them behold, [ἐμϐλέψατε,] look upon, the birds of the air, which were then flying about them, and were fed by Providence, though they did not ſow, nor reap, nor gather into barns. Conſider, ſays our bleſſed Lord, ver. 28. take notice of the lilies of the field, which were then blown, and were ſo beautifully clothed by the ſame power, and yet toiled not like the huſbandmen, who were then at work. Being in a place where they had a wide proſpect of a cultivated land, he bad them obſerve how God cauſed the ſun to ſhine, and the rain to deſcend upon the fields and gardens, even of the wicked and ungrateful; and he continued to convey his doctrine to them under rural images; ſpeaking of good trees, and corrupt trees; of knowing men by their fruits; wolves in ſheep's clothing; grapes not growing upon thorns, nor figs on thiſtles; of the folly of caſting precious things to dogs and ſwine; of good meaſure preſſed down, and ſhaken together, and running over, and a variety of other particulars, which will occur to every reader's obſervation. From this peculiarity in the ſtile and genius of our Saviour's diſcourſes, we may conclude that the writers of the Goſpel have given us always the ſubſtance, and often the very words of our Lord's ſermons; and we may alſo plainly ſee in the diſcourſes of Jeſus Chriſt his great deſign,—which was to inſtruct; therefore he conveys knowledge in a familiar way: He adapts his language to his hearers. He ſpeaks to their eyes, and to their ears. He chuſes images and compariſons which would ſtrike them moſt powerfully, and make the moſt laſting impreſſion upon their minds. See Jortin's diſcourſes, p. 212. and note on ver. 14.

Ver. 3. Bleſſed are the poor in ſpirit] Happy, &c. Doddridge: and ſo throughout the beatitudes: I uſe the word happy rather than bleſſed, ſays he, as more exactly anſwering to Μακάριοι as the word bleſſed does to εὐλογημένοι: and I the rather chuſe to render it thus, becauſe our Lord ſeems to intimate by it, not only that the diſpoſitions here recommended would be the way to future bleſſedneſs, but that they would immediately be attended with the trueſt happineſs, and the moſt noble pleaſures. In order to render his hearers more attentive, Chriſt propoſes his doctrine in certain paradoxical dogmas, which, at firſt appearance, may ſeem falſe to the vulgar eye, but are found moſt true by the attentive conſiderer. "It is notable, ſays an old writer, that all the beatitudes are affixed to unlikely conditions, to ſhow that the judgement of the word, and of the world, are contrary." Bengelius obſerves, that in the preſent ſermon we have, firſt, an exordium, containing a ſweet invitation to true holineſs and happineſs, ver. 3—12. ſecondly, a perſuaſive to impart it to others, ver. 13—16. thirdly, a deſcription of true Chriſtian holineſs, ver. 17—ch. vii. 12. in which it is eaſy to obſerve, that the latter part exactly anſwers to the former; fourthly, the concluſion; giving a ſure mark of the true way, warning againſt falſe prophets, and exhorting to follow after righteouſneſs. St. Luke applies this firſt beatitude to the poor, properly ſo called; but though poverty of ſpirit may include a diſpoſition which bears poverty rightly, there ſeems no doubt that it here primarily refers to humility of heart. Dr. Heylin's ſeems the true interpretation: The phraſe, ſays he, poor in ſpirit, expreſſes an inward diſpoſition or ſtate of mind, by an outward worldly circumſtance; namely, poverty, which ſignifies want; the ſenſe whereof obliges men to dependance upon others for ſupply, by begging or ſervitude: So by exact analogy, poverty of ſpirit implies want, and conſequently an habitual addreſs to, and dependance upon God, for ſupply, by prayer and obedience. The beatitude therefore may be thus paraphraſed, "You naturally congratulate the rich and the great, and expect, under the reign of the Meſſiah, to be advanced to wealth, dignity, and power; but your notions of theſe things are very falſe and viciated; For I ſay unto you, happy are the poor in ſpirit; thoſe humble ſouls, who, deeply conſcious of their ignorance and guilt, can quietly reſign to the divine teachings and diſpoſals, and accommodate themſelves to the loweſt circumſtances which Providence ſhall appoint them: For, howſoever they may be deſpiſed and trampled on by men, their's is the kingdom of heaven: They will be moſt likely to embrace the Goſpel, and they alone will be intitled to its moſt important bleſſings, both in time and in eternity." See Doddridge, Wetſtein, and Bengelius.

Ver. 4. Bleſſed are they that mourn] "Either for their own ſins, or for other men's, and who are ſteadily and habitually ſerious; they ſhall be comforted, moſt ſolidly and deeply in this world, and eternally in heaven. What they now ſow in tears, they ſhall reap in joy; their tears ſhall waſh away their guilt, and their innocence be crowned with perpetual felicity." See 1 Cor. v. 2. and Bengelius. Poſſibly our Saviour might refer ſtill farther in this bleſſing to the mourning rightly improved on account of afflictions; and in this light nothing can be more true than the preſent aphoriſm; becauſe, if any thing brings a man to virtue, it is affliction: The natural tendency thereof being to give him a feeling of the vanity of the world, and conſequently to convince him how neceſſary it is, that he ſhould ſeek his happineſs in things more ſolid and durable. Affliction awakens ſerious thoughts in the mind, compoſes it into a grave and ſettled frame, very different from the levity which proſperity inſpires; gives it a fellow-feeling of the ſorrows of others, and makes it ſenſible of the evil of departing from God, the ſource and centre of its joy. See Macknight.

Ver. 5. Bleſſed are the meek] That is, the men of mild and forgiving tempers, who hold all their paſſions and affections even; they ſhall inherit the earth; they ſhall enjoy the protection of civil government, with all the bleſſings of the preſent life, the greateſt and beſt of which flow from meekneſs itſelf. Meekneſs conſiſting in the moderating of our paſſions, makes a perſon beautiful and venerable in the eyes of others, ſo that he poſſeſſes their inward eſteem; while the man devoid of this grace is deſpicable, though dignified with ever ſo many titles of honour. Hence it is called the ornament of a meek and quiet ſpirit. Further, this grace ſecures a man againſt many injuries to which he may be expoſed; a ſoft anſwer being powerful to turn away wrath; or, if an injury is done to a meek perſon, his meekneſs prevents the ſtorm which pride, anger, and revenge raiſe within; enables him to bear the injury with tranquility, and ſtrengthens him to overcome it with good. Thus much ſeems to be implied in the bleſſing annexed to the character in this verſe; which is a citation from Pſ. xxxvii. 11. and ſeems to be produced to ſhew of how great a price the ornament of a meek and quiet ſpirit is in the ſight of God; for the words immediately put us in mind, that under the diſpenſation wherein God rewarded virtue with temporal advantages, he annexed the higheſt bleſſing, even that of inheriting the Promiſed Land, to the lovely grace of meekneſs. See Macknight, Bengelius, and Rev. v. 10. Dr. Heylin is of opinion, after many of the fathers, the Vulgate, and ſeveral ancient manuſcripts, that this beatitude is miſplaced; and that it ſhould follow immediately after the firſt. There being, as he thinks, an apparent antitheſis in the words, as well as a ſtrong connection in the ſenſe.

Ver. 6. Bleſſed are they that do hunger, &c.] Our Saviour uſes the ideas of hunger and thirſt metaphorically, to expreſs vehement deſire. By righteouſneſs ſeems to be meant that holineſs which the Goſpel teaches and recommends, in oppoſition to the righteouſneſs of Scribes and Phariſees. So that the perſons here ſaid to hunger and thirſt, are thoſe who earneſtly long for, and are ſenſible of the want of that ſalvation which is procured by Jeſus Chriſt. This beatitude therefore may be thus paraphraſed: "Happy are they, who, inſtead of deſiring inſatiably the poſſeſſions of others, and endeavouring to obtain them by violence or deceit, eagerly hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs, and make it the delightful buſineſs of life to improve in all the branches of evangelical virtue and goodneſs. For they ſhall never be diſappointed in theſe pious purſuits, but be abundantly ſatisfied with the righteouſneſs they ſeek, and be competently ſupplied with every neceſſary good." See ver. 10. Prov. xxi. 21. Matt. vi. 33. Doddridge, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 7. Bleſſed are the merciful] Thoſe who feel for the ſorrows of others as their own, and with tender ſympathy haſten to relieve them. Dr. Heylin remarks excellently upon this beatitude, that the frailty of human nature renders men continually liable to abuſe, and perverts the good diſpoſitions which religion would excite: thus mourning for ſin may degenerate into a gloomy melancholy and moroſeneſs of temper; and ſome, becauſe they are diſpleaſed, as they have reaſon, with themſelves, become peeviſh and fretful at all about them; and again, with regard to the hunger and thirſt after juſtice, 8 Bleſſed are the pure in heart: for they ſhall ſee God.

9 Bleſſed are the peace-makers: for they ſhall be called the children of God.

10 Bleſſed are they which are perſecuted for righteouſneſs ſake: for their's is the kingdom of heaven.

11 Bleſſed are ye when men ſhall revile you, and perſecute you, and ſhall ſay all manner of evil againſt you falſly, for my ſake.

Ver. 8. Pſ. xv. 2. xxiv. 4. Hebr. xii. 14. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. 1 John iii. 2.—V. 10. 2 Tim. ii. 12. 1 Peter iii. 14.—V. 11. Luke vi. 22. 1 Peter iv. 14. Gr. lying.

i. e. univerſal virtue, (See on ch. iii. 15.) In order to produce this, men called to religion have commonly powerful convictions, concerning the turpitude of vice, with the danger and guilt of neglecting virtue. And they ought ſtudiouſly to cultivate theſe convictions, and impreſs them deeply upon their minds by aſſiduous meditation, as the proper motive to perſeverance in their good reſolutions. But, as the ſpeculations of juſtice are pleaſing, and the practice of it laborious; and as it is much eaſier to deſire that others ſhould be virtuous, than to bebecome ſo themſelves; it too often happens that they miſapply their concern for the intereſts of virtue to the morals of other men, and are more intent upon their neighbour's faults than their own: Thus they turn their zeal the wrong way, and ſuffer it to evaporate in chimeras of reforming the public: But hunger and thirſt are perſonal; for no man hungers for another's want, but for his own. Thoſe holy deſires which the ſpirit of God firſt excites in his ſervants, chiefly tend to their own purification: and in the progreſs of that work, I mean while they grieve for their own folly, and pine for their own want of juſtice, they will compaſſionately bear with the follies of other men, and be very indulgent to their want of juſtice; a want which they ſo ſenſibly experience in themſelves. To ripen this good diſpoſition to which their ſtate naturally leads, in the meaſure they advance in it, Chriſt here ſo ſeaſonably pronounces his benediction, Bleſſed are the merciful, for they ſhall obtain mercy; which a pious reader will thus apply to himſelf: "Guilty as I am of ſuch faults, and ſubject to ſuch infirmities, what a happineſs is it, that I may hope for the mercy of God! I may ſecurely hope it, if I forgive the faults of others, and treat them with that compaſſion which God commands, and I myſelf ſtand ſo much in need of."

Ver. 8. Bleſſed are the pure in heart] Mr. Blair ſuppoſes that this may refer to the expectation the Jews had of poſſeſſing themſelves of beautiful captives in wars, by which they fancied the Meſſiah's kingdom would be eſtabliſhed. The large ſeraglios of eaſtern princes and great men, which, by a very miſtaken taſte, were regarded as matters of ſtate and grandeur, might poſſibly give countenance to ſuch an extravagant notion. Dr. Doddridge therefore in the following paraphraſe juſt touches upon it; "Indulge not a thought of thoſe licentious gratifications which are often mingled with victory, and are accounted as the pleaſures of the great; happy are the men who not only abſtain from theſe groſs enormities; but are concerned that they may be pure in heart too; avoiding every irregular deſire, and mortifying every unruly paſſion: This reſolute ſelf-denial ſhall be the ſource of nobler and more laſting pleaſures; for they ſhall ſee God: Thus purified and refined, they ſhall enjoy him in his ordinances, and in all the communications of his grace here, and dwell with him forever in heaven." Dr. Heylin in his uſual manner obſerves, that the purification here pronounced bleſſed, is a long and arduous work; beginning in repentance, and attended with that mourning for ſin, to which a former beatitude invites. This purification is carried on by that hunger and thirſt after juſtice mentioned in the next; and it advances ſtill more and more in the following benediction upon the merciful; who, by the violence they do themſelves to mortify their own pride and ill-nature, ſo as patiently to bear with and compaſſionate the infirmities of their brethren, draw down upon themſelves the mercy of God, which at length ſo conſummates their purification, by a ſuper-abundant increaſe of divine grace, that they become pure in heart, and thereby are qualified for that ſublime and efficacious knowledge of the deity, which is here called ſeeing God; the mental eye being irradiated from above; for God, who maketh his ſun to riſe upon the evil and on the good, does alſo from himſelf illumine the minds of all men, in proportion to their deſire of, and earneſt ſearch after his light; The path of the juſt is as a ſhining light, which ſhineth more and more unto the perfect day. See more in Heylin.

Ver. 9. Bleſſed are the peace-makers] Bleſſed are the peaceable, for they ſhall become the children of God. With reſpect to the term peaceable or peace-makers, [εἰρηνοποιοί,] it is to be noted, that in Scripture, το ποιειν, to make, or do, ſignifies an habit of mind, with its conſequent actions. So by thoſe who do good or evil, we underſtand good or bad men; and when St. Paul ſpeaks of making prayer, Phil. i. 4. he means not to cauſe others to pray, but to pray ourſelves. So the peace here ſpoken of is perſonal. It is the fruit of victory after ſucceſsful conqueſts over the inbred impurity of our nature. It is the peace and tranquility of the ſoul; and it is an immediate diſpoſition for the accompliſhment of regeneration, wherein, as St. Paul ſpeaks, we ſhall be renewed by knowledge after the image of the Creator. See Heylin, Suicer's Theſaurus under εἰρηνοποιος, and the note on 2 Cor. iii. 18. Other expoſitors ſuppoſe that this beatitude refers not only to thoſe who are of a peaceable diſpoſition, but is oppoſed to men of hoſtile and warlike minds; and therefore they paraphraſe it thus: "Warriors and conquerors, the diſturbers of the peace of mankind, are by no means happy in their victories, nor they who love to involve others in quarrels for their own purpoſe; but They are happy, who, loving peace, promote it to the utmoſt of their power: they ſhall be called the children of God. Having rendered themſelves like to God, by imitating his greateſt perfection, they ſhall be acknowledged by him as his children, and admitted to a participation of his happineſs; an honour, which thoſe who take pleaſure in war, however eminent they may be for courage, ſhall certainly miſs, though it be the aim of their ambition; becauſe they purſue it not by the Godlike diſpoſition of diffuſing happineſs, but by ſpreading deſolation and death among their fellow-creatures. So that, having diveſtd themſelves of the nature of God, they have no title to be called his ſons."

Ver. 10. Bleſſed are they which are perſecuted, &c.] One would imagine that a perſon of the amiable temper and behaviour deſcribed in the laſt mentioned beatitude, would be the darling of mankind; but our Lord well knew it would not be ſo, as long as Satan was the prince of this world; he therefore warns them before-hand of the treatment all were to expect, who were determined thus to tread in his ſteps, by ſubjoining, Happy are they who are perſecuted for righteouſneſs ſake. "Inſtead of thoſe pomps and pleaſures, thoſe victories and triumphs, in expectation of which you may now be crowding around me, my followers muſt prepare themſelves for the ſeverity of ſuffering, and courageouſly endure the greateſt extremities, for the teſtimony of their conſciences; for the cauſe of true righteouſneſs and virtue. Their richeſt treaſure is beyond the reach of their moſt inveterate enemies, for they ſhall reign with God in everlaſting glory." This is the laſt of theſe ſacred paradoxes, ſays Heylin; paradoxes to the world, but ſavoury and luminous truths in the eye of right reaſon. This beatitude needs no further explanation or proof, than what is obvious from the univerſal ſentiment of mankind, who agree to place the heroic character, in ſuffering for a good cauſe. So our Milton aſſures us,

> —— That ſuffering for truth's ſake
> With fortitude, is higheſt viſtory. Book xi.

This was the prerogative of the martyrs in the primitive church, and juſtice has ſince had its martyrs in all ages. After declaring the general axiom, our Lord applies it, (continues this writer) to his diſciples now preſent, to animate their zeal, who were to lead the van in this magnanimous combat. See ver. 11—16. But though what is here ſaid may be peculiarly applicable to the apoſtles and miniſters of Chriſt; yet there can be no doubt, that it is alſo applicable to all thoſe who come within the character here deſcribed; all who are holy themſelves, the ſalt of the earth, and therefore capable of ſeaſoning others.

Ver. 11, 12. Bleſſed are ye when men ſhall revile, &c.] Macknight underſtands this as a diſtinct beatitude from that in the 10th verſe, ſuppoſing the former to refer to liberty and external eaſe; the preſent to reputation: and accordingly he paraphraſes it thus; "Fame, or the applauſe of the world, does not give perfect contentment, by ſatisfying true ambition; but to be reviled falſely, in the ways of righteouſneſs, and to ſhare in affronts with and for God, is a dignity which yields infinitely greater joy, and is that by which the ſaints and prophets have been diſtinguiſhed in all ages:" Inſtead of, Be exceeding glad, in ver. 12. Ἀγαλλιᾶσθε, would be properly rendered, Triumphantly exult, or leap for joy. See Luke i. 14.

In concluſion of theſe beatitudes, we may obſerve upon them all in general, that to bleſs men, that is, to make them hapyy, was the great buſineſs for which our Lord came into the world; and accordingly, in the beginning of this divine ſermon, he pronounced eight bleſſings together, annexing them to ſo many Chriſtian virtues, and aſſigning the particular beatitude which attends each of them. Knowing that happineſs is our common aim, and that an innate inſtinct continually urges us to the purſuit of it, he in the kindeſt manner applies directly to that inſtinct: he directs it towards its proper object, and ſhews the way to obtain it. Though all men neceſſarily deſire happineſs, yet the greater part continue miſerable, becauſe they ſeek it where it is not to be found. Our Lord therefore begins his divine inſtruction, which is the compleat art of happineſs, by laying before us the true and only method of acquiring it.

We may here further obſerve the benevolent condeſcenſion of our Lord; How he ſeems to lay aſide his ſupreme authority, as our legiſlator, that he may better act the part of our friend and our Saviour; and, inſtead of uſing the lofty imperative ſtyle in poſitive commands, chuſes rather in a more gentle and engaging way to inſinuate his will and our duty, by pronouncing thoſe bleſſed who comply with it. He alſo indulgently conſiders the great depravation of our nature, how its original corruption and acquired malignity, by evil habits, together with the force of bad examples, and the ſinful converſation and faſhions of the world, had ſo darkened the underſtanding, and perverted the judgement of men, that they could but obſcurely diſcern the genuine beauty of the ſublime doctrines which he was to inculcate; and therefore he propoſed them in ſuch a light as would moſt effectually recommend them. He named the duty and its happy conſequences together; guarding and enforcing each virtue with a beatitude; that thoſe who were not yet capable of being affected by the intrinſic merit of holineſs, might be allured to the practice of it by the reward that attends it. See Heylin, 12 Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven: for ſo perſecuted they the prophets which were before you.

13 Ye are the ſalt of the earth: but if the ſalt have loſt his ſavour, wherewith ſhall it be ſalted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be caſt out, and to be troden under foot of men.

14 Ye are the light of the world. A city that is ſet on an hill cannot be hid.

15 Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a buſhel, but on a candleſtick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the houſe.

16 Let your light ſo ſhine before men, that they may ſee your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.

17 Think not that I am come to deſtroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to deſtroy, but to fulfil.

18 For verily I ſay unto you, Till heaven

Ver. 12. James i. 2. Acts vii. 52.—V. 13. Mark ix. 50. Luke xiv. 34.—V. 14. Prov. iv. 18.—V. 15. Mark iv. 21. Luke viii. 16. xi. 33. The word in the original ſignifieth a meaſure containing about a pint leſs than a peck.—V. 16. 1 Peter ii. 12. 1 Cor. xiv. 25.—V. 18. Luke xvi. 17.

Ver. 13. Ye are the ſalt of the earth] This relates to all the diſciples who were there preſent, Luke xiv. 34. and alſo to all Chriſtians in general. (1 Theſſ. v. 5. Philip ii. 15.) But more eſpecially to the apoſtles. See on ver. 16. Salt is the emblem of wiſdom, and it ſerves alſo to preſerve things from putrefaction. Now the firſt diſciples of Chriſt were more eſpecially appointed to diffuſe the wiſdom of the Goſpel throughout the whole world, and to promote virtue and holineſs among men by their doctrines and examples. The meaning is, "Who could inſtruct and reform you, if you ſhould happen to fall into error or vice; You that are to be entruſted with the ſanctification and inſtruction of others?" Comp. Mark ix. 49. Coloſſ. iv. 6. Livy calls Greece Sal Gentium," the ſalt of all the nations," on account of thoſe intellectual improvements which they learned from thence. The word μωρανθῆ, rendered, Have loſt its ſavour, Dr. Waterland tranſlates Is become inſipid; it has a peculiar beauty and ſtrength here, and might literally be rendered, If it be infatuated or grown fooliſh; alluding to the common figure, in which ſenſe and ſpirit are expreſſed by ſalt. Our Lord's ſuppoſition of the ſalt's loſing its ſavour is illuſtrated by Mr. Maundrell, who tells us, That "in the valley of ſalt, near Gebul, and about four hours journey from Aleppo, there is a ſmall precipice, occaſioned by the continual taking away of the ſalt: In this, ſays he, you may ſee how the veins of it lie: I broke a piece of it, of which the part expoſed to the rain, ſun and air, though it had the ſparks and particles of ſalt, yet it had perfectly loſt its ſavour, as in Matt. v. The innermoſt, which had been connected with the rock, retained its ſavour, as I found by proof." See Grotius, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 14. Ye are the light of the world] Jeſus compares his diſciples to the ſun, repreſenting the efficacy of their miniſtry to fill the world with the gladſome light of truth, a thing as neceſſary in the moral world, as light in the natural: Ye are the light of the world. This appellation was given by the Jews to their wiſe men and doctors. See John v. 35. 2 Pet. i. 19. Jeſus Chriſt beſtows it on his diſciples, becauſe they were appointed to preach the Goſpel, (Philip ii. 15.) and to reveal to mankind the knowledge of Chriſt, who is the true light of the world, John i. 49. This is alſo applicable to Chriſtians in general; and to excite them and all Chriſtians to diligence in diſpenſing the ſalutary influences of their doctrine and example, He bad them call to mind, that a city which it ſet upon a mountain cannot be hid; or, that the diſciples of Jeſus Chriſt, and all Chriſtians, being appointed to profeſs and preach the Goſpel, the eyes of all men would be upon them, and ſo their faults being by this means known and obſerved, might ſtop the progreſs of the Goſpel: Comp. Philip iii. 17. 1 Pet. v. 13, &c. Mr. Maundrell tells us, that there is a city called Saphet, thought to be the antient Bethulia, which, ſtanding on an high hill, might eaſily be ſeen from the mountain on which Chriſt made this diſcourſe; and he, very probably, ſuppoſes, that our Saviour might point to that here, as he afterwards did to the birds and the lilies; agreeably to what we have obſerved on ver. 1. of our Lord's manner of taking his ſimilies from the moſt obvious things; a thought which Sir Iſaac Newton has well illuſtrated in his Obſervations on the Prophecies of Daniel, p. 148. to whom the writer referred to in the note on ver. 1. is greatly indebted. See Doddridge, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 15. Neither do men light a candle] This ſeems to be a proverbial expreſſion. See the application Chriſt makes of it on another occaſion, Mark iv. 21. Luke viii. 16. xi. 33. They formerly uſed lamps only, inſtead of candles, and the candleſtick was the foot on which they were ſet up. The meaning of this compariſon is the ſame with that foregoing. The diſciples and Chriſtians being the lights of the world, were deſigned to light men out of the ways of ignorance and vice, into the paths of holineſs and virtue. "Men do not ſo much as light a common lamp, to put it under a buſhel, and conceal it there; but they ſet it on a ſtand, to give light to all who are in the houſe. How much leſs will it become you, whom I have compared to the ſun, to hide or ſuppreſs your rays? The knowledge of divine things is given you, not to be concealed, but to be imparted to mankind around you; therefore, ver. 16. let your light, &c." That is, "Make your doctrine and example bright in the eyes of all who behold you; that they may honour God, Firſt, by acting up to the precepts of the Goſpel, ſtrongly impreſſed on their underſtandings by your penetrating ſermons, and powerfully recommended to their hearts by your exemplary lives: Next by their returning thanks to God for ſending ſuch men to enlighten and reform the world; for to glorify God, is not only to praiſe him, (as Luke ii. 20. and elſewhere,) but alſo to acknowledge the truth of the Goſpel. See Luke xxiii. 47. 1 Pet. ii. 12. This expreſſion includes edification, as oppoſed to the giving offence. The Greek for in heaven is plural;—(in the heavens,) for the Jews reckoned three heavens, the air, the firmament, and the third heaven, or the heaven of heavens, the uſual place of God's reſidence. See Macknight, L'Enfant, and Pierce's fourth diſſertation. Heylin obſerves, that the beatitudes, containing the principal articles of Chriſtian morality, were as ſo many texts for the apoſtles to preach upon, and allure men to the practice of them, by ſhewing them the happineſs that would enſue: But the generality of the world ſo little know the way to true happineſs, that they ſcorn and abuſe thoſe who propoſe it to them; like men in a phrenzy, who ſpurn the offered medicine, and aſſault thoſe who would adminiſter it. Our Lord, who foreknew this, forewarned his diſciples of it: And leſt ſuch ingratitude and ill uſage ſhould make them deſiſt from their high office, and not perſevere in their endeavours to do good to others, at the hazard of ſuch indignities and calumnies and dangers to themſelves, He encourages them with the aſſurances of the great reward with which their patience would be crowned. He animates their zeal, (ver. 12.) by the example of the glorious company of the prophets their predeceſſors, who had faithfully perſiſted in publiſhing the truth, and doing good to mankind, notwithſtanding the grievous perſecution which thereby they drew upon themſelves. And, further to engage his apoſtles to tread in their ſteps, our Lord repreſents to them, that this is their bounden duty, the great work to which they were divinely ordained, and for which they were eſpecially qualified by ſupernatural abilities: And that as their reward would be great, if they rightly diſcharged their miniſtry, ſo their puniſhment would be proportionable, if they neglected it. "Ye are the ſalt of the earth, and your deſtined office is to preſerve from corruption of manners; but if the ſalt become inſipid, &c." Their eſpecial duty was to teach others their duty: but if they flinched from it, through fear of perſecution, or any other motive, they would be loſt irrecoverably; and ſink in perdition beneath the reſt of mankind, as much as by their ſacred office they were placed above them. He goes on therefore with repeated alluſions to remind them of their high ſtation: "Ye are the light of the world, expoſed to public view; a light which ſhould illuminate all around, and in which every the leaſt eclipſe will be viſible and of bad influence." They were to be a pattern to others: They were to recommend their doctrine by their example, and to ſhew how amiable virtue is in their own practice. Let your light ſo ſhine, &c. See his Lectures, p. 75. Dr. Waterland renders the firſt clauſe, In like manner, let your light ſhine before men, that, &c.

Ver. 17—20. Think not that I am come to deſtroy, &c.] Becauſe the doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt concerning happineſs was contrary to that which the Jews were accuſtomed to hear, and which their preachers pretended to derive from the prophets, whoſe deſcriptions of the glory of the Meſſiah's kingdom they underſtood in a literal ſenſe; Alſo becauſe he was about to give explications of the moral precepts, of very different tenor from thoſe which the Scribes and Phariſes commonly gave, but which his diſciples, as inſtructors of mankind, were to inculcate; he ended this branch of his diſcourſe, and introduced that which followed, with declaring that he was by no means come to deſtroy the law or the prophets; i. e. the moral precepts contained in them; for he came to deſtroy the whole ceremonial precepts of the law, the hand-writing of ordinances, which he blotted out and nailed to his croſs, that its abolition might be known to all. See Col. ii. 14. Beſides, we find the phraſe law and prophets made uſe of elſewhere, to ſignify the moral precepts contained in them. See ch. vii. 12. xxii. 40. Think not that I am come to deſtroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to deſtroy, but to fulfil;—πληρῶμαι, to confirm, for ſo the word is uſed 1 Kings i. 14. in the margin. Accordingly, it follows, ver. 18. Verily I ſay unto you, till heaven and earth, &c. Eternity and immutability are by no means the attributes of any ceremonial precept whatever. They are the diſtinguiſhing characters of the precepts of morality enjoined in the law and the prophets. None of them ſhall paſs, or be abrogated, till all be fulfilled: ἕως ἂν παντα γένηται. "Till all the things mentioned be done;" i. e. till the heavens and the earth paſs, or are deſtroyed. Our Lord's meaning therefore is, that there is nothing in the univerſe ſo ſtable as the eternal truths of morality: The heavens may fall, the whole frame of nature be unhinged; nay, every part of it be diſſolved; but the and earth paſs, one jot or one tittle ſhall in no wiſe paſs from the law, till all be fulfilled.

19 Whoſoever therefore ſhall break one of theſe leaſt commandments, and ſhall teach men ſo, he ſhall be called the leaſt in the kingdom of heaven: but whoſoever ſhall do, and teach them, the ſame ſhall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.

20 For I ſay unto you, That except your righteouſneſs ſhall exceed the righteouſneſs of the ſcribes and Phariſees, ye ſhall in no caſe enter into the kingdom of heaven.

21 Ye have heard, that it was ſaid by them of old time, Thou ſhalt not kill; and whoſoever ſhall kill, ſhall be in danger of the judgement:

22 But I ſay unto you, That whoſoever is angry with his brother without a cauſe, ſhall be in danger of the judgement: and whoſoever ſhall ſay to his brother, Raca, Ver. 19. James ii. 10.—V. 20. Rom. ix. 31. x. 3.—V. 21. Or, to them. Exod. xx. 13. Deut. v. 17.—V. 22. 1 John iii. 15. James ii. 20.

rules of righteouſneſs ſhall remain immutable and immortal: Wherefore he ordered his diſciples on the ſevereſt penalties, both by their doctrine and example, to enforce the ſtrict obſervation of all the moral precepts contained in the ſacred writings, and that to their utmoſt extent: ver. 19. Whoſoever therefore ſhall break, that is, deſtroy, (λύσαι, being here put for καταλύσαι, as it is likewiſe John ii. 18.) one of theſe leaſt commandments, and ſhall teach men ſo, ſhall be called; i. e. ſhall be,—the leaſt in the kingdom of heaven. Since the moral precepts of the law are eternal and immutable, whatſoever weakens their obligation ſhall never enter into heaven: for there is in the text a figure which the rhetoricians call meioſis, (diminution) often elegantly uſed to convey a ſtrong idea: Thus, Gal. v. 21. They that do ſuch things ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God; i. e. ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed. Our divine teacher adds, ver. 20. " Except your righteouſneſs,—the righteouſneſs which you practice yourſelves, and enjoin upon others,—ſhall exceed the righteouſneſs of the Scribes and Phariſees —the Jewiſh doctors of the ſtricteſt ſects; ye ſhall in no caſe enter into the kingdom of heaven; for, ye like them will be corrupters of others, and conſeqently monſters of the blackeſt kind. But becauſe this was a ſubject of great importance, our Lord goes on to ſpecify various particulars, wherein their's ſhould excel the doctrine and practice of the Jewiſh teachers. This appears to be the true and proper explanation of this paſſage; and from the whole of what follows, it is manifeſt that Chriſt refers to the moral, and not the ceremonial law; for he doth not give a ſingle inſtance from the latter. The word ἰωτα, which we render jot, ver. 18. undoubtedly anſwers to the Hebrew letter י jod, whence the Engliſh word here uſed ſeems to be derived; and which, being the leaſt letter of their alphabet, might properly be uſed proverbially on this occaſion. Κεραια, which we render tittle, properly ſignifies one of thoſe little ornamental curlatures or flouriſhes, which, when Hebrew is elegantly written, are generally uſed at the beginning and end of a letter, and ſometimes at the corners. The clauſe might have been rendered, Not the leaſt letter or ſtroke. The latter part of the 20th verſe muſt have greatly ſurpriſed Chriſt's hearers, if the proverb which hath ſince prevailed were of ſo ancient a date. For it hath been commonly ſaid by the Jews, " That if but two men were to enter into the kingdom of heaven, one of them would be a Phariſee, and the other a Scribe." See Chemnitz, Calmet, and Macknight. Dr. Heylin obſerves very well, that it clearly appears from theſe verſes, that our Lord certainly foreſaw the great abuſes which would be made of his religion; How ſome would think they might compenſate for the neglect of moral duties, by deeds of ſuperſtition and will-worſhip; and how others, glorying in their preſumptuous aſſurances, would contradiſtinguiſh faith from morality; and by taking away the law, which is the only true foundation of all religion, leave Chriſtianity a mere caſtle in the air, an enthuſiaſtic ſyſtem of abſurdities. Chriſt therefore ſolemnly, and with great emphaſis, aſſerts the perpetual obligation of the law, till nature itſelf ſhould be ſo changed, as to render its dictates uſeleſs. In the preſent courſe of things the law is ſo far from abating, or being abrogated in any eſſential point of duty, that, on the contrary, all who faithfully practice the law, find by experience that it increaſes, and ſpreads its juriſdiction further, in proportion to the progreſs they make; for the moral ſenſe greatly improves by exerciſe, and as men advance in their obedience of the law, they alſo advance in the knowledge of it; ſo as to diſcover new duties, and ſtricter obligations, whereof they had not been before ſenſible: And theſe too muſt be faithfully complied with and perſevered in, before we can be qualified for that ſuperior diſcipline, which is peculiar to the doctrine of Chriſt: Unleſs, ſays he, your juſtice ſhall ſurpaſs, &c.

Ver. 21. It was ſaid by them of old time] To them, &c. Wat. and ſo wherever it occurs. It was ſaid to them of former time—But I ſay to you: So our Lord introduces his ſeveral improvements of the law under the different articles hereafter ſpecified. Chriſt here diſtinguiſhes his doctrines from thoſe, which in former times had been publicly taught and enforced by the authority of law; for as there is a gradual increaſe of knowledge in every man, who faithfully practices what he knows already; ſo by divine appointment, it has proved in the courſe of the world. Natural religion was the general rule of life till Moſes, who gave the revealed law, which bears his name, and was the ſtandard of duty till the coming of Chriſt; whoſe inſtructions are the completion of all that appertains to moral rectitude: Upon which account the ſeaſon of his diſpenſation is called the laſt days, as the ages preceding it are here named the former time; and it is with this view that our Lord, when he was going to extend the boundaries of the law, takes diſtinct notice how far they were advanced already. The Greek for them of former time is ἀρχαῖοι, which may be well rendered beginners, or novices, and ſo rightly oppoſed to the Apoſtles, who were in a ſtate of proficiency. See Heylin. Jeſus Chriſt inſtances in the commandments of the ſecond table, how the Jews had corrupted the word of God by their traditions; and he propoſes here theſe commandments in the ſame ſenſe as they were underſtood by the Phariſees, and ſometimes with the gloſſes they put upon them; and from theſe it is he endeavours to vindicate and reſcue them. He begins with the ſixth commandment. It ſeems, the doctors gave it as their opinion, that this law, Thou ſhalt not kill, prohibited nothing but actual murder, committed with a man's own hand; and therefore, if he hired another to kill him, or turned a wild beaſt upon him, that ſlew him,—according to them it was not murder, puniſhable by the law, though they acknowledged it might deſerve the judgement of God. The doctrine of Chriſt's diſciples was to be more ſublime, exhibiting the intention and ſpirit of the law, which forbids our being angry with another, our affronting him, and judging evil concerning his ſpiritual eſtate without good reaſon; for the limitation added to the firſt member of the ſentence, ver. 22. muſt be underſtood throughout the whole. It may be proper to obſerve, that by the judgement, is meant that court of judicature amongſt the Jews, which conſiſted of twenty-three judges who had power of life and death; ſo that the meaning of the words, He ſhall be in danger of, or liable to be puniſhed by the judgement, is, " He ſhall be guilty of death." Deut. xvi. 18. xxi. 2. But is to be noted here, that though Jeſus Chriſt makes uſe of the ſame expreſſions as were uſed by the Jews to denote temporal puniſhments, yet his words are to be figuratively underſtood, and applied to the future puniſhments of the wicked, of which he diſtinguiſhes the different degrees, according to the different crimes. See Grotius, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 22. But I ſay unto you] Which of the prophets ever ſpake thus? Their language is, Thus ſaith the Lord. Who hath the authority to uſe this language?—He who is able to ſave and deſtroy. Jeſus Chriſt does not mean here that anger, or every ſcornful or reviling word deſerves the ſame puniſhment from the magiſtrates as murder; i. e. death; but only that anger, being in direct violation of the ſixth commandment, becauſe it tends and diſpoſes men to murder, the judgement of God will take cognizance of ſuch anger, as well as of all deſires of revenge, hatred, opprobrious and reviling language, &c. See 1 John iii. 15. The word εἰκῆ, without cauſe, though found in almoſt all the Greek manuſcripts, is omitted in moſt manuſcripts of the Vulgate. Bengelius, and ſeveral others think it a mere human gloſs: " If our Lord, ſay they, had only forbidden the being angry without a cauſe, there was no manner of need for that ſolemn declaration, I ſay unto you, for the ſcribes and Phariſees themſelves ſaid as much as this." But ſurely theſe writers ſtretch the point much too far; for it ſeems as impoſſible to diveſt man intirely of anger, as of his nature: Moreover anger is aſcribed frequently to God and to Chriſt, Mark iii. 5. and St. Paul, (Epheſ. iv. 26.) doth not forbid us to be angry, but ſo to be angry, as not to ſin. This limitation, therefore, without cauſe or good reaſon, is certainly added with great propriety. See Wetſtein. By brother is meant another Chriſtian; this is the meaning of the word ἀδελφος, in the ſacred writings; and that the ſame ſenſe is put upon it here is evident from the next verſe. The Jews would give the name of brother to no one who was not an Iſraelite. They vouchſafed to give that of neighbour to a proſelyte; but would by no means beſtow it on a Gentile. Our Lord did not deſign to authorize a like diſtinction, when he made uſe here of the word brother; for he elſewhere enjoins his diſciples to forgive all men in general, and ſhews that our neighbour is any man whatſoever. Luke x. 29, 30. The word judgement here unqueſtionably muſt ſignify puniſhment from God; ſince this cauſeleſs anger might be ſo concealed in the heart, as not to admit of conviction before men. " He ſhall be liable to a worſe puniſhment from God, than any which your common courts of judicature can inflict." See the note on ver. 21. Our Saviour goes on, " Whoſoever to his ſecret anger ſhall add opprobrious and contemptuous words,—for inſtance, ſhall ſay to his brother, Raca, that is, thou worthleſs, empty fellow! ſhall be expoſed to yet more terrible effects of the divine judgement, and be obnoxious to a yet ſeverer puniſhment; as far exceeding the former, as that inflicted by the Sanhedrim, which extends to ſtoning, exceeds that which follows the judgement of the inferior courts, which only have the power of the ſword." Raca is a Syriac word, which, according to Lightfoot, ſignifies a ſcoundrel; according to Druſius, a coxcomb; and ſo is a term of great contempt. Κενε, vain man, uſed James ii. 20. ſeems ſhall be in danger of the council: but whoſoever ſhall ſay, Thou fool, ſhall be in danger of hell-fire.

23 Therefore, if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there remembereſt that thy brother hath aught againſt thee;

24 Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; firſt be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.

25 Agree with thine adverſary quickly, whilſt thou art in the way with him: leſt at any time the adverſary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be caſt into priſon.

26 Verily, I ſay unto thee, Thou ſhalt by no means come out thence, till thou haſt paid the uttermoſt farthing.

27 Ye have heard that it was ſaid by them of old time, Thou ſhalt not commit adultery:

28 But I ſay unto you, That whoſoever looketh on a woman to luſt after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.

29 And if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and caſt it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members ſhould periſh, and not that thy whole body ſhould be caſt into hell.

to be a tranſlation of it; for, as St. Jerome obſerves, it is derived from the Hebrew ריק rik, which ſignifies vain or empty. See Parkhurſt on the word. The council—, in the Greek συνεδριον, a word which the Jews adopted into their language, giving it an Hebrew termination, Sanhedrin,—ſignifies the council or ſenate of the nation. It conſiſted of ſeventy-two judges, or, according to others, of ſeventy, beſides the preſident. It uſed to ſit at Jeruſalem. Concerning the place where it met, ſee John xix. 13. This was the ſupreme court of judicature among the Jews, and to it appeals were made from inferior tribunals. It took cognizance only of the moſt important matters; as, for inſtance, ſuch wherein a whole tribe was concerned; thoſe that related to the high-prieſt, a falſe prophet, idolatry, treaſon, &c. and could, while the republic laſted, inflict the heavieſt puniſhments; particularly ſtoning, and burning with melted lead poured down the throat of the criminal after he was ſtrangled. See L'Enfant, and Calmet's dictionary. Our Saviour goes on, "Whoſoever, in his unreaſonable paſſion, ſhall ſay to his brother, Thou fool, [Μωρὲ] i. e. Thou graceleſs wicked villain;—thereby impeaching his moral character, as well as reflecting on his intellectual; ſhall be obnoxious to the Gehenna of fire; or, to a future puniſhment, more dreadful even than being burned alive in the valley of Hinnon; from whence the name of the infernal regions is borrowed." Wicked men are ſo often called fools in the Old Teſtament, eſpecially in the writings of David and Solomon; that the appellation of fool, in the Jewiſh language, ſignifies not ſo much a weak thoughtleſs creature, as a man deliberately wicked; for, as religion is the higheſt wiſdom, vice muſt be accounted the extremeſt folly. Dr. Sykes draws the ſame ſenſe from the word, by deriving it from the Syriac μαρα, rebellavit; ſo that, according to him, the original μωρε ſignifies a rebel againſt God, or an apoſtate from the true religion. The valley of Hinnom, called alſo Tophet, was the ſcene of the deteſtable worſhip of Moloch, as we have before obſerved, 2 Kings xxiii. 10. See alſo Iſai. xxx. 33. In after times continual fires were kept in this valley, for burning the unburied carcaſes and filth of the city, that, being thus polluted, it might be unfit for the like religious abominations. The Jews, from the perpetuity of theſe fires, and to expreſs the utmoſt deteſtation of the ſacrifices which were offered to Moloch in this valley, made uſe of its name to ſignify hell, of which they conceived it a fit emblem. Hence our tranſlators have given Tophet, or Gehenna, its metaphorical meaning in the preſent paſſage, whereas it ought rather to have had its literal ſignification; for our Lord, intending to ſhew his hearers that the puniſhment of cauſeleſs anger, contemptuous ſpeeches, and abuſive names, ſhall, in the life to come, bear a proportion to the guilt that is in theſe ſins; and finding no means in the language of men, by which thoſe different degrees of puniſhments could properly be expreſſed, he illuſtrated them by the puniſhment wherewith the Jews were acquainted. This interpretation of the puniſhment in the latter clauſe of the verſe, has a particular advantage attending it, as it prevents the reader from imagining, that only the ſin of calling his brother fool will be puniſhed with hell-fire. See Lightfoot and Macknight. St. Auſtin obſerves, that here is a gradation in the faults reprehended. The firſt is anger, deliberately and cauſeleſly conceived in the mind; the ſecond when that breaks forth in wrathful expreſſions; the third when it vents itſelf in contumelious abuſes. It is by theſe ſteps, that a man enraged with anger, ſometimes proceeds to actual murder, but much oftener to the commiſſion of it in his thought and intention; and we are here warned that all theſe ſteps are criminal in their ſeveral degrees, and that the law not only prohibits murder, but even the remoteſt tendencies toward it.

Ver. 23, 24. Therefore, if thou bring thy gift] Further to quench the firſt and ſmalleſt ſparks of enmity, and prevent all occaſion of angry reſentments, our Lord adds what follows from this to the 26th verſe, for ſo far his advice extends, with regard to the ſixth commandment; becauſe men are ſo very apt to fall into raſh anger, and to expreſs their anger by contemptuous ſpeeches and abuſive names, fancying that there is no ſin in theſe things, or but little, and that compenſation may eaſily be made for them by acts of devotion, Jeſus declared that atonement was not to be made for theſe offences by any offerings, how coſtly ſoever, and therefore preſcribed immediate repentance and reparation, as the only remedies of them. He inſiſted particularly on reparation, aſſuring us, that unleſs it be made, God will not accept the worſhip of ſuch offenders; being infinitely better pleaſed with repentance than with ſacrifices, or external worſhip of any kind, how precious ſoever thoſe duties may appear in the eye of vulgar underſtandings. Vain, therefore, is their preſumption, who fancy they can make amends for yet more groſs acts of injuſtice, by acts of devotion: "Therefore if thou bring thy gift, δῶρον—thy free-will offering, to the altar, and there recollect that thy brother hath aught againſt thee,—any juſt cauſe of complaint; leave there thy gift before the altar:—Do not lay aſide the thoughts of worſhipping God, becauſe thou art not in a proper ſtate, but prepare thyſelf for his worſhip without delay; go thy way; firſt be reconciled," &c. It is obſervable that Philo, in explaining the law of the treſpaſs-offering, tells us, that when a man had injured his brother, and repenting of his fault, voluntarily acknowledged it, (in which caſe both reſtitution and ſacrifice were required) he was firſt to make reſtitution, and then to come into the temple, preſenting his ſacrifice, and aſking pardon. This is a very juſt and natural account of the matter, and adds a great illuſtration to this text. See Macknight, and Doddridge.

Ver. 25, 26. Agree with thine adverſary] Our bleſſed Saviour here inforces the exhortation in the preceding verſes, from the conſideration of what was reckoned prudent in ordinary law-ſuits. In ſuch caſes wiſe and honeſt men always adviſe the party that has done the wrong to make up matters with his adverſary whilſt it is in his power, leſt the ſentence of a judge being interpoſed, fall heavy on him. For the ſame reaſon we, when we have offended our brother, ought to make it up with him, whilſt an opportunity of repentance is allowed us, and that, though our quarrel ſhould have proceeded to the greateſt lengths; leſt the ſentence of the ſupreme Judge overtake us, and put reconciliation out of our power for ever. The original ἴσθι εὐνοῶν, rendered agree, ſeems to imply not only peace, but benevolence; and therefore might be rendered, "Come to a friendly agreement." The word ἀντίδικος, adverſary, properly ſignifies a perſon who is going to law with another. The farthing κοδράντης was the leaſt braſs coin the Romans had. In a figurative ſenſe, which is that of Jeſus Chriſt here, the priſon is taken for hell, out of which the unrelenting ſinner can never come, according to our Lord's declaration, becauſe he can never be able to make that ſatisfaction. We are all thy debtors, O Lord, and in one ſenſe the priſoners of thy juſtice; of ourſelves moſt incapable, not only of paying the uttermoſt farthing, but even of diſcharging the leaſt part of the debt. We bleſs thee for that generous Surety, who has undertaken and diſcharged it for us; and by the price of whoſe atoning blood we are delivered from the chains of darkneſs, and are tranſlated into the glorious liberty of thy children. See Doddridge, L'Enfant, &c.

Ver. 27, 28. Ye have heard, &c.] What hath been hitherto ſaid refers to meekneſs; what now follows, to purity of heart. Dr. Lightfoot, to explain the opinion of the Jewiſh doctors, reſpecting the duty of this ſeventh commandment, cites the Targum upon Exod. xx. by which it appears, that they were very looſe moraliſts indeed. In oppoſition therefore to them, our Lord declared, that whoſoever looketh on a woman, &c. whoſoever cheriſhes unchaſte deſires and intentions, or, as it is expreſſed in the tenth commandment, covets his neighbour's wife, is really guilty of adultery, though he ſhould never find the opportunity of committing the act with her; for which cauſe, all ſuch uſe of our ſenſes, as inflames the mind with luſt, muſt be carefully avoided. See on the next verſe, and Ecclus. ix. 5. &c. xli. 21. xlii. 12.

Ver. 29, 30. And if thy right eye offend thee, &c.] The word rendered offend thee, σκανδαλίζει, ſignifies to be a ſtumbling block in a perſon's way, or the occaſion of his fall; and ſo implies much more than merely to diſpleaſe; a remark which deſerves attending to, becauſe the ſenſe of many texts depends upon it. Dr. Waterlands reads, make thee offend. We may juſt note, that the greateſt

30 And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and caſt it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members ſhould periſh, and not that thy whole body ſhould be caſt into hell.

31 It hath been ſaid, Whoſoever ſhall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement:

32 But I ſay unto you, That whoſoever ſhall put away his wife, ſaving for the cauſe of fornication, cauſeth her to commit adultery: and whoſoever ſhall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery.

33 Again, ye have heard that it hath been ſaid by them of old time, Thou ſhalt not forſwear thyſelf, but ſhalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths:

34 But I ſay unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne:

35 Nor by the earth; for it is his footſtool: neither by Jeruſalem; for it is the city of the great King.

36 Neither ſhalt thou ſwear by thy head, becauſe thou canſt not make one hair white or black:

37 But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatſoever is more than theſe cometh of evil.

38 Ye have heard that it hath been ſaid, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth:

part of Chriſt's auditors being people who lived by their daily labour, to theſe the loſs of a right hand would be a much greater calamity than that of a right eye; ſo that there is a gradation and force in this paſſage, beyond what has been generally obſerved. Every one knows that the expreſſions in theſe verſes are figurative, and not to be underſtood literally. The general meaning is, "Deny thyſelf the uſe of thy ſenſes, though ever ſo delightful, in all caſes where the uſe of them enſnares thy ſoul. Turn away thine eye, and keep back thy hand from the alluring object." This, ſays Chryſoſtome, is a moſt mild and eaſy precept: It would have been much more hard, had he given commandment to converſe with, and look curiouſly on women, and then to abſtain from further commiſſion of uncleanneſs with them. Figurative and proverbial ſpeeches, which may have great beauty and force in one language, often loſe their grace and energy when tranſlated into another tongue, wherein the novelty and exotic air of the expreſſion may greatly obſcure the ſenſe intended by it. All our tranſlations of the Scripture muſt labour under this difficulty. A ſuperficial reader will find his imagination ſhocked at the bare propoſal of pulling out an eye, or cutting off an hand, being not aware, that by the eye is meant the intention, and by the hand the execution of it. In the very next chapter, we have eye again in this ſenſe, namely, to denote the intention, view, or deſign; and to expreſs performance by the hand, is ſo agreeable to the general tenor of Scripture-language, that it is needleſs to inſiſt upon it. With this explanation, it appears not only that the precept is reaſonable and expedient, but alſo that the terms by which our Lord choſe to expreſs it, are remarkably proper to the occaſion. The occaſion was the prohibition of impure deſires, and the mental adultery; an odious ſubject, which requires great reſerve, and a covering of darkneſs, even in reproving it. But it is known how thoſe who are poſſeſſed with that criminal paſſion, are apt to be tranſported by it; and that the exaggerating metaphors in which they delight to expreſs their infatuation, amply juſtify the ſacred language of pulling out the right eye, and caſting it away, to expreſs the extreme violence which they ought to do themſelves, who would preſerve their purity. See Heylin, and Oſtervald on uncleanneſs.

Ver. 31, 32. It hath been ſaid, &c.] It hath been ſaid, &c.—bill of divorce: ver. 32. But, &c.—except in the caſe of adultery, occaſions her being an adultereſs. Wat. The doctors of the ſchool of Sammaï affirmed, that in the law concerning divorce, Deut. xxiv. 1. the words, ſome uncleanneſs, were to be underſtood of adultery only; whereas they of the ſchool of Hillel interpreted them of any manner of diſlike whatever. Hence the Phariſees aſked Jeſus, ch. xix. 3. If it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cauſe? The opinion of Hillel was generally eſpouſed by the Jews, as appears both from their practice and their writings. Thus Malachi ii. 16. the clauſe which in our tranſlation runs, The Lord ſays he hateth putting away, i. e. divorces on frivolous pretences, is by the Chaldee paraphraſt and the LXX rendered, If thou hateſt, thou ſhouldeſt put her away: Alſo the ſon of Sirach, Ecclus. xxv. 26. If ſhe go not as thou wouldeſt have her, cut her off from thy fleſh; and Joſephus Antiq. l. 4. c. 8. "He that would be disjoined from his wife, for any cauſe whatever, as many ſuch cauſes there may be among men, let him give her a bill of divorce." Nay, one of their doctors delivered it as his opinion, "That a man may put away his wife, if he likes any other woman better." As therefore they had perverted the law of divorce, that they might give full ſcope to their luſts, Jeſus thought fit to reduce it to its primitive meaning; aſſuring them, that he who divorces his wife for any of the cauſes allowed by the doctors, whoredom excepted, layeth her under a ſtrong temptation to commit adultery; unjuſt divorce being no divorce in the ſight of God: and that ſince ſuch marriages ſtill ſubſiſted, he who married the woman unjuſtly divorced, committeth adultery alſo. See Macknight, Calmet, and the note on 1 Cor. vii. 15.

Ver. 33—37. Again, ye have heard, &c.] As to oaths the doctors affirmed, that they were obligatory, according to the nature of the things by which a man ſwears. See ch. xxiii. 16. Hence they allowed the uſe of ſuch oaths in common converſation as they ſaid were not obligatory; pretending that there was no harm in them, becauſe the law which forbad them to forſwear themſelves, and enjoined them to perform their vows, meant ſuch ſolemn oaths only, as were of a binding nature. It is this deteſtable morality which Jeſus condemned in ver. 34—36. By comparing ch. xxiii. 16. it appears that our Lord is here giving a catalogue of oaths, which, in the opinion of the doctors, were not obligatory. His meaning, therefore is, "Swear not at all, unleſs you have a mind to perform; becauſe every oath being really obligatory, he, who from an opinion that ſome are not, ſwears in common converſation by heaven, or by the earth, or by Jeruſalem, or by his own head, is, without all doubt, guilty of perjury. Much more is he guilty, who, when called thereto by lawful authority, ſwears with an intention to falſify." Jeſus by no means condemns ſwearing truly before a magiſtrate, or upon grave and ſolemn occaſions, becauſe that would have been to prohibit both the beſt method of ending controverſies, Heb. vi. 16. and an high act of religious worſhip, Deut. vi. 13. Iſai. lxv. 16. An oath being not only a ſolemn appeal to the divine Omniſcience, from which nothing can be hid, but alſo a direct acknowledgement of God, as the great protector and patron of right, and the avenger of falſehood. But let your communication, ſays he, be yes, yes; no, no: "Maintain ſuch ſincerity and truth in all your words, as will merit the belief of your acquaintance. So that in common converſation, to gain yourſelves credit, you need do no more than barely aſſert or deny any matter, without invoking the name of God at all; for whatſoever is more than theſe cometh of evil; or, as it may be tranſlated, cometh of the evil one: Ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ, ſee ch. vi. 13." In common diſcourſe, whatever is more than affirmation, or negation, ariſeth from the temptation of the devil; who prompts men to curſe and to ſwear, that he may leſſen their reverence for God, and lead them at length to perjury, even in the moſt ſolemn inſtances: Conſiderations, which ſhew the evil nature of this ſin in the ſtrongeſt light. We may juſt obſerve, that the Jews have a proverb among them to this purpoſe: "The yea of the juſt is yea, and their nay, nay:" That is to ſay, they are ſincere, and perform whatever they ſay or promiſe. See James v. 12. In whatever ſenſe the laſt clauſe be underſtood,—cometh of evil, it contains a demonſtration, that the 34th verſe is to be explained with the limitation propoſed; for it is evident that oaths were in ſome caſes not only allowed, but required by the Moſaic law. See Exod. xxii. 11. Lev. v. 1. Numb. v. 19, 21. Deut. xxix. 12, 14. So that if Chriſt's prohibition had here referred to ſwearing in ſolemn and judicial caſes, he would in theſe words have charged the divine law with eſtabliſhing an immorality; which is moſt abſurd to ſuppoſe. See Macknight, Doddridge, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 38—42. Ye have heard, &c.] With reſpect to men's reſiſting and revenging ſuch injuries as are done them, Jeſus aſſured his diſciples, that although for the preſervation of ſociety, Moſes had ordained the judges to give eye for eye, and tooth for tooth, if the injured party demanded it; yet the doctors were greatly in the wrong, not only when they enjoined men to inſiſt on retaliation as their duty, but declared it lawful in many caſes for the injured party to avenge himſelf with his own hand, provided, in his revenge he did not exceed the meaſure preſcribed in the law. Chriſt's doctrine is, that the good man is ſo far from revenging private injuries, that oftentimes he does not even reſiſt them, and always forgives them when they happen to be done to him; a generoſity which he warmly recommended to his diſciples in the paſſage before us. To underſtand it aright we muſt take notice, that there are five caſes put, wherein Chriſtian meekneſs muſt eſpecially ſhew itſelf: firſt, when any one aſſaults our perſon, in reſentment of ſome affront which he imagines we have put upon him: ſecondly, when any one ſues us at the law, in order to take our goods from us: thirdly, when he attacks our natural liberty: fourthly, when one who is poor aſks charity: fifthly, when our neighbour begs the loan of ſomething from us. In all theſe caſes, our Lord forbids us to 39 But I ſay unto you, That ye reſiſt not evil: but whoſoever ſhall ſmite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other alſo.

40 And if any man will ſue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke alſo.

41 And whoſoever ſhall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.

42 Give to him that aſketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee, turn not thou away.

43 Ye have heard that it hath been ſaid, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy:

44 But I ſay unto you, Love your enemies, bleſs them that curſe you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which deſpitefully uſe you, and perſecute you;

reſiſt: yet, from the examples he mentions, it is plain, that this forbearance and compliance is required only when we are ſlightly attacked, but by no means when the fault is of a capital kind; for it would be unbecoming the wiſdom which Jeſus ſhewed in other points, to ſuppoſe that he forbids us to defend ourſelves againſt murderers, robbers, and oppreſſors, who would unjuſtly take away our life, our eſtate, or our liberty: Neither can it be, that he commands us to give every idle and worthleſs fellow all he may think fit to aſk, whether in charity or in loan: we are only to give what we can ſpare, and to ſuch perſons, as out of real neceſſity ſeek relief from us; nay, our Lord's own behaviour towards the man, who, in the preſence of the council, ſmote him on the cheek, gives reaſon to think he did not mean that in all caſes his diſciples ſhould be paſſive under the very injuries which he here ſpeaks of. In ſome circumſtances, ſmiting on the cheek, taking away one's coat, and the compelling of him to go a mile, may be great injuries, and therefore are to be reſiſted: The firſt inſtance was judged ſo by Jeſus himſelf, in the caſe mentioned; for had he foreborn to reprove the man who did it, his ſilence might have been interpreted as proceeding from a conviction of his having done evil, in giving the high-prieſt the anſwer for which he was ſmitten. Allowing, therefore, that this rule has for its object ſmall injuries, and that it orders us to be paſſive under them, rather than to repel them, it is liable to no objection: for he who bears a ſlight affront, conſults his honour and intereſt much better than he who reſiſts or reſents it; becauſe he ſhews a greatneſs of mind worthy of a man, and avoids quarrels, which frequently are attended with the moſt fatal conſequences. In like manner, he who yields a little of his right, rather than go to law, is much wiſer than the man who has recourſe to juſtice in every inſtance; becauſe in the progreſs of a law-ſuit ſuch animoſities may ariſe, as are inconſiſtent with charity. Again, benevolence, which is the glory of the divine nature, and the perfection of the human, rejoices in doing good; hence, the man poſſeſſed of this godlike quality chearfully embraces every occaſion in his power, of relieving the poor and diſtreſſed, whether by gift or loan. Some are of opinion that the precept concerning alms-giving, and gratuitous lending, is ſubjoined to the inſtances of injuries which our Lord commands us to bear: to teach us, that if the perſons who have injured us fall into want, we are not to with-hold any act of charity from them, on account of the evil they have formerly done us. Taken in this light, the precept is generous and divine. Moreover, as liberality is a virtue nearly allied to the forgiveneſs of injuries, our Lord joins the two together, to ſhew, that they ſhould always go hand in hand: the reaſon is, revenge will blaſt the greateſt liberality, and a covetous heart will ſhew the moſt perfect patience to be a ſordid meanneſs of ſpirit, proceeding from ſelfiſhneſs. See Macknight, Blair, and Blackall. The words μὴ ἀντιστῆναι τῷ πονηρῷ, are rendered by Dr. Doddridge, Do not ſet yourſelves againſt the injurious perſon. See the force of the original word ἀντιστῆναι, 2 Tim. iii. 8. where to reſiſt the truth, is the ſame as to endeavour to deſtroy it; Rom. xii. 17. Inſtead of coat and cloak in the 40th verſe, Doddridge reads veſt and mantle, which more exactly anſwer to χιτῶν and ἱμάτιον, and are parts of dreſs, under different names, ſtill retained in Barbary, Egypt and the Levant. The mantle was much larger than the veſt, and probably the more valuable. See John xix. 23. and Shaw's Travels, page 289. The word ἀγγαρεύσει, rendered compel, in verſe 41. all the commentators have obſerved is derived from the name of thoſe officers or public meſſengers amongſt the Perſians, who were wont to preſs the carriages and horſes they met on the road, if they had occaſion for them, and even to force the drivers or riders to go along with them. See ch. xxvii. 32. Dr. Waterland very properly renders the word preſs. This cuſtom was alſo in uſe in Judea, and the Roman empire. Among the Jews, the diſciples of their wiſe men were excuſed from ſuch ſervices; but Chriſt adviſes his diſciples not to inſiſt on that exemption. The laſt clauſe of the 42d verſe ſhould be rendered, and do not turn away him that would borrow of thee. Dr. Heylin upon this paſſage has finely obſerved, that the apoſtles were like the devoted Decii, deſtined victims for the reformation of the world. The laſt and moſt effectual proof of their doctrine, was to be their martyrdom; and their blood ſo ſhed was to be the ſeed of the church, which has ſince ſo abundantly fructified and overſpread the earth. In this view, what we read here may be accounted amongſt the eſpecial directions peculiar to the apoſtolical character; concerning which, ſee the laſt note on this chapter. But if we apply them, as I believe our Lord intended, to all who are called to genuine Chriſtianity, then the following obſervation may be uſeful to ſet them in their proper light.

The eſſence of virtue conſiſts in mental diſpoſition; in our temper and frame of mind; but as human language is adapted to expreſs bodily action much better than mental diſpoſition, it is uſual to expreſs the latter by the action it would naturally produce: and as the principles of action are complicated and various, and prudence or neceſſity may often oblige us to act differently from what the frame and temper of our mind inclines to; hence it comes to paſs, that ſome Evangelical counſels, which preſcribe an outward action, mean in particular caſes only the proper inward diſpoſition; namely, a readineſs and inclination to perform it: So that the will, though not formally mentioned in the precept, is always required, and the deed, though nominally expreſſed, may on many occaſions be omitted. For inſtance, it is ſaid at ver. 42. Give to him who aſketh thee, &c. Now this precept is in the letter, and with regard to the outward act it commands, very often impoſſible, very often improper to be put in practice: but in the ſpirit of it, i. e. the diſpoſition of heart which it enjoins, it is always poſſible, always practicable, always obligatory: The narrowneſs of our own circumſtances may make it impoſſible, or the circumſtances of him who aſks our bounty, may make it improper to put this precept in execution, as to the outward act: for we may be ſo poor ourſelves, or the perſon who applies to us may, by his vices or other qualities be ſo circumſtanced, that we either cannot or ought not to relieve him. But an inclination to aſſiſt him, and do him ſervice, is always in our power: The pooreſt man may have in the good treaſury of his heart, wherewithal to defray this univerſal debt of benevolence to all who aſk or need his aſſiſtance; and thus the precept will be virtually fulfilled; i. e. the virtue of the act will be imputed to him, as the diſpoſition which would produce it. So again, when our Lord commands us not to reſiſt the man who injures us, &c. his meaning is, That we ſhould not repel and ſtrive againſt the occaſions of ſuffering which occur in the order of providence, but readily accept every croſs which comes in our way. Thoſe who are capable of this leſſon know full well how ſalutary ſufferings are, and that it is not poſſible to carry on their purification without them.

Ver. 43. You have heard, &c.] It may be proper to note here in this laſt quotation, the manner of our Lord's quoting the doctrines which he choſe to ſpeak of. He does not ſay, Ye know that it was ſaid, &c. as he would have done, if nothing but the written law had been in his eye; but he ſays, Ye have heard that it was ſaid;—comprehending not only the law itſelf, but the explications of it, which the doctors pretended to have derived from the mouth of Moſes by tradition. The paſſage of the law refered to in the preſent caſe, is Levit. xix. 18. where the clauſe, and hate thine enemy, is not found. But the doctors pretended that it was deducible from the firſt part of the precept, which ſeems to limit forgiveneſs to Iſraelites: Beſides, they ſupported their opinion by the tradition of the elders, and by the precepts concerning the idolatrous nations too rigidly underſtood. Hence their malevolence to all mankind but their own nation, was ſo remarkable, that the heathens took notice of it. "Their fidelity, ſays Tacitus, is inviolable, and their pity ready towards one another; but unto all others they bear an implacable hatred:" Hiſt. lib. v. cap. 5. and compare 1 Theſſ. ii. 15. Indeed, they were ſo exceſſively haughty, that they would not ſo much as ſalute a heathen or a Samaritan. None but brethren received the leaſt mark of reſpect from them; a behaviour, which rendered them odious to all mankind. They certainly diſhonoured God extremely, by pretending that his law countenanced ſuch ferocity; the precepts upon which they laid ſo much ſtreſs, having no reference at all to the diſpoſition which particular perſons among the Iſraelites were to bear to particular perſons among the heathens. They only preſcribed what treatment the Iſraelites were to give thoſe nations as bodies politic, in which capacity it was moſt juſt they ſhould be deſtroyed, becauſe of their abominations, and becauſe they might have tempted God's people to idolatry; Lev. xviii. 25, 28. But the Jews, overlooking the reaſon of thoſe precepts, extended them moſt abſurdly to the heathens in general, nay, and to private enemies among their brethren alſo. In oppoſition to this narrow and abominable ſpirit, our Lord commands his diſciples to ſhew benevolence, according to their power, to every individual of the human ſpecies, without reſpect of country or religion; benevolence even to their bittereſt enemies. See Macknight, Chemnitz, and the next verſe.

Ver. 44. Which deſpitefully uſe you, &c.] Who falſely accuſe, or traduce you, and perſecute you. Wat. Doddridge renders it, Who inſult you and perſecute you. The particulars mentioned in this verſe, are certainly the higheſt expreſſions of enmity: for what can be worſe

45 That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his ſun to riſe on the evil and on the good, and ſendeth rain on the juſt and on the unjuſt.

46 For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the ſame?

47 And if ye ſalute your brethren only, what do ye more that others? do not even the publicans ſo?

48 Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.

CHAP. VI.

Chriſt continueth his ſermon on the mount, ſpeaking of alms, prayer, forgiving our brethren, faſting, where our treaſure is to be laid up, of ſerving God and mammon: exhorteth not to be careful for worldly things; but to ſeek the kingdom of God.

TAKE heed that ye do not your alms before men, to be ſeen of them: other-than curſing and calumny, inſults and perſecutions? Yet we are commanded to love and bleſs, and do good to, and pray for our enemies, even while they perſiſt in their enmity againſt us. This may ſeem contrary to the precept, Luke xvii. 3. where forgiveneſs ſeems to be enjoined only, on condition the injurious party repents: If thy brother treſpaſs againſt thee, rebuke him, and if he repent, forgive him: But the difficulty will diſappear, when it is remembered, that in the two paſſages different perſons and different duties are ſpoken of. In this ſermon, the duty we owe to mankind in general, who injure us, is deſcribed; but in Luke we are told how we are to behave towards an offending brother; one with whom we are particularly connected, whether by the ties of blood or friendſhip. The forgiveneſs we owe to mankind, is in the ſermon ſaid to conſiſt in the inward affection of benevolence, civil language, and good offices, ſuch as we would have done to them had they never injured us, and hearty prayers; all which men may receive even while they may perſiſt in their enmity; whereas the forgiveneſs due to a brother, implies that he be reſtored to the place in our friendſhip and affection which he held before he offended. But in order to this, his repentance is juſtly required; becauſe, without a ſenſe of his offence, and due evidence of his reformation, he is both unworthy and incapable of being reſtored.' See Macknight, Whitby, and the note on chap. vi. 12.

Ver. xlvi. Luke vi. 32.—V. 48. Epheſ. v. 1.——V. 1. Or, righteouſneſs, Deut. xxiv. 13. Pſ. cxii. 9. Dan. iv. 27. 2 Cor. ix. 9, 10.

Ver. 45. That ye may be the children, &c.] Our bleſſed Saviour enforces the doctrine of loving our enemies, ſo far as to do them good, from the nobleſt of all conſiderations, that it renders men like God, who is good even to the evil and unthankful. "Being thus benevolent towards all, the bad as well as the good, you ſhall be like God, and ſo prove yourſelves his genuine offspring; for he maketh his ſun common to them who worſhip, and to them who contemn him; and ſuffers his rain to be uſeful both to the juſt and to the unjuſt; alluring the bad to repentance, and ſtirring up the good to thankfulneſs, by this univerſal and indiſcriminate benignity of his providence."—"If you would imitate the gods, ſays Seneca, do ſervices even to the ungrateful; for the ſun ſhines even upon the wicked."—"To conquer one's paſſion, to refrain from revenge; not merely to raiſe, but even to aſſiſt and dignify a fallen enemy, ſays Cicero, is not only to be like the greateſt men, but like to God himſelf." Hæc qui faciat, non ego eum ſummis viris comparo, ſed ſimilimum Deo judico. See his oration for Marcellus.

Ver. 46. The publicans] Theſe were the Roman tax-gatherers, ſome of whom were Jews: theſe were more extremely odious to their countrymen than thoſe who were heathens. The other Jews would have no communication with them; Luke iii. 13. Mark ii. 16. Luke vii. 35. They looked upon the profeſſion as ſcandalous; and the profeſſors were the more odious to them, on account of their great extortion. See chap. ix. 10. xviii. 7. L'Enfant, and Calmet.

Ver. 47. And if ye ſalute] The word ἀσπάσησθε, denotes all outward ſigns of friendſhip, ſuch as kiſſing, embracing, wiſhing well, &c. It is the word uſed by the apoſtles in their ſalutations, Rom. xvi. &c. The meaning of it ſeems to be the ſame with that of the word to bleſs, ver. 44. See chap. x. 10. and compare Luke x. 5. Inſtead of, Your brethren, ſome copies read, Your friends, which ſeems to have been added by way of explanation. The Jews embraced their own countrymen, and allowed them as brethren; but the Gentiles they thought unworthy of that honour. Jeſus Chriſt teaches here his diſciples to make their charity extend to all men. See Rom. xii. 17, 18. L'Enfant, and Wetſtein. Dr. Waterland, inſtead of publicans, reads heathens, after a different verſion.

Ver. 48. Be ye therefore perfect, &c.] Father Hardouin obſerves, that this might be rendered agreeably to the Greek, You ſhall therefore be perfect, ſo as to contain a promiſe, and not an exhortation. The perfection of the divine goodneſs is propoſed to our imitation, as it is promiſcuous, extending to the evil, as well as the good, and not as it is abſolutely univerſal and infinite; for in theſe reſpects the imitation of it is impoſſible. The preciſe meaning of the text, ſays Bp. Sherlock, is "Let your love be univerſal, unconfined by partialities; and with reſpect to its objects, as large as God's is. Not that our love either to enemies or friends can be ſuppoſed in other reſpects, and as to the effects of it, to bear any proportion to the divine love." See diſcourſe 13, vol. iii. The Love to friends, enjoined by the Scribes and Phariſees, was very imperfect: we are to labour after a more complete reſemblance to God, by loving enemies. The ſame precept is therefore expreſſed in Luke, chap. 36. by Be ye merciful, as your father alſo is merciful. Some think that our Lord here made uſe of the word τέλειοι, perfect, in oppoſition to the τελώνας, publicans, juſt before mentioned. The heathens gave the epithet of τέλειοι to many of their gods, eſpecially the chief: and ſome of their writers deſcribe clemency and goodneſs to enemies, as a virtue by which mortals make the neareſt approach to the divine perfection. See the paſſage from Cicero, in the former note, Wetſtein and Elſner.

As this ſermon is itſelf ſo practical throughout, and the obſervations upon it neceſſarily, in various places, become ſo, I do not intend to add any Reflections; but for the better underſtanding of it, as well as to remove ſome objections which have been urged againſt it, I will conclude the preſent chapter with the following obſervations from Dr. Heylin.

Although the beatitudes, ſays he, are paradoxes, which contradict vulgar opinion; yet, upon mature conſideration, it appears, that the ſituation of mind expreſſed in each of them, is reſpectively the proper diſpoſition for the bleſſings therein ſpecified: and therefore as to theſe, there is no difficulty but in the execution. But in the ſequel of this divine ſermon great difficulties have been found in ſeveral of its precepts, which ſound harſh and abſurd, and quite impracticable in the ordinary courſe of human affairs. Indeed one of the moſt ſenſible objections to the Chriſtian religion, is, that ſome of its doctrines are too ſublime to be general rules of life for all mankind; and farther, that if they ſhould be received, and could be put in practice, they would diſſolve the bonds of ſociety: there are alſo auſtere enthuſiaſts, who aggravate this objection, by inſiſting with rigour, and on the penalty of damnation, upon certain particular texts, which at leaſt are very improper and unſeaſonable, with regard to the perſons to whom they apply them.

To prevent or remove this difficulty, ſome commentators upon the ſcriptures have recourſe to reſtrictions and limitations, by which they beat down and explain away the true meaning of a text, that they may accomodate it to their own notions: "they ſcruple not to offer a little violence to the words, that they may pitch the ſenſe at ſuch a convenient height, as their principles will reach." What leads them to this unfairneſs, is an opinion, that all the inſtructions given in the goſpel equally and at all times, oblige all Chriſtian profeſſors,—without making the due allowance for their different capacities, their different ſtates or degrees of proficiency, and the different offices to which ſome are called and appointed by an eſpecial diſpenſation of Providence. Whereas it ought to be conſidered that the Scriptures contain a general ſyſtem of duty for all ſorts of men, in all ſorts of circumſtances; ſo that every individual may find there his ſpecific duty: but the whole is no more ſuited to the particular caſe of each individual, than all the preſcriptions of a diſpenſary to the caſe of every ſingle patient.

All the learning which ſome men require, terminates in their own improvement: whereas others are deſigned hereafter to profeſs ſcience in public, and be teachers themſelves. To theſe latter ſome peculiar qualifications are neceſſary, and additional rules are to be preſcribed for their particular conduct, and to direct their behaviour in their public capacity. Now the parts moſt objected to in this ſermon on the mount are of this kind: they were ſpoken to the apoſtles as apoſtles.

Jeſus had left the multitude that followed him below in the plain; and having aſcended the mountain he addreſſed this ſublime diſcourſe to his ſelect diſciples apart. Here (Ver. 12) he treats them as Succeſſors of the prophets. He calls them the ſalt of the earth, and the light of the world; high appellations, which could belong to them only in their apoſtolical character! To qualify them farther, he was to inſtruct them in the ſublimeſt virtues: and his precepts of this kind are, through all ages, the ſtanding doctrines of genuine Chriſtianity. But beſides theſe general advices, they were alſo to have a ſpecial direction for the diſcharge of their high office; which, as it was of a very extraordinary kind, and had extraordinary powers annexed to it, (for the apoſtles were under the conduct of a particular Providence, whereof they actually had the experience, in the miracles which they themſelves were enabled to perform,) to qualify them I ſay, for the diſcharge of their extraordinary commiſſion, they had peculiar and extraordinary directions for their behaviour as apoſtles, which it would be preſumptuous for an ordinary man to take to himſelf, and abſurd to exact from others.

As theſe eſpecial advices are interſperſed through this and the two following chapters, I thought it ſeaſonable here to give this plain account of them, as a general ſolution of the many objections that have been made to them.

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. Take heed that you do not your alms] Your righteouſneſs. Wat. Our tranſlators have put alms in the text; but doubting, upon good wiſe ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven.

2 Therefore, when thou doeſt thine alms, do not ſound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do, in the ſynagogues, and in the ſtreets, that they may have glory of men. Verily, I ſay unto you, they have their reward.

3 But when thou doeſt alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth:

4 That thine alms may be in ſecret: and thy Father which ſeeth in ſecret, himſelf ſhall reward thee openly.

5 And when thou prayeſt, thou ſhalt not be as the hypocrites are: for they love to pray ſtanding in the ſynagogues, and in the corners of the ſtreets, that they may be ſeen of men. Verily, I ſay unto you, They have their reward.

6 But thou, when thou prayeſt, enter into thy cloſet, and when thou haſt ſhut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in ſecret; and thy Father which ſeeth in ſecret, ſhall reward thee openly.

7 But when ye pray, uſe not vain repetitions, as the heathen do: for they think that they ſhall be heard for their much ſpeaking.

Ver. 1. Or, with.—V. 2. Rom. xii. 8. Or, cauſe not a trumpet to be ſounded.—V. 4. Luke xiv. 14.—V. 6. 2 Kings iv. 33.—V. 7. Ecclus. vii. 14. 1 Kings xviii. 26, 29.

grounds, whether that was the true reading, they have for alms put in the margin righteouſneſs, i. e. juſtice, as it ſtands in the Vulgate; a reading ſupported with great authority from manuſcripts, and commentaries of ancient fathers upon the place. However, if this were a mere verbal criticiſm, it would leſs deſerve to be inſiſted upon: But it ſeems much better, and more agreeable to the ſenſe of the Evangeliſt, that inſtead of alms we read juſtice; for the proper reward, not only of alms, but of every other virtue, will be forfeited, if a deſire of worldly applauſe be our motive to the practice of them; and therefore this firſt verſe ſeems to be a general caution againſt vain glory in our good works, as what makes void the merit of all virtuous actions, which are here ſummed up as uſual in the comprehenſive name of righteouſneſs or juſtice: This general caution our Lord applies in the ſequel to the three principal branches into which that juſtice is divided; namely, firſt, Juſtice to our neighbour, by acts of kindneſs and beneficence; for merely not to hurt him, when we can do him good, is not doing him juſtice: Secondly, juſtice to God by devotion; and thirdly, juſtice to ourſelves by mortification, ver. 16, &c. which three branches of juſtice our Lord here treats of ſeverally. With this view Beza, who was for reſtoring δικαιοσύνην, juſtice, into the Greek text, makes the ſame remark; as does alſo St. Auſtin, who found Juſtitia in his copy. This verſe therefore may be conſidered as a general introduction to what follows, and thus the appearance of tautology in the following verſe is prevented. The doctrine and precepts of the diſciples,—the righteouſneſs which they preached, was to excel the righteouſneſs of the Scribes and Phariſees in the manner ſet forth in the preceding chapter. Our Lord goes on to ſpeak of the righteouſneſs which the Jewiſh teachers practiſed; ſhewing that his diſciples, eſpecially ſuch of them as were inſtructors of others, ought to excel them in that reſpect alſo. The particulars which he mentions, though few, are of great importance; namely, alms-giving, prayer, faſting, heavenly-mindedneſs, candid-judging, and ſelf-reformation. The preſent chapter contains four parts; firſt, the right intention and manner in giving alms, ver. 1—4. ſecondly, the right intention, manner, form, and prerequiſites of prayer, ver. 5—15. thirdly, the right intention and manner of faſting, ver. 16—18. fourthly, the neceſſity of a pure intention in all things, unmixed either with a deſire of riches, or worldly care, and fear of want, ver. 19—34. This firſt verſe is a general caution againſt vain-glory in any of our good works. Our Saviour does not forbid us to do works of this kind publickly; for on ſome occaſions that cannot be avoided; but to do them publickly, with a view and deſign to be ſeen of men, and to be applauded for them. See Heylin, Wetſtein, Bengelius, and Olearius.

Ver. 2. When thou doeſt thine alms] When you do good offices. Heylin. The term ἐλεημοσύνη, which we render alms, has a much larger ſignification, and imports all acts of kindneſs by which we can benefit others. In all theſe our Lord warns us againſt oſtentation, and the deſire of applauſe; and not only that we ſhould not ſeek the praiſe of others upon ſuch occaſions, but alſo heedfully abſtain from all vain-glorious reflections upon the good we have done; which advice he couches in thoſe emphatical words, Let not your left hand know what your right hand doth: The phraſe of ſounding a trumpet before them, is generally thought to be only a figurative expreſſion, to repreſent their doing it in a noiſy oſtentatious way, as it is certain that "to do a thing with the ſound of the trumpet," is ſometimes uſed proverbially to expreſs a public oſtentation. However, it ſeems not improbable, that as the Jews were wont to aſſemble the people by the ſound of a trumpet, (Joel ii. 15.) perſons who affected the reputation of being extremely charitable, might ſound a trumpet when they diſtributed their alms, on pretence, no doubt, of gathering the poor to receive then, while their real intention was to proclaim their own good works, and to receive glory of men. See Beza, and Elſner.

Ver. 3. Let not thy left hand know, &c.] This is a kind of proverbial expreſſion, which may be explained to this effect: "Let no one, no, not even your moſt intimate acquaintance, know what you do; be ignorant of it yourſelves, if poſſible, or forget it immediately." It is ſaid that the poor's cheſt ſtood on the right hand as they entered the ſynagogues; to which circumſtance ſome ſuppoſe the words to allude.

Ver 5. And when thou prayeſt] Our Lord is here treating of private prayer; for which reaſon his rules muſt not be extended to public devotion. The Jews of old obſerved ſtated hours of prayer, as the Mahometans do at this day. The Scripture mentions three of them; firſt, the third hour, anſwering to our nine o'clock, when the morning ſacrifice was offered: ſecondly, the ſixth hour, anſwering to our twelve o'clock. At this hour we find Peter praying on the houſe-top, Acts x. 9. Thirdly, the ninth hour, anſwering to our three o'clock in the afternoon; at which the apoſtles, Peter and John, are ſaid to have gone up to the temple, Acts iii. 1. The three are mentioned together, Pſ. lv. 17. See alſo Daniel vi. 10, 13. At theſe hours, therefore, the hypocrites took care to be in ſome public meeting or other, (for ſo συναγωγαῖς may be underſtood) perhaps in the market-place, or in ſome court of juſtice, or in a corner where two ſtreets met, and where there was a concourſe of paſſengers to behold their devotions; which they performed before all preſent with a vanity extremely offenſive to the great Being whom they pretended to worſhip. This was the affectation here blamed in the Jews, and not their ſtanding up when they prayed, for that was their uſual poſture at the time of prayer, as appears from Mark xi. 25. Luke xviii. 11, 13. And even, in their ſtile, to ſtand up praying, meant no more than to pray; for they never kneeled, but in times of extraordinary humiliation. See L'Enfant, Grove's diſcourſe on ſecret prayer, p. 3, 4. and Addiſon's Freeholder, numb. 59.

Ver. 6. Enter into thy cloſet] That is, "Perform thy private devotions without noiſe or ſhew; by which it will appear, that thou art influenced by a true ſenſe of duty." The word ταμιεῖόν, cloſet, ſignifies any retired part of the houſe, any ſecret or ſeparate place; and Mr. Blair piouſly conjectures, that Chriſt might uſe a word of ſuch latitude, that none might omit ſecret prayer, for want of ſo convenient an apartment as they could wiſh to retire into. Duly to perform the great duty of private prayer, we muſt withdraw from the world not only our perſons, but our thoughts too; we muſt ſhut out all worldly cares and conſiderations, as if we and God were alone in nature. The fathers teach us, that our Lord here principally meant the heart, by the cloſet into which he bids us enter. "The heart ſaith St. Ambroſe, is a retiring place, always private, always at hand, and ready to receive you:" Indeed, a mind long practiced in piety, can eaſily recollect itſelf in every place, and maintain devotion in the midſt of a croud; but the novice in Chriſtianity ſhould here underſtand our Lord literally, and take all proper occaſions of being by himſelf in ſolitude. Thou when thou prayeſt enter into thy cloſet, and there enter into thyſelf by devout recollection; for the bodily retirement avails nothing, but inaſmuch as it ſerves to promote the mental; which is a diſpoſition eſſentially neceſſary to prayer, and ſometimes difficult to beginners, by reaſon of the contrary habit which their minds have contracted, by living ever abroad, and being diſſipated amongſt ſenſible objects: But a ſincere endeavour will ſoon help that frailty; if we faithfully bear in mind the fundamental truth in which our Lord here inſtructs us; namely, that the Almighty God is with us in our ſecret retirement. Pray to thy father who is in ſecret,—is there preſent with thee. God, we know, is in all places; but his ſpiritual nature lies beyond the reach of bodily ſenſes: He is hidden, if I may ſo ſpeak, in the centre of our ſouls. There is his ſecret dwelling place, where he will be found of thoſe who diligently ſeek him. When, therefore, you are retired from the world, and have ſhut the door of your cloſet, and of your heart too, as cloſe as poſſible by devout recollection, turn all your attention to God, preſent in you, and humble yourſelves before him with a full aſſurance of faith; of actual faith, I mean, that you are in his preſence; and believe me,—for this is a truth of the utmoſt conſequence,—that as the faith of the diſeaſed woman, who touched our Saviour's clothes, drew forth a miraculous power to heal her infirmity, ſo this faith, wherewith we approach God in prayer, will infallibly draw forth the divine co-operation to our endeavours. He is a living God, and his ſpirit will unite with ours to help our infirmities, and enable us to offer up ſuch prayers as will find acceptance at the throne of grace. Such is the preparation or diſpoſition with which we ſhould addreſs ourſelves to God in prayer. The following words inſtruct us in what is further requiſite for the right performance of it.

Ver. 7. But when ye pray, uſe not vain repetitions] Μὴ βαττολογήσητε, a word derived from one Battus, who was a great babbler,. (See Ovid's Metamorph.

8 Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye aſk him.

9 After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name.

Ver. 9. Luke xi. 2.

Metamorph. ii. ver. 688.) and ſignifying, "to uſe a vain multiplicity and repetition of words." See Mintert, Beza, and Hammond. The word is very applicable to the devotions of the heathens. See 1 Kings xviii. 26. Acts xix. 34. and the note on Callimachus's hymn to Diana, p. 54. The vain repetition which Chriſt here forbids his diſciples to uſe in their prayers, is plainly ſuch as proceeded from an opinion that they were to be heard for their much ſpeaking, after the manner of thoſe heathens: This opinion implying a denial either of the power, or the knowledge, or goodneſs of Him whom we worſhip, is highly injurious to Him; and therefore repetitions in prayer flowing from it, are culpable; but repetitions proceeding from a deep ſenſe of our wants, and which expreſs a vehement deſire of the divine grace, Jeſus by no means prohibits; for he himſelf made uſe of ſuch repetitions in his agony, when he prayed three ſeveral times with exceeding vehemence; yet, as St. Matthew remarks, uſing ſtill the ſame words: and indeed nothing is more beneficial, than to perſevere as long as poſſible in the ſame act of deſire, and to renew it again and again with freſh zeal and intenſeneſs. This is what our Lord both taught and practiced. But to repeat words without meaning them, is certainly a vain repetition; and therefore we muſt be extremely careful in our prayers to mean what we ſay, and to ſay only what we mean from the very bottom of our hearts. The vain and heedleſs repetitions, which we are here warned againſt, are a moſt dangerous, yet very common error, which has long been the reproach of Chriſtendom, and is the principal cauſe why ſo many, even of thoſe who ſtill profeſs religion, are a diſgrace to it: And how is it poſſible they ſhould be otherwiſe, while they want the only foundation of all true religion, an inward devotion? See Heylin.

Ver. 8. Be not ye therefore like them] This argument would be forcible againſt all prayer in general, if prayer was conſidered only as a means of making our wants known to God; whereas it is no more than an act of obedience to our heavenly Father, who hath commanded us to pray to him, chap. vii. 7. and made it the condition of his favours; an expreſſion of our truſt in him, and dependance on his goodneſs, whereby we acknowledge, that all the benefits we receive come from him, and that we muſt apply to him for the attainment of them. Theſe words, ſays Dr. Heylin, are highly inſtructive, and may ſerve to give us a ſolid and practical knowledge of the true nature of prayer. The proper end of prayer is not to inform God of our wants, nor to perſuade him to relieve them; Omniſcient as he is, he cannot be informed; merciful as he is, he need not be perſuaded: the only thing wanting, is a fit diſpoſition on our part to receive his grace; and the proper office of prayer, is to produce ſuch a diſpoſition in us, to render us proper ſubjects for ſanctifying grace to work in; or in other words, to remove the obſtacles which we ourſelves put to his goodneſs. Now the principal obſtacles are, worldly-mindedneſs and ſelf-love; whereby our deſires cleave to earthly goods and corrupt ſelfiſh intereſts: but in prayer we ſuſpend theſe deſires, our heart being turned to God only, and by whatever means we attain ſuch an holy poſture of mind, they are the proper means of true devotion. As long as our minds are attentive to God only, by whatever ſentiment that attention is maintained, ſo long we pray. When ſuch attention flags, we muſt renew it by paſſing on to ſome other conſideration proper to keep our heart attached to God, and open to receive his ſanctifying communications.

Ver. 9. After this manner, therefore, pray ye] Jeſus Chriſt gives his diſciples a form of prayer, as was uſually done by the Jewiſh maſters; John the Baptiſt had taught his diſciples to pray, Luke xi. 1. It is to be obſerved, that this prayer is almoſt wholly taken out of the Jewiſh liturgies, and from them ſo well adapted by our Lord, as to contain all things which can be requeſted of God, with an acknowledgement of his divine Majeſty, and of our dependance. The word ye here, is emphatical; thus pray YE, in oppoſition to the heathen, who uſed vain repetitions in their prayers. He who beſt knew what we ought to pray for, and how we ought to pray, what matter of deſire, what manner of addreſs would moſt pleaſe himſelf, would beſt become us, hath here dictated to us a moſt perfect and univerſal form of prayer, comprehending all our real wants, expreſſing all our lawful deſires; a complete directory, and full exerciſe of all our devotions. Yet it does not follow, that we are to uſe only the words of this prayer in our addreſs to God; for in the Acts and Epiſtles, we find the Apoſtles praying in terms different from this form. But the meaning of theſe words, thus, or after this manner pray ye, is, that we are to frame our prayers according to this model, both with reſpect to matter, manner, and ſtyle; ſhort, cloſe, full. This prayer conſiſts of three parts, the preface, the petition, and the concluſion. I. The preface,—Our Father who art in heaven, lays a general foundation for prayer; comprizing what we muſt firſt know of God, before we can pray in confidence of being heard. It likewiſe points out to us that faith, humility, and love of God and man, with which we are to approach God in prayer. 1. If they are called fathers, who beget children, and bring them up, the Almighty God hath the beſt right to that title from every every creature, and particularly from men, being the father of their ſpirits, (Heb. xii. 9.) the maker of their bodies, and the continual preſerver of both. Nor is this all; he is our father in a yet higher ſenſe, as he regenerates and reſtores his image upon our minds; ſo that partaking of his nature, we become his children, and can with holy boldneſs name him by the title of that relation. In the former ſenſe, God is the father of all his creatures, but in the latter, he is the father only of ſuch as are good. Of all the magnificent titles invented by philoſophers or poets in honour of their gods, there is none which conveys ſo grand and lovely an idea, as this ſimple name of father. Being uſed by mankind in general, it marks directly the eſſential character of the true God; namely, that he is the firſt cauſe of all things, or the Author of their being; and at the ſame time conveys a ſtrong idea of the tender love which he bears to his creatures, whom he nouriſhes with an affection, and protects with a watchfulneſs, infinitely ſuperior to that of any earthly parent whatſoever. But the name father, beſides teaching us that we owe our being to God, and pointing out his goodneſs and mercy in upholding us, expreſſes alſo his power to give us the things we aſk, none of which can be more difficult than creation. Further, we are taught to give the great God the title of father, that our ſenſe of the tender relation in which he ſtands to us may be confirmed; our faith in his power and goodneſs ſtrengthened, our hope of obtaining what we aſk in prayer cheriſhed, and our deſire of obeying and imitating him quickened; for natural reaſon teaches, that it is diſgraceful in children to degenerate from their parents, and that they cannot commit a greater crime, than to diſobey the juſt commands of an indulgent father. 2. Again, we are directed to call him our Father, in the plural number, and that even in ſecret prayer; to put us in mind, that we are all brethren, the children of one common parent, and that we ought to love one another with pure hearts fervently; praying not for ourſelves only, but for others: that God may give them likewiſe daily bread, the forgiveneſs of ſins, and deliverance from temptation. 3. The words who art in heaven, do not confine God's preſence to heaven, for he exiſts every where; but they contain a comprehenſive, though ſhort deſcription of the divine greatneſs. They expreſs God's majeſty, dominion, and power; and diſtinguiſh him from thoſe whom we call our fathers on earth, and from falſe gods, who are not in heaven, the region of bliſs and happineſs; where God, who is eſſentially preſent through all the univerſe, gives more eſpecial manifeſtations of his preſence to ſuch of his creatures as he has exalted to ſhare with him in his eternal felicity.

II. 1. Hallowed be thy name] This is commonly eſteemed the firſt of the petitions in the Lord's prayer. Wetſtein, however, and ſeveral others, are of opinion, that theſe words, as well as thoſe in the next verſe, are not to be conſidered as petitions ſo much as acts of adoration, and acknowledgements of the power and majeſty of God; and accordingly they begin the petitions at the 11th verſe. But I apprehend, ſays Dr. Heylin, (and with him the greater part agree) that this paſſage directly tends to our ſanctification, and that we are as much perſonally concerned in this, as in the following petitions; for, in order to our ſanctification, our notions and opinions muſt firſt be rectified, becauſe our notions are the ſource and rule of our actions: We are ſolicitous or indifferent about things, not according to their intrinſic merit, but according to the notions or opinions which we have conceived of them, as deſirable, or of no moment; ſo that a change of manners muſt ever begin in a change of opinions. Now, before converſion a man's notions of worldly goods are lively and animated, as of things highly deſirable; but his notion of God is a faint and inſipid idea, as of ſomewhat remote, and which he cares not to be concerned with. The thoughts of wealth, and glory, and pleaſure, move his heart ſtrongly; but the thought of God lies dormant in him, as a barren or diſagreeable ſpeculation. What we want, therefore, is a due and worthy notion of God; I mean, an high, and lively, and affecting ſenſe of him: ſuch as may have its proper aſcendant in our minds; ſuch as may rule in our hearts, and make us behave towards him in a manner ſuitable to his dignity: And this I take to be the drift of theſe words hallowed be thy name; for the name of God ſignifies, that idea or notion whereby we conceive him in our minds: (See Pſ. lxxvi. 1. Prov. xviii. 10.) and to hallow or ſanctify a thing, ſignifies to give it that diſtinction and preference which religion confirms: for, as things excelling upon a worldly account are honourable, ſo things excelling upon a religious account are called holy; and therefore, in theſe words hallowed be thy name, we pray, that the conception or thought of God ſhould be ſo exalted in us, that all our thoughts may fall down before it, and be brought in ſubjection to it; that the names of grandeur, and riches, and voluptuous joy, may ſink beneath the name of the Lord our God; may fade, and leſſen, and vaniſh in his preſence. This is hallowing the name of God, and treating it with the reverence it deſerves: This is the end of all religion, and therefore firſt propoſed in this divine prayer: The following petitions relate to the means of attaining it. Such is Dr. Heylin's interpretation. It may be proper however, for the ſatisfaction of the reader, to give that which is more generally received. Now the name of God is generally underſtood as a Hebraiſm for God himſelf, his attributes and works; and to ſanctify a thing, is to entertain the higheſt notion of it, as true and great and good; and by our words and actions to teſtify that belief: See 1 Pet. iii. 15. Iſai. viii 13. In this view, the meaning of the petition is, "May thy exiſtence be univerſally believed; thy perfections loved and imitated, thy works admired, thy providence reverenced and confided in. May we and all men ſo think of the divine majeſty, and of his attributes and works,

10 Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.

11 Give us this day our daily bread.

12 And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors.

13 And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen.

Ver. 11. See Job xxiii. 12. Prov. xxx. 8.—V. 13. 1 Chron. xxix. 11.

works, and may we and they ſo expreſs our veneration of God, that his glory may be manifeſted every where, to the utter deſtruction of the worſhip of idols and devils. See Eraſmus, Barrow, Macknight, &c.

Ver. 10. Thy kingdom come] The kingdom of God being univerſal and everlaſting, (Pſ. cxlv. 13.) theſe words cannot be underſtood of it; but of the kingdom of the Meſſiah, which is alſo called The kingdom of God, chap. iii. 2. There are in the coming of this kingdom ſeveral ſteps to be obſerved:—The reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, his aſcenſion, and the ſending down of the Holy Ghoſt were the beginnings of it. Acts ii. 32, 36 The preaching of the Goſpel to the Gentiles, extended it beyond the bounds of Judea, eſpecially when, after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the utter extirpation of the ceremonial law, the earthly kingdom of Judea, over which God preſided, entirely ceaſed, and the Goſpel came to be preached over the known world. This kingdom hath ever ſince enlarged its bounds, as the Goſpel hath been by degrees received in the world, and will continue to enlarge itſelf till God hath brought all our Bleſſed Saviour's enemies under his feet; 1 Cor. xv. 24, &c. What we deſire or pray for in this ſecond petition is, the advancement and progreſs of the Goſpel; obedience to the faith or doctrine of Chriſt, and his appearance in glory. See 2 Tim. iv. 8. Rom. viii. 19, &c. Rev. xxii. 17, 21. It may be paraphraſed thus, "May thy kingdom of grace come quickly, and ſwallow up all the kingdoms of the earth; may all mankind, receiving thee, O Chriſt, for their king, and truly believing in thy name, be filled with righteouſneſs and peace and joy; With holineſs and happineſs, till they are removed hence, into thy kingdom of glory, there to reign with thee for ever and ever."

Thy will be done on earth, &c.] 3. In this third petition we pray not that God may do his own will, as Dr. Whitby obſerves, nor that the will of his providence may be done upon us: neither do we pray that we may become equal to the angels in perfection, or that God may compel us to do his will; But, that in conſequence of the coming of his kingdom, or the eſtabliſhment of the Goſpel in the world, men may be enabled to imitate the angels, by giving ſuch a ſincere, univerſal, and conſtant obedience to the divine commands, as the imperfection of human nature will admit of. This is the moſt humble, as well as the moſt prudent wiſh, that it is poſſible for the creature to expreſs; becauſe it implies that the Supreme Being will do nothing but what is for the intereſt of his creatures, and that he knows better than they what is ſo. See the Spectator, N° 207. Dr. Heylin joins the two petitions of this verſe together; becauſe, ſays he, they have a mutual dependance, and may beſt ſerve to explain each other. The latter, wherein we pray that we may do the will of God on earth, as the angels do it in heaven, might ſeem a ſtrange, perhaps, or preſumptuous, certainly an impoſſible requeſt, had we not been firſt to ſay, Thy kingdom come. If the kingdom of God comes; i. e. if God vouchſafes to govern us, he will ſubdue all our enemies under our feet; A ſceptre of juſtice is the ſceptre of his kingdom. It will bring every thought into ſubjection; it will animate and govern our ſouls, as our ſouls do our bodies, and make us do his will on earth, as the angels do it in heaven.

Ver. 11. Give us this day our daily bread] Our bread convenient. Wat. 4. The word ἐπιούσιον, rendered daily, in our verſion, is no where elſe to be found; neither in the LXX, or in any Greek author, or in any other place of the New Teſtament, but in this part of the Lord's prayer. Commentators differ much in their interpretation of it. That in Etymol. Magna, ſeems as juſt as any. 'Επιούσιος,—'Ο ἐπι τη οὐσια ημῶν αρμοζῶν. "That which is ſufficient to our life;" and ſo Theophylact explains it. "What will ſtrengthen us from day to day, for ſerving God with chearfulneſs and vigor." Bread, according to the Hebrew idiom, ſignifies the whole proviſions of the table. See Gen. xviii. 5. and in the preſent petition, it ſignifies raiment alſo, with convenient habitation, and every thing neceſſary to life. See Agur's Petition, Prov. xxx. 8. Since then we are not allowed to aſk proviſion for rioting and luxury, but only for the neceſſaries of life, and that not for many years, but from day to day, The petition forbids anxious cares about futurity, and teaches us how moderate our deſires of worldly things ſhould be; and whereas not the poor only, (whoſe induſtry, all acknowledge, muſt be favoured by the concurrence of providence, to render it ſucceſsful) but the rich alſo are enjoined to pray for their bread day by day. This is on account of the great inſtability of human affairs, which renders the poſſeſſion of wealth abſolutely precarious; and becauſe, without the divine bleſſing, even the abundance of the rich is not of itſelf ſufficient to keep them alive, far leſs to make them happy. This petition contains a moſt excellent leſſon, ſays Doddridge, to teach us, on the one hand, moderation in our deſires; and on the other an humble dependance on divine providence for the moſt neceſſary ſupplies, be our poſſeſſions or our abilities ever ſo great. But this petition ſeems to include ſomething further; and accordingly Eraſmus, Heylin, and many others, underſtand it, after the Fathers, in a ſpiritual ſenſe alſo. Bread, ſays Heylin, here ſignifies all things needful for our maintenance; the maintenance of the whole man, both body and ſoul; for each of theſe have their proper ſuſtenance; to one belongs the natural bread, to the other the ſpiritual, and both are included in this petition: The natural bread means all things needful ſor the aſſiſtance of the body; the ſpiritual bread, the grace of Chriſt, which muſt alſo be our daily bread for the maintenance and growth of our ſouls in virtue. The petition therefore may be paraphraſed, "Give us, O Father; for we claim nothing of right, but only of thy free mercy; —This day; for we take no ſollicitous thought for the morrow,—Our daily bread; all things needful for our ſouls and bodies; not only the meat that periſheth, but the ſacramental bread, and thy grace; the food which endureth to everlaſting life."

Ver. 12. And forgive us our debts, &c.] 5. We may obſerve that this is the only petition in this prayer upon which our Lord enlarges, and indeed it is a petition of the greateſt conſequence, and the more to be attended to by us, as we ourſelves aſk that which is the greateſt of all things from God, even the pardon of our ſins, upon a condition voluntarily urged. It is hardly poſſible to imagine a more effectual expedient to promote the forgiveneſs of injuries, than this of making it a part of our daily prayer, to aſk ſuch pardon of God, as we give to our offending brother; for in this circumſtance every malicious purpoſe againſt him would turn the petition into an imprecation, by which we ſhould as it were bind down the wrath and vengeance of God upon ourſelves. (See on ver. 14, 15.) The earth and the fulneſs thereof being the Lord's, he has a right to govern the world, and to ſupport his government by puniſhing all who preſume to tranſgreſs his laws. The ſuffering of puniſhment therefore is a debt which ſinners owe to the divine juſtice. So that when we aſk God in prayer to forgive our debts, we beg that he would mercifully be pleaſed to remit the puniſhment of our ſins, particularly the pains of hell; and that, laying aſide his diſpleaſure, he would graciouſly receive us into favour, and bleſs us with eternal life. In this petition therefore we confeſs our ſins, and teſtify the ſenſe we have of our demerit, than which nothing can be more proper in our addreſs to God. The reaſon is, humility and a ſenſe of our own unworthineſs when we aſk favours of God, whether ſpiritual or temporal, tend to make the goodneſs of God in beſtowing them on us appear the greater; not to mention that theſe diſpoſitions are abſolutely neceſſary to make us capable of being pardoned. The condition on which we are to aſk the forgiveneſs of our ſins, is remarkable: Forgive us,—as we forgive: we muſt forgive others in order to our being forgiven ourſelves, and are allowed to crave from God, only ſuch forgiveneſs as we grant to others. So that, if we do not pardon our enemies, we in this fifth petition ſeriouſly and ſolemnly beg of God, to damn us eternally: for which reaſon, before men enter into the preſence of Almighty God to worſhip, they ought to be well aſſured that their hearts are thoroughly purged from all rancour and malice. We may juſt obſerve, that in this petition there is no expreſs mention made of repentance as neceſſary on the part of our enemies to entitle them to forgiveneſs; yet the nature of the petition itſelf, and the parable of the two debtors, c. xviii. v. 23. which may be conſidered as a commentary upon it, ſeem to intimate that repentance is neceſſary: for ſince we pray forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors, making acknowledgement of our ſins, and then aſking forgiveneſs; and ſince God forgives none but ſuch as repent, The meaning of the petition certainly is, "forgive us, who now confeſs our ſins, and reſolve to amend, even as we forgive thoſe who repent of the injuries they have done us." In the mean time, when we beg forgiveneſs of God, like that which we grant to men, we muſt beware of ſetting our forgiveneſs on an equality with God's: The moſt perfect forgiveneſs which men are capable of exerciſing towards men who repent, falls infinitely ſhort of the divine forgiveneſs neceſſary to repenting ſinners; as is plain from this, that in the beſt, the fleſh reſiſts the ſpirit. Beſides God himſelf has taken notice of the difference, Hoſea, c. xi. v. 8, 9, Becauſe I am God, and not man, &c. We only beg that the Divine forgiveneſs may reſemble ours in its reality: In this petition therefore we are taught the neceſſity of forgiving really and from the heart all who repent of the evil they have done us. In other paſſages however, the doctrine of forgiveneſs is carried ſtill higher. See the note on chap. v. 44. Macknight, and Olearius.

Ver. 13. And lead us not into temptation.] And do not bring us into temptation, but reſcue us from the evil one. Doddridge. This might be tranſlated, "And lead us not into temptation, but ſo as to deliver us from the evil; either by removing the temptation itſelf, when it proves too hard for us, or by mitigating its force, or by increaſing our ſtrength to reſiſt it, as God ſhall ſee moſt for his glory." The correction of the tranſlation here propoſed is built upon this argument, That to pray for an abſolute freedom from all ſollicitation or temptation to ſin, is to ſeek a deliverance from the common lot of humanity: Which is abſurd; becauſe trials and temptations are wiſely appointed by God for the exerciſe and improvement of virtue in good men, and that others may be encouraged by the conſtancy and patience which they ſhew in affliction. Hence, inſtead of praying to be abſolutely delivered from them, we are taught to rejoice, when, by divine appointment, we fall into temptations or trials. This 14 For, if ye forgive men their treſpaſſes, your heavenly Father will alſo forgive you:

15 But if ye forgive not men their treſpaſſes, neither will your Father forgive your treſpaſſes.

16 Moreover, when ye faſt, be not as the hypocrites, of a ſad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to faſt. Verily, I ſay unto you, They have their reward.

17 But thou, when thou faſteſt, anoint thine head, and waſh thy face;

18 That thou appear not unto men to faſt, but unto thy Father which is in ſecret; and thy Father which ſeeth in ſecret, ſhall reward thee openly.

petition teaches us to preſerve a ſenſe of our own inability, to repel and overcome the ſollicitations of the world, and of the neceſſity of aſſiſtance from above, both to regulate our paſſions, and to conquer the difficulties of a religious life. See Macknight. The petition, however, may be well underſtood agreeably to the common verſion of it;—Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us; for, as God is the only potentate, the ſole governor of the world, ſo that nothing can poſſibly fall out but by his allowance and permiſſion, it is uſual upon that account, in the ſtile of Scripture, to impute all things to him, as the firſt cauſe, and as ſuch the author of them. Thus he is ſaid to have ſent Joſeph into Egypt to preſerve his life,—though in fact his brethren, out of envy, had ſold him thither. See Gen. xlv. 58. Job i. 21. And it is in this ſenſe that God is ſaid to lead into temptation, or expoſe to temptation; becauſe all temptations come by his allowance; for the tempter and the tempted are his; all the powers of nature are his; and what we call chance or fortune, is nothing elſe but the inceſſant adminiſtration of his providence. The general intent, therefore, of theſe words, lead us not, &c. is, that with juſt diſtruſt of ourſelves, and an humble ſenſe of our weakneſs, we ſhould deprecate ſuch trials as may endanger our feeble virtue. But as ſome trials, that is, temptations, are neceſſary and inevitable, it is therefore added, but deliver us from evil. The Jews were wont to beg of God in their prayers, "That he would not deliver them into the hand of temptation;" whereby they did not deſire that he would keep them from falling into temptation, but that he would not give them up to it, or ſuffer them to yield thereto. And indeed to enter into temptation, ch. xxvi. 41. is to be overcome by it; as to lead, or cauſe to enter into temptation, is to ſuffer men to fall a prey to it: For, after all, God never ſuffers us to be tempted above what we are able. See James i. 13. compared with 1 Cor. x. 13. We may remark, in concluſion of theſe petitions, and as a proof of the perfection of this prayer, that the principal deſire of a Chriſtian's heart being the glory of God, ver. 9, 10. and all he wants for himſelf or his brethren being the daily bread of ſoul and body, or the ſupport of life, animal and ſpiritual; pardon of ſin, and deliverance from the power of it, and of the devil, ver. 11—13. there is nothing beſide for which a Chriſtian can wiſh; therefore this prayer comprehends all his deſires. Eternal life is the certain conſequence, or rather the completion of holineſs. See L'Enfant, Heylin, &c.

For thine is the kingdom, &c.] III. Theſe words contain the doxology or concluſion of the Lord's prayer; the genuineneſs whereof hath been very much diſputed. It is, however, certainly very ancient. The Jews uſed it in their liturgies; and they derived that uſe moſt probably from 1 Chron. xxix. 11. Bp. Hopkins, Mr. Blair, and other excellent writers have well obſerved, that it admirably ſuits and enforces every petition; And having therefore been ſo long received, and ſo generally uſed, it ſeems to be very properly retained in our Bible: Accordingly I proceed to explain it, referring ſuch as chuſe to enter into the diſpute concerning its genuineneſs, to Dr. Mill, and Wetſtein upon the place, Jones's hiſtory of the canon, vol. i p. 141. and the other critics. It may be paraphraſed thus: "Becauſe the government of the univerſe is thine for ever, and thou alone poſſeſſeſt the power of creating and upholding all things; and becauſe the glory of infinite perfections remains eternally with thee; therefore all men ought to hallow thy name, ſubmit themſelves to thy government, and perform thy will: In an humble ſenſe of their dependance, ſhould they ſeek from thee the ſupply of their wants, the pardon of their ſins, and the kind protection of thy providence." For ever and ever, is in the Greek εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας; words, which though they expreſs the idea of a proper eternity, yet often denote a finite duration, whether paſt or to come; but of a long continuance. See Gen. xlix. 26. Prov. xxii. 28. 2 Tim. i. 9. They are always to be underſtood, both in the Hebrew and the Greek, according to the nature and circumſtances of the things to which they are applied; and conſequently in this place, where kingdom, power, and glory are aſcribed to God for ever, they ſignify abſolute eternity, eternity without beginning or end. The word amen is of Hebrew original, and frequently retained by the Evangeliſts. St. Luke hath ſometimes rendered it by a word ſignifying yes, and at other times truly. See Luke ix. 27. When it is a ſign of wiſhing, it then ſignifies ſo be it, as the LXX have rendered it; and when added to the concluſion of our prayers, it is intended to expreſs the ſincerity and earneſtneſs with which we deſire the bleſſing we aſk, with ſome chearfulneſs of hope, as to the ſucceſs of our petitions. See the note on Deut. xxvii. 15. The Jews have a remarkable ſaying, "That whoſoever ſaith amen with all his might, the gates of paradiſe are opened to him. He is greater who anſwereth amen, than he who prayeth." It is obſervable, that though the doxology is threefold, as well as the petitions, and directed to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt diſtinctly, yet is the whole fully applicable to every perſon, and to the ever-bleſſed and undivided Trinity. See Macknight, Doddridge, and Heylin. For another expoſition which I have given of the Lord's Prayer, I refer my reader to the 4th volume, 75th and following pages, of the Chriſtian's Magazine.

Ver. 14, 15. For if ye forgive, &c.] From what our Lord here ſays, we are not to imagine that the forgiving of injuries alone will intitle us to pardon. Indeed all negative declarations concerning the terms of ſalvation being in their own nature abſolute, he who does not forgive, never ſhall be forgiven, as it is in the 15th verſe. But affirmative declarations alway imply this limitation, that no other condition of ſalvation be wanting. Behold then the neceſſity of forgiving all kinds of injuries, eſtabliſhed by Jeſus Chriſt himſelf! in oppoſition to the fooliſh opinions of the men of this world, who, aſſociating the idea of cowardice with the greateſt and moſt generous act of the human mind, the forgiveneſs of injuries, have laboured to render it ſhameful and vile, to the utter diſgrace of human reaſon, and common ſenſe. It is a ſtrong remark of Archbp. Wake, upon that petition of the Lord's Prayer, whereof theſe verſes are explicatory, that "If we do not forgive as we hope to be forgiven, we imprecate the wrath of God upon our own heads, when we uſe the Lord's Prayer, and do in reality pray after this deſperate manner,—Thou, O God, haſt commanded me to forgive my brother his treſpaſſes; thou haſt declared that unleſs I do ſo, thou wilt not forgive me my ſins. Well, let what will come, I am reſolved to ſtand to the hazard of it. I will not forgive, nor be reconciled to my brother; do then with me as thou ſhalt ſee fit." Can the man of unforgiving temper, ſee his ſin and his danger in a ſtronger point of view?

Ver. 16. Moreover, when ye faſt, &c.] Our Lord goes on to apply the general advice, before given, to private faſting as well as to private prayer. The word σκυθρωπος properly denotes a fretful and angry countenance, but here it ſignifies a "face disfigured with mortification and faſting." The LXX have uſed the ſame word, Gen. xl. 7. to expreſs a ſad countenance. See alſo Prov. xv. 13. This word, as well as Ὑποκρῖται, hypocrites, refers to the theatre, and to thoſe actors and diſſemblers there, who put on every countenance to ſerve their purpoſe. The word ἀφανίζουσι, rendered they disfigure, ſignifies, to cauſe to diſappear, or vaniſh; to deſtroy; and is the ſame word which has been rendered in the 19th and 20th verſes corrupt. Theſe hypocritical actors wonderfully affected the fame of extraordinary holineſs. Hence they aſſumed very auſtere countenances in their faſts; they put on the appearance and dreſs of mourners, and induced a kind of paleneſs, at leaſt as much as they could, over their countenance. In ſhort, they made their natural face to diſappear as much as poſſible; putting on an artificial one, as the players put on their maſks. See Fortuita Sacra. p. 14. Our Saviour refers here more particularly to the private and voluntary faſtings of the Phariſees: They faſted on Mondays and Thurſdays; but thoſe who would be thought more devout than the reſt, faſted beſides on Tueſdays and Fridays, and abſtained from all kind of food till ſun-ſetting. There can be no doubt that our Saviour ſpeaks here of private faſting only; becauſe when public ſins and calamities are to be mourned for, it ought to be performed in the moſt public manner. Doddridge renders this, When you keep a faſt, be not like the hypocrites, putting on a diſmal air; for they deform their countenances, that, &c.

Ver. 17, 18. Anoint your head] i. e. "Affect nothing which is uncommon; continue in your uſual method of life; and rather than put on a ſad countenance, which may ſhew that you faſt, waſh, on the contrary, your face, and anoint your head." Except in times of deep mourning, or public faſting, when they uſed duſt and aſhes, which muſt have ſadly deformed the countenance, the Jews were wont to waſh and rub themſelves with oil, which was commonly perfumed, eſpecially on feſtivals. See Ruth iii. 3. 2 Sam. xiv. 2. Luke vii. 73. Such were our Lord's directions to his diſciples with reſpect to faſting; from which it appears that he approved of the duty, and indeed the uſefulneſs of it is ſufficiently evident; for by abſtinence from food, the body is mortified and ſubjected to the ſpirit, and the ſpirit itſelf is better fitted for the exerciſes of repentance: Nevertheleſs, in religious faſting, regard muſt be had to men's conſtitutions; for it may happen to ſome that a total abſtinence from food would, inſtead of fitting them for the exerciſes of piety, render them wholly incapable thereof; in which caſe it ceaſes to be a duty. See Macknight, Fortuita Sacra, p. 18. and Explication de Textes difficiles, &c.

Ver. 19—21. Lay not up, &c.] By taking a general review of what we have been hitherto taught in this divine ſermon, we ſhall be led more diſtinctly to the meaning of the words now before us.

upon earth, where moth and ruſt doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and ſteal:

20 But lay up for yourſelves treaſures in heaven, where neither moth nor ruſt doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor ſteal:

21 For where your treaſure is, there will your heart be alſo.

22 The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be ſingle, thy whole body ſhall be full of light.

23 But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body ſhall be full of darkneſs. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkneſs, how great is that darkneſs!

24 No man can ſerve two maſters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or elſe he will hold to the one, and deſpiſe the other. Ye cannot ſerve God and mammon.

25 Therefore I ſay unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye ſhall eat, or what ye ſhall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye ſhall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?

Ver. 20. Ecclus. xxix. 11. Luke xii. 33. 1 Tim. vi. 19. 1 Pet. i. 4.—V. 22. Luke xi. 34.—V. 24. Luke xvi. 13. Gal. i. 10. 1 Tim. vi. 17. Jam. iv. 4. 1 John ii. 15.—V. 25. Pſ. lv. 22. Luke xii. 22. Phil. iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 7.

After the beatitudes, and a particular application of the laſt of them to the Apoſtles, our Saviour goes on to treat of juſtice, that is, duty in general: And firſt he ſhews the extent of it; I mean what degrees of it are neceſſary, and how far its obligations reach. He begins with a general propoſition, ch. v. 20. and this he illuſtrates and exemplifies in many inſtances, which fill up the remainder of that chapter. After thus ſhewing the extent of juſtice, he comes in the next place to rectify the motive to it; as in the firſt verſe of this chapter. Take heed that you do not your juſtice, i. e. acts of juſtice to be ſeen of men, &c. And here again he gives particular inſtances in the three principal acts of that juſtice, namely, beneficence to mankind, devotion to God, and mortification which concerns ourſelves; with a ſtrict caution not to let the merit of them evaporate in vain glory. And as vanity is not the only wrong motive, and as the deeds of juſtice laſt mentioned are not our only occupation, but beſides theſe we have each of us his ſecular employment, or worldly buſineſs to diſcharge; our Lord therefore goes on to regulate our whole courſe of action, by ſetting the heart right, and in a proper diſpoſition for the performance of it. Lay not up for yourſelves, &c. I ſhould rather read, Make not for yourſelves, &c. which the original imports, and the ſenſe requires; becauſe, whatever we place our happineſs in, that we make our treaſure; the treaſure of the covetous is literal treaſure; and that of the reſt of the world conſiſts of thoſe things which they deſire and count upon as a fund for enjoyment; for as where our treaſure is, there will our heart be alſo; ſo where our heart is, there alſo is our treaſure. As almoſt every animal has had its idolaters, ſo almoſt every kind of object has become a treaſure to ſome or other of the ſons of men. But as true religion is but one, ſo there is but one real treaſure; one only that is worthy our option, and will anſwer our expectation; and that which we make for our ourſelves in heaven, when by the aſſiduous practice of virtue, we ſecure our everlaſting intereſts there, as our Lord adviſes. In order the more fully to underſtand the words, where moth and ruſt doth corrupt, &c. we ſhould remember, that in the eaſtern countries, where the faſhion of cloaths did not alter as with us, the treaſures of the rich conſiſted not only of gold and ſilver, but of coſtly habits, and fine-wrought veſſels of braſs, and tin, and copper, liable to be deſtroyed in the manner here mentioned. See Ezek. vi. 69. Job xxvii. 16. James v. 2, 3 Doddridge renders and paraphraſes the 19th verſe, (underſtanding it ſingly as a caution againſt covetouſneſs) "Do not make it your great care to lay up for yourſelves treaſures here on earth, where ſo many accidents may deprive you of them; where the moth, for inſtance, may ſpoil your fineſt garments, and the devouring canker may conſume your corn, or may corrupt the very metals you have hoarded; and where thieves may dig through the ſtrongeſt walls which you have raiſed about them; and may ſteal them away; but, &c." Nothing certainly can be conceived more powerful to damp that keenneſs with which men purſue the things of this life, than the conſideration of their emptineſs, fragility, and uncertainty; or to kindle in them an ambition of obtaining the treaſures in heaven, than the conſideration of their being ſubſtantial, ſatisfying, durable, and ſubject to no accident whatſoever. See Heylin, Macknight, and Calmet.

Ver. 22, 23. The light of the body is the eye—ſingle—evil] The eye is the lamp of the body:—clear or pure;—bad, or vitiated. Heylin, and Wat. Mr. Locke has obſerved, that the modes of thinking, as he ſpeaks, i. e. the ſeveral operations of the human mind, are in all languages expreſſed by figurative terms, which belong to ſenſible ideas in their primary ſignification. Now, if all languages uſed the ſame figures, this would bring no additional obſcurity to our tranſlations; but it is well known that the oriental tongues have, upon theſe ſubjects, quite a different ſet of metaphors from thoſe in uſe among the Greeks and Romans, and conſequently among us, who ſo generally follow their phraſeology, many difficulties in Scripture are to be imputed to this cauſe; and to ſolve thoſe difficulties we muſt have recourſe to the context, and collect the meaning of this unuſual dialect from the occaſion upon which it is ſpoken. It was upon this account that we made the general review of the tenor of our Lord's diſcourſe in the preceding note, and particularly of the context, which diſtinctly leads us to the meaning of the difficult paſſage now before us. The eye is the lamp of the body: Body here ſignifies, as it ſometimes does in our own language, the perſon. the man himſelf; and eye, in the Hebrew idiom, ſignifies, as we obſerved on ch. v. 29. the intention, which caſts a light upon whatever it aims at; like a microſcope, it magnifies its object, it illuſtrates it, and renders the minuteſt part of it conſpicuous: for having made it its treaſure, it treats it as ſuch, and counts upon it as a fund for happineſs; and although the object be void of real worth, yet the intention imputes to it all the advantages which a credulous deſire and active fancy can ſuggeſt. Thus the intention is the force of the mind turned one way; and therefore our Lord compares it to a lamp, which when directed to one particular object, greatly enlightens that, and makes other things viſible only in proportion to their nearneſs. In like manner, whatever is the direct object of the intention, receives from it a luſtre, which ſhews it to the greateſt advantage, and ſhews other things in a good or bad light, as they ſeem favourable or prejudicial to the execution of our deſign. Now when this intention is right, our Lord calls it the ſingle or ſimple eye, ἁπλοῦς, and with good reaſon; for as only one ſtrait line can paſs between two given points, and as the truth upon every ſtated queſtion is but one, while error and miſtake are almoſt infinitely various; ſo there is not, there cannot be, but one ſuch right intention. What that is, our Lord had juſt before declared, when he directed us to make for ourſelves treaſures in heaven; and that we might be induced to collect and unite all our deſires in that one thing neceſſary. He here calls the intention to do ſo the ſingle eye; on the contrary, every other Intention an evil eye; for every other deliberate purpoſe, which doth not coincide with, or become ſubordinate to the right intention, though we could ſuppoſe it innocent in itſelf, yet will prove an obſtacle to that right intention, becauſe the right intention cannot ſucceed but by a perfect renunciation of all other projects and deſigns; and therefore our Lord immediately ſubjoins, no man can ſerve two maſters. See Heylin, and Calmet. Several commentators have explained this as if our Lord intended here to urge the practice of liberality, as what would have a great influence on the whole of a man's character and conduct; and they ſuppoſe it illuſtrated by all thoſe paſſages, where an evil eye ſignifies a grudging temper, and a good eye a bountiful diſpoſition; and alſo by thoſe texts in which ſimplicity is put for liberality. See Hammond, Whitby, L'Enfant, &c. But there wants nothing more than an attentive peruſal of what has been advanced in this and the foregoing note to ſhew that the ſenſe above given is the moſt natural, as unqueſtionably it is the moſt extenſive. See Doddridge, Olearius, and Mr. Laws's Serious Call, ch. 2.

Ver. 24. No man can ſerve, &c.—mammon] Mammon is a Syriac word for riches, which our Lord beautifully repreſents as a perſon whom the folly of men had deified. It is well known that the Greeks had a fictitious god of wealth; but I cannot find, ſays Doddridge, that he was ever worſhipped in Syria under the name of mammon. According to ſome, mammon, derived from אמן amen, ſignifies whatever one is apt to confide in: And becauſe men put their truſt generally in external advantages, ſuch as riches, authority, honour, power, &c. the word mammon is uſed to denote every thing of that kind, and particularly riches, by way of eminence. The word hate, in this verſe, ſignifies not to mind, to have a leſs value for; and to love, is to have a greater regard for; as appears from the remaining part of the verſe, and from ch. x. 37. compared with Luke xii. 16. See Bp. Newton's notes on Par. Loſt. b. i. ver. 678.

Ver. 25. Therefore I ſay unto you, Take no thought, &c.] Be not ſolicitous, [and ſo wherever it occurs]—Is not the life more than food, Wat. The Greek μεριμνᾶτε imports ſuch anxiety, as cauſes an inteſtine ſtrife, by contrary reaſonings with oppoſite hopes and fears. This is ſo ſtrictly the ſenſe of the original, that a word of the ſame derivation is uſed by our Lord, where he ſays, a kingdom divided againſt itſelf, μερισθεῖσα—cannot ſtand. ch. xii. 25. So that this precept only forbids that perplexity and diſtraction of thought, which is inconſiſtent with the ſingle right intention, and interrupts our reſignation to the divine will. St. Luke, in the parallel place, has made uſe of the word μετεωρίζω, ch. xii. 29. which ſignifies to have a wavering and doubtful mind, diſquieted and toſſed about with miſtruſt and fear. See Mintert on the word. In this view there is no need to ſay with Archbp. Tillotſon, Dr. Clarke, and ſome others, that our Lord only addreſſes this to his Apoſtles, who were to caſt themſelves on an 28 And why take ye thought for raiment? Conſider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they ſpin;

29 And yet I ſay unto you, That even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of theſe.

30 Wherefore, if God ſo clothe the graſs of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is caſt into the oven, ſhall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?

Ver. 26. Job xxxviii. 41. Pſ. cxlvii. 9. Luke xii. 24.

extraordinary Providence, without any ways concerning themſelves for their ſupport. Mr. Blair has well proved the contrary at large, in his appendix to his 4th ſermon, vol. i. p. 55, &c. and it is eaſy to obſerve, that the arguments urged by our Lord contain nothing peculiar to their caſe; but are built on conſiderations applicable to all Chriſtians. Compare Philip. iv. 6. and 1 Pet. v. 7. as alſo Luke xxii. 35, 36. and Acts xx. 34. from whence it appears, that the Apoſtles themſelves were not intirely to neglect a prudent care for their own ſubſiſtence, in dependance on miraculous proviſions. Our Saviour, attentive to his main argument, proceeds in theſe verſes to ſhew, that all the reaſons by which worldly-mindedneſs is uſually juſtified or palliated are intirely overthrown, by conſidering the power, perfection, and extent of the PROVIDENCE of God. This grand ſubject he handles in a manner ſuitable to its dignity, by propoſing a few ſimple and obvious inſtances, wherein the proviſion which God has made for the leaſt and weakeſt of his creatures ſhines forth illuſtriouſly, and forces on the mind the ſtrongeſt conviction of that wiſe fatherly care which the Deity takes of all the works of his hands. From what they were at that inſtant beholding, the birds of the air, the lilies, the graſs of the field, he led even the moſt illiterate of his hearers to form a more elevated and extenſive notion of the divine government than the philoſophers attained to: who, though they allowed in the general that the world was ruled by God, had but confuſed conceptions of his Providence, which many of them denied to reſpect every individual creature and action. Our Divine Prophet taught, that the great Father Almighty has every ſingle Being in his hand and keeping; that there is nothing expoſed to fortune, but that all things are abſolutely ſubjected to his will. This notion of Providence affords a ſolid foundation for ſupporting that rational truſt in God, which is the higheſt and beſt act of the human mind, and furniſheth us at all times with the ſtrongeſt motives to virtue.

Far be it from me, ſays Dr. Heylin, to widen the narrow ways preſcribed in the Goſpel! but to make them narrower than the literal ſenſe imports, will render them quite unpaſſable; for men engaged in buſineſs and the tumult of the world (as the beſt Chriſtians ſometimes are) not to have their minds intangled in ſecular intereſts, not to be anxious and diſquieted about future events, wherein either their reputation, or their fortune, or perhaps both are at ſtake, this is an high degree of virtue, which can be maintained only by an habitual devotion: but to ſay abſolutely take no thought, is a miſrepreſentation of our Lord's doctrine: All his intention here was, to teach the virtues in the moſt radical manner, by extirpating the remoteſt tendency to the contray vices. As under the 6th commandment, which prohibits murder, he forbids an angry word, or malicious thought; ſo here, to preſerve us from worldly-mindedneſs, he forbids all painfully-ſolicitous care even for the neceſſaries of life; and he enforces his prohibition with ſuch cogent arguments, as muſt convince all who piouſly attend to them. Is not the life more than food, and the body than cloathing? "He who hath given us the greater, will he deny us the leſs? He who gave us our being, will he refuſe what is neceſſary for the ſupport of it?—It is as abſurd as ungrateful to diſtruſt a benefactor, whoſe goodneſs we have already ſo largely experienced, and who takes upon himſelf the care to provide for us. Conſider the birds of the air; they ſow not, &c.—are ye not of greater value than they? Are ye not the children of God?—And when ye ſee him make ſo plentiful a proviſion for his inferior creatures, can you ſuſpect that he will leave you, his children, deſtitute of neceſſary ſubſiſtence? See more on ver. 34. and the note on Pſ. xciv. 19.

Ver. 27. Which of you, by taking thought, &c.] Who of you, by his ſolicitude, can prolong his life one hour? A verſion ſtrictly literal would be, can add any length to his age; for ἡλικία ſignifies both age and ſtature, and is to be rendered by either, as the occaſion requires. Our tranſlators have rendered it by age, John ix. 21, 23. and Heb. xi. 11. Πῆχυς indeed commonly means a cubit; but it is not unfrequent to transfer the meaſures of ſpace to expreſs thoſe of time, as Pſ. xxxix. 5. Thou haſt made my days as it were a ſpan long. Dr. Hammond upon the place ſhews that cubit has been uſed in the ſame manner. Thus far we have ſeen what ſenſes the terms are capable of; what their proper ſenſe is here we muſt gather from the context. At ver. 25. our Lord diſſuades from anxiety about food and cloathing; food for the life, (ψυχὴ in the original, i. e. ſoul, or animal life) and cloathing for the body. He then treats of theſe ſeparately. The words under conſideration conclude what he ſaid concerning the maintenance of life, to which ſtature is not applicable, but age. What he adds concerning the body begins at the next verſe. Beſides, he was ſpeaking to adult perſons, who probably had no ſolicitude about their ſtature, and certainly had no imagination that ſuch ſolicitude could make them grow a foot and a half taller; but a care for the maintenance of life is the common care of all men, and apt to run into exceſs, where it is not moderated by religion. See Luke xii. 25. and Heylin.

Ver. 28, 29. They toil not, neither do they ſpin] The expreſſion οὐ κοπιᾷ—they toil not, denotes rural labour, and therefore is beautifully uſed in a diſcourſe of cloathing, the materials of which are produced by agriculture. As the eaſtern princes were often cloathed in white robes (and they were generally accounted a magnificent apparel, Compare Eſth. viii. 15. Dan. vii. 9.); Calmet properly refers this dreſs of Solomon to the whiteneſs of the lilies; and following him, Doddridge paraphraſes the paſſage very well thus: "Even the magnificent Solomon, in all his royal glory, when ſitting on his throne of ivory and gold (1 Kings x. 18.) was not arrayed in garments of ſo pure a white, and of ſuch curious workmanſhip, as one of theſe lilies preſents to your view." Mr. Ray thinks that χρίνα ſignifies tulips of various colours, or a purple kind of lily. See his "Wiſdom of God in creation," p. 107. In which view the paſſage might be paraphraſed, "Solomon himſelf, in all his magnificence, was but poorly arrayed in compariſon of the flowers of the field, whoſe beautiful forms, lively colours, and fragrant ſmell far exceed the moſt perfect productions of art."

Ver. 30. If God ſo clothe—oven, &c.] The word ἀμφιέννυσιν, which we render clothe, Dr. Doddridge well obſerves, expreſſes properly the putting on a complete dreſs, which ſurrounds the body on all ſides; and is uſed with peculiar beauty for that elegant yet ſtrong external membrane, which, like the ſkin in the human body, at once adorns the tender ſtructure of the vegetable, and likewiſe guards it from the injuries of the weather: Every microſcope with which a flower is viewed, affords a lively comment on this text. Dr. Doddridge and others render the word κλίβανον by ſtill, inſtead of oven; but the Author of the Obſervations ſtrongly oppoſes this interpretation, and informs us, that myrtle, roſemary, and other plants, with withered ſtalks of herbs and flowers, are made uſe of in Barbary and other parts of the Eaſt, to heat their ovens as well as bagnios; which, ſays he, gives us a clear comment on the preſent paſſage. The graſs of the field here apparently is to be underſtood to include the lilies of which our Lord had been ſpeaking, conſequently herbs in general. Critics have remarked this large ſenſe of the word χόρτος, nor can it with any ſhew of reaſon be pretended, that our Lord is ſpeaking of the morrow in the rigid ſenſe of the word, but of a little time after. "Behold then, ſays our Lord, theſe lilies and fine flowers of the field!—yet beautiful and magnificent as they appear one day, they are in a manner the next thrown into the oven: their dried ſtalks are, with the dried ſtalks of other plants, employed in heating the ovens of the villages around us; and will not God much more clothe you, who are my diſciples?" His ſentiment here plainly is, that if God covers with ſo much glory things of no further value than to ſerve the meaneſt uſes, will he not then take care of his ſervants, who are ſo precious in his eyes, and deſigned for ſuch important ſervices in the world?—Conſequently he cannot be ſuppoſed as ſpeaking of precious flowers, diſtilled either for medicinal purpoſes, or to make rich perfumes, but of thoſe of which men make no higher uſe than they do of cow-dung and ſtubble. See Obſervations, p. 142. and the note on 1 Sam. ii. 8. and Lam. iv. 5. Our Saviour adds, O ye of little faith! which is the firſt place where faith occurs in the New Teſtament. This was a term in the Jewiſh as well as the Chriſtian theology; The root is Aman, nutrivit; from which comes Amen, veritas; and Emunah, fides, faith; as it were "the reception of truth, for the nurture of the ſoul." So we ſay in Engliſh, nurture, for good inſtruction. Nor is this a fanciful application, but moſt conſonant to the whole tenor of Scripture ſtile in both Teſtaments, where the practical truths of religion are continually expreſſed by the various ſpecies of nouriſhment, as well meat as drink, in all the different forms they are uſed for bodily ſuſtenance. Maimonides, in his explanation of the word Achal, comedit, ſhews, "that it is moſt frequently applied to expreſs the reception of wiſdom and doctrine, and univerſally all information of the mind, whereby it [the mind] is maintained for growth to the perfection of its nature, as the body is maintained by the food proper for its nouriſhment. Thus Iſaiah lv. 1, &c. inviting men to attend to his doctrine, ſays, Come ye, buy and eat, &c" And after quoting two paſſages from the Proverbs, where the ſame word is uſed, he ſays, "Wherever eating and drinking are ſpoken of in that book,

32 (For after all theſe things do the Gentiles ſeek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all theſe things.

33 But ſeek ye firſt the kingdom of God, and his righteouſneſs, and all theſe things ſhall be added unto you.

34 Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow ſhall take thought for the things of itſelf. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

CHAP. VII.

Chriſt ending his ſermon on the mount, reproveth raſh judgement, forbiddeth to caſt holy things to dogs, exhorteth to prayer, to enter in at the ſtrait gate, to beware of falſe prophets, not to be hearers only, but doers of the word: like houſes built on a rock, and not on the ſand.

JUDGE not, that ye be not judged.

2 For with what judgement ye judge, ye ſhall be judged: and with what meaſure ye mete, it ſhall be meaſured to you again.

Ver. 33. See 1 Kings iii. 13. Pſ. xxxvii. 25. Luke xii. 31.——V. 1. Luke vi. 37. Rom. ii. 1. 1 Cor. iv. 3, 5. James iv. 11, 12. V. 2. Mark iv. 24. Luke vi. 38.

book, wiſdom, or the law of God is always to be underſtood as the mental food." And hence it may be inferred that the Hebrew term for faith (according to the derivation before-mentioned) may denote the proper diſpoſition on man's part for receiving and digeſting the great truths of religion. Buxtorff, in his Talmud, i. e. Lexicon, explains emunah, faith, by religion; and indeed faith commonly means the ſame as piety, or godlineſs. Thus the Jews underſtood the word in our Saviour's time; and in this ſenſe, doubtleſs, he uſed it, as particularly when he reproached them with neglecting faith, which he names a weightier matter of their own law, ch. xxiii. 23. and the phraſe he uſed, O ye of little faith, was then common among the Jews, as is notorious from many paſſages in the Talmud. To conclude, The term mammon, i. e. riches, has, as we have obſerved on ver. 24. the ſame derivation with the original word for faith, and for the ſame reaſon; namely, becauſe men are ſo apt to confide in riches, as a true and ſtable fund on which to build their happineſs. When the Divine Being holds that place in our minds, which worldly wealth has in the minds of covetous men, then indeed we have faith in him; for by faith I underſtand ſuch a real and efficacious knowledge of God as is proper to our preſent ſtate of probation. Dr. Heylin, p. 132. who, in ſome following diſſertations, finely and fully illuſtrates this definition.

Ver. 32. (For after all theſe things do the Gentiles ſeek)] It was the general character of the heathens, that they neither prayed to their Gods, nor laboured themſelves for any other bleſſings than the temporal ones here mentioned; as all their prayers and hymns to their deities abundantly prove, and as we learn in particular from the 10th ſatire of Juvenal: And this becauſe they were in a great meaſure ignorant of God's providence and goodneſs, had erred fundamentally in their notions of religion, and had no certain hope of a future ſtate. See Epheſ. ii. 2. We may obſerve that there is a noble antitheſis in this verſe. Chriſt ſets God's knowledge of our wants in oppoſition to the anxiety of the heathens about having them ſupplied, to intimate that the one is much more effectual for that purpoſe than the other. See 1 Kings xviii. 27. Macknight and Wetſtein.

Ver. 33. But ſeek ye firſt the kingdom of God, &c.] That is, true religion; the advantages of the kingdom of God: Rom. xiv. 17. the treaſures mentioned ver. 20. Comp. 1 Kings iii. 11, 12. And his righteouſneſs, i. e. particularly, the performance of God's commandments, as they have been illuſtrated and explained by Jeſus Chriſt, and not as they were underſtood by the Phariſees. See ch. v. 6, 20, 48. Dr. Sykes here, by righteouſneſs, underſtands the Meſſiah; the righteous branch, who was to rule in righteouſneſs, and in whoſe days the righteous were to flouriſh. See Sykes on Chriſtianity, p. 35. But it ſeems more natural to interpret it of that way of becoming righteous which the goſpel propoſes, and which St. Paul, by a phraſe exactly equivalent to this, calls the righteouſneſs of God. Compare Rom. x. 3. and Philip iii. 9. Dr. Clarke, in his ſermons, paraphraſes the paſſage thus: "Be not ſo ſolicitous for the things of this preſent life, as to neglect your more important intereſt in that which is to come; but let your principal care be to ſecure this." The meaning of the word προστεθήσεται is, ſhall be added over and above; than which expreſſion nothing could have been more proper; for theſe temporal bleſſings are by no means eſſential to the ſtipulations of the covenant of grace, but are intirely to be referred to the divine good pleaſure, to add or with-hold, as God ſhall ſee fit. The goods of this world ought not to be looked upon by Chriſtians as true and eſſential advantages. They ſhould make a good uſe of them, if God thinks proper to bleſs them therewith, 1 Tim. iv. 8. but if not, their duty is to be ſatisfied with their own portion, whatever it is, being poſſeſſed of ſpiritual goods, and hoping for thoſe that are eternal. Heb. xi. 10, 13, 16, 17.

Ver. 34. Take therefore no thought, &c.] "Since the extent and efficacy of Divine Providence is ſo great, and ſince you are the objects of its peculiar care, you need not vex yourſelves about futurity;" for the morrow denotes future time in general. The morrow continues our Lord, ſhall take thought for the things of itſelf; or rather, according to the Hebrew ideom, ſhall make you take thought for the things of itſelf; namely, in a proper time, it being ſufficient that you provide the neceſſaries of life for yourſelves as they are wanted: "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof; Every time has abundant neceſſary troubles of its own; ſo that it is fooliſh to increaſe them by anticipating thoſe which are to come, eſpecially as by that anticipation it is not in your power to prevent any future evils." Such is our Saviour's doctrine with reſpect to Providence; and upon this ſubject it may be proper to remark, that though God can produce by an immediate act whatever he accompliſhes by the intervention of ſecond cauſes: for inſtance, can make heat without the ſun, can communicate fruitfulneſs to the earth without heat, can furniſh food to men without the fruitfulneſs of the earth, nay can ſuſtain life without food; yet he does all things by a ſeries or concatenation of cauſes, in each of which there is as much wiſdom and power diſplayed, as would have appeared had the end been effected by an immediate act. This plan is the moſt gracious that poſſibly could be; for the manifeſtation of the divine perfections are greatly multiplied thereby, and a Providence formed in ſuch a manner, as to be not only the ſubject of human contemplation, but the foundation of our truſt in God, and the grand incitement by which we are engaged to ſeek his favour, who thus, by a variety of means, makes himſelf known as the chief good in every part of the univerſe. Covetouſneſs, therefore, and worldly-mindedneſs, with all the other vices which derive their ſtrength, whether from an abſolute diſbelief of the perfections of God, or from wrong notions of them, are by this conſtitution of things as effectually deſtroyed, as the nature of moral government will admit.

A fear of wanting neceſſaries is the moſt ſpecious pretence for covetouſneſs; and it is in order to repreſs the remoteſt tendencies to that baſe diſpoſition, that our Lord is thus copious and emphatical in aſſuring us of the ſuperintending care of Providence. But let no perverſe ſpirit miſtake his declarations here as a diſpenſation from induſtry: He never meant to abrogate that ſentence paſſed upon our whole race, in the ſweat of thy face thou ſhalt eat bread. Daily labour is a principal part of the penance impoſed on mankind, and is included in the daily croſs which he has commanded us to take up. It only by taking up that croſs, and punctually diſcharging our duty in that ſtate of life to which God hath called us, that we have a claim to his fatherly protection: But then we ought to depend upon it; for a truſt in God, and a diligence in our calling, are connected like faith and obedience, which are ſo far from interfering, that they are in their own nature inſeparable. Duty is very extenſive, conſiſting of many parts, which muſt be performed at once; yet cannot be ſpoken at once, but muſt be detailed in ſeparate precepts. Virtue conſiſts not merely in action, but alſo in the motive which animates it. Our courſe of action is taught elſewhere; and our worldly calling, which is to us the order of Providence, preſcribes the daily work we have to do. The doctrine now under conſideration relates to the proper motive of our actions, directing our view towards the great end to which they all ought to be ultimately referred. Our actions are upon earth; but the right motive is in heaven, where only faith can penetrate; and therefore our Lord, expoſtulating with his diſciples upon their want of ſenſibility to that motive, ſubjoins, at ver. 30. O ye of little faith. See Macknight and Heylin.

Chap. VII. Ver. 1, 2. Judge not, &c.] Our Saviour having condemned worldly-mindedneſs in the general, proceeds to forbid all raſh and unfavourable judgements, whether of the characters of others in general, or of their actions in particular. See Luke vi. 37. Though he does not level his diſcourſe againſt the Phariſees in this chapter, as in the two foregoing, he ſeems evidently to glance upon them in this and other expreſſions which he uſes in it. That they were very culpable on this head, appears from Luke xviii. 9, 14. xvi. 14, 15. and John vii. 47, 49. comp. Iſai. lxv. 5. Indeed their unjuſt cenſures of Chriſt are the ſtrongeſt inſtances of it that can be conceived. God propoſes and recommends his mercy to our imitation: He commands us in this, in mercy, to be perfect as himſelf; but judgement is His reſerved prerogative, and they ſhall feel the weight of it who raſhly invade its office. To judge is an act of ſovereignty; it is an exerciſe of ſuch authority as is indeed very conſiderable, if we were really poſſeſſed of it. Pride, among its other uſurpations, arrogates to itſelf this province; it raiſes us above our brethren in an imaginary tribunal, from whence we affect to diſtribute praiſe or blame in the ſentence we paſs on them, and which is commonly to their diſadvantage, becauſe the firſt-born of pride is malice: He who loves himſelf more than he ought, muſt love others leſs than he ought; and the ſame principle which makes us overvalue ourſelves, makes us undervalue our neighbours; for, as our no-

3 And why beholdeſt thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but conſidereſt not the beam that is in thine own eye?

4 Or how wilt thou ſay to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and behold, a beam is in thine own eye?

5 Thou hypocrite! firſt caſt out the beam out of thine own eye; and then ſhalt thou ſee clearly to caſt out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

6 Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither caſt ye your pearls before ſwine, leſt they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

7 Aſk, and it ſhall be given you; ſeek, and ye ſhall find; knock, and it ſhall be opened unto you:

8 For every one that aſketh receiveth; and he that ſeeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it ſhall be opened.

9 Or what man is there of you, whom if his ſon aſk bread, will he give him a ſtone?

10 Or if he aſk a fiſh, will he give him a ſerpent?

11 If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more ſhall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that aſk him?

12 Therefore, all things whatſoever ye would that men ſhould do to you, do ye even ſo to them: for this is the law and the prophets.

tions of excellence are by compariſon, we cannot aſcribe it ſo immoderately to ourſelves, but upon a ſuppoſed defect of it in others. Their abaſement ſeems to ſet us higher, and we erect trophies to ourſelves upon their ruins; and this is the reaſon why we err ſo much oftener to the prejudice, than to the advantage of our neighbour. Mere ignorance has an equal chance either way: What is thrown in the dark, and at random, might as probably hit above as below the mark; the reaſon why we are ſo often under it, is the malice of our hearts, which makes us delight to find faults in others, as excuſes for our own faults, or foils to our virtues. The expreſſion With what meaſure ye mete, &c. is proverbial, and was much in uſe among the Jews. The words are certainly moſt aweful. Thus may we chuſe, as it were, for ourſelves, whether God ſhall be ſevere or merciful to us. God and man will favour the candid and benevolent: but they muſt expect judgement without mercy, who ſhew no mercy. See Heylin, Chemnitz, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 3. And why beholdeſt thou] Τί βλέπεις,—"Why doſt thou obſerve, or take notice of? For βλέπεις here ſignifies not only to be acquainted with other people's faults, but to pry into them, with a deſign to cenſure and reprove them. Eye here, as in ch. v. 29. and vi. 22. ſignifies the intention, which is the uſual ſubject of raſh cenſures; becauſe actions are ſelf-evident, and not ſo liable to miſconſtruction, as the intention wherewith they are performed. This latter is not apparent, and therefore leaves room for that raſh judgement which our Lord had juſt before prohibited. The word which we render mote, ſignifies a ſplinter or ſhiver of wood; in Latin feſtuca, whence the Engliſh feſcue. This, and the beam as its oppoſite, were proverbially uſed by the Jews, to denote ſmall infirmities and groſs faults; each of which proportionably obſtruct the moral diſcernment. See Stockius on the word δοκὸς, Heylin, and Horace, ſat. iii. lib. i. ver. 26.

Ver. 4. Let me pull out the mote, &c.] Hold ſtill, and I will take the mote out of thine eye. This ſeems to be the exact meaning of Ἄφες ἐκβάλω, which tranſlated thus literally, elegantly intimates how ready men are to ſhrink from reproof. The ſimile here uſed implies, that it is as abſurd for a bad man to ſet up for a reprover of others, as it would be for one who is almoſt blind himſelf, to pretend to perform operations on other men's eyes. How wilt thou ſay, means, "How wilt thou have the confidence to ſay."—See Doddridge and L'Enfant.

Ver. 5. Thou hypocrite!] As by the eye we judge of things relating to the body, ſo by the underſtanding we judge of things pertaining to the ſoul. You may therefore lay this down as fixed and certain, that the more exalted your own virtue is, the better will you be able to judge of your brother's faults; and the better qualified, both in point of ſkill and authority, to reclaim him. Your judgement of his character and actions will be ſo much the more charitable, and for that reaſon ſo much the more juſt. Your rebuke will be ſo much the more mild, prudent, and winning, and your authority to preſs a reformation upon him ſo much the more weighty. It is hypocriſy to pretend a zeal for others, if we have not firſt had it for ourſelves. True zeal is uniform, and even begins within to remove the beam from our own eye; which is its proper and peculiar work, and a neceſſary qualification for reforming others. Yet, even when it is ſo qualified, it muſt ſtill proceed with a prudent caution, as our Lord inſtructs us in the next verſe.

Ver. 6. Give not that which is holy, &c.]—Leſt thoſe trample—and theſe turn again and tear you. Wat. Our Lord having ſet forth the ſeveral branches of the righteouſneſs which the reformers of mankind ought to practiſe and teach, obſerves further, that to render their labour ſucceſsful, there muſt be a willingneſs in mankind to receive inſtruction. If that is wanting, it is needleſs to attempt reclaiming them; therefore, ſays our Lord, give not, &c. "Do not reprove perſons of a ſnarling, profligate, and ſenſual diſpoſition; becauſe the effect which vice hath upon ſuch is generally bad; they will be provoked by it to do you a miſchief, or at leaſt will deſpiſe both you and your admonition. Perſons of this kind will not be inſtructed, far leſs will they receive a direct rebuke. You may warn others againſt them, you may weep over them, and you may pray for them; but you cannot reprove them with ſucceſs and ſafety; for which reaſon they are by all means to be avoided." There is a ſimilar maxim to this in the Talmudical writings; "Do not caſt pearls before ſwine;" to which is added, by way of explanation, "Do not offer wiſdom to one who knows not the price of it." This was one reaſon why our Saviour taught in parables. Comp. Acts xiii. 45, 46. and the parallel places.

Ver. 7. Aſk, &c.] There is often a latent connection in the diſcourſes of our Lord, which obviates difficulties, and anſwers doubts, that may ariſe from what has been ſaid; As here, when he had taught how they who take upon them to inſtruct others ought to be qualified, had cautioned them who were ſo qualified not to proſtitute the precious truths of religion, to ſuch as were not in a condition to profit by them,—A doubt might juſtly ariſe in their minds, how they ſhould be able to diſcern who were proper, or not proper ſubjects of admonition; And to anſwer this, he ſubjoins what immediately follows, Aſk, and it ſhall be given you. When the caſe is dubious, and the monitor himſelf ſo far purified, as to have no beam in his own eye, there will be no danger of enthuſiaſm, if, after lifting up his heart to the Father of lights, he in ſimplicity does what he finds himſelf inclined to. See Heylin. But, though this be the immediate connection of the words, they may be underſtood in a more general ſenſe, as referring to all mankind; teaching us, that God always grants our requeſts, provided we aſk aright, and pray for what is agreeable to his will. See 1 John v. 14. and comp. John ix. 31. See Calmet.

Ver. 9. Or, what man, &c.] Is there any man among you. Blackwall and Wat. And indeed what one man is there among you: Doddridge: Who obſerves upon this verſe, "Young preachers, I hope, will remark, how much life and force it adds to theſe diſcourſes of our Lord, that they are directed ſo cloſely, through the whole of them, as an immediate addreſs to his hearers, and are not looſe and general harangues, in the manner of thoſe eſſays, which have of late grown ſo faſhionable in pulpits. If any are become too polite to learn true oratory from Chriſt, I wiſh they would at leaſt learn it from Demoſthenes, who, I doubt not, would have admired the elegance of this ſermon."

Ver. 11. If ye then, being evil] If ye then, wicked as ye are. Wat. The words Τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν, which of you, in the 9th verſe, are well explained by this. "If, ſays our Lord, you, imperfect and evil as you are, and ſome of you, perhaps, tenacious, froward, and unkind, readily give good gifts to your children when they cry for them; how much rather will the Great God, who is perfect in goodneſs, and unbounded in loving-kindneſs, beſtow bleſſings on his children, who endeavour to reſemble him in his perfections, and for that end aſk the aſſiſtance of his Holy Spirit?"—for by good things are meant the true goods, Luke xi. 13. the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt; whatever in general is proper and neceſſary for them, and will prove to them a real good.

Ver. 12. Therefore, all things, &c.] This verſe, ſays an anonymous annotator, ill agrees with the context; and if compared with Luke vi. 30, 31. ſhould be placed after ch. v. ver. 42. Other commentators, however, are of opinion, that the Οὖν, Therefore, is by no means a mere expletive in this paſſage, and that there is a force in the connection beyond what has been generally obſerved. Becauſe our Saviour was referring them, ſays Macknight, to what paſſed within themſelves, he took occaſion to engraft upon thoſe feelings one of the nobleſt, plaineſt pieces of morality,—which Doddridge thus connects with the preceding verſes: "Being animated therefore by his goodneſs, ſtudy to expreſs your gratitude for it, by your integrity and kindneſs to your fellow-creatures; and take it as a 13 Enter ye in at the ſtrait gate; for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to deſtruction, and many there be which go in thereat:

15 Beware of falſe prophets, which come to you in ſheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves.

16 Ye ſhall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thiſtles?

17 Even ſo, every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth ſorth evil fruit.

18 A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.

moſt ſacred rule, All things, &c. Treat men in every inſtance juſt as you would think it reaſonable to be treated by them, if you were in their circumſtances, and they in yours; for this is in effect the ſummary and abſtract of all the humane and ſocial virtues recommended in the moral precepts of the law and the prophets, and it was one of the greateſt ends of both to bring men to this humane and equitable temper. I ſay one of the greateſt, that this may be reconciled with our Lord's declaring the love of God to be the firſt and great commandment. ch. xxii. 38. And it is indeed a moſt abſurd and fatal error to imagine, that the regulation of ſocial life is the only end of religion." We may juſt obſerve, that this precept, which contains the rule of natural equity, juſtice, and even of charity, was familiar to the Jews, and one of their maxims. See Tobit iv. 15. And a ſimilar precept has been delivered by ſeveral heathen writers; many quotations from whom the reader will find by referring to Grotius and Wetſtein on the place. Thus far proceeds the doctrinal part of the ſermon; the exhortation to practiſe it begins at the next verſe. See Bengelius. The reader will find, in the excellent diſcourſes of Bp. Atterbury and Dr. Evans, the ſenſe, reaſonableneſs, and uſe of this golden law illuſtrated in a manner which deſerves the moſt attentive peruſal.

Ver. 13, 14. Enter ye in at the ſtrait gate] That is, ſtrive to enter. See Luke xiii. 24. The ſtrait gate, ſays Dr. Heylin, is the law juſt before mentioned; namely, that we ſhould do as we would be done by. A manuſcript before me reads, ver. 13. for the wide gate, and the broad way, is that which leadeth, &c. but the ſtrait gate, and the narrow way, is that which, &c. By theſe figurative expreſſions our bleſſed Saviour gives us to underſtand how eaſy it is to enter into deſtruction, and how hard to procure our own ſalvation. Intimating at the ſame time, that the generality of mankind tread in the wide paths of error, and follow their paſſions, while very few know how to find out truth, and to adhere thereto, in oppoſition to all the obſtacles and diſcouragements they meet with in their way. Compare Prov. xiv. 12, 13. vii. 27. Eccles. xxi. 11. The reflections of Eraſmus upon the ſtrait gate are lively. "How ſtrait, ſays he, is the gate, how narrow the way, that leadeth to life! In the way nothing is to be found that flatters the fleſh, but many things oppoſite; poverty, faſting, watching, injuries, chaſtity, ſobriety. And as for the gate, it receives none that are ſwollen with the glory of this life; none that are elated and lengthened out with pride; none that are diſtended with luxury. It does not admit thoſe who are laden with the fardels of riches, nor thoſe that drag along with them the other implements of the world. None can paſs through it but naked men, who are ſtripped of all worldly luſts, and who, having put off their bodies, are as it were emaciated into ſpirits; which is the reaſon that it is ſought after by ſo very few.' In order to reconcile what is here advanced with thoſe paſſages which aſſert Chriſt's yoke to be eaſy, and the ways of wiſdom to be ways of pleaſantneſs, &c. ſome think it neceſſary to ſuppoſe, that this text refers intirely to the caſe of perſecution; and that the ſtrait gate is a violent death, which lay at the end of the narrow way, and concluded the injuries and calamities which perſecutors would bring upon Chriſtians. See Hallet's diſcourſes, vol. iii. p. 24, &c. But nothing is more certain than that Chriſt requires from all his diſciples, in all ages and places, a life of mortification and ſelf-denial; which, though it is mingled with and introductory to pleaſures abundantly ſufficient to counterbalance it, yet to corrupt nature is difficult. See Doddridge; and Whitby, Grotius and Wetſtein, for many parallel paſſages from heathen writers.

Ver. 15. Beware of falſe prophets] The connection here is remarkable, ſays Dr. Heylin. One characteriſtic of falſe prophets, that is, falſe preachers, is, that they widen the narrow way. It is their propheſying, their teaching the broad way, rather than their walking in it themſelves, which is here chiefly ſpoken of. All thoſe are falſe prophets who preach any other way than that which our Lord hath here marked out. A wolf in ſheep's cloathing is grown into a proverb, for a wicked man, who makes a great profeſſion of religion, yet cannot diſſemble ſo well as not to be diſcovered by attentive obſervation; which was juſt the character of the Phariſees in our Saviour's days. See ch. xxiii. 23—28. Luke xi. 39—42.

Ver. 16—20. Ye ſhall know them by their fruits] That is, by the evil tendency of their doctrines, as well as by the immorality of their lives. See John iv. 1. 1 Cor. xiii. 3. What follows ſeems to be a kind of proverb, and there occur in profane authors many ſimilar ſayings. Several commentators are of opinion, that the fruits here referred to, are rather the nature and tendency of the doctrine, than the actions of the falſe teachers lives; But Dr. Doddridge obſerves, and I think very juſtly, that the characters of men are not to be diſcerned by the doctrines they teach, and therefore this cannot be the meaning of knowing them who were their teachers by their fruits. It is more reaſonable to explain it of their actions, which are often called fruits. Comp. ch. iii. 8. xxi. 43. John xv. 2, 5. Col. i. 6. and ſee 2 Tim. iii. 5—9. It will be objected, that bad men may teach good doctrines, and the worſt have been known to do it in ſome inſtances. But to this I anſwer, that our Lord does not exhort his diſciples to reject whatever ſuch men taught; but only to be upon their guard againſt them, that they might not credit any thing merely on their authority.

Ver. 21. Not every one that ſaith, &c.] That is, "Among thoſe who acknowledge me for the Meſſiah, none but ſuch as do the will of God ſhall be admitted into his kingdom: Not a bare profeſſion of religion, but a conſcientious performance of the duties of it, will procure us the eternal approbation of our God." Here the kindom of heaven muſt ſignify that of glory above; for calling Chriſt Lord, is the very circumſtance which conſtitutes us the ſubjects of his earthly kingdom, or members of his viſible church. Comp. ch. viii. 11. Luke xiii, 28. 1 Cor. xv. 15. and Olearius on the text.

Ver. 22. In that day] That is, the day of judgment; ſo called by way of eminence. Inſtead of devils. Dr. Heylin reads dæmons; for as an evil ſpirit is called by two different names in the original, namely, διαβόλος, where it is ſpoken of as the tempter or accuſer of mankind, and δαιμων where bodily poſſeſſions are ſpoken of, it would be proper to render the firſt by devil, and the ſecond by dæmon. There certainly is a material difference, though we can give no ſatisfactory account of it. Have we not phopheſied, in this place means preached; and indeed they are often ſynonimous terms in the New Teſtament. Bad men, on ſome occaſions, have, in the wiſdom of Providence, been commiſſioned by God to ſignify his pleaſure, and have been furniſhed with powers to prove their commiſſion; witneſs Judas Iſcariot, who was admitted into the college of Apoſtles by our Lord himſelf. Propheſying and preaching, ejecting of devils, and other miracles are mentioned, to ſhew that no gift, endowment, or accompliſhment whatſoever, without faith and holineſs, will avail to our acceptance with God. A caution very proper at all times, but more eſpecially in thoſe days, when the gifts of the Spirit were to be beſtowed in ſuch plenty on them who made profeſſion of Chriſtianity. See Macknight and Calmet.

Ver. 23. I will profeſs unto them] The author of an imperfect homily, inſtead of Ὁμολογήσω, reads Ομωσω, I will ſwear; which ſenſe well ſuits this place. See Maldonat. To know, frequently ſignifies in Scripture to acknowledge or approve. The meaning is, "Though I called you to be my ſervants, and you profeſſed yourſelves ſuch, I never knew you to be ſuch, nor approved of you. I knew indeed that ye were the ſlaves of other maſters,—mammon, your own belly, never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity.

24 Therefore, whoſoever heareth theſe ſayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wiſe man, which built his houſe upon a rock:

25 And the rain deſcended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that houſe; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock.

26 And every one that heareth theſe ſayings of mine, and doeth them not, ſhall be likened unto a fooliſh man, which built his houſe upon the ſand:

27 And the rain deſcended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that houſe; and it fell, and great was the fall of it.

28 And it came to paſs, when Jeſus had ended theſe ſayings, the people were aſtoniſhed at his doctrine:

29 For he taught them as one having authority, and not as the ſcribes.

CHAP. VIII.

Chriſt cleanſeth the leper, healeth the centurion's ſervant, Peter's mother-in-law, and many other diſeaſed; ſheweth how he is to be followed: ſtilleth the tempeſt on the ſea, driveth the devils out of two men poſſeſſed, and ſuffereth them to go into the ſwine.

WHEN he was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him.

2 And behold, there came a leper and worſhipped him, ſaying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canſt make me clean.

3 And Jeſus put forth his hand and touched him, ſaying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leproſy was cleanſed.

4 And Jeſus ſaith unto him, See thou tell no man; but Go thy way, ſhew thyſelf to and ambition; therefore, as your lives have been contrary both to my precepts, and your own profeſſion, I will have nothing to do with you." There is an incomparable dignity in this whole paſſage. The poor deſpiſed Jeſus not only calls God his Father, but ſpeaks as the eternal judge, before whom men ſhould plead and beg for their lives, dreading baniſhment from him as their final deſtruction. See Doddridge and Chemnitz.

Ver. 24—27. Therefore, &c.] The meaning of theſe verſes is, that whoever grounds his ſalvation upon a mere outward profeſſion of the Goſpel, without performing the commandments of God, will ſee all his ill-grounded hopes vaniſh, and come to nothing, when he appears before the judgement ſeat of that God, who will judge all men according to their works.

Ver. 28. Aſtoniſhed at his doctrine] Or, his manner of teaching: See Mark i. 27. for he taught them, (ver. 29.) as one having authority. This authority plainly appeared in theſe words, but I ſay unto you, &c. and in ver. 22, 23. have we not propheſied in thy name, &c. from which it is evident that Jeſus Chriſt was not a teacher only of God's will, but a law-giver, and a perſon ſent immediately from God; and inveſted with a much greater authority than any of the prophets that went before him:—And not as the Scribes: The Vulgate and Syriac verſions add, and the Phariſees,—whoſe lectures, for the moſt part, were abſolutely trifling, being drawn ftom tradition, or from the comments of other doctors, which theſe ignorant and corrupt teachers ſubſtituted in the place of Scripture, reaſon, and truth. If we may judge of the teaching of the Scribes in Chriſt's days, by the Jewiſh Talmuds, or even by their Miſchna, nothing could be more generally contemptible; and their frigid and inſipid comments and leſſons could no more be compared with thoſe ſtrains of divine eloquence with which our Lord's diſcourſes abounded, than a glow-worm can be compared to the ſun. Beza has obſerved that Ἦν διδάσκων, He taught them, or rather, He was teaching them, refers to the continued courſe and general character of his teaching; of which this divine ſermon is a noble ſpecimen. Moſt of the things contained in it were delivered by our Lord oftener than once; for they were of ſuch importance, as to admit of a frequent repetition. Therefore, ſays Macknight, in agreement with Doddridge, (ſee on ch. v. 1) the ſermon which St. Luke has related, although the ſame with this in the matter of it, may very well have been different in point of time. The commentators, indeed, are generally of another opinion; ſwayed, I ſuppoſe, by the ſimilarity of the diſcourſes, and of the incidents attending them. Further, although throughout the Goſpels we meet with almoſt all the precepts contained in this ſermon, we are not from hence to infer, That there was no ſuch diſcourſe ever pronounced by Chriſt, but that it is a collection made by St. Matthew, of the doctrines and precepts which he taught in the courſe of his miniſtry,—as ſome learned men have affirmed. The reflection wherewith the Evangeliſt concludes his account of this ſermon, ſeems evidently to prove that the whole was delivered at once. It came to paſs when Jeſus had finiſhed theſe ſayings, &c. i. e. had ended this diſcourſe to the people, &c. See Chemnitz and Hammond. Thoſe who chuſe to dwell more largely upon this diſcourſe will be amply ſatisfied by reading the excellent ſermons of Bp. Blackall, and Mr. Blair, upon it.

Chap. VIII. Ver. 2. And behold, there came a leper] It has been generally thought, that this is the leper whoſe cure is recorded Mark i. 40. Luke v. 12. and conſequently that the ſermon in Luke is not the ſame with that in the preceding chapter. "But the cures, ſays Macknight, are different: That was performed in a city, this in the fields. Having cleanſed the leper here mentioned, Jeſus entered into Capernaum, and cured the centurion's ſervant; whereas the other leper, having publiſhed the miracle, Jeſus could not, at leaſt in the day-time, go into the town; but was obliged to remain without, in deſart places, to ſhun the crowd." It muſt be acknowledged, indeed, that there are ſome things ſimilar in the two cures: For inſtance, both the lepers ſay to Chriſt, If thou wilt, thou canſt make me clean; but it was ſo natural to addreſs their deſires to the Son of God in this form, by which alſo they expreſs their belief in his power, that it is rather matter of wonder we do not find it more frequently made uſe of. Further, there is the ſame command given to the lepers to go ſhew themſelves to the prieſt; but this command muſt have been repeated not twice, but twenty times, on ſuppoſition that Jeſus cleanſed lepers ſo often. Accordingly we find him repeating it to the ten lepers whom he cleanſed at one time in Samaria, Luke xvii. 14. As for the circumſtance of his bidding the cured perſon tell no man what has happened, it occurs almoſt in every miracle performed by Chriſt during the two firſt years of his miniſtry; the reaſons for which ſee in the note on ver. 4. Inſtead of fell down and worſhipped him, The above-quoted manuſcript reads, fell down as a ſupplicant.

The immediate cure of the leproſy was only in the power of God: The leper, therefore, by this application to Chriſt, immediately confeſſes his divine authority; but more fully to enter into this ſubject, the reader ſhould refer to our notes on Levit. xiii. and on 2 Kings v. 7.

Ver. 3. And Jeſus put forth his hand, &c.] Doddridge ſuppoſes that our Saviour took this leper aſide from the multitude,—without which he thinks there could have been no room for the charge of ſecrecy which Jeſus gave. This circumſtance certainly happened in another cure. See Mark viii. 23. Chriſt had taught with authority, chap. vi. 29. which he immediately confirms by wonderful actions. Comp. v. 27. The prieſt, after a long trial, pronounced whether a man was cured of his leproſy or not; but Chriſt healed him with a word. St. Matthew could not have related the matter in more proper terms. This is that ſublimity which Longinus ſo much admires in Moſes. See his treatiſe on the ſublime, ſect. 9.

Ver. 4. See thou tell no man] Jeſus commanded the leper without all delay to haſte to Jeruſalem, leſt, if the report of his cure ſhould arrive before him, the prieſts, though envy, might refuſe to pronounce him cleanſed; for it was the province of the prieſts to judge of and to determine concerning the leproſy. For a teſtimony unto them, means to the Jews, and particularly to the prieſts and Phariſees, who withſtood the doctrine of Chriſt. The ſenſe of the paſſage is, "that the ſacrifice offered by the leper may be a proof of the reality of this miracle, and conſequently of my divine miſſion." Theſe words may alſo be rendered, that it may be a teſtimony againſt them. Comp. Mark vi. 11. Luke ix. 5. The plain meaning ſeems to be, "Go without delay, and ſhew yourſelf, cleanſed as you are, to the prieſt, and preſent the ſacrifices which the law requires for your purification, that we may convince them of the reality of the cure, and yet not give them any occaſion of calumny." But though our Saviour here might enjoin ſecrecy on the leper only till he had ſhewn himſelf to the prieſt; yet he commanded many others to tell none of the miracles he had wrought upon them. Perhaps our Saviour did not intend that he ſhould be univerſally received as the Meſſiah during his own life-time. He was indeed to fulfil all the prophetical characters of the Meſſiah, that when the time appointed for erecting his kingdom came, the the prieſt, and offer the gift that Moſes commanded, for a teſtimony unto them.

5 And when Jeſus was entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion, beſeeching him,

6 And ſaying, Lord, my ſervant lieth at home ſick of the palſy, grievouſly tormented.

7 And Jeſus ſaith unto him, I will come and heal him.

8 The centurion anſwered and ſaid, Lord, I am not worthy that thou ſhouldeſt come under my roof: but ſpeak the word only, and my ſervant ſhall be healed.

9 For I am a man under authority, having ſoldiers under me: and I ſay to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my ſervant, Do this, and he doeth it.

10 When Jeſus heard it, he marvelled, foundation on which it was to reſt might want nothing of the ſtrength and ſolidity which was neceſſary to ſupport ſo great a fabric as the faith of the world. But all thoſe prophetical characters of the Meſſiah Jeſus fulfilled, and appropriated to himſelf, when in his own life-time, he proved his miſſion from God; by miracles communicated the knowledge of divine things to a competent number of diſciples, in order to their propagating it through the world; and in the concluſion, by his ſufferings and death not only confirmed his doctrine, but made atonement for the ſins of men. The wiſdom of his plan was worthy of its author; for had our Lord, during his miniſtry, propoſed to convert great numbers of the Jews, he might, no doubt, have done it with as much ſucceſs as after his aſcenſion; but then the conſequences would have been inconvenient in two reſpects: 1. Had the Jews univerſally become Chriſt's followers, they would have endeavoured to make him a king; by which means one main end of his coming muſt have been defeated,—his dying as an atonement for ſin; and the Chriſtian religion have been deprived of the evidence which it derives from the greateſt of all miracles, his reſurrection from the dead. 2. This general good reception given to Jeſus by his countrymen, might have made the Gentiles reject him, ſuppoſing it was a contrivance to ſupport the ſinking credit of the nation.—On the other hand, if it ſhall be ſaid that our Lord could not have convinced more than he did, though he had attempted it, This conſequence at leaſt muſt have followed from the attempt; Herod in Galilee, or the governor of Judea, provoked at him for affecting popularity, would have cut him off: or though they had deſpiſed him, and let him alone, the haughty prieſts would certainly have deſtroyed him before his time. We are warranted to ſay this by what happened toward the concluſion of his miniſtry: When he went into Jeruſalem, taught in the temple, and wrought his miracles publickly before the world, they purſued him ſo hotly, that though he was innocent of every crime, they conſtrained the governor to condemn him, and execute upon him the puniſhment of the vileſt malefactor. But as it was neceſſary that Jeſus ſhould perform many miracles for the confirmation of his miſſion, and preach many ſermons, in order to prepare his diſciples for their future work, He was obliged, at leaſt in the beginning of his miniſtry, to keep himſelf as private as the nature of his work would admit; and this I ſuppoſe was one of the reaſons that induced him to ſpend ſo large a ſhare of his public life in Galilee, and the other countries about the lake of Genneſareth. But farther, our Lord kept himſelf private, that he might not be too much incommoded by the crowds; for though he uſed every prudent method to prevent it, he was often hurried to ſuch a degree, that he had not leiſure to take his neceſſary meals, far leſs leiſure for inſtructing his diſciples. Mark i. 45. iii. 20. vi. 31. To conclude, beſides theſe good reaſons, there may oft-times have been particular circumſtances, which made it fit to conceal the miracle, on the occaſion of which the caution was given. We know there was a reaſon of this kind attending the miracle under conſideration, which we have already obſerved at the beginning of this note. See Macknight, Clarke, and Wetſtein. As I have already conſidered the Miracles and Parables of our Saviour in large diſcourſes, and have not only explained them, but deduced the moſt important practical doctrines from them, I ſhall be the more brief with reſpect to them here, referring my readers to what I have ſaid in the diſcourſes.

Ver. 4. Lev. xiv. 3, 4, 10. Luke v. 14.—Ver. 5. Luke vii. 1.—V. 8. Luke xv. 19, 21. Pſ. cvii. 20.

Ver. 5. And when Jeſus was entered into Capernaum] St. Luke has related this ſtory more at large than St. Matthew. The whole may be thus connected: Jeſus, having finiſhed his ſermon on the mount, as ſoon as he came down from thence, to ſhew that his words and doctrines pertained both to the Jews and Gentiles, performed two miracles: the one for a Jew, a leper who came to him, the other for a Gentile, a centurion or Roman commander of 100 ſoldiers, who was ſtationed at Capernaum. A ſervant of this centurion, whoſe virtue and honeſty, obedience and induſtry made him very valuable [ἔντιμος] in the eyes of his maſter, lay at home ſick of the palſy, in the moſt grievous ſtage of the diſeaſe; δεινῶς βασανιζόμενος. The centurion hearing of Jeſus (whoſe fame began now to be ſpread abroad, and to which his miraculous cure performed at a diſtance on the ſon of a nobleman in this ſame city muſt have greatly contributed; See John iv. 43—53.) but not thinking himſelf worthy to come unto him, engaged, as St. Luke informs us, the elders of the Jews in his cauſe, and ſent them to intercede with this bleſſed perſon, of whom he had conceived ſuch high notions, on behalf of his afflicted ſervant. They performed their office punctually; for they came and beſought our Lord inſtantly and earneſtly, and ſtrengthened their importunity by informing him, that the centurion was worthy for whom he ſhould do this;—for he loveth our nation, ſay they, and, as a proof of it, hath built us a ſynagogue. Jeſus, ever ready to do good, made them no reply, but immediately went with them. The centurion hearing that he was coming, moved by the moſt remarkable humility, and judging his houſe unworthy the preſence of ſo divine a gueſt, immediately diſmiſſed his friends, to deſire the maſter not to give himſelf ſo great trouble, as to come to the houſe of one, who judged himſelf ſo far from being worthy of this great condeſcenſion, that he thought himſelf not even worthy to come to Jeſus: His humble requeſt was, that he would deign to ſpeak the word only, ſince he was aſſured that would be ſufficient for the recovery of his ſervant. But humility never yet prevented Chriſt's approach, and therefore he proceeded on towards the centurion's houſe; Coming near to which, the centurion himſelf, as St. Matthew here informs us, haſtened out to meet him; and thus the ſacred hiſtorians are eaſily reconciled, and the ſtory recorded here and in St. Luke appears to be one and the ſame. See my ſermon on the good centurion, vol. i. p. 97. However, as Macknight and ſome others ſuppoſe the ſtories to be different, that I may do juſtice to the ſubject, I will ſubjoin their arguments at the end of the 13th verſe.

Ver. 6. My ſervant] Ὁ παῖς μȣ. In Luke he is called δοῦλος. Whence the writers mentioned at the end of the laſt note would draw an argument in proof of the difference of theſe ſtories; for as παις ſometimes ſignifies ſon, they would infer, that this centurion came for the cure of his ſon; that in Luke for the cure of his ſervant. This, however, is but a weak argument; for it is plain, from ch. xiv. 2. as well as from ſeveral other paſſages both in ſacred and profane writers, that παις in the Greek, as well as puer in the Latin, is uſed for ſervant.

Ver. 8, 9. Lord, I am not worthy, &c.] The centurion with great humility anſwers our Lord, that he means he ſhould not take the trouble of going to his houſe, as he was a Gentile; but only that he would be ſo good as to command his ſervant's cure, though at a diſtance; for he knew his power equal to that effect; diſeaſes and devils of all kinds being as much ſubject to Chriſt's command, as his ſoldiers were to him. He knew that he himſelf was only an inferior officer; for the Roman centurions were ſubject to the command of their reſpective tribunes, as our captains are to that of their colonels. "I am only an inferior officer, ſays he, and yet what I command is done even in my abſence; how much more what thou commandeſt, who art Lord of all!" Some of the heathens formed very grand ideas of the divine power: thus Cicero ſays, Nihil eſt quod Deus efficere non poſſet, et quidem ſine labore ullo. Ut enim hominum membra, nulla contentione mente ipſa ac voluntate moveantur, ſic numine Deorum omnia regi, moveri, mutarique poſſe. See Nat. Deor. lib. 3. "There is nothing which the Deity cannot effect, and that without any labour; for as the members of men are moved without any difficulty by the mere act of their will, ſo can the Deity direct and govern all things." But the excellency and the peculiarity of the centurion's faith conſiſted in his applying this ſublime idea to Jeſus, who by outward appearance was only a man. His faith ſeems to have taken riſe, as was above hinted, from the miraculous cure performed ſome time before on a nobleman's ſon at Capernaum; for as the centurion dwelt there, he might know that at the time of the cure Jeſus was not in Capernaum, but at Cana, at the diſtance of a day's journey from the ſick, when he performed it. It may be proper to obſerve, after St. Chryſoſtom, that ſome place a comma, ver. 9. at εἰμι, and take it out at ἐξουσίαν, as being explanatory only of ὑπ' ἐμαυτὸν: I am a man, having in my power, under me, ſoldiers; but, upon comparing Luke vii. 8. it will appear, that ours is the proper reading. See Wetſtein and Maldonat. Inſtead of I ſay to this man. Dr. Wat. and the MS. read this ſoldier.

Ver. 10. He marvelled] Our Lord's conduct on this occaſion by no means implies that he was ignorant either of the centurion's faith, or of the grounds on which it was built; He knew all fully, before the man ſpake one word; but he was ſtruck with admiration at the noble notion which this heathen Roman captain had conceived of his power; the paſſion of admiration being excited by the greateſt and beautifulleſt of any object, as well as by its novelty and unexpectedneſs: Jeſus expreſſed his admiration of the centurion's faith in the praiſes which he beſtowed upon it to them who followed, as he was paſſing along the ſtreets of Capernaum, with a view to make it the more conſpicuous; for he declared publickly, that he had not met with, among the Jews themſelves, any one who poſſeſſed ſuch juſt, ſuch elevated conceptions of the Power by which he acted, notwithſtanding they were the choſen people of God, and enjoyed the benefit of a divine revelation, directing them to believe on him.

nd ſaid to them that followed, Verily I ſay nto you, I have not found ſo great faith, o not in Iſrael.

11 And I ſay unto you, That many ſhall come from the eaſt and weſt, and ſhall ſit down with Abraham, and Iſaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven.

12 But the children of the kingdom ſhall be caſt out into outer darkneſs: there ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth.

13 And Jeſus ſaid unto the centurion, Go thy way; and as thou haſt believed, ſo be it done unto thee. And his ſervant was healed in the ſelf-ſame hour.

Ver. 11. Mal. i. 11. Luke xiii. 29.—V. 12. Ch. xxi. 43. Ch. xiii. 42, 50. xxii. 13. xxiv. 51. xxv. 30. Luke xiii. 28.

See Macknight, and L'Enfant. It is very remarkable, ſays Dr. Heylin, that throughout the whole Goſpel, Jeſus is never ſaid to wonder at any thing but faith; which wonder in Chriſt is to be interpreted as an high expreſſion of eſteem. See ch. xv. 28. Now things difficult, rare, and extraordinary in their kind, are the proper objects of admiration: But it may be ſaid, Is not faith the gift of God? and is God's bounty ſo penurious, and his gifts ſo rare, that he himſelf, who has the diſtribution of them, our Lord I mean, ſhould ſhould wonder to find a mind greatly enriched by them? To this we anſwer, that moſt indubitably faith is the gift of God, and that a man might as ſoon create in himſelf a new ſenſe, as produce a true and lively faith by his own abilities: And it is not the gift, but man's perſevering acceptance of that gift, which was the ſubject of Chriſt's admiration. To paſs over what was peculiar in the caſe of this centurion,—whereof we are not competent judges, as Chriſt alone diſcerned his inmoſt ſentiments—and to bring this matter home to ourſelves, we may, upon due reflection, be convinced that divine faith in general, when it is actually received and embraced in the heart of a Chriſtian, produces there ſuch ſtrange and wonderous effects, as cannot but raiſe our eſteem and admiration. For faith is a divine light, by which conſcience will preſently read us our duty, and urge ſuch mortifying conſequences, that it is no wonder men ſhut their eyes againſt it. The wonder is, when they perſiſt to receive its illumination, notwithſtanding the deep ſentiments of humiliation, of remorſe, and compunction which it muſt neceſſarily excite in them. But this matter cannot be more emphatically repreſented than in the following words of the judicious Dr. Barrow. "The firſt ſtep, ſays he, into the Chriſtian ſtate, is a ſight and ſenſe of our own imperfection, weakneſs, baſeneſs, and miſery. We muſt diſcern and feel that our mind is very blind, our reaſon feeble, our will impotent and prone to evil; that our life is void of merit, and polluted with guilt; that our condition is deplorably ſad and wretched; that of ourſelves we are inſufficient to think or do any good, in order to our recovery; whence we are obliged to ſore compunction of ſpirit for our deeds and our caſe; to humble confeſſion of our ſins and miſeries; to earneſt ſupplication for mercy and grace, to heal and reſcue us from our ſad eſtate. Lord have mercy on me, a ſinner! What ſhall I do to be ſaved! Wretched man that I am, &c. are the ejaculations of a ſoul teeming with faith." See more in this admirable author's diſcourſe concerning faith.

Ver. 11, 12. And I ſay unto you] From this exalted pitch of faith found in a heathen, Jeſus took occaſion to declare the merciful purpoſe which God entertained towards all the Gentiles; namely, that he would accept their faith as readily as the faith of the Jews, and ſeat them with Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob in heaven, while the children of the kingdom, i. e. ſuch of the profeſſing people of God as came ſhort of their faith, ſhould be ſhut out for ever. Though the phraſe from the eaſt and from the weſt is moſt probably proverbial, to expreſs from all parts of the earth, (ſee Luke xiii. 29.) yet it is remarkable that the Goſpel ſpread much more to the eaſt and weſt of Judea, than to the north and ſouth of it. The words ἀνακλιθήσονται μετὰ Ἀβραὰμ, ſhall ſit, or lie down with Abraham, whereby our Lord expreſſes the future happineſs of the Gentiles, ſignify properly, "to ſit down at table with Abraham, &c." This is agreeable to the phraſeology of Scripture, which repreſented the rewards of the righteous under the idea of a ſumptuous entertainment; and though the joys of heaven be all of a ſpiritual kind, this metaphor needs not be thought ſtrange; ſince, as Le Clerc obſerves, we can neither ſpeak ourſelves, nor underſtand others ſpeaking of our ſtate in the life to come, unleſs phraſes taken from the affairs of this life be made uſe of. Beſides, the metaphor is not peculiar to the inſpired writings. The Greeks repreſented divine pleaſure under the notion of a feaſt. Empedocles, ſpeaking of the felicity of virtuous men after death, ſays, "They live chearfully at tables with the other immortals, free from the pains to which other men are ſubjected." Our Lord, by repreſenting the Gentiles as lying down at the feaſts of heaven on the ſame couch with Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, the founders of the Jewiſh nation, has diſgraced the pride of the Iſraelites; who diſdained to eat with Gentiles, though many of them, in point of morality, were far better than they. There is a great emphaſis in the original of the 12th verſe, where the puniſhment of thoſe rejected from the kingdom is deſcribed. They ſhall not only be caſt out,—that were bad enough,—but they ſhall be caſt out into darkneſs;—What can be worſe?—Behold, they ſhall be caſt out into τὸ σκότος τὸ ἐξώτερον, the very outer darkneſs: And how is this augmented by the next words, there ſhall be weeping, &c.! The Greek word κλαυθμὸς, ſignifies alſo the cries and howlings which ſometimes accompany weeping; and the gnaſhing of teeth which is added here, completes the deſcription of rage and deſpair. See ch. xiii. 42, 50. Acts vii. 54. It has been juſtly obſerved by many commentators, that this phraſe of outer darkneſs, which is often uſed after comparing the kingdom of heaven to a banquet, contains a beautiful alluſion to the luſtre of thoſe illuminated rooms in which ſuch feaſts were generally celebrated, as oppoſed to that darkneſs which ſurrounded thoſe who by night were turned out; but it alſo ſometimes goes yet farther, when the perſons excluded are ſuppoſed to be thrown into a dark dungeon. Ver. 13. Jeſus ſaid to the centurion, Go thy way] This moſt evidently proves that the centurion was come out of his houſe, as we have obſerved on ver. 5. There is in theſe words of our Saviour a ſtrong inſinuation, that the centurion had conceived no higher an idea of his divine power than was juſt: As thou haſt believed, ſo, &c. After theſe words many manuſcripts read, And the centurion, returning to his houſe, found that his ſervant, &c. See Wetſtein. This miracle, ſays Macknight, is generally ſuppoſed to have been the ſame with that related Luke vii. 1. yet they ſeem to have been different: For 1. according to Matthew, it was the centurion's ſon, (παῖς) who was ſick, whereas, according to Luke, it was his ſlave (δοῦλος). It is true, Luke once calls him παῖς; a circumſtance which has led many to confound the two miracles: Yet there is little in it, as we are directed to explain that word by the name δοῦλος, which he uſes no leſs than three times. On the other hand, we are under no neceſſity to tranſlate the word παῖς in Matthew by ſervant, but upon the ſuppoſition that the miracles are the ſame. 2. Matthew's centurion came in perſon, being to aſk a favour for his ſon; whereas Luke's centurion, conſidering with himſelf that he was to petition Jeſus in behalf of a ſlave, firſt prevailed with the elders of the town to preſent his petition: Afterwards, on ſecond thoughts, he deputed ſome intimate friends to hinder Jeſus from coming. The maxim indeed of the civilians, that He who cauſes another to do any thing, may be ſaid to do it himſelf, is thought by many a ſufficient reconciliation of this difference. But it is not ſo; for though the law eſtabliſhes that maxim, to render the execution of juſtice effectual, it cannot well be allowed in hiſtory; the perfection of which lieth in the exactneſs of the narration. And therefore, ſeeing Matthew has expreſly affirmed that the centurion came beſeeching Jeſus; that Jeſus ſaid to him, I will come, &c. that the centurion anſwered, I am not worthy, &c. and that Jeſus ſaid unto the centurion, Go thy way, and as thou haſt believed, ſo be it done unto thee: to interpret theſe things as ſaid to the man's friends, would be extremely harſh, and contrary to all the rules of hiſtory. 3. There is not the ſmalleſt hint given in Matthew that the centurion of whom he ſpeaks was a proſelyte. On the contrary, there is an inſinuation that he was not, in the oppoſition that is ſtated between his faith, and the faith of the Iſraelites; and in the declaration which our Lord was pleaſed to make on this occaſion; viz. that many ſhould come from the eaſt and weſt, i. e. from all countries, and ſit down in the kingdom of God, while the children of the kingdom, who looked on themſelves as having the only natural right to it, ſhould be excluded for ever. Whereas the centurion St. Luke ſpeaks of, was a lover of the Jewiſh nation, and had built them a ſynagogue, perhaps in Italy, or ſome other heathen country; and ſo was, in all probability, a proſelyte of righteouſneſs, for which cauſe the principal people of the town chearfully undertook to ſolicit Jeſus in his behalf. On the other hand, there are three ſimilar circumſtances attending theſe miracles, which have made the bulk of readers confound them. 1. They were both performed in the town of Capernaum, after Jeſus had preached ſermons, which in ſubſtance are pretty much the ſame. To this I reply, that theſe ſermons were different; the one in Matthew having been preached on a mountain; whereas that in Luke was delivered on a plain, Luke vi. 7. Both the centurions dwelt in Capernaum. But this might eaſily happen; as in the ſpace of twelve or fourteen months different companies of Roman ſoldiers in Herod's pay, with their officers, may have been ſtationed there. Or there may have been two centurions in Capernaum at the ſame time, whoſe ſoldiers might be quartered in the town and the neighbouring villages. 3. Both centurions made the ſame ſpeech to Jeſus, the one in perſon, the other by his friends; Lord, I am not worthy that thou ſhouldeſt come, &c. But this circumſtance may be accounted for in the following manner: As the faith of the firſt centurion, who was a heathen, took its riſe from the extraordinary cure which Jeſus had performed on the nobleman's ſon, the addreſs of the ſecond might take its riſe from the ſucceſs of the firſt; which could not miſs of being well known both in the town and country. Much encouraged, therefore, by that inſtance of Chriſt's goodneſs, the ſecond centurion might expect ſomething in behalf of his ſlave, eſpecially as he was himſelf not a heathen by religion, but a proſelyte to Moſes, and a lover of the Jews, and had built them a ſynagogue: Beſides, he had engaged the elders of the city to preſent his petition. However, when the elders were gone, recollecting his brother centurion's ſpeech, that had been ſo favourably received, he bethought himſelf of ſending ſome friends, with the ſame ſpeech, improved by this farther circumſtance of humility, that he did not think himſelf worthy ſo much 14 And when Jeſus was come into Peter's houſe, he ſaw his wife's mother laid, and ſick of a fever.

15 And he touched her hand, and the fever left her: and ſhe aroſe and miniſtered unto them.

16 When the even was come, they brought unto him many that were poſſeſſed with devils: and he caſt out the ſpirits with his word, and healed all that were ſick:

17 That it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by Eſaias the prophet, ſaying, Himſelf took our infirmities, and bare our ſickneſſes.

18 Now when Jeſus ſaw great multitudes about him, he gave commandment to depart unto the other ſide.

19 And a certain ſcribe came, and ſaid unto him, Maſter, I will follow thee whitherſoever thou goeſt.

20 And Jeſus ſaith unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have neſts; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.

21 And another of his diſciples ſaid unto him, Lord, ſuffer me firſt to go and bury my father.

22 But Jeſus ſaid unto him, Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead.

23 And when he was entered into a ſhip, his diſciples followed him.

24 And behold, there aroſe a great tempeſt in the ſea, inſomuch that the ſhip was covered with the waves: but he was aſleep.

25 And his diſciples came to him, and awoke him, ſaying, Lord, ſave us: we periſh!

26 And he ſaith unto them, Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Then he aroſe, and rebuked the winds and the ſea; and there was a great calm.

27 But the men marvelled, ſaying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the ſea obey him!

as to come into Chriſt's preſence. See Luke vii. 6, 7. This being an eminent inſtance of faith and humility, Jeſus would not let it paſs without due approbation. He honoured it with the ſame high encomium which he had paſſed on the like faith and humility in the other centurion. Only, as this was not a heathen by religion, he did not, as formerly, ſet his faith and the reward of it in oppoſition to the faith of the Jews. This oppoſition he ſtated afterwards, when one aſked him, Are there few to be ſaved? Luke xiii. 28. To conclude, that two centurions ſhould have had one, his ſon, and the other his ſlave, cured in Capernaum, with like circumſtances, is no more improbable than that the temple ſhould have been twice purged, the multitude twice fed, and the fiſhes twice caught by miracle, and with the ſame circumſtances.

Ver. 14. And when Jeſus was come] After this, Jeſus going into Peter's houſe, ſaw there his wife's mother lying ſick of a fever. Wat. This was the houſe into which Jeſus was uſed to retire at Capernaum. See Mark xxi. 22. and Luke iv. 31. Peter was of Bethſaida, which was at a little diſtance from Capernaum, John i. 35. This event happened after the cure wrought upon the demoniac in the ſynagogue, ſpoken of by St. Mark and St. Luke in the paſſages above quoted.

Ver. 15. And he touched her hand] Her cure was effected in an inſtant, and not ſlowly, like the cures produced in the courſe of nature, or by medicine; for though the length and violence of her diſtemper had brought her into a weak and languid ſtate, her full ſtrength returned all at once, inſomuch that riſing up immediately, ſhe prepared a ſupper for them, and ſerved them while at meat,—διηκόνει ἀυτοῖς: ſhewing that ſhe was reſtored to perfect health. Dr. Waterland reads ἀυτῷ, to him, after many manuſcripts.

Ver. 16. When the even was come] St. Mark adds, At even, when the ſun was ſet; becauſe it was the ſabbath the people did not come with their ſick to Jeſus, but as ſoon as the holy reſt was ended, that is to ſay, at ſun-ſetting, they brought them in great numbers to him, fully perſuaded that he would heal them. Dr. Waterland, inſtead of many that were poſſeſſed, &c. reads, many demoniacs, and he caſt out the ſpirits with a word.

Ver. 17. That it might be fulfilled, &c.] This prophecy of Iſaiah relates properly to the ſins of men, whereof diſeaſes are the emblem and the conſequence; for which reaſon the original Hebrew words rendered here our infirmities, have been by the LXX, and by St. Peter, 1 Ep. ch. ii. 24. tranſlated our ſins. Grotius has obſerved, that the word ἐβάστασεν ſignifies, "to carry a heavy load," Rom. xv 1. Gal. vi. 2. and ſo expreſſes well the indefatigable labours of Chriſt, ſpending the evening in healing, probably with many intermingled diſcourſes, after he had employed the day in preaching. Our Redeemer, by aſſuming the human nature, with its infirmities and diſeaſes, as well as by his ſufferings, made atonement for ſin, and freed men both from the temporal and eternal puniſhment of ſin. Of this he now gave the cleareſt proof in his miracles, healing with ſovereign authority all diſeaſes, originally inflicted on men as the temporal puniſhment of ſin: Hence the curing of theſe diſeaſes is called by Chriſt himſelf, in the ſecond verſe of the next chapter, the forgiving of ſins. I have endeavoured throughout my ſermons on the miracles above referred to, to ſhew that the wonderful works performed by our Lord were not only deſigned as proofs of his divine power, but as emblems of thoſe ſpiritual miracles wrought by his grace on our ſouls; and in confirmation of what is there repeatedly obſerved, I will add, by way of Reflections, at the end of the ninth chapter, ſome obſervations of an able writer on the ſubject.

Ver. 18—20. Now when Jeſus ſaw, &c.] Now Jeſus, perceiving the crowd about him, gave orders to depart, &c. Wat. Though our Saviour had retired into the wilderneſs after the cure of the leper, mentioned Luke v. 12. the people, excited by the fame of that miracle, came to him from every quarter; wherefore, that he might effectually avoid them, he reſolved to go to the other ſide of the lake, and commanded his diſciples to accompany him. Upon this, a Scribe, who happened to be preſent, offered to follow him, ver. 19. but Jeſus, knowing that he had nothing in view but the pleaſures and profits of the ſuppoſed kingdom, would not accept of his ſervice; telling him, that he was quite miſtaken, if he propoſed to better his worldly circumſtances by attending him. The phraſe Son of man is found in Dan. vii. 13. where the univerſal dominion to which the Meſſiah, in quality of the Son of man, was to be raiſed, is deſcribed. It is the appellation which Jeſus Chriſt commonly gives himſelf; and as he was called ſo by none but himſelf, it is plain he choſe the title out of humility, as having ſome relation to his mean and humble appearance in this world. Son of man, in the prophets Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah, does not ſo much denote the human nature, as the frailty and weakneſs of man; and in this ſenſe undoubtedly the expreſſion is uſed, Pſ. viii. 5. and xlix. 2. Jeſus Chriſt takes care indeed to lay a ſtreſs upon it, when he would make his power and authority known. See ch. ix. 6. xiii. 26, &c. but he certainly made uſe of it for this end, that he might rectify the miſtaken notions they had formed of the nature of his kingdom, and to give them to underſtand, that the way he was to enter into glory, was through ſufferings and the croſs. See L'Enfant. Inſtead of holes—and—lay his head, ver. 20. Dr. Wat. reads kennels, and, reſt his head.

Ver. 21, 22. And another—ſaid, &c.] The anſwer of this diſciple ſuppoſes that our Saviour had ordered him to follow him. See Luke ix. 59. It is uncertain whether this diſciple's father was juſt dead, or whether, as being very old, his ſon deſired leave to ſtay with him till his death. Chriſt's anſwer ſeems to take it for granted that he was already dead. Let the dead bury their dead: "Let thoſe who are themſelves ſpiritually dead, perform the rites of funeral; yea, let the dead remain unburied, rather than diſobey my word, when I give thee ſo great a commiſſion."

Ver. 23. And when he was entered] And when he went aboard the veſſel. Wat.

Ver. 24. A great tempeſt] Σεισμὸς μέγας properly ſignifies a mighty agitation, probably it was ſomething of an hurricane. Jeſus, poſſibly fatigued with the labours of the day (which had been a very buſy one) was aſleep in the ſtern of the veſſel, for the refreſhment of his weary body, as well as for the trial of their faith.

Ver. 27. The men marvelled, ſaying, &c.] This reflection, as well as the extreme fear of the diſciples in the time of their danger, may ſeem unaccountable, conſidering how many and what miracles they had been witneſſes to; but both may be explained in ſome meaſure by the following remark: that hitherto his miracles were generally upon diſeaſed perſons, and that he had given as yet no proofs of his dominion over the elements, the wind and the water, which, it ſeems, were thought leſs ſubject to human power than diſtempers; or if this does not account for the reflection which the diſciples made on ſeeing the preſent inſtance of Chriſt's power, it may be attributed to

28 And when he was come to the other ſide, into the country of the Gergeſenes, there met him two poſſeſſed with devils, coming out of the tombs; exceeding fierce, ſo that no man might paſs by that way.

29 And behold, they cried out, ſaying, What have we to do with thee, Jeſus, thou Son of God? art thou come hither to torment us before the time?

30 And there was a good way off from them an herd of many ſwine, feeding.

31 So the devils beſought him, ſaying, If thou caſt us out, ſuffer us to go away into the herd of ſwine.

32 And he ſaid unto them, Go. And when they were come out, they went into the herd of ſwine: and behold, the whole herd of ſwine ran violently down a ſteep place into the ſea, and periſhed in the waters.

33 And they that kept them fled, and went their ways into the city, and told every thing; and what was befallen to the poſſeſſed of the devils.

Ver. 28. Mark v. 1. Luke viii. 26.

the fear and confuſion they were in, occaſioned by the greatneſs of their jeopardy, from which they were but juſt delivered. See more concerning this miracle on Mark iv. 39.

Ver. 28. And when he was come to the other ſide] The ſtorm being huſhed, they came to land. St. Matthew ſays, in the country of Girgaſa; St. Mark and Luke, in the country of Gadara; but the Evangeliſts do not differ here; if, as it is probable, the one gives us the general name of the country, the other the denomination of a particular ſpot only; though indeed there is no neceſſity for this ſuppoſition, as many MSS and verſions of great authority read Gadarenes here, in agreement with St. Mark and St. Luke. Joſephus ſays, Gadara was the metropolis of Peræa, and that it was ſixty furlongs from Tiberias. Gadara therefore is rightly placed oppoſite to Tiberias, at the ſouth-end of the ſea. Further, ſpeaking of the country of Gadara, he ſays, it bounded Galilee to the eaſt. See Luke viii. 26. Gadara therefore muſt have been ſituated on the eaſt-ſide of the lake, about eight miles from Tiberias, in ſuch a manner, that part of its territory was contiguous to the lower Galilee, but ſeparated from it by the Jordan; and part of it was oppoſite thereto, with a lake between. The city was one of thoſe called Decapolis, and according to Joſephus was ſituated in Cœlo-Syria, in the poſſeſſion of the tribe of Manaſſeh. When Pompey ſubdued Judea he rebuilt Gadara, and joined it to the province of Syria; Auguſtus afterwards gave it to Herod; but, upon Herod's death, he annexed it again to Syria. By theſe means the town came to be inhabited partly by Syrians. Gadara being thus inhabited by a mixture of people, it is no wonder that there were Swine in its territory; for though the Jews did not eat the fleſh of theſe animals, they might breed them for their heathen neighbours; or the herd might be the property of the latter.

When Jeſus and his diſciples landed at this place, two men poſſeſſed with devils came towards them from the tombs. Mark and Luke ſpeak only of one demoniac; but in ſeveral inſtances the ſacred hiſtorians mention but one perſon, though more were concerned in the matter related. St. Auſtin thinks that one of the demoniacs was more remarkable than the other, perhaps, for his birth, or parts, or intereſt in the country; and that his cure made more noiſe, and for that reaſon was mentioned by Mark and Luke, while they omitted the cure of the other. St. Luke's account, as it ſtands in our tranſlation, ſeems in one particular to claſh with St. Matthew and St. Mark; for he ſays, ch. viii.. 27. there met him out of the city a certain man; but there is no real inconſiſtency between the Evangeliſts; for St. Luke's words are ἀνὴρ ἐκ τῆς ϖόλεως, which properly ſignifies a man of the city, one who had formerly been an inhabitant, though now he dwelt among the tombs. See the phraſe in John i. 45. Accordingly, St. Luke tells us, that he did not abide in any houſe, but in the tombs; whither Grotius ſuppoſes that the dæmons choſe to drive the men whom they poſſeſſed, to confirm ſome ſuperſtitious notions of the Jews relating to the power of evil ſpirits over the dead. The heathens had undoubtedly ſuch notions; but Elſner's opinion ſeems moſt probable, that the dæmoniacs choſe the caves of this burying-ground as a kind of ſhelter; and he has ſhewn, that wretches in extremity ſometimes did the like. It ſhould be remembered that the ſepulchres of the Jews were, very wiſely, always at ſome diſtance from their cities, in lonely and deſart places. Hence St. Luke ſays of the dæmoniac, ch. viii. 29. that he was driven into the wilderneſs. Doubtleſs thoſe malevolent ſpirits love ſuch tokens of death and deſtruction.

It ſhould be obſerved further, that no compaſſion to theſe unhappy men, nor endeavours for their own ſecurity, had been wanting in the people of the place; for they had frequently endeavoured to confine them; but no man could bind them, no not with chains; becauſe, though they had been frequently ſo bound, the chains has been plucked aſunder by them, and the fetters broken in pieces; neither could any man tame them. See Mark v. 4. Being therefore at liberty, they ſhunned the ſociety of men, wandering day and night amidſt the melancholy receptacles of the dead, formidable to all who paſſed by, and a great nuiſance to the country. Concerning the nature of theſe dæmoniacs, ſee the note on the 33d verſe.

Ver. 29. What have we to do with thee?] This is an Hebrew phraſe. ſignifying, "What right, rule, or authority doſt thou claim over us? What concern haſt thou with us? See John ii. 4. Judg. xi. 12. 2 Sam. xvi. 10. 1 Kings xvii. 18. 2 Kings iii. 13. ix. 19. Septuagint. There is, in the next words, art thou come to torment us, &c. ſuch a reference to the final ſentence which Chriſt is to paſs upon theſe rebel ſpirits in the judgment of the great day, to which they are reſerved, (Jude, ver. 6.) as could not have been dictated by lunacy; and it is much to be queſtioned whether the perſons ſpeaking, or any of the hearers, but Chriſt himſelf, underſtood the ſenſe and propriety of them. See 2 Peter ii. 4.

Ver. 30—32. And there was a good way off—many ſwine, &c.] Inſtead of a good way off, Doddridge reads at a conſiderable diſtance—at ſome diſtance;—and by comparing Mark v. 11. and Luke viii. 32. it will be found, that this is the true meaning of the word μακρὰν. St. Mark ſays, that there were about two thouſand inthe herd of ſwine; which will not ſeem ſtrange, if it be conſidered that the generality of the inhabitants of that country were Gentiles. The devils, no doubt, requeſted permiſſion to enter into the herd of ſwine, with a view to prevent any good effects which the miracle might have had on the Gadarenes, and to render Chriſt odious to them. Their deſign could not be hid from Jeſus; nevertheleſs he granted their requeſt, making it ſubſervient to his own gracious purpoſes. He permitted the devils to enter into the ſwine, not only to ſhew the reality of the poſſeſſion (which was thus undeniably proved, for nothing but ſuch a poſſeſſion could have forced ſo large a herd down a precipice into the water); but that we might underſtand how great the power of evil ſpirits is, and how terrible the effects of their malice would be, if they were not reſtrained; for no ſooner was the permiſſion granted, than the keepers who were with the ſwine, and the diſciples who were at a diſtance, beheld, to their great aſtoniſhment, the whole herd running furiouſly down the mountain, and leaping from the tops of the rocks into the ſea; while the poſſeſſed furious madmen immediately became meek and compoſed, having recovered the intire exerciſe of their reaſon. Jeſus alſo might permit the devils thus to fall on the herd, as a puniſhment to the Gadarenes for keeping Swine, which were a ſnare to the Jews; and to make trial of their diſpoſition, whether they would become more affected with the loſs of their cattle, than with the recovery of the men, and with the doctrine of the kingdom. Whatever were the reaſons, it is certain, that though he might rightfully have uſed all mens properties as he pleaſed; yet this, and the withering of the barren fig-tree are the only inſtances wherein man ſuffered the leaſt damage by any thing our Lord ever did. But certainly, neither the owners of the herd, nor of the fig-tree, could juſtly complain of their loſs, ſince the good of mankind, not in that period or corner only, but in every ſucceeding age, through all countries, has been ſo highly promoted at ſuch a trifling expence to them. No miracles are more ſuſpicious than pretended diſpoſſeſſions, as there is ſo much room for colluſion in them; but it was ſelf-evident that the herd of ſwine could not be confederates in any fraud. Their death, therefore, in this inſtructive and convincing circumſtance, was ten thouſand times a greater bleſſing to mankind, than if they had been ſlain for food, as was intended. We may obſerve further, that the devils, by making this requeſt to Jeſus, acknowledged that it was not in the power even of a legion of them to do any miſchief to ſo contemptible a creature as a ſwine, without Chriſt's permiſſion; far leſs could they deſtroy the man in whom they lodged. See Doddridge, Macknight, and Bp. Pearce's vindication of the miracles of Jeſus; and for more on this ſubject, "The ſermon on the man diſpoſſeſſed of a legion," vol. i. p. 322.

Ver. 33, 34. And they that kept them fled] The miracle iſſuing thus in the deſtruction of the ſwine, was immediately reported in the town and country by the affrighted keepers, who, as they fled, had fallen in, it ſeems, with Jeſus and his company, and learned from them the cauſe of what had happened. The intelligence threw the Gadarenes into the utmoſt conſternation; for when they came, and ſaw the men who had been poſſeſſed ſitting gravely in their right mind, and decently clothed, (the diſciples having charitably ſupplied them with ſuch upper garments as they could ſpare) they perceived how great Chriſt's power was, and were exceedingly afraid, having treſpaſſed in the matter of the ſwine, which was an unclean food; or, if the herd belonged to the Syrian inhabitants of the town, they might know the law, and conſequently, taking the deſtruction of their cattle as a rebuke, they could not but dread further puniſhment from this prophet of the Jews, who was come to vindicate the neglected inſtitutions of Moſes. Wherefore, this inſtance of his

34 And behold, the whole city came out to meet Jeſus: and when they ſaw him, they beſought him that he would depart out of their coaſts.

CHAP. IX.

Chriſt cureth one ſick of the palſy; calleth Matthew from the receipt of cuſtom, eateth with publicans and ſinners, defendeth his diſciples for not faſting. Cureth the bloody iſſue, raiſeth from death Jairus' daughter, giveth ſight to two blind men, healeth a dumb man poſſeſſed of a devil, and hath compaſſion on the multitude.

AND he entered into a ſhip, and paſſed over, and came into his own city.

power terrifying them, they with one accord fooliſhly beſought him, in the moſt earneſt manner, to depart out of their country. It ſeems they were altogether ignorant of his goodneſs, notwithſtanding he had given them a ſtriking proof of it in the recovery of the demoniacs. As Jeſus was intirely free from oſtentation, he never forced his company on any people, nor wrought miracles of healing without being aſked, leſt it ſhould have been imagined that he had choſen objects within his power. The madmen indeed, whoſe cure is here related, and perſons in ſimilar circumſtances, were excepted, for a reaſon too obvious to be mentioned. In all his actions our Lord preſerved a becoming dignity, tempered with great modeſty. The requeſt of the Gadarenes therefore, being a ſufficient reaſon for his withdrawing from ſuch a ſtupid people, he entered into his veſſel, and returned to the country from whence he had come; leaving to them a valuable pledge of his love, and to us a noble pattern of perſeverance in well-doing, even when our kindneſſes are contemned, or it may be, requited with injuries; for notwithſtanding the men from whom the devils had been expelled intreated him to take them along with him, (ſeeMark v. 18.) fearing perhaps that their tormentors might return after he was gone, He ordered them to ſtay behind, as a ſtanding monument both of his power and goodneſs; very proper to induce the Gadarenes to believe, when they found their miracle real, and that Jeſus could reſtrain the devils, as well when abſent as preſent. And this was the reaſon that, in the inſtance before us, Jeſus acted contrary to his uſual practice; ordering the men to go and publiſh the miracle among all their relations and acquaintance. See Luke viii. 39. Beſides, there were many heathens in Gadara and the neighbourhood, upon whom the publication of his miracles would not have the ill effect it was apt to have on the Jews; or he might give this order, becauſe he did not intend to return ſoon into that part of the country.

REMARKS ON THE DEMONIACS IN THE GOSPEL.

Such is this remarkable miracle; an invincible evidence that the demoniacs mentioned in the New Teſtament were not, as ſome have ſuppoſed, only lunatics, or epileptics, but perſons really poſſeſſed by unclean ſpirits. The perſonal actions of thoſe ſpirits, and their entrance into the ſwine, abundantly prove it, were there no other proofs. But the Scriptures throughout, as well as heathen writers, join in the teſtimony; and indeed, the preſent miracle ſeems in a great meaſure deſigned to confute any ſuch erroneous opinions, and to convince us of the reality of ſpiritual agency. The learned Bp. of Rocheſter, in his excellent vindication of the miracles of Jeſus, part ii. p. 28. obſerves, "In the inſtance of this miracle before us we find, that the devils ſpoke out of the poſſeſſed perſons; they were ſent out of them, and they entered into the herd of ſwine. Perſonal actions, as well as ſpeeches are aſcribed to them, which can never be aſcribed to mere phrenſy and madneſs; for had there been nothing more than madneſs, when it ceaſed in the men, it would have had then no influence on the ſwine: whereas that which went out of the one, and entered into the other, muſt have had a diſtinct being and exiſtence of its own. This therefore, is the true Goſpel notion of demoniacs: They were not madmen only, but they were poſſeſſed by unclean ſpirits; and if Jeſus be proved to have come from God, he could not have been unacquainted with the immaterial world; and therefore no one can reaſonably refuſe to believe the account which he hath given us of the operations of evil ſpirits upon human bodies. Had no authors but the ſacred ones made mention of the demoniacs of thoſe days, yet the Scripture teſtimony would have been ſufficient; But there are unqueſtionable authors, who agree in this ſtory, and ſpeak of poſſeſſed perſons as no uncommon ſight in their days. Joſephus ſays, that Solomon had from God the art of caſting devils out of men, and healing them; and that he compoſed charms for aſſuaging the diſeaſe, and left behind him forms of adjuration, by which the devils were ſo effectually caſt out, as never to return again. And he adds, that this way of healing was practiſed amongſt his countrymen even down to his own days. Whether the Jews had ſo effectual a method of diſpoſſeſſing men as Joſephus thought, yet thus much appears plainly from his teſtimony, that there were perſons poſſeſſed with devils in his days, and long before: nay, he tells us in the ſame place, that he ſaw one diſpoſſeſſed in the preſence of the emperor Veſpaſian and his family: And to prevent our miſtaking this calamity for madneſs, or any other common and natural diſtemper, he explains what he means by being poſſeſſed with devils, when he ſays, that what were called ſo, were the ſpirits of wicked men, which entered into living perſons, and occaſioned the death of ſuch of them as met with no help. Plutarch and Lucian mention demoniacs, as well known in their days; and Philoſtratus, in his life of Apollonius, among the miraculous cures which he aſcribes to him, has a particular account of a young man, who had an unclean ſpirit, which "made him wander from home, and led him into the deſolate parts of the country, amidſt deep vallies and precipices." Where the reader may obſerve, that the ſame circumſtances are ſaid to have attended this young man, as attended the madmen in this miracle before us: and whatever was the truth of the fact reported by Philoſtratus, yet it ſhews both his opinion, that there were demoniacs at that time, and that the effects of ſuch poſſeſſion were commonly the ſame as the Evangeliſts repreſent them."

"Why theſe demoniacs were ſo frequent at or about the time of our Saviour's coming, and perhaps more eſpecially in and about the place of his miniſtry, though we may not be able to ſee all the reaſons, Yet it appears probable, that as the great end of his incarnation was to deſtroy the works of the devil, therefore the wiſe Diſpoſer of all events might permit that apoſtate ſpirit to exert himſelf, and to diſplay his tyranny in an unuſual manner, that Chriſt's triumph over him might be more ſignal and manifeſt. Why ſuch demoniacs were ſuffered at all, theſe reaſons are offered: 1. To confirm us in our belief of the reality of the agency of good and bad ſpirits, which ſurely, none who believe the Goſpel can doubt or deny; and to convince us of the divine power of Chriſt, whoſe words they hear and obey with terrible confuſion. 2. To exerciſe the patience, and increaſe the reward of thoſe, who are at any time tried by theſe and the like temptations of Satan, as in the caſe of Job. 3. To convince unbelievers what blackneſs of darkneſs, what horrors and puniſhments remain for thoſe, who ſhall be wholly given up to the power of theſe evil ſpirits. If they drive men into the tombs and deſarts, cauſe them to howl away in miſerable lamentation days and nights, to cut and mangle themſelves with the rocks and ſtones. If here upon earth they cauſe men to fall down into the fire and water, to foam at the mouth, and gnaſh with the teeth, what will they do when they get miſerable and condemned ſouls into their whole and entire poſſeſſion. 4. A fourth reaſon alledged for theſe corporeal poſſeſſions is, that they were ſuffered, in order to ſhew us what the devil doth with the ſoul ſpiritually poſſeſſed and enſlaved by him and ſin; for, as Satan, when he poſſeſſeth the body, makes one blind, another deaf, another dumb, and another void of all ſenſe; ſo, in whatſoever ſouls he reigns through ſin, he deprives them of all ſpiritual ſenſes, and renders them blind, and deaf, and dumb, to whatſoever concerns their great, their eternal welfare: A conſideration, which ſhould incline all ſuch to haſten to Chriſt, if they would eſcape thoſe everlaſting flames prepared for the devil and his angels. See the Reflections at the end of the next chapter: Nor can I help referring my reader, deſirous of improving the Scripture hiſtory, to the contemplations of the excellent Bp. Hall, which will afford him at once the trueſt pleaſure, and the greateſt profit.

Chap. IX. Ver. 1—7. And he entered into a ſhip] And returning into a veſſel, he croſſed the lake, and came to his own city, [of Capernaum, where he had dwelt after his leaving Nazareth] ver. 2. where they brought to him a paralytic lying on a bed; and Jeſus, ſeeing their faith, ſaid to the paralytic, Have confidence, my ſon! your ſins are forgiven. Heylin. See this miracle more circumſtantially deſcribed in Mark ii. and Luke v. In St. Luke's miracle, there is a very material circumſtance premiſed, namely, that ſome Phariſees and doctors of the law, who came out of every town of Galilee and Judea, and from Jeruſalem, were ſitting by him, while he was teaching,—and the power of the Lord was preſent to heal them, i. e. thoſe his auditors, of their ſpiritual maladies; and then it immediately follows, and behold, men brought on a bed, or couch, one ſick of a palſy; and becauſe there was then no other acceſs to Chriſt, by reaſon of the crowd which encompaſſed him, they let down the paralytic through the tiles upon his couch, into the midſt before Jeſus, (ſee the note on Mark ii. 4.) who, full as he was of the divine ſanative power, and accordingly conſidering the object ſo preſented to him not only with regard to his bodily diſeaſe, but more eſpecially with regard to his ſpiritual infirmity, by the prevalent power of ſin, which incapacitated his mind for virtuous actions, as the palſy did his body for the natural functions; Chriſt, I ſay, conſidering this, applied, in the firſt place, to what was moſt important, and releaſed him from the power of ſin, ſaying; "Have confidence, my ſon! your ſins are forgiven; or, as the original ſignifies, your ſins are diſmiſſed, and ſhall no longer have dominion over you." Phyſicians both ancient and modern, tell us, that palſies are ſometimes occaſioned by intemperance; therefore, if this paralytic brought his diſeaſe upon himſelf, the propriety of the terms in which the cure was pronounced will more fully appear,—your ſins are forgiven. The reader need not to be told, that ſon is a title of condeſcenſion and tenderneſs, as father was a correſpondent title of reſpect.

The Scribes who were preſent, being diſappointed in their curioſity

2 And behold, they brought to him a man ſick of the palſy, lying on a bed: and Jeſus ſeeing their faith, ſaid unto the ſick of the palſy; Son, be of good cheer; thy ſins be forgiven thee.

3 And behold, certain of the ſcribes ſaid within themſelves, This man blaſphemeth.

4 And Jeſus, knowing their thoughts, ſaid, Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts?

5 For whether is eaſier? to ſay, Thy ſins be forgiven thee; or to ſay, Ariſe and walk?

6 But, that ye may know that the ſon of man hath power on earth to forgive ſins, (then ſaith he to the ſick of the palſy,) Ariſe, take up thy bed, and go unto thine houſe.

7 And he aroſe, and departed to his houſe.

8 But when the multitude ſaw it, they marvelled, and glorified God, which had given ſuch power unto men.

9 And as Jeſus paſſed forth from thence, he ſaw a man named Matthew, ſitting at the receipt of cuſtom: and he ſaith unto him, Follow me. And he aroſe, and followed him.

10 And it came to paſs, as Jeſus ſat at meat in the houſe, behold, many publicans and ſinners came and ſat down with him and his diſciples.

11 And when the Phariſees ſaw it, they ſaid unto his diſciples, Why eateth your Maſter with publicans and ſinners?

(for they expected to ſee an outward bodily cure) and ſtartled to hear our Lord expreſs himſelf in ſuch unuſual terms, took offence, and in their hearts condemned him of blaſphemy, for aſſuming to himſelf an authority to diſmiſs ſin, ver. 3. Chriſt, to whom the ſecrets of all hearts are open, knew their thoughts: As he is the Almighty Word which maketh all things by ſpeaking them, ſo with him to ſay and to do is the ſame thing, which he plainly ſignifies here by his manner of expreſſing himſelf, Which is eaſieſt? to ſay, &c. ver. 5. i. e. "Which is eaſieſt to be performed, to ſet him free from ſin, or to deliver him from his diſeaſe?" Our Lord, as we before obſerved, ſeeing through the diſeaſed object preſented to him, and conſidering as well the ſpiritual as the bodily diſorders which oppreſſed him, firſt applied a remedy, where the want was greateſt, and delivered him from his ſins; but this was an inviſible operation, and although of a much higher nature than any bodily cure, yet was it no object of ſenſe, and conſequently not diſcernable by the ſpectators; ſome of whom were ſo far from believing Chriſt's power to diſmiſs ſins, that they were ſcandalized at him for aſſuming it. He, therefore, to inſtruct them and us in a matter of ſo great importance, reaſoned in the following manner: "Which is eaſieſt, think ye,—to deliver a mind from the power of ſin, or a body from diſeaſe?—To cure the body is certainly the eaſieſt work; for it requires another kind of power to reach and operate upon the mind, to rectify its vicious inclinations, and repair the diſorders induced by ſin. This I have effected in the paralytic here preſent. I have diſmiſſed his ſins; I have healed his diſtempered ſoul: but as this divine operation is internal, and conſequently not diſcernable to you that are ſpectators, I will add a ſecond miracle, which, though in all reſpects of an inferior nature, yet has the advantage of being viſible, and therefore is a proper proof of what I aſſert. Judge of my power to heal ſouls by the cures I work upon bodies: And, that all may know the authority I have to diſmiſs ſins, and cure the depravations of the mind, I ſay unto thee, O paralytic, ariſe, take up thy couch, and return to thine own home." The ſick perſon did ſo, and they were all amazed, and glorified God. We may extend the ſame way of reaſoning to all the miraculous cures recorded in the goſpel, and infer from all and every one of them the divine power of our Saviour to reform the ſouls of men. See Heylin, and the Reflections at the end of this chapter.

Ver. 8. But when the multitude ſaw it] The people were ſtruck with an high degree of ſurprize, mixed with admiration. What was to the Scribes an occaſion of blaſphemy, proved to them an incitement to praiſe and bleſs; they glorified God, who had given ſuch power to men, power not only to heal diſeaſes, but to forgive ſins; for they could not but acknowledge the authority of Chriſt's declaration, thy ſins are forgiven, when their eyes ſhewed them the efficacy of his command, ariſe and walk. Even the Phariſees could not help being confounded at this miracle; for it was performed by one whom they had but a few moments before pronounced a blaſphemer. Beſides, they were incapable of finding the leaſt fault with the miracle, although, no doubt, they examined it with a ſcrupulous exactneſs. It is ſtrange, therefore, that they did not forthwith lay aſide their enmity againſt Jeſus. Probably in this, as in other inſtances, they reſiſted the dictates of their own minds; or they might overlook the miracle, and continue to find fault with the expreſſion uttered when it was performed; for with reſpect to good, their minds ſeem to have been in the ſame enervated and dead condition, which the body of the paralytic had been in before his cure; only the miſery of their ſtate was greater than his; the palſy of the ſoul being an evil much more deplorable than the palſy of the body. See Macknight. We may juſt obſerve, that Cocceius is of opinion, that men in this verſe refers to the men cured by Jeſus, who had given ſuch power to men, i. e. of receiving remiſſion of ſins, and bodily health; but the interpretation referring it to Chriſt, as a prophet, ſeems preferable. See Bp. Smallbrooke's vindication of the miracles, vol. 2. p. 248.

Ver. 9. As Jeſus paſſed thence, he ſaw a man, &c.] St. Luke, in the parallel place, calls St. Matthew a publican, which was a very odious name among the Jews, as the employment was attended with ſo much corruption and temptation, that there were but few honeſt men ſuppoſed to be engaged in it. They were generally perſons of ſo infamous and vile a character, that publicans and ſinners are often joined together as ſynonimous terms. See on ch. v. 46. ix. 11. xi. 19. Τελώνιον properly ſignifies the cuſtom-houſe, and ſo Dr. Waterland renders it: Some have rendered it Tolbooth; which, ſays L'Enfant, was a place near the lake and harbour: There were toll-booths on the great roads, as alſo on the lakes and rivers. The other Evangeliſts call St. Matthew by the more honourable name of Levi. Porphyry and Julian have blamed St. Matthew for following one of whom he had ſo little knowledge, thus raſhly, as they are pleaſed to call it. But as it is evident that this publican lived in Capernaum, or near it, he muſt have often heard our Lord preach; for it was the town where he ordinarily reſided, and probably he might have been witneſs to a number of Chriſt's miracles; Wherefore the oppoſers of our religion muſt forgive us if we affirm, that there was neither raſhneſs nor imprudence in the readineſs which Matthew ſhewed to follow Jeſus. He might have been his diſciple long before this, and only waited for permiſſion to attend him. But further, why may we not ſuppoſe that a divine and ſupernatural influence attended this call of our Lord? Which, conſidering all its circumſtances, may well be acknowledged as great a miracle as any of thoſe we have before reviewed. Dr. Doddridge makes the following pleaſing and pious remarks upon the event. "Let us view, with humble wonder and pleaſure, this further inſtance of the condeſcenſion and grace of the Redeemer, in the call of Matthew: His condeſcenſion, in calling to ſo near an attendance, and ſo intimate a friendſhip, a man who was a publican, infamous as that employment was; and his grace, which could immediately inſpire this publican with ſo firm a reſolution of quitting all the profits of that employment; that he might reduce himſelf to circumſtances of life as precarious as thoſe of his divine maſter. Many, no doubt, cenſured him as a raſh enthuſiaſt and a lunatic, rather than as a ſober convert; but he is even now reaping the abundant reward:—His loſs is gain, and his contempt glory." See on ch. x. 2, &c.

Ver. 10. And it came to paſs] Matthew, thinking himſelf highly honoured by the call of Jeſus, made an entertainment for his maſter, who did not refuſe to partake of it; at the ſame time he invited as many of his brother publicans as he could, hoping that Chriſt's converſation might bring them to repentance. In this feaſt, therefore, St. Matthew ſhewed both gratitude and charity; gratitude to Chriſt, who had reclaimed him; charity to his acquaintance, in labouring to bring about their converſion. It has been commonly thought that Matthew made this entertainment on the very day that Chriſt called him to attend upon him. The early harmonies of Tatian and Ammonius very juſtly ſeparated them: (See Chemnitz Harm. cap. 23.) And to the many convincing arguments which Mr. Jones, in his Vindication of Matthew, p. 129, &c. has brought to prove that they ought to be ſeparated; we may add, that it ſeems very evident they were not both on the ſame day, from the following obvious conſideration. So many things happened before the calling of Matthew, that the day muſt be far advanced, and there could not have been time to prepare a great feaſt, and invite a number of gueſts, at leaſt till ſupper: On which account it is certain, that the feaſt was after the day of his calling; perhaps ſome months after, when he had made up his accompts, and regularly paſſed his buſineſs into other hands; which certainly, from a principle of juſtice, as well as prudence, he would take care to do.

Ver. 11—13. And the Phariſees ſaw it] See on ver. 9. Inſtead of whole, ver. 12. Dr. Waterland reads well; and ver. 13. I will have mercy rather than ſacrifice; for I am not come to call ſaints, but, &c. The Phariſees did not indeed direct their diſcourſe to Jeſus, but having ſpoken ſo loud as to let all the gueſts hear their cenſure, he could not avoid meekly putting them in mind, that it is ſick people only who have need of a phyſician; to inſinuate, that ſince the Phariſees thought themſelves righteous perſons, they had no need of his company; whereas the publicans, whom they called ſinners, being 12 But when Jeſus heard that, he ſaid unto them, They that be whole need not a phyſician, but they that are ſick.

13 But go ye, and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not ſacrifice: for I am not come to call the righteous, but ſinners, to repentance.

14 Then came to him the diſciples of John, ſaying, Why do we and the Phariſees faſt oft, but thy diſciples faſt not?

15 And Jeſus ſaid unto them, Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come when the bridegroom ſhall be taken from them, and then ſhall they faſt.

16 No man putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worſe.

17 Neither do men put new wine into old bottles: elſe the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles periſh: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preſerved.

Ver. 13. Hoſ. vi. 6. Mic. vi. 6, 7, 8. Ch. xii. 7. 1 Tim. i. 15.—V. 14. Mark ii. 18. Luke v. 33.—V. 15. John iii. 29.—V. 16. Or, raw, or unwrought cloth.

ſick, had the beſt title to it; and that as nobody ever blamed a phyſician for going into the company of the patients whoſe cure he had undertaken, ſo they could not blame Him for converſing with ſinners, ſince he did it to reclaim them. "Murmur not therefore, ye Scribes and Phariſees, that I eat and converſe with publicans and ſinners. My buſineſs is with ſuch; and the end of my coming into the world was the ſalvation of theſe. I converſe not with them to lull them in fatal ſecurity amidſt their vices, or to contract any taint from the contagion of their impurities; but as the phyſician viſits the chambers of the ſick, and is occupied amidſt the couches of the languiſhing and the diſtreſſed; ſo do I, as the great Phyſician of the ſoul, ſeek out the ſick and diſeaſed in mind, and offer health and ſalvation to the children of men,—ſuffering under a malady the moſt mortal and inveterate, the malady of ſin: And what phyſician, in caſes of diſtreſs and danger, ſtands upon the niceties of form, or the exactneſs of punctilio? Why then do you marvel and murmur, that I, in the like extremities, act in the like manner?" It is to be noted, that this is a proverbial expreſſion, they that be whole, &c. which hath been known to ſome heathen philoſophers, who have made uſe of it in return to ſimilar reproaches: Supervacuus inter ſanos Medicus, ſays Quintilian. When Antiſthenes was aſked why he converſed with wicked men, his anſwer was, Καὶ οἱ ἰατροὶ μετὰ τῶν νοσουντων εισι, "Phyſicians are converſant with the ſick." Our Saviour moreover deſired his adverſaries ſeriouſly to conſider the meaning of what God had declared by the prophet Hoſea, ch. vi. 6. I will have mercy rather than ſacrifice: "Where the one or the other muſt be omitted, let mercy, by all means,—let the work of compaſſion, beneficence, and love, be preferred to ſacrifice; to inſtituted forms, and merely external ordinances; which, though neceſſary in themſelves, and highly uſeful, as ordained of God, and as means to an important end, muſt yet never deſtroy that end, but give place and preference to it; for of all thing mercy, acts of humanity and benevolence, are moſt pleaſing to the God of love; and of all acts, as being the moſt humane and beneficent, the ſalvation of loſt ſinners from deſtruction and death: And this is the great work for which I came into the world; this is the great end I have to accompliſh: I am not come to call the righteous, but ſinners, to repentance: The repentance of righteous perſons is not ſo much the object of my attention, as the converſion of ſinners." Mr. Locke obſerves, that this latter clauſe ſhould be joined to the 12th verſe. (See Mark ii. 17. Luke vii. 31, 32.) I come not to cure thoſe who are whole, but thoſe that are ſick. For a like form of expreſſion, ſee 1 Cor. i. 17. Some commentators imagine, that ſelf-righteous perſons are here ſpoken of, and that this is a kind of ironical reflection on the Phariſees; "I came not to ſave ſuch righteous perſons as you are:" But the ſcope and connection of the paſſage ſeems to confirm the former meaning. By citing the paſſage from Hoſea, Jeſus inſinuated, that in his labours for the converſion of ſinners, he acted from a principle of benevolence. Here he appeals to his practice for a proof of that inſinuation; as if he had ſaid, "Ye cannot doubt that I am actuated by the moſt lively charity, ſince you ſee me ſpend my pains, not ſo much in exhorting the pious to change their lives, as thoſe whoſe vices have made a total reformation neceſſary: A ſcheme more difficult, dangerous, and exceptionable than the other; which I would certainly purſue, were I influenced by conſiderations of intereſt." Thus our Lord clearly proved a capital doctrine of right reaſon and true religion, which the teachers of thoſe times, notwithſtanding they boaſted of their knowledge, ſeem to have loſt the very idea of; namely, that ceremonial inſtitutions ſhould always give place to works of charity. See the note on ch. xii. 7. Wetſtein, Macknight, and my "firſt ſermon before the governors of the Magdalen charity," on this text.

Ver. 14—17. Then came to him the diſciples of John] The alterations of Dr. Waterland and the manuſcript are, ver. 16. A patch of new cloth upon, &c.—For the patch will draw from the garment, and a worſe rent is made. Ver. 17. Old ſkins; elſe the ſkins will burſt, and —are loſt; but, &c. into new ſkins. In the law we find only one faſt day enjoined, namely, the 10th of the 7th month, on which the national atonement was made. But the Jews, of their own accord, obſerved many other days of faſting See Iſai. lviii. 3. In our Lord's time days of this kind were more frequent than ever; eſpecially among the Phariſees, who, according to the practice of their ſect, faſted probably twice a week; ſee Luke xviii. 12. And therefore, as Jeſus did not pretend to teach his diſciples a more lax kind of diſcipline than John and the Phariſees, the diſciples of John were ſurpriſed to find them overlooking ſo eſſential a duty. As John the Baptiſt preached repentance, he not only lived upon coarſe diet, but alſo faſted often, and trained up his diſciples thereto. Comp. ch. xi. 18. Luke v. 33. and the note on ch. vi. 16. The expreſſion, Thy diſciples faſt not, may ſignify, "Do not faſt often," or, "are not uſed to faſt." See a ſimilar expreſſion, Mark xiv. 12. xv. 16. To this our Saviour replies, Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, &c.?" Would it not be improper for the gueſts at a wedding to faſt and weep while the marriage ſolemnity continues?—It would be equally improper for my diſciples to enter on a courſe of ſevere and ſtrict abſtinence, at the time that I am perſonally preſent with them, to give them joy." The children of the bride-chamber is an Hebrew phraſe, to denote "The friends of the bridegroom," who were wont to provide whatever was proper and neceſſary during the marriage feſtival. See John iii. 29. ch. v. 6. Pſ. xlv. 10. As John had deſcribed our Saviour under the name of bridegroom, ſo he repreſents himſelf here under that idea: And ſome have ſuppoſed that there is in this ſimilitude which our Saviour uſes, a reference to the book of Canticles, as is not impoſſible. Our Saviour adds, but the day will come, when, &c. by which he did not mean, as the Montaniſts affirm, that the Phariſaical faſts ſhould be introduced into his church when he was gone, but that his diſciples ſhould faſt and mourn, on account of the various calamities befalling them after his departure; and that they ſhould repeat theſe faſts as often as the circumſtances of diſtreſs and danger in which they were placed might require. Further, by the ſimilitude of a piece of new cloth put upon an old garment, ver. 16. He ſhewed his hearers, that to have laid on his diſciples precepts of frequent abſtinence, at a time when he was employing them to preach the goſpel, which aboliſhes all rites and ceremonies whatſoever, would have been as incongruous, as to fill up the holes of an old thread-bare garment with pieces of new cloth, which cannot be joined to the old, but with the danger of making the rent worſe. The proper meaning of the words, ῥάκους ἀγναφου, by which new cloth is expreſſed, is, "Cloth which hath not paſſed through the fuller's hands," and which is conſequently much harſher than what has been often waſhed and worn; and therefore yielding leſs than that, will tear away the edges to which it is ſowed; and thus it is a juſt repreſentation of perſons, who have not yet been trained up and inſtructed. In the next place, by the ſimilitude of new wine put into old leathern bottles, which burſt by the fermentation of the wine, He taught them, that the old corrupt nature of man will not admit all at once of a thorough reformation; and that infant virtue muſt not immediately be put to the greateſt trials, leſt it be killed with the ſeverity of the exerciſe. See the note on Pſ. cxix. 82. and on Luke v. 39. Some think that by the firſt of theſe parables is denoted the impropriety, in the laſt the danger, and in the middle one, both the impropriety and danger, of too great rigour with new converts. They ſhew, ſays Heylin, the doctrine of accommodating doctrines to ſtates; the former muſt vary with the latter. Souls of an advanced degree come under a different diſcipline, which would be prejudicial to novices in the heavenly kingdom, as Chriſt's diſciples yet were. The faſt which he preſcribes for them, was of a far deeper kind than the bodily abſtinence which the diſciples of John practiced. It was to be deprived of thoſe vital conſolations, with which they were now ſupported by his ſenſible preſence with them. Chriſt would not diſcourage his diſciples by over-rigorous inſtitutions; and it is unfit that his religion ſhould be burdened with them. He ſuits the duties of his people to their circumſtances, and kindly proportions their work to their ſtrength, with a tender regard to their weakneſs, till by degrees they may be fitted for the moſt difficult and humbling ſervices. See Iſai. xl. 11. From his example, and the whole genius of his goſpel, we ſhould learn to make all proper allowances to thoſe about us; that we may teach them and train them up, as they are able to bear it: Not cruſhing them under any unneceſſary load, nor denying them any indulgence which true friendſhip will permit us to grant them; leſt the good ways of God ſhould be miſrepreſented, diſgraced, and abandoned, through our imprudent, though well-meaning ſeverity. A caution to be peculiarly obſerved in our conduct toward young perſons, and not to be forgotten, with reſpect to thoſe who, like the diſciples here in queſtion, are training up for the miniſterial office. See Doddridge, Carpzov. Defence of the Hebrew Bible, p. 220. and Albert's obſervations, p. 71.

18 While he ſpake theſe things unto them, behold, there came a certain ruler, and worſhipped him, ſaying, My daughter is even now dead: but come, and lay thy hand upon her, and ſhe ſhall live.

19 And Jeſus aroſe, and followed him, and ſo did his diſciples.

20 (And behold, a woman which was diſeaſed with an iſſue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the hem of his garment:

21 For ſhe ſaid within herſelf, If I may but touch his garment, I ſhall be whole.

22 But Jeſus turned him about, and when he ſaw her, he ſaid, Daughter be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole. And the woman was made whole from that hour.)

23 And when Jeſus came into the ruler's houſe, and ſaw the minſtrels, and the people making a noiſe, 24 He ſaid unto them, Give place: for the maid is not dead, but ſleepeth. And they laughed him to ſcorn.

25 But when the people were put forth, he went in, and took her by the hand, and the maid aroſe.

26 And the ſame hereof went abroad into all that land.

27 And when Jeſus departed thence, two blind men followed him, crying, and ſaying, Thou ſon of David, have mercy on us!

28 And when he was come into the houſe, the blind men came to him: and Jeſus ſaith unto them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? They ſaid unto him, Yea, Lord.

29 Then touched he their eyes, ſaying, According to your faith, be it unto you.

30 And their eyes were opened; and Jeſus ſtraitly charged them, ſaying, See that no man know it.

31 But they, when they were departed, ſpread abroad his fame in all that country.

32 As they went out, behold, they brought unto him a dumb man poſſeſſed with a devil.

33 And when the devil was caſt out, the dumb ſpake: and the multitudes marvelled, ſaying, It was never ſo ſeen in Iſrael.

34 But the Phariſees ſaid, He caſteth out devils through the prince of the devils.

35 And Jeſus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their ſynagogues, and preaching the goſpel of the kingdom, and healing every ſickneſs, and every diſeaſe among the people.

36 But when he ſaw the multitudes, he was moved with compaſſion on them, becauſe they fainted, and were ſcattered abroad, as ſheep having no ſhepherd.

The original σωθήσομαι is literally I ſhall be ſaved; Dr. Doddridge renders it I ſhall be recovered; and he obſerves that there are many other places in which the word is uſed in the ſame ſenſe; as to be ſure it may with great propriety be applied to a reſcue from any imminent danger, or preſſing calamity, eſpecially in an extraordinary way. The ſame word is uſed in the next verſe. Compare Mark v. 23. vi. 36. Luke viii. 36. xvii. 19. xviii 42. John xi. 12. and Acts iv. 9.

Ver. 23. The minſtrels] The muſicians or pipers, Heylin; the players on the flute, L'Enfant. It was the cuſtom amongſt the Jews to have muſical inſtruments at funerals, whereon mournful tunes were played. See Jer. xlviii. 5, 36. Some learned authors obſerve, that the trumpet was uſed at the funerals of grown or old perſons, and the flute at thoſe of children; ſuch as was the daughter of Jairus, who was but twelve years old. Ver. 32, 33. A dumb man, &c.] A dumb demoniac. Wat. From the circumſtance of the demoniac's being dumb, Eraſmus conjectures, that he was alſo deprived of the uſe of his reaſon: if ſo, being inſenſible of his own miſery, he had as little inclination as ability to apply for a cure. He could not even make his miſery known by ſigns, and therefore needed to be brought to the Saviour by others; but being cured, he ſpoke both rationally and fluently, to the aſtoniſhment of all who heard him; inſomuch that they extolled the author of the miracle above all the prophets that had ever appeared: "It was never ſo ſeen, even in Iſrael itſelf, ſaid they—though it be a people among whom God hath wrought ſuch unparalleled wonders." This reflection was perfectly juſt; for no one of the prophets that we read of in the Old Teſtament appears to have wrought ſo many beneficial miracles in his whole life as our Lord did in this one afternoon; when he raiſed the daughter of Jairus from the dead, healed the woman that had a bloody iſſue, reſtored two blind men to their ſight, cured a dumb demoniac, &c. &c. See on ch. xv. 36. and, reſpecting the calumnies of the Phariſees in the next verſe, ch. xii. 24.

Ver. 36. Becauſe they fainted] The original, ἐκλελυμένοι, denotes here a kind of faintneſs; the weakneſs which is cauſed by hunger and wearineſs. See ch. xv. 32. Heb. xii. 3. There are notwithſtanding ſeveral Greek manuſcripts which read, as does alſo the Vulgate, weary, fatigued. Theſe multitudes came not only from the ſeveral parts of Galilee, but alſo from Judea and Idumea, from beyond Jordan, and the borders of Tyre and Sidon. Elſner ſeems to have proved beyond diſpute, that ἐῤῥιμμένοι, rendered ſcattered abroad, ſignifies properly "expoſed to every invading danger," as ſheep are when thrown up, and abandoned by the ſhepherd. Dr. Heylin reads, with the margin of our Bible, were tired and lay down. As the people were utterly neglected by their Scribes and Phariſees, the appointed public teachers, who ought to have inſtructed them, the indefatigable zeal with which our Lord now ſpread the knowledge of divine things, was moſt ſeaſonable and acceptable. The teachers juſt now mentioned were blind, perverſe, lazy guides, who every day diſcovered more and more their ignorance and wickedneſs. They either neglected the office of teaching altogether, or they filled the people's minds with high notions of ritual obſervances and traditions, to the utter diſparagement of moral duties, which in a manner they trampled under foot; ſo that inſtead of ſerving God, they ſerved their own glory, their gain, and their belly; wherefore, any appearance of religion which they had was wholly feigned and hypocritical, inſomuch that they rather did hurt by it, than were of real ſervice to the intereſts of virtue. Beſides, the common people being diſtracted by the diſagreeing factions of the Phariſees and Sadducees, knew not what to chooſe or refuſe; their caſe therefore called loudly for the compaſſion of Jeſus, which indeed was never wanting to them at any time; for he always cheriſhed the tendereſt affections towards his countrymen: But it flowed particularly on this occaſion, when he conſidered that they were in great diſtreſs for want of ſpiritual food. See the next ch. ver. 6. Elſner, Wolfius, Macknight. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that the 10th chapter ſhould certainly begin at the 35th verſe; for the connection is abſolutely and intirely broken by the preſent diviſion.

37 Then ſaith he unto his diſciples, The harveſt truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few;

38 Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harveſt, that he will ſend forth labourers into his harveſt.

Ver. 37. Luke x. 2. John iv. 35.—V. 38. 2 Theſ. iii. 1.

Ven. 37. The harveſt truly is plenteous] The multitude that followed Jeſus, and expreſſed ſo earneſt a deſire of receiving his inſtruction, gives him an occaſion of making this reflection: He compares Judea and the neighbouring countries to fields covered with ripe corn, where nothing was wanting but reapers. See John iv. 35. and L'Enfant.

Ver. 38. That he will ſend forth] The word ἐκβάλῃ plainly imports ſome degree of force. Doddridge therefore very properly tranſlates and paraphraſes the paſſage thus: "Therefore let me urge you to make your importunate ſupplicatious to the great Lord and maſter of the harveſt, that he would, by the ſecret and powerful energy of the Spirit on mens hearts, conquer their natural diſinclination to this excellent work; and ſo thruſt forth a ſufficient number of active and indefatigable labourers into his harveſt, by whom it may be ſucceſsfully carried on, to his own greater glory, and the edification and ſalvation of ſouls." Whoever conſiders the immenſe difficulties and oppoſitions with which every miniſter of Chriſt's kingdom was ſure to encounter in thoſe early days of it, will ſee the neceſſity of ſome unuſual neceſſity and impulſe on the mind to lead any to undertake it. See on ver. 9. Miniſters may learn of their Redeemer, who is repreſented in ſo amiable a light here before them, tenderly to pity thoſe who are faint and expoſed to danger, and are as ſheep having no ſhepherd. The extreme neceſſities of his churches in many places are but too apparent. It is our duty earneſtly to pray to God that he would behold them with compaſſion; that he would graciouſly provide for their inſtruction, and would thruſt forth ſuch labourers among them, as may be faithful and diligent in their work, and prove the happy inſtruments of gathering in fruits to everlaſting life. See Doddridge and Chemnitz.

REFLECTIONS ON THE MIRACULOUS CURES WROUGHT BY JESUS CHRIST.

The firſt and moſt obvious uſe intended by the miraculous cures which our Lord performed, was to convince men of the truth of his doctrine; and that they might have ſure ground to reaſon as Nicodemus did, when he ſaid to him, "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God; for no man can do theſe miracles which thou doſt, except God be with him." The firſt effect therefore which his miracles ought to have with us, ſhould be to make us cordially embrace his doctrines, and exert our utmoſt endeavours to put them in practice. Thoſe who apply themſelves to this with the greateſt fidelity and earneſtneſs, will ſooner or later meet ſuch difficulties, or perhaps real obſtacles in their religious courſe, as will convince them that mere inſtruction is not ſufficient; that beſides advice, they muſt have aſſiſtance too, and that the ſame divine power which was exerted to convince them of the truth of his doctrine, muſt concur to enable them to practiſe it: and they will by degrees come to feel ſuch a weight and burden of ſin, as will greatly oppreſs, and not a little diſcourage them. Here then a ſecond leſſon is to be learnt from the miraculous cures wrought by Chriſt; for thoſe great inſtances of his goodneſs and power will raiſe the languiſhing hopes of his diſtreſſed ſervants. And as every man naturally transfers the notions he is full of to the objects that come in his way, and our minds are ever quick at applying things to what we have moſt at heart; ſo when they reflect upon his bounty to the diſeaſed of every kind that were addreſſed to him in Paleſtine, they too will hope for ſome ſhare in his favours, and accordingly addreſs themſelves to him as the great phyſician of Souls. This is a general conſideration applicable to every miraculous cure which he performed. See on ch. vii. 8.

When we read with what ſucceſs the blind, the lame, the deaf, the lepers, and in ſhort the diſeaſed of every kind were addreſſed to him, ſo that no patient ever came to him in vain; but all diſtempers, though of the moſt malignant nature, though moſt obſtinate, and of many years continuance, though ſuch as had baffled all other remedies, were infallibly cured by him;—when I ſay we read theſe inſtances of his Almighty Power and Goodneſs, our own ſpiritual infirmities ſhould occur to our thoughts.

Have you nothing to aſk of this divine phyſician? Do you not with a ſigh, and as it were ſome ſort of envy, think how fortunate they were, who had ſuch eaſy acceſs to him in Paleſtine? And does not their ſucceſs raiſe ſome hope in your breaſt? In reaſon it ought to do ſo; for ſpiritual maladies are his proper province, and it is in the cure of theſe that his goodneſs principally delights to exert itſelf.

I ſay, that to be a healer of bodily diſtempers was a foreign character, which our Lord aſſumed only to make way for what is his genuine office, even to heal ſouls. For he wrought the outward cures only to convince us of his divine power, becauſe ſuch cures were viſible to all: they were, as he ſaid himſelf to John's diſciples, ſuch things as they could hear and ſee; they were ſuch groſs palpable proofs, as ſuited all capacities; whereas the operations of his Spirit are inviſible, aud are no ground of faith to any but thoſe who experience them. In condeſcenſion, therefore, he gave thoſe outward demonſtrations of Omnipotence, reſtoring ſenſes, limbs, and life itſelf; but theſe temporal favours may be accounted as very trivial, even as crumbs that fall from his table, in compariſon of what he then did, and ſtill actually does in the ſouls of thoſe who apply to him with the proper diſpoſitions. He cures the ſpiritual blindneſs and inſenſibility to divine truth. He takes away hydropic avarice, paralytic lazineſs, the leprous pruriency of foul deſires, and every evil luſt and paſſion. To cure theſe is his profeſſion and character: it is the work for which he came into the world, as the name of Jeſus teſtifies; and ſo the angel, who appointed that name, did at the ſame time explain it: Thou ſhalt call his name Jeſus, i. e. Saviour, for He ſhall ſave the people from their ſins.

Nor let us imagine that He is leſs powerful now that He ſitteth at the right-hand of God, than He was formerly, when in the days of his fleſh he ſojourned in Judea. The fulneſs of the Godhead does actually reſide in him for our uſe: I ſay, the fulneſs of the Godhead, i. e. Deity in its plenitude of power, does actually reſide in the perſon of Chriſt for our uſe: and He is ready, He is ever deſirous to communicate it; ſo that there is nothing wanting but capacities on our part to receive it. What thoſe are, we may ſhew in the following particulars:

Firſt, whoſoever would be cured of any ſpiritual malady, muſt go to Chriſt.

It is a wretched miſtake of ordinary Chriſtians, that they conſider Chriſt as inacceſſible ſince his aſcenſion, and conceive of Him only as highly exalted, and remote at an unmeaſurable diſtance from us: but this comes from not effectually believing, or, what amounts to the ſame thing, not conſidering the DIVINITY of our Saviour.

The divine nature of Chriſt has been treated of late as a ſpeculative queſtion to diſpute about: but it is really one of the moſt practical, as well as one of the moſt important points of our religion. For by this He is ever every-where preſent: He is in all things: He is in every man, as numberleſs paſſages of Scripture teſtify. Every man therefore is to ſeek Chriſt, where He is neareſt at hand; i. e. within himſelf. But few men look into themſelves: their ſoul is always abroad (if I may ſo ſpeak) and converſes only with outward things. Thoſe who would approach to Chriſt, muſt turn away from the world, and all outward ſenſible objects, to ſeek him inwardly, as in their hearts, by devout recollection; and they will then infallibly find him.

Chriſt, I ſay, by his divine nature, is Omnipreſent: He is therefore preſent within our minds, and we ought not to ſearch after him, as far diſtant from us. So St. Paul to the Romans: Say not in thin heart, who ſhall aſcend into heaven? (i. e. to bring Chriſt down from above) Or who ſhall deſcend into the deep? (i. e. to bring up Chriſ from the dead) but Chriſt is nigh thee, even in thy heart. By devotion we enter into our hearts, where Chriſt is preſent, where our Chriſt is preſent; I mean, Chriſt for our uſe, to receive our addreſſes, and communicate his graces.

Secondly, when by devotion we are thus introduced into the preſence of Chriſt, we muſt declare our wants to Him, we muſt humbly expoſe our miſeries before him, with earneſt prayer for deliverance. For this there is no need of ſtudied ſpeeches: let us only imimite ſome of thoſe diſeaſed perſons who ſtory we read in the Goſpel: the paralytic for inſtance, whoſe double cure has been already mentioned. Although great efforts, and even violence had been uſed to introduce him to Jeſus; for the roof of the houſe had been broken open, and he was let down through the tiling: yet when he was preſented before the Lord, all the difficulty was over: his circumſtances ſpoke for him ſufficiently, they needed no interpreter: Proſtrate on his bed he turned his eyes to our Lord, and our Lord beheld him with compaſſion. He ſaw his miſery, his helpleſs miſery, and that he had no hopes, but in the mercy of his Saviour, this ſufficed to obtain his mercy. All his maladies were cured; his ſins, the ſource of all, were diſmiſſed; and he was reſtored to all that is valuable, health and innocence. We too ſhall find the ſame ſucceſs if to the diſpoſitions before recommended we add,

In the third place, faith, i. e. a worthy opinion of Chriſt. Th is apparently neceſſary; for to diſtruſt his power or his goodneſs i an injurious thought, which renders us unworthy of his favour And it is remarkable that he inſiſts upon faith more than any othe qualification, in the perſons who apply to him for relief.

In all divine operations upon the creatures, God requires the concurrence, as far as they are able. Conſequently He requires o every ſinner a ſenſe of his guilt, a ſincere deſire to be delivered fro it, and (which is a neceſſary effect of ſuch deſire) that the ſinner d all that is poſſible on his part for his own reformation: but as all h endeavours are not ſufficient, and God has vouchſafed to promiſe th He will make up what is wanting with the ſuccours of grace, H farther requires our faith in thoſe promiſes: we muſt do homage t the divine truth and goodneſs, with a ſincere and pious perſuaſi that God will ſupply what is defective by his redundant mercy, an help the real infirmity of our nature by ſupernatural aſſiſtan This is having a worthy opinion of God: and he demands it a previous diſpoſition in all ſubjects that are capable of it.

To teach us this (beſides the apparent reaſonableneſs of the thin our Lord in working his miraculous bodily cures, which, as I ſa are emblems of his divine operations on ſouls, frequently require public declaration of ſuch devout confidence in his goodneſs a power, before he exerted them for the relief of thoſe who implo his aſſiſtance. So, when two blind men had followed Him ho with cries ſoliciting his mercy; He ſaid unto them: Believe ye t I am able to do this? they ſay unto Him, yea, Lord. Then touched

CHAP. X.

Chriſt ſendeth out his twelve apoſtles, enabling them to do miracles; giveth them their charge, teacheth them, comforteth them againſt perſecutions, and promiſeth a bleſſing to thoſe that receive them.

AND when he had called unto him his twelve diſciples, he gave them power againſt unclean ſpirits to caſt them out, and to heal all manner of ſickneſs, and all manner of diſeaſe.

2 Now the names of the twelve apoſtles are theſe; The firſt, Simon, who is called

Ver. 1. Mark iii. 14. vi. 7. Luke vi. 13. ix. 1. Or, over.—V. 2. John i. 42.

their eyes, ſaying, According to your faith be it unto you. And ſtraightway their eyes were opened. We have another very edifying inſtance of the efficacy of faith in diſpoſing us for ſupernatural graces, in the man who beſought our Lord for his ſon, who had been diſtracted from his infancy by the poſſeſſion of a malignant ſpirit, that had often endangered his life. If thou canſt do any thing (ſaid the father, after repreſenting the deplorable condition of his child) have compaſſion on us, and help us. Jeſus ſaid unto him, if thou canſt believe, all things are poſſible to him that believeth. And ſtraightway the father of the child cried out, and ſaid with tears, Lord I believe, help Thou my unbelief. Jeſus accepted his humble faith, and ratified it in the cure of his ſon.

Many other inſtances of the ſame kind are recorded in the Goſpel for our inſtruction and encouragement, that we ſink not into deſpair upon the ſad experiment of our weakneſs and miſery; but that we ſhould approach with an holy confidence to the throne of grace, ſecure in his goodneſs, and careful only not to diſtruſt Him.

And leſt we ſhould fondly imagine that the ſupernatural aſſiſtance which Chriſt communicates to believers, was confined to the days of his fleſh; even after his reſurrection He declared to his diſciples, as a fundamental principle of his religion, That all power was given to Him in heaven and in earth. All Chriſtians acknowledge his power in heaven: but many forget it upon earth; they forget to have recourſe to it for their ſatisfaction, which is the work in which he principally delights to exerciſe it. He therefore ordered his Apoſtles to publiſh it through the world: and at the ſame time that they inſtructed men to obey his commands, leſt the perſons inſtructed ſhould be diſcouraged with the ſeeming difficulty of his ſublime precepts, they were to deliver down as an article of faith to all his true diſciples, That He would be with them always, even unto the end of the world: That He—He who hath all power in heaven and in earth, He would be with them unto the end of the world.

Fourthly, and laſtly, to obtain the amendment, and finally perfect the cure, which we ſeek from this divine Phyſician; we muſt, as becomes every reaſonable patient, and the nature of the caſe requires, give ourſelves up to his management, abandon ourſelves to his care, and endure his operations, though painful to our corrupt nature. We muſt drink of the cup which He preſents to us, even the cup of ſuffering. Fear it not, when His hand adminiſters it. He has tried the utmoſt force of it, and drank it to the dregs himſelf: but, tenderly compaſſionate as He is, and conſcious of our weakneſs, He will adminiſter it to us in ſuch due proportions, and with ſuch ſweet infuſion of heavenly peace and conſolation, or other ſpiritual ſupport, that it will prove the cup of health, the cup of ſalvation. See Dr. Heylin's lectures, p. 161. Dr. Jortin alſo, in his remarks on Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, vol. ii. p. 16. has ſome obſervations on this ſubject.

Chap. X. Ver. 1. And when he had called them] The diſtinction of the ſacred writings into chapters and verſes, which is a modern invention to facilitate references, has with that advantage great inconveniencies, becauſe it often breaks that thread of diſcourſe, which is the proper clue to lead us into the meaning of what follows. It will be ſeen how reaſonable this reflection is, if we look back to the 36th verſe, &c. of the preceding chapter, where we read that Jeſus, beholding the multitudes, (in their ſpiritual capacities, which were ever the principal object of his regard) had compaſſion on them, bocauſe they were tired and laid down, as ſheep that had no ſhepherd; Then ſaith he, &c. After this, as he himſelf was ever foremoſt, on all proper occaſions, to do what he commanded others, He paſſed the following night in prayer. See Luke vi. 12, 13. And the next morning he choſe twelve from among his diſciples, whom he conſtituted apoſtles; perſons ſent, i. e. eſpecial meſſengers, and ſent them forth with a peculiar commiſſion, as ſhepherds, to raiſe and guide thoſe dejected forlorn ſheep, who had moved his compaſſion; and as labourers, to be employed in the harveſt which was now mature, and fit for the threſhing-floor. The language is figurative, and there is an abſolute neceſſity that it ſhould be ſo; becauſe the mental diſpoſitions here ſpoken of have no proper names in human language, which conſiſts only of terms, that in their firſt ſignification all belong to the objects of ſenſe. The language is therefore figurative, and even different figures are here made uſe of to expreſs the ſame object; which alſo cannot ſometimes be avoided: For every ſimilitude is defective, and can ſhew but a part. Therefore, where one ſimilitude falls ſhort, another may aptly ſupply its deficiency, and repreſent, by new images, the whole of what was intended. Thus, in the paſſage now under conſideration, the ſame mental diſpoſition is expreſſed by two metaphors, both highly inſtructive, yet in different reſpects, for each gives a different leſſon. The firſt ſhews what kind of perſons are rightly diſpoſed to be admitted into that laſt and peculiar diſpenſation, which is called the kingdom of heaven; and the ſecond intimates to them who are to be admitted, what kind of treatment they are to expect there. See Heylin, the note on ver. 6. and on ch. iii. 7. It appears from the preſent verſe, that Jeſus had already choſen from among his diſciples thoſe whom he afterwards honoured with the name of Apoſtles. Comp. Mark iii. 14. Luke vi. 13. It is probable that he choſe twelve, in reference to the twelve tribes of Iſrael, (ſee ch. xix. 28. Luke xxii. 30. Rev. xxi. 12, 14. and comp. Exod. xxiv. 4. Deut. i. 23. Joſh. iv. 2, 3.) and therefore care was taken, on the death of Judas, to chooſe another to make up the number; which ſeems to have been a piece of reſpect paid to the Jews, previous to the grand offer of the Goſpel to them: whereas when they had generally rejected it, two more, Paul and Barnabas, were added, without any regard to the particular number of twelve. With reſpect to unclean ſpirits, it may be obſerved, that the Jews were perſuaded that God ſuffered evil ſpirits to inflict ſeveral diſeaſes on mankind; and therefore they diſtinguiſhed theſe diſeaſes into ſuch as rendered men unclean, and thoſe that did not. Thus the woman, mentioned Luke xiii. 11. who had a ſpirit of infirmity, that kept her bowed together, had not an unclean ſpirit, becauſe her diſtemper was not defiling; whereas thoſe who were afflicted with polluting diſtempers, were in their opinion poſſeſſed with unclean ſpirits. Now, as nothing was reckoned more defiling than ſepulchres, the perſons poſſeſſed with devils who dwelt therein, were, according to them, tormented with unclean ſpirits. It is alſo obſervable, that thoſe lying ſpirits, which inſpired the falſe prophets, are named in Scripture unclean ſpirits, Zech. xiii. 2. Rev. xvi. 13, 14. comp. Luke iv. 33. becauſe, in all probability, thoſe prophets went into ſepulchres to endeavour to get there ſome inſpiration: They were a kind of necromancers; for ever ſince the captivity, the Jews were very much addicted to magic. See L'Enfant, &c.

Ver. 2. Now the names, &c.] In the catalogue of the apoſtles, Simon and Andrew, the ſons of Jonah, are named firſt; not becauſe they were greater in dignity than their brethren of the apoſtolical college, but becauſe they had become Chriſt's diſciples before them. With reſpect to Andrew, this is plain from John i. 40, 41. and as for Peter, he may have been the ſecond diſciple, notwithſtanding it was another perſon who accompanied Andrew when he firſt converſed with Jeſus. That perſon is ſuppoſed to have been John, the ſon of Zebedee, and the author of the Goſpel, becauſe he is there ſpoken of in the manner that John uſually ſpeaks of himſelf. But whoever he was, Peter may have been a diſciple before him, becauſe it by no means follows from Andrew's being convinced, that his companion was convinced alſo. The foundation of his faith may have been laid at that meeting, though he did not acknowlege Chriſt's miſſion till afterwards. Now as ſome one of his diſciples was to have the firſt place in the catalogue, the earlineſs of Peter's faith might be a reaſon for conferring that honour on him. But he takes place even of his brother Andrew, who was converted before him, perhaps becauſe decency required it, being, as is generally believed, his elder brother. In like manner, James the ſon of Zebedee, being elder than John his brother, is mentioned before him, though it is probable he was the younger diſciple. Whatever was the reaſon of ranking the Apoſtles in the catalogue, we are certain they are not ranged according to their dignity: for had that been the caſe, the order of the names would not have been different in the different Evangeliſts; neither would the Apoſtle Paul, in ſpeaking of the pillars of the church, Galat. ii. 9. have mentioned James the Leſs before Peter.—In the catalogue, Simon, the brother of Andrew, is diſtinguiſhed from the other Simon by the ſurname of Peter, which had been conferred on him when he firſt became acquainted with Jeſus at Jordan. The reaſon of the name, however, was not aſſigned till long after that, viz. when Simon declared his faith in Jeſus as the Meſſiah, Matt. xvi. 17, 18. for it was then that Jeſus told him he was called Cephas, and Peter (which by interpretation is a rock) on account of the fortitude wherewith he was to preach the goſpel.—Simon and Andrew were originally fiſhermen, and inhabitants of Bethſaida, a town ſituated on the north ſhore of the lake of Genneſareth; but after Peter was married, he and his brother ſettled in Capernaum, perhaps becauſe his wife lived there. Before they became acquainted with Chriſt they were diſciples of the Baptiſt, who pointed him out to them as the Meſſiah. Andrew has left no writings, for which reaſon we are at a loſs to judge of his ſpirit and endowments; but Peter was the author of the two Epiſtles which bear his name.

James and John, the ſons of Zebedee, were alſo fiſhermen; they dwelt in Capernaum, and ſeem to have been rather in better circumſtances than Peter and Andrew; for the Goſpels ſpeak of their having hired ſervants to aſſiſt them in their buſineſs. John is thougbt to have been the youngeſt of all the apoſtles; yet he was old enough to have been the follower of John the Baptiſt before he came to Chriſt.—On this, or ſome other occaſion, James and John, the ſons of Zebedee, obtained the ſurname of Boanerges, i. e. the ſons of thunder, perhaps becauſe of the vehemency and impetuoſity of their tempers. Accordingly their ſpirit ſhewed itſelf in the deſire they expreſſed to have the Samaritans deſtroyed by fire from heaven, becauſe they refuſed to lodge Jeſus, in his way to Jeruſalem. It appeared alſo in their ambition to become the great officers of ſtate in their maſter's kingdom, which they ſuppoſed would be a ſecular one. Beſides, John's writings ſhew that he was a man of a warm and affectionate turn of mind. The warmth of his temper gave him a ſingular fitneſs for friendſhip, in which he was not only amiable above all the diſciples, but happy, as it rendered him the object of Chriſt's peculiar love; a love which will do him honour to the end of the world. As for James, his being put to death by Herod, is a proof that his zeal was uncommon, and that it moved him to be more active and bold than the reſt in the work of the Goſpel. Had it been otherwiſe, he would not have become the object either of Herod's jealouſy or reſentment.—Some indeed are of opinion, that the epithet ſons of thunder was not expreſſive of the diſpoſitions of the two brothers, but of the force and ſucceſs with which they ſhould preach the Goſpel; yet if that had been the reaſon of the ſurname, it was equally applicable to all the Apoſtles.—Philip is ſaid to have been a native of Bethſaida, the town of Peter and Andrew. He was originally a diſciple of the Baptiſt; but he left him to follow Jeſus, as ſoon as he became acquainted with him at Jordan. John i. 44.—Bartholomew is ſuppoſed to have been the diſciple called Nathanael, whoſe converſion is related John i. 45. The ancients tell us, he was a native of Cana, and ſkilled in the law.—Matthew was a rich publican of Capernaum: he was otherwiſe named Levi, and left his gainful employment for the ſake of Chriſt. He wrote the Goſpel, to which his name is prefixed, and was the ſon of one Alpheus, of whom we know nothing but the name.—There is nothing ſaid of Thomas before his converſion: however, it is conjectured that, like the reſt, he was of mean extraction, and becauſe he is mentioned among thoſe who went a fiſhing, John xxi. 2, 3. it is ſuppoſed that he was a fiſherman by occupation. He obtained the ſurname of Didymus, probably, becauſe he was a twin, and made himſelf remarkable, by continuing longer than his brethren to doubt of Chriſt's reſurrection.—In the college of Apoſtles, beſides James the ſon of Zebedee and brother of John, Judas Iſcariot, who betrayed his maſter, and Simon ſurnamed Peter, we find James, ſurnamed the Leſs, or Younger (Mark xv. 40.) to diſtinguiſh him from the other James, the ſon of Zebedee, who was elder than he: alſo Judas, ſurnamed Thaddeus (Mark iii. 18.) and Lebbeus, the brother of James the Leſs, and Simon, ſurnamed Zelotes. James the Leſs, Judas Thaddeus, and Simon Zelotes were brothers, and ſons of one Alpheus or Cleophas, who was likewiſe a diſeiple, being one of the two to whom our Lord appeared on the road to Emmaus after his reſurrection. They were called Chriſt's brethren (Matt. xiii. 55.) that is, his couſins, in which ſenſe the word is uſed, Lev. x. 4. It ſeems their mother Mary was ſiſter to Mary our Lord's mother; for it was no unuſual thing among the Jews to have more children than one of a family called by the ſame name. The three Apoſtles, therefore, who go by the name of our Lord's brethren, were really his couſin-germans.—James the Leſs and Judas Thaddeus wrote the Epiſtles which bear their names. This James was a perſon of great authority among the Apoſtles; for in the council which met at Jeruſalem to decide the diſpute about the neceſſity of circumciſion, we find him, as preſident of the meeting, ſumming up the debate, and wording the decree.—Simon, the couſin of our Lord, is called by Matthew and Mark the Cananite; but from the above account of his relations it is plain, that the epithet does not expreſs his deſcent, otherwiſe his brothers James and Judas ought to have been termed Cananites likewiſe. Luke calls him Simon Zelotes, which ſeems to be the Greek tranſlation of the Hebrew appellation given him by Matthew and Mark. From קנא [kena] zelotyphus fuit,—he was jealous, comes the Chaldaic word קנן [kenen] zelotes,—a zealot. See Buxtorff on the word. Put the Greek termination to this Chaldaic word, and it becomes κανανιτης: wherefore the appellation of Cananités, given to Simon here and in Mark, and the epithet Zelotés which he bears in Luke, are as perfectly the ſame as Cephas and Petros, Tabitha and Dorcas. The Zealots were a particular ſect or faction among the Jews, who in later times, under colour of zeal for God, committed all the diſorders imaginable. They pretended to imitate the zeal which Phinehas, Elijah, and the Maccabees expreſſed, in their manner of puniſhing offenders; but they acted from blind fury, or from worſe principles, without regard either to the laws of God, or to the dictates of reaſon. Some are of opinion, that Simon the Apoſtle had formerly been one of this peſtilent faction; but as there is no mention made of it till a little before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem (Joſeph. Bel. lib. iv. c. 3.) we may rather ſuppoſe that the ſurname of Zelotes was given him on account of his uncommon zeal in matters of true piety and religion.—Judas the traitor was the ſon of one Simon, John vi. 17. He had the ſurname of Iſcariot given him, to diſtinguiſh him from Judas Thaddeus, our Lord's couſin. The literal meaning of Iſcariot is, a man of Cariot, or Kerioth, which was a town in the tribe of Judah, Joſh. xv. 25. In all probability therefore this ſurname denotes the place of the traitor's nativity. Some pretend, that among the Jews no perſon was ſurnamed by the place of his birth, but ſuch as were illuſtrious on account of their ſtation; and ſo would have us believe, that Judas was a perſon of ſome diſtinction. They think his being intruſted with the bag, or common-ſtock purſe, preferably to all the reſt, is a confirmation of this; but as the other Apoſtles were men of mean condition, theſe arguments are too trivial to prove that Judas was diſtinguiſhed from them in that particular.

Peter, and Andrew his brother; James the ſon of Zebedee, and John his brother;

5 Theſe twelve Jeſus ſent forth, and commanded them, ſaying, Go not forth into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not.

Thus were the foundations of the church laid in twelve illiterate Galileans, who being at firſt utterly ignorant of the nature and end of their office, and deſtitute of the qualifications neceſſary to diſcharge the duties of it—integrity excepted, were the moſt unlikely perſons in the world to confound the wiſdom of the wiſe; to baffle the power of the mighty; to overturn the many falſe religions which then flouriſhed every where, under the protection of civil government; and, in a word, to reform the univerſally-corrupted manners of mankind. Had human prudence been to make choice of inſtruments for ſo grand an undertaking, doubtleſs ſuch as were remarkable for deep ſcience, ſtrong reaſoning, and prevailing eloquence, would have been pitched upon; and theſe endowments probably would have been ſet off with the external advantages of wealth and power. But lo! the wiſdom of God, infinitely ſuperior to that of men, acted quite differently in this matter: for the treaſure of the Goſpel was committed to earthen veſſels, that the excellency of its power might in all countries be ſeen to be of God. Accordingly, the religion which theſe Galileans taught through the world, without having at all applied themſelves to letters, exhibited a far juſter notion of things than the Grecian and Roman philoſophers were able to attain, though their lives were ſpent in contemplation aud ſtudy. Hence, by its own intrinſic ſplendor, as well as by the external glory of the miracles which accompanied it, this religion ſhewed itſelf to be altogether of divine original. Beſides, it was attended with a ſucceſs anſwerable to its dignity and truth. It was received every where by the bulk of mankind with the higheſt applauſe, as ſomething they had hitherto been ſeeking in vain, while the maxims and precepts of the philoſophers never ſpread themſelves farther than their particular ſchools. It was therefore with the higheſt wiſdom that the foundations of the church were thus laid in the labours of a few weak illiterate fiſhermen: for with irreſiſtible evidence it demonſtrated that the immenſe fabric was at firſt raiſed, and is ſtill ſuſtained, not by the arm of fleſh, but purely by the hand of Almighty God. See Macknight. Dr. Waterland reads Zealot, ver. 4. inſtead of Cananite.

Ver. 5. Go not into the way, &c.] It may ſeem ſtrange that our Lord neither preached himſelf to the Gentiles, nor allowed his diſciples to preach among them, during his own life-time; eſpecially when it is evident that he came into the world on purpoſe to deſtroy the polytheiſm of the heathens, their idol mediators, and their idolatrous worſhip, and to eſtabliſh the knowledge of the true God, and of the only Mediator between God and man, and of the right method of attaining his favour: but our wonder will ceaſe, when the reaſon of his conduct is underſtood. As the Jews were the only people in the world who believed in the one true God, Before his meſſengers attempted to preach him to the heathens, it was fit that they ſhould prove their miſſion, to the conviction of the Jews; inſtruct them more fully in the fundamental doctrines of religion, and correct what errors had crept into their faith. Beſides, Chriſtianity was to be propagated through the world, not only by the force of its own intrinſic excellence, and by the miracles wherewith it was accompliſhed, but it was to make its way alſo by the evidence which it derived from the Jewiſh prophecies, and by the light thrown upon it, conſidered as the perfection of that grand ſcheme which was begun in the firſt ages, and carried on under various diſpenſations from time to time, till it obtained a more complete and laſting form under the Jewiſh oeconomy. It was highly expedient, therefore, that a competent number of Jews ſhould be converted to Chriſtianity, who might publiſh it to the reſt of the world, with all the evidence that was proper to be offered: but if, on account of the former revelation made to the Jews, it was abſolutely fit that the new revelation ſhould be preached by them to the reſt of the world, it was neceſſary that the Goſpel, at the firſt, ſhould be confined to them; becauſe, had it been preached to the Gentiles, that circumſtance alone would have made the Jews reject it univerſally. It is well known how high the prejudices of the Apoſtles themſelves ran on this head, even after they had received the gifts of the Spirit; being exceſſively offended with Peter, one of their number, who, by a viſion from heaven, had with difficulty been prevailed upon to preach to the proſelyte Cornelius. Nay, they were hardly brought to believe, that God intended to beſtow the Goſpel on the Gentiles, when they ſaw them receive the greateſt of its privileges themſelves, even the gifts of the Spirit; and though after this they preached to the Gentiles, yet, wherever they came, their cuſtom was to begin at the Jews, if there were any in the place, that all offence might be prevented; and on the Jews rejecting the Goſpel, they turned to the Gentiles. Acts xiii. 46. Thus, as the Apoſtle tells us, Rom. xiv. 8. Jeſus Chriſt was a miniſter of the circumciſion for the truth of God, to confirm the promiſes made unto the fathers, namely, concerning the converſion of the Gentiles, and that the Gentiles might glorify God on account of his mercy; the mercy of the new covenant which they enjoyed by their converſion to Chriſtianity. Had Jeſus Chriſt been a miniſter of the uncircumciſion, i. e. had he preached the Goſpe lat all to the Gentiles, the Jews would have rejected it; ſo that the proſelytes, and ſuch as held the faith of the proſelytes, which the wiſer ſort of the Gentiles ſeem generally to have done, would not have become Chriſt's diſciples with ſuch eaſe and readineſs. The reaſon was, the evidence of the Goſpel being greatly weakened by the unbelief of the Jews, the converts among the Gentiles would have been few in compariſon, and by that means, the promiſes made to the fathers, that in Chriſt all nations ſhould be bleſſed, would not have been confirmed, or ſo fully accompliſhed as it is by the ſcheme which Providence hath actually choſen. See Macknight. When our Saviour ſays, enter not into any city of the Samaritans, he means, "enter not with a deſign to preach." It is true, in the beginning of his miniſtry, our Lord himſelf preached to the Samaritans with great ſucceſs, John iv. 41, 42. and, therefore, had he ſent his Apoſtles among them, numbers in all probability would have been induced to believe; but the inveterate enmity which the Jews bore to the Samaritans made the converſion of the latter improper at this time, for the reaſons mentioned.

Ver. 6. But go rather to the loſt ſheep, &c.] See what has been ſaid concerning the metaphors of ſheep and harveſt, in the note on ver. 1. With reſpect to the firſt, it ſhould be remembered, that in the note on ch. iii. 7. it was obſerved, that men, as animals, have each of them a peculiar reſemblance to ſome particular ſpecies of other animals; which we exempliſied in the term lamb, ſheep, wolves, dogs, &c. we now further add, that theſe appellations are upon no account to be taken for indelible characters; but thoſe to whom they are applicable at one time, may in the future courſe of life ſo far controul their wrong propenſions, by a ſteady practice of the contrary virtues, as to merit a quite oppoſite character. To effect this, is the proper work of repentance, thence called μετανοια, i. e. a change of the mental diſpoſition, whereby the crafty, rapacious, miſchievous, ſtubborn, or other ſavage temper, may be tranſmuted into that ſimplicity, meekneſs, harmleſſneſs, and ductility, which conſtitute the character of ſheep, and will gradually qualify their profeſſors to be received into the Chriſtian fold. I ſay gradually, becauſe it ſuffices not to have attained this inoffenſive ſtate, but they muſt perſiſt in it with continual endeavours after greater improvement, till they have exhauſted their active force, and are become incapable of farther advancement in their preſent circumſtances. This is intimated by the ſituation in which our Lord is ſaid to behold the multitudes; viz. tired, lying down, and without a ſhepherd: When, in conſequence of this view, he directs his apoſtles to go in queſt of them, he calls them the loſt ſheep; not that they had gone aſtray from their Shepherd, for they wanted one; but loſt here imports, that they were quite at a loſs how to proceed, and actually periſhing for want of a guide. The word in the original for loſt, is the ſame which the diſciples uſed when they awoke our Lord in the ſtorm, (ch. viii. 25.) ſaying, Lord, ſave us! we periſh: "We are loſt, and deſpair of ſafety, but from your aſſiſtance." Such were the perſons who had moved the compaſſion of our Lord, and for whoſe ſake he had ſent forth his apoſtles to publiſh the glad tidings of his kingdom, with aſſurances, that divine power was at hand to take them under his more immediate regency. And as that kingdom was mental, and therefore not obvious to ſenſe, the Apoſtles were at the ſame time to give viſible proofs of its reality, by healing the ſick, cleanſing the lepers, raiſing the dead, and caſting out demons. Theſe miraculous teſtimonies were to thoſe who were rightly diſpoſed, a ſure ground of faith in Chriſt; and concurring with the attractions of heavenly grace, or rather, to uſe his own words, (John vi. 44.) the drawings of his Father, would induce them to reſign themſelves, with an implicit ſubmiſſion, to the conduct of his Spirit; even that divine nature, which was incarnate in Jeſus, and was from Him communicable to thoſe whoſe hearts were prepared to receive it. It is obſervable that the apoſtles, in this their particular commiſſion, were not to ſay, as was uſual upon more general occaſions, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is near; but barely to notify the nearneſs of that kingdom, and that acceſs was now opened to it; becauſe thoſe to whom they were now ſent had repented, and had brought forth the proper fruits of repentance, which fruits were alſo come to maturity, were ready for the harveſt, and to be carried off the ground they grew on, into the threſhing-floor, where the further purification, foretold by St. John, was to be accompliſhed. Thus we ſee the metaphor is changed: The allegorical ſheep are now ſpoken of as corn ripe for the harveſt, to intimate what kind of treatment the perſons here ſignified were to expect. See on ch. iii 10, 11. and Heylin "on the origin and progerſſion of virtue through the legal to the Evangelical diſpenſation."

Ver. 7. Preach, ſaying, &c.] Κηρύσσετε, which is derived from κήρυξ, a herald, ſignifies, "Proclaim, with that ardour and zeal which becomes my heralds." Probably they were to make this proclamation with a loud voice, as they paſſed through the ſtreets of the towns which they viſited, as Jonas declared his meſſage to Nineveh. See Jonas iii. 4. and Doddridge.

Ver. 8. Raiſe the dead] In ſeveral copies this clauſe is wanting; for which reaſon, and becauſe the diſciples did not raiſe any perſons from the dead that we read of, till after Chriſt's aſcenſion, Dr. Mill takes it for an interpolation. But his opinion is ill-founded; as it is certain that this, with ſeveral other articles in the Apoſtles' firſt commiſſion, have a direct relation to the period comprehended under that more extenſive commiſſion which they received after their Maſter's reſurrection. See ver. 18, 21, 23. Whitby, and Wetſtein. That the direction at the end of this verſe, freely, or gratis ye have received, freely give, relates to the miraculous cures which the Apoſtles were empowered to perform, and not to the ſtated offices of the apoſtolical function, is evident from Luke x. 7. where our Lord, in giving a like commiſſion to the LXX, bids them eat and drink what was ſet before them, becauſe the labourer was worthy of his hire; nay, in this very charge, no ſooner did he order the Apoſtles to give freely, than he forbad them to provide gold, &c. becauſe the workman is worthy of his meat; [deſerves his maintenance. Heylin.] plainly intimating, that while they were preaching, they had a right of maintenance from thoſe who enjoyed the benefit of their labours, and ſhould, in the courſe of divine Providence, be ſupplied with all things neceſſary. Accordingly we find the Apoſtles receiving ſuch maintenance, and inſiſting upon it as their due, 1 Cor. ix. 4, 5, 14. Galat. vi. 6. See Macknight.

Ver. 9. Braſs in your purſes] The Greek word κτήσησθε, which ſignifies to poſſeſs, ſignifies alſo to get, to furniſh oneſelf with; which is the meaning of it here. The ſtreſs ſeems to lie on this word: They might uſe what they had already, but they might not delay at all to provide any thing more, nor take any thought about it. Nor indeed were they to take any thing with them, more than was ſtrictly neceſſary; leſt it ſhould retard them, and becauſe they were to learn hereby to truſt God in all future exigencies. In your purſes, in the Greek is ζώνας, girdles. The eaſtern girdles being doubled, and ſewed along the edges, were more convenient for carrying a quantity of money than purſes; becauſe the money, being diſtributed round the body in the fobs of the girdle, the weight of it was not ſo much felt. By money therefore in their girdles, is to be underſtood a conſiderable ſum. See Calmet, L'Enfant, and Shaw's Travels, p. 227.

Ver. 10. Nor ſcrip for your journey] The ſcrip, Πήρα, was a ſort of large bag, in which ſhepherds, and thoſe who journeyed, carried their proviſions. See on Luke x. 34. Thus the bag into which David put the ſmooth ſtones, wherewith he ſmote Goliath, is called both a ſcrip and a ſhepherd's bag. In the account which St. Mark gives of the repetition of theſe inſtructions, immediately before the diſciples took their journey, He ſays, they were permitted to be ſhod with ſandals, ch. vi. 9. The ſandal was a piece of ſtrong leather or wood, faſtened to the ſole of the foot with ſtrings, which they tied round the foot and ancle; but the ſhoe was a kind of ſhort boot, that covered the foot and part of the leg, and was a more delicate piece of dreſs than the ſandals. See Calmet on the word ſandals, and Lightfoot. St. Mark ſays, ch. vi. 8. that they were allowed to take a ſtaff; which Calmet thinks may be reconciled with St. Matthew, by attending to the ambiguity of the Hebrew word שבט ſhebet, anſwering to the Greek word ῥάβδος; for, as the Hebrew ſignifies any ſort of rod, whether club, ſtaff, ſceptre, or pole, He thinks the ſtaff, which, according to St. Matthew, the diſciples were prohibited to uſe, may have been a pole for carrying a burden on; an accoutrement which was uſeleſs, as they were not allowed to carry any proviſions with them, nor any ſpare clothes; whereas the ſtaff, which, by St. Mark's account he permitted them to take, was a walking ſtaff, very proper for thoſe who were to perform a journey with expedition. Heinſius labours to prove, that εἰ μὴ, the exceptive particle in Mark, may ſignify no not; and ſo would have the clauſe εἰ μὴ ῥάβδον μόνον, tranſlated no, not a ſingle ſtaff. But the more probable ſolution of the difficulty ſeems to be, that ſuch of the Apoſtles as had ſtaffs in their hands, might take them; as for thoſe who were walking without them, they were not to provide them; for, as the providence of God was to ſupply them with all neceſſaries, to have made the leaſt preparation for their journey would have implied a diſbelief of their Maſter's promiſe. Dr Waterland reads here, Nor yet a ſtaff.

Ver. 11. Enquire who in it is worthy] Anciently they had no houſes of entertainment for the accommodation of travellers, but only houſes for lodging them, called in modern language caravanſeras, into which travellers brought their own proviſions, and accommodated themſelves in the beſt manner they could; but it was common for perſons of humane diſpoſitions, ſuch as our Lord here calls ἄξιοι, worthy perſons, to entertain ſtrangers according to their ability. See Judg. xix. 15, 21.

Ver. 12, 13. When ye come, &c.] The Vulgate, and many manuſcripts, add at the end of the 12th verſe,—Saying, peace be to this houſe; words, which we find in the parallel place, Luke x. 5. and which ſerve to explain the verſe following; for they ſhew that this ſalutation was no formal compliment in the mouths of the apoſtles, but efficacious to minds rightly diſpoſed. A calm and compoſed ſpirit, and a total ſilence of the paſſions, is neceſſary for hearing the word of God profitably. See Heylin, Exod. xviii. 7. John xiv. 27.

Ver. 14. Whoſoever ſhall not receive you] In Scripture to receive one, ſignifies, to allow him the benefit of our company, to converſe familiarly with him, and to do them good offices. See Luke xv. 2. It ſignifies alſo to entertain one hoſpitably, being applied twice to Rahab's entertaining the ſpies, Heb. xi. 31. James ii. 25. The Jews thought there was ſomething of ſo peculiar an holineſs in the land of Iſrael, that when they came home from any heathen country, they ſtopped at its borders, and wiped the duſt of it from their ſhoes, that the ſacred inheritance might not be polluted with it: Nor would they permit herbs to be brought to them from their neighbours, leſt they ſhould bring any of the duſt of their land upon them. So that the action here enjoined to the Apoſtles of ſhaking off the duſt, was a lively intimation, that when the Jews had rejected the Goſpel, they were no longer to be regarded as the people of God, but were on a level with heathens and idolaters. See Fleming's Chriſtology, vol. ii. p. 160. Doddridge, and Calmet.

Ver. 16. Behold, I ſend you forth as ſheep, &c.] Conſidering the nature of the tidings which the Apoſtles were now ſent out to publiſh, namely, that the kingdom of heaven was at hand; the number and variety of miraculous cures they were enabled to perform, in confirmation of their doctrine; and the greatneſs of the benefits they were empowered to confer upon the families who ſhould entertain them kindly; it is reaſonable to think that they were flattering themſelves with the hopes of great honour and acceptance wherever they came. In the mean time, the event was by no means to anſwer their expectation; they were every where to be deſpiſed, perſecuted, delivered up into the hands of public juſtice, and puniſhed as evil-doers. Our Lord, therefore, in the moſt fair and generous manner, forewarned them of theſe things; made them large promiſes of the divine aid, and gave them directions with reſpect to their conduct in every circumſtance. Behold, I ſend you forth, &c. "I ſend you forth weak and defenceleſs amongſt a cruel and wicked people." Be ye therefore wiſe as ſerpents, and harmleſs as doves. "On the one hand, be ſo prudent as not to irritate them, either by your behaviour or doctrine unneceſſarily, ch. vii. 6. And on the other, let not your prudence degenerate into craft, leſt it lead you to betray the truth, or to encourage men in their evil practice. Join prudence and innocence together; rendering yourſelves remarkable for integrity amidſt the greateſt temptations, and for meekneſs under the greateſt provocation." The word rendered harmleſs, ἀκέραιοι, properly ſignifies pure and unmixed, or elſe innocent, and unwilling to do any harm. See Stockius. The ſimplicity recommended here, includes meekneſs, ſincerity, and innocence; and it is with theſe virtuous qualities that Jeſus Chriſt tempers what might be pernicious in the ſerpents, whoſe prudence is commonly accompanied with a miſchievous diſpoſition. See Gen. iii. 1. Our bleſſed Saviour has given remarkable inſtances of the prudence he requires here in his diſciples. Comp. chap. xxii. 21, &c. Bp. Warburton obſerves, that the character of the Chriſtian miſſion is denoted in theſe words, Behold, I ſend you forth as ſheep; and the condition of an unbelieving world in the following,—I ſend you in the midſt of wolves. Though the faith was to be propagated only by the mild meaſures of perſuaſion, yet even this would provoke the wolfiſh diſpoſition of the powers of darkneſs to put in uſe all the iniquitous contrivances of fraud and violence for its oppreſſion. Their provident maſter, therefore, delivers them a rule for the innocence and prudence of their own conduct; Be ye wiſe, &c. a direction equally reſpecting their private and their public characters, whereby the firſt might correſpond with the dignity of their office, and the other with the objects of their care. So that, as men, the human virtues, as miſſionaries the ſocial, are recommended to their practice, and both under the familiar images of the ſerpent's wiſdom, and the dove's innocence. What theſe human virtues are, the alluſion in the figurative expreſſion will diſcover; what the ſocial, muſt be determined by the occaſion of the precept; be ye therefore wiſe as ſerpents, and harmleſs as doves; a direction conveyed in two proverbial ſayings, whoſe import the diſciples perfectly underſtood. The firſt alludes to a vulgar ſuppoſition of the ancient world, which gave credit to certain artiſts, who pretended to the power of rendering ſerpents innoxious by the force of charms and incantations. The men who traded in this impoſture, in order to hide their frequent miſcarriages, made the people believe, that ſome of theſe ſerpents had gotten a trick as good as their own, which was, to ſhut their ears to their enchantments. Hence the proverb of the deaf adder that ſtoppeth her ears, which refuſeth to hear the voice of the charmer, charm he never ſo wiſely; by which moraliſts would infer the wiſdom and ſafety of abſtaining from unlawful pleaſures. The ſecond, of being harmleſs as doves, alludes to as ancient and as fanciful an error of the naturaliſts, that the dove is without a gall, or at leaſt bears it not within. The whole of this monition therefore to the diſciples in their private character implies, that they ſhould learn to abſtain from all unlawful, unmanly, and intemperate pleaſures, and to ſuppreſs in themſelves all the ſentiments of rage, envy, and revenge. The ſerpent's wiſdom being directed againſt the concupiſcible paſſions, as the dove's innocence is againſt the iraſcible; and both together make one good precept for the ſubjection of our brutal nature to the rational, in which conſiſts the exerciſe of the human virtues. Could any thing be more harmleſs than this method of propagating religion? Could any thing be more holy than the manners of its propagators? What regard to the rights of men, to the laws of ſociety, was enjoined to the offerers of the Goſpel! What neglect of the intereſts of fleſh and blood was required of the receivers of it! Truth was the laſting foundation on which Jeſus erected his church, and virtue the living principle which was to actuate its members. Indeed the purity of his intentions, and the rectitude of his meaſures are ſo evident from the evangelic hiſtory of his life and death, that the moſt ſtubborn infidel is ready to clear him of fraudulent impoſture, and to center all his ſuſpicions in a well-meaning enthuſiaſm. This is the laſt miſerable refuge of obſtinate impiety; and to ſee it expoſed in all its nakedneſs, we refer the reader to the Reflections at the end of this chapter.

Ver. 17, 18. But beware of men] "Though I order you to be meek and patient under injuries, I do not mean that you ſhould not be on your guard, and, if poſſible, avoid them: no, the more circumſpect you are, the better; for, after all, you will meet with many indignities, and often be in danger of death, even from the hand of public juſtice." They will deliver you up to the ſanhedrim, or conſiſtories, and ſcourge you in their ſynagogues. Scourging is a ſort of diſcipline which has long ſince been uſed in the ſynagogues, where they keep their courts. See L'Enfant's introduction.—And ye ſhall be brought before governors, &c. Theſe things did not happen while the Apoſtles were on their firſt miſſion, but after Chriſt's aſcenſion. See Acts iv. 6, 7. v. 40. xii. 3. &c. &c.—For a teſtimony againſt them and the Gentiles: "All theſe things are ordered to befal you, that your innocence may appear, and that the truth of the Goſpel may be demonſtrated." Had the Apoſtles never come before the ſupreme powers, nor defended their cauſe in the preſence of kings and governors, it might have been ſaid, that becauſe Chriſtianity could not bear a ſtrict examination from able judges, it was preached to none but men of vulgar underſtandings, who were not capable of de-

19 But when they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye ſhall ſpeak: for it ſhall be given you in that ſame hour what ye ſhall ſpeak.

20 For it is not ye that ſpeak, but the Spirit of your Father which ſpeaketh in you.

21 And the brother ſhall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child: and the children ſhall riſe up againſt their parents, and cauſe them to be put to death.

22 And ye ſhall be hated of all men for my name's ſake: but he that endureth to the end, ſhall be ſaved.

23 But when they perſecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I ſay unto you, Ye ſhall not have gone over the cities of Iſrael, till the Son of man be come.

24 The diſciple is not above his maſter, nor the ſervant above his lord.

25 It is enough for the diſciple that he be as his maſter, and the ſervant as his lord. If they have called the maſter of the houſe Beelzebub, how much more ſhall they call them of his houſhold?

26 Fear them not therefore: for there is nothing covered, that ſhall not be revealed; and hid, that ſhall not be known.

27 What I tell you in darkneſs, that ſpeak ye in light: and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the houſe-tops.

28 And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the ſoul: but rather fear Him which is able to deſtroy both ſoul and body in hell.

tecting it: but when perſons of the higheſt diſtinction for birth, fortune, capacity, and learning had the Goſpel laid before them, in the defences which the Apoſtles and firſt preachers of it were obliged to make at the public tribunals of every country, its ſtanding ſuch a tribunal was certainly a great confirmation of its truth to perſons of inferior note. Wherefore, as Jeſus here foretold, the bringing of his Apoſtles before kings, became a teſtimony of their innocence, and of the truth of the Goſpel, and conſequently an undeniable proof of the guilt both of Jews and Gentiles who neglected it. See Macknight, Clarke, and the hiſtories of the firſt ages of the church.

Ver. 19, 20. But when they deliver you up, take no thought] Be not ſolicitous. Wat. This direction was repeated on ſeveral occaſions afterwards, particularly Luke xii. 11. Mark xiii. 11. The Apoſtles, being illiterate men, and wholly unacquainted with the laws of the different countries whither they were to go, as well as with the forms of their courts, their Maſter foreſaw that they would be in great perplexity, when they appeared as criminals before perſons of the firſt diſtinction. He foreſaw, likewiſe, that this circumſtance would occur to themſelves, and render them anxious to meditate beforehand by what apology they might beſt defend ſo noble a cauſe. More than once, therefore, he expreſly forbad them to be in the leaſt ſolicitous about the defences they were to make, nor ſo much as to premeditate any part of them; promiſing to afford them, on all occaſions, the aid of their Father's Spirit, who would inſpire them to ſpeak in a manner becoming the cauſe they were to defend. Nothing ſurely could have been more ſuitable, than the promiſe which our Lord here makes them; nor can one conceive any admonitions and declarations further from the language of impoſture and enthuſiaſm, than thoſe before us in the preſent chapter. See Dr. Whitby's admirable preface to the ſecond volume of his Commentary.

Ver. 21. And the brother ſhall deliver up, &c.] "Such is the nature of the men among whom you are going, and ſuch the obſtinacy with which they will oppoſe the Goſpel, that were it their brother, their father, or their ſon who preach it, they would make no ſcruple of being active in putting theſe neareſt relations to death. You may therefore expect the hotteſt perſecution; but as you are to have great aſſiſtances, you need not be diſmayed." See the next note.

Ver. 22. Ye ſhall be hated of all men] They who believed the teſtimony of the Apoſtles, as multitudes did, could not but ardently love them, as their fathers in Chriſt. See Gal. iv. 15. This, therefore, is plainly one of thoſe many Scriptures, in which the univerſal term all is to be taken with great reſtrictions. Comp. John xii. 32. Phil. ii. 21. Rom. v. 18. There is a peculiar emphaſis in the words for my name's ſake in this place. The Apoſtles and firſt Chriſtians ſet themſelves in oppoſition both to the Jewiſh and pagan religions, declaring the nullity of the former, and urging the renunciation of the latter in all its forms, as matter of indiſpenſable neceſſity. On the moſt tremendous penalties, they required every man, without exception, to believe in Chriſt, and ſubmit implicitly to his authority; a demand moſt galling to the pride of their princes, prieſts, and philoſophers. Moreover, having a lively ſenſe of the importance of the things which they preached, they urged them not in a cold and indifferent manner, but with the utmoſt fervency. Need it be matter of wonder, then, that in every country ſuch a furious ſtorm of perſecution aroſe againſt them, and the religion they taught, and that they were treated as the filth and off-ſcourings of the earth? Our Saviour adds, But he that endureth, &c. "He who perſeveres, who bears conſtantly, and with invincible patience, theſe perſecutions." The original word ὑπομείνας, denotes both patience and conſtancy. Jeſus gave this encouragement to his diſciples likewiſe, when he ſpoke to them of the ſufferings they were to meet with about the time of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. See ch. xxiv. 13. We may therefore believe that He had thoſe ſufferings now in view.

Ver. 23. But when they perſecute you, &c.] "Let not the perſecutions you are to meet with, in any period of your miniſtry, diſcourage you; but when you are ſore preſſed in one city, flee unto another, where you will meet with an aſylum: For I aſſure you, in ſpite of all oppoſition, your labours ſhall be attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that you ſhall not have gone over the cities of Iſrael till the ſon of man be come; i. e. according to the general interpretation, "before he comes to execute vengeance upon the Jews, by the deſtruction of their devoted city." The deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Titus is often called the coming of the Son of man. See ch. xxiv. 27, 37, 39, 44. Luke xviii. 8. Macknight differs from this interpretation, and gives the following: "Before ye have carried the glad tidings of the Goſpel to the ſeveral cities of Iſrael, my kingdom ſhall be eſtabliſhed in many places; ſo that in the midſt of the hotteſt perſecution, you may always expect to find ſome who will befriend you." See Olearius, and Whitby.

Ver. 24, 25. The diſciple is not above his maſter] "That you may bear all with a becoming fortitude, conſider that they have calumniated, traduced, and perſecuted me, your Maſter; for which cauſe you, my diſciples, cannot think it hard if they calumniate and perſecute you." This is a proverbial expreſſion, which Jeſus Chriſt applies on different occaſions. Here, and John xv. 20. it relates to the perſecutions his diſciples were to undergo. It is applied to another ſubject, John xiii. 16. Luke vi. 40. Concerning Beelzebub, ſee the note on 2 Kings i. 2.

Ver. 29. Fear them not, therefore, &c.] The meaning of this verſe is, that the diſciples ought not to conceal the truth which had been committed to them, notwithſtanding all the contradictions they might meet with in the courſe of their miniſtry; becauſe the deſign of God was, that the Goſpel which Jeſus Chriſt revealed to them in private, and which was a myſtery to all the reſt of mankind, (ch. ii. 27. 1 Cor. ii. 9. &c.) ſhould by them be publiſhed all over the world. Our bleſſed Saviour applies here a proverbial ſaying to the Goſpel; ſee Mark iv. 22. Luke viii. 17. xii. 2. There is nothing covered, &c. This is a general rule, which may admit of ſeveral exceptions. Jeſus Chriſt applies it to different ſubjects. Here he gives his diſciples to underſtand, that it was his deſign they ſhould openly and courageouſly reveal to the world thoſe truths, which the time and circumſtances did not then permit him to diſcloſe every where.

Ver. 27. What I tell you in darkneſs] That is, in private: In the light, means in public. In the next words our Lord alludes to a cuſtom among the Jews, whoſe teachers were wont to have their interpreters, who received the dictates of their maſters whiſpered in the ear, and then publickly propoſed them to all. The laſt words, that preach ye upon the houſe-tops, refer to another cuſtom of making things public, by proclaiming them on the flat roofs of the houſes in the eaſt. The mollahs among the Turks at this day proclaim on the top of their moſques, that "God is great, and Mahomet is his prophet," as a ſignal for the people to come to public prayers. See on ch. xxiv. 17. and Wynne's New Tranſlation.

Ver. 28. And fear not them, &c.] This was a ſaying familiar to the Jews. See Wiſd. xvi. 13, 14. and comp. Iſai. li. 7. Our Saviour wiſely cautions his diſciples againſt the fear of man, ſince they were going to encounter all the powers of the world and of darkneſs, by promoting the Goſpel of purity, and of true holineſs. Dr. Doddridge obſerves very well, that theſe words contain a certain argument, to prove the exiſtence of the ſoul in a ſeparate ſtate, and its perception of that exiſtence, elſe the ſoul would be as properly killed as the body; and accordingly he paraphraſes the words,

" Fear

29 Are not two ſparrows ſold for a farthing? and one of them ſhall not fall on the ground without your Father.

30 But the very hairs of your head are all numbered.

31 Fear ye not therefore; ye are of more value than many ſparrows.

32 Whoſoever therefore ſhall confeſs me before men, him will I confeſs alſo before my Father which is in heaven.

33 But whoſoever ſhall deny me before men, him will I alſo deny before my Father which is in heaven.

34 Think not that I am come to ſend peace on earth: I came not to ſend peace, but a ſword.

35 For I am come to ſet a man at variance againſt his father, and the daughter againſt her mother, and the daughter-in-law againſt her mother-in-law.

36 And a man's foes ſhall be they of his own houſhold.

37 He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me: and he that loveth ſon or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me.

38 And he that taketh not his croſs, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me.

39 He that findeth his life, ſhall loſe it: and he that loſeth his life for my ſake, ſhall find it.

Ver. 29. It is in value halfpenny farthing in the original, as being the tenth part of the Roman penny: See on ch. xviii. 28.—V. 30. 1 Sam. xiv. 45. 2 Sam. xiv. 11. Luke xxi. 18. "Fear not them who can only kill the mortal body, but cannot kill, or hurt the immaterial ſoul, which will ſtill ſurvive in all its vigour, while its tabernacle lies in ruins." Our Saviour, inſtead of ἀποκτεῖναι, to kill, makes uſe of the word ἀπολέσαι, to deſtroy, in the ſecond clauſe, which carries with it the ſignification alſo of tormenting. See Grotius. What an aweful verſe is this before us! How fit is it that this eternal and almighty God! ſhould be the object of our humble fear, and that in compariſon with him we ſhould fear nothing elſe; All the terrors, and all the flatteries of the world, are diſarmed by this. An idea, which in every ſtate of life ſhould engage us to be faithful to God; ſo ſhall we be moſt truly faithful to ourſelves.

Ver. 29—31. Are not two ſparrows ſold for a farthing?] Our Saviour here goes on to encourage his diſciples, from the important conſideration of God's particular providence. "You ſhould conſider that your enemies cannot touch even your bodies, without your Father's permiſſion; for the meaneſt of his creatures are under the protection of his providence; inſomuch, that nothing befalleth them, without its direction." The Greek word ἀσσαρίου, rendered a farthing, denotes a very ſmall piece of money, about the value of which commentators are not agreed. Fall on the ground, is an Hebrew phraſe, ſignifying to periſh. See Joſh. xxiii. 14. 2 Kings x. 10. and comp. Luke xxi. 18. with Acts xxvii. 34. The next verſe is a proverbial expreſſion, which gives a very noble and lively repreſentation of the care God takes of the righteous. See 1 Sam. xiv. 45. 2 Sam. xiv. 11. 1 Kings i. 51. Luke xxi. 18. Than many ſparrows, ver. 31. means, "than all the ſparrows in the world:" The word many is ſometimes put for a great many, or for all. See Dan. xii. 2. and comp. Rom. v. 12, 15. Theſe verſes contain a full proof of the univerſality of the divine Providence; but the ſingular interpoſitions of it in favour of good men, may, in a much more convincing manner, be argued from the prayers and promiſes offered in Scripture, with regard to particular events, and the promiſes of temporal bleſſings made to thoſe who fear and ſerve God: Nor are we much concerned to determine how far any of theſe are miraculous, and how far the reſult of general laws, ſettled in an exact congruity to the temper and conduct of every individual affected by it, which an omniſcient God foreſaw, and for which his perfect ſchemes might eaſily provide, by methods to us unſearchable. It is plain Homer thought divine Providence intereſted itſelf in the lives of brute animals. See Iliad, l. xv. v. 274. and we have a remarkable inſtance in the book of Jonah, of God's care for all his creatures, ſmall and great; for he urges his compaſſion to brute creatures, as one of the reaſons why he would not deſtroy Nineveh. See Jonah iv. 11. Grotius, and Doddridge.

Ver. 32, 33. Whoſoever ſhall confeſs me—will I confeſs.] Acknowledge, &c. MS. To confeſs here ſignifies, publicly to acknowledge Jeſus Chriſt for the promiſed Meſſiah, and the ſon of God. This confeſſion extends to the receiving of his whole doctrines, and even the leaſt of his commands. To deny Jeſus Chriſt is, not to acknowledge, or to diſown him; to renounce his doctrine, and be aſhamed of the profeſſion of it. See the paſſages in the margin, and ch. vi. 3[illegible]. There is an inſpeakable majeſty in this member of our Lord's diſcourſe: Though in the loweſt ſtate of humanity, he declared, that His confeſſing us before God, is the greateſt happineſs, and his denying us the greateſt miſery that can befal us.

Ver. 34—36. Think not that I am come, &c.] "Becauſe the prophets have ſpoken glorious things of the peace and happineſs which ſhall flouriſh under the Meſſiah, whom they have named, for that reaſon, the Prince of peace; you may imagine that I am come to put the world into that happy ſtate immediately: But this is far from being the caſe; for though the nature of my government be ſuch as might produce abundant felicity, inaſmuch as my religion breathes nothing but love, Men will not lay aſide their animoſity, nor will they exerciſe a mutual friendſhip among themſelves, as ſoon as the Goſpel is preached to them. No; ſuch is their weakneſs, that they ſhall make the Goſpel itſelf an occaſion of ſuch bitter diſſenſions, that it will ſeem as if I came on purpoſe to ſow the ſeeds of diſcord among the children of men." Theſe bad conſequences, however, are not to be peculiar to Chriſtianity; and therefore muſt not be imputed to it, but to the wickedneſs of men. The deiſts indeed boldly affirm, that the diverſity of opinions and worſhips which prevailed among the heathens, never produced either bloodſhed or diſorder, nor diſturbed the peace of mankind. But their aſſertion is falſe. It is true, we are not ſo well acquainted with the religious diſputes of the heathens, as we are with our own: Not becauſe no ſuch diſputes were ever known, but becauſe the hiſtorians of thoſe times did not think them worthy of being tranſmitted to poſterity. Some flagrant inſtances, however, are accidentally preſerved, by which we may judge of the reſt. Socrates, one of the beſt of the heathens, was put to death by the Athenians, the wiſeſt and moſt learned of all the Greeks, for teaching the unity of God, and the ſpirituality of the worſhip due to him. Ariſtotle the philoſopher was alſo impeached for his opinions, and obliged to fly from Athens, leſt he ſhould have incurred the fate of Socrates. Antiochus Epiphanes raiſed a moſt violent and bloody perſecution againſt the Jews, in their own country, on account of religion, in which many thouſands periſhed for refuſing to ſubmit to the idolatrous worſhip which he had ſet up in the temple at Jeruſalem. The emperor Claudius baniſhed the Jews from Italy for their religion, pretending that they were ſeditious. The religious quarrels of the Egyptians, the fury with which they proſecuted them, and the diſturbances they ocaſioned, are well known. And, to name no more, was there ever any perſecution raiſed by Chriſtians, either againſt one another, or againſt infidels, more bloody, cruel, and extenſive, than the ten perſecutions carried on by the Roman emperors, at the inſtigation of the philoſophers? It is to no purpoſe to reply, that theſe were perſecutions of men, who ſet themſelves to overturn the eſtabliſhed religions of the countries where they lived. For while thoſe men attacked them with the force of argument only, they ought to have been repelled by no other weapon. And if they could not be thus quelled, their adverſaries, inſtead of perſecuting them, ought to have yielded to truth. Whilſt the accounts of thoſe perſecutions ſtand on record, it muſt not be a little aſſurance that is able to bear the deiſts out in affirming, that the ancient heathen religions never inſpired their votaries with a ſpirit of perſecution. Yet it will not reflect any diſhonour on Chriſtianity, though it ſhould be allowed to have occaſioned more diſturbances than any other religion. On the contrary, it is rather a proof of its ſuperior excellency; for, if Chriſtianity animates the perſons who believe it with greater zeal for truth, it is becauſe it approves itſelf better worth the contending for. Its evidences are clearer, and its tendencies better than thoſe of any falſe religion, and therefore no wonder that men have eſpouſed its intereſt more heartily. See Macknight, and Bp. Hoadley's ſermons on the text.

Ver. 47. He that loveth father or mother, &c.] See Deut. xxxiii. 9. to which our Saviour manifeſtly alludes. "He who preferreth the friendſhip of his neareſt relations, though the ſweeteſt of all earthly ſatisfactions, to my religion; renouncing it, that he may enjoy their good will, is not worthy, being my diſciples; does not deſerve to be called a Chriſtian." Our Lord told them this very properly, after having declared that their bittereſt foes ſhould be the members of their own families. L'Enfant, and Macknight.

Ver. 38. He that taketh not his croſs] This alludes to the cuſtom of criminals carrying the croſs to which they were to be faſtened, and was a ſtrong intimation, that he ſhould himſelf be crucified, and that none could be a ſincere Chriſtian without a willingneſs to bear even that ſhameful and cruel death for his ſake, if he was called to it. He follows Chriſt, ſays Grotius, who leads his life, as much as poſſible, in conformity to His life and precepts.

Ver. 39. He that findeth his life, &c.] "He who makes ſhipwreck of faith and a good conſcience to ſave his life, ſhall loſe that which is really ſo,—his everlaſting happineſs; whereas he who maintains his integrity with the loſs of life, and all its enjoyments, ſhall find what is infinitely better, a bleſſed immortality." See ch. xvi. 24.

Ver. 40—42. He that receiveth, &c.] "As you ſhall be rewarded for perſeverance in my faith, ver. 39. ſo in proportion ſhall they who entertain you for my ſake. He who receiveth you, &c. i. e. ſheweth you kindneſs,—ſheweth me kindneſs, and for the ſame reaſon ſheweth my Father kindneſs, who hath ſent me, and ſhall be rewarded accordingly." By a prophet is meant a miniſter of God in general. The word δεχόμαι, rendered receive, plainly ſignifies here to entertain in an hoſpitable way, as it does likewiſe Heb. xi. 31. James ii. 25, &c. Nor can the gradation in the following words be underſtood without ſuch an interpretation. Jeſus Chriſt ſtiles thoſe perſons little ones, ver. 42. who were recommendable neither for their learning nor dignity; plain and well-meaning men, who, though they were illiterate, were of a teachable diſpoſition, and entertained a great love of truth. See ch. xi. 5, 25. xviii. 6. Mark ix. 42. Luke xvii. 2. By diſciple in this verſe is not to be underſtood one of the twelve Apoſtles; for Jeſus obſerving here a gradation, deſcends from a prophet to a juſt man, and from a juſt man to a diſciple, i. e. any believer. See ch. v. 1. xviii. 6. We may firſt ohſerve here, that what renders good works valuable in the ſight of God, and procures them a recompence from him, is, their being done out of regard for him and our bleſſed Saviour. By the rewards here promiſed, Le Clerc underſtands the happineſs of heaven—thus; "He that ſheweth kindneſs to a prophet on account of his miſſion and doctrine, or to a righteous man on account of his righteouſneſs, eſpecially if by ſo doing he expoſes himſelf to perſecution, ſhall be as highly rewarded as that righteous man or prophet ſhall be: nay, he who doth any good office whatever to the meaneſt of my diſciples, though it ſhould be but the ſmall ſervice of handing a cup of cold water to them, ſhall not go unrewarded." Other commentators think it improper to interpret theſe promiſes of the rewards of the life to come, becauſe the offices to which they are annexed may poſſibly be performed by very bad men, who on ſome occaſions honour and cheriſh the ſervants of Chriſt, as Herod did John the Baptiſt. But Le Clerc has endeavoured to obviate this, by adding the circumſtance of mens ſuffering perſecution for ſuch good offices; yet he adds it without warrant from the text. Beſides, the promiſe thus underſtood would not have animated the diſciples ſo powerfully in the diſcharge of their duty, under the difficulties they were to meet with. Perhaps, therefore, it is more reaſonable to underſtand theſe rewards actively of the temporal bleſſings which the Apoſtles, as prophets and righteous men, were impowered to confer on the families who ſhewed them hoſpitality. As prophets, they could heal the ſick in tboſe families, and raiſe the dead: as righteous men, they could aſſiſt them in the management of their affairs, by giving them prudent advice in difficult caſes; or they might keep them back from ſin by their religious converſation and example; and in both capacities might draw down many bleſſings on them by their prayers. (See ver. 13). "You are to meet, ſaid he, with great oppoſition; but I will engage men to befriend you: for all who do you any kindneſs ſhall, even in this life, be ſo rewarded by your miracles and prayers, that they ſhall be confirmed in their good-will to you; and others, obſerving how God has bleſſed them, ſhall be excited to imitate their humanity." Calvin thinks this text teaches, that the rewards of the good offices here mentioned will bear a proportion to the dignity of the perſon receiving them. L'Enfant imagines, that our Lord alludes to the old cuſtom of carrying preſents to prophets, when perſons went to conſult them, 1 Sam. ix. 7. But whatever ſenſe we put upon the paſſage, the declaration and promiſe here made, joined with verſe 14. where our Lord threatens to puniſh thoſe who ſhould reject his meſſengers, were excellently calculated to comfort them under the proſpect of the bad reception which he told them they were to meet with, while employed in preaching the Goſpel. See Macknight. Inſtead of in the name of, Dr. Waterland reads, as, or in quality of.

THE CHARACTER OF JESUS VINDICATED FROM THE CHARGE OF ENTHUSIASM.

If Jeſus had been an enthuſiaſt, (ſee the note on ver. 16.) there was no time when the fanatic ſpirit would ſo forcibly have broken out, as at the critical juncture of ſending his diſciples abroad to convert the world. An enthuſiaſt, poſſeſſed with the high glory of propagating and eſtabling a new religion, to ariſe and be denominated from himſelf, would have his ſpiritual paſſions kindled and inflamed to their utmoſt bearing, at the important moment of commencing his enterprize; but the words of Jeſus upon this occaſion beſpeak their author to be perfectly cool, and collected within himſelf. Behold, I ſend you forth as ſheep in the midſt of wolves. Let us reflect upon them with attention.

Though I am not altogether of opinion with thoſe who conſider this premonition ſo frequently repeated by Jeſus to his followers, of the various perſecutions which awaited the profeſſion of his Goſpel, as the cleareſt evidence of his prophetic Spirit,—becauſe I think a common obſerver of the ſtate and genius of the then prevailing ſuperſtitions, might eaſily foreſee what would be the early fate of a religion ſupported by no other powers than thoſe of grace, when it openly oppoſed its truth and purity to a world ſunk deep in error and confuſion;—yet ſo far muſt always be confeſſed, that this ſerious attention to the event would not have made part of the character of an heated and inflamed enthuſiaſt. When we find, therefore, the founder of our holy religion calmly attentive to the reception his doctrine was likely to meet with from the people, and provident of the treatment his ſervants were ſure to receive from the magiſtrate; we muſt needs conclude, that he then poſſeſſed himſelf in that dignity of repoſe, under a comprehenſive view of his ſcheme, which became a great prophet, ſuperior to all the infirmities as well as chances of humanity.

But his proviſion for his faithful ſervants did not ſtop at the ſalutary warning here given them: when he had hinted at the treatment of the world towards them, behold, I ſend you forth as ſheep, &c. he directs what ſhould be their conduct to the world; be ye therefore wiſe as ſerpents, and harmleſs as doves; a direction, which none under the direction of a fanatic ſpirit would be either forward to give, or fond to ſee obſerved: for religious enthuſiaſm, as we know by ſad experience, places its chief glory in deſpiſing human prudence, and in violating and trampling upon human peace. Its two great ſtates or ſtages are the ſufferings and triumphs of its deluded inſtruments, and in both, this hot and fiery ſpirit fatally hurries them into the moſt miſchievous extremes. The founder of our faith hath digged up by the very roots the whole ſyſtem of impoſture; he hath quelled the wildneſs of the ſtubborn, hot, and imprudent fanatic, in the command to be wiſe as ſerpents; he hath checked the ambition of the inſolent and triumphant enthuſiaſt, in the command to be harmleſs as doves; ſo that the unbelievers muſt either acquit him of theſe affections, or muſt retract what he ſeems ſo willing to allow him,—the greatneſs of his character and abilities: for if we will credit theſe men, the great ſupport of his character was, a well-directed enthuſiaſm; and yet he effectually contrived to damp its influence at that very criſis, when an enthuſiaſt would have let looſe his genius, and given it the utmoſt force and moment.

In this account of well-directed enthuſiaſm, we have ſuppoſed it to conſiſt of an equal mixture of extravagance and art; the firſt betraying itſelf in the ſtruggle, and the laſt in its application of the fruits of victory; and whatever inconſiſtency there may appear to be in their repreſentation, the fault lies only in the contradictions of our corrupt nature. It is commonly ſuppoſed, that the more wild and extravagant a fanatic temper is, the more clear it muſt needs be of all fraud and artifice; but both reaſon and experience are ready to ſhew us our miſtake. Fanaticiſm is a fire which heats the mind indeed; but heats without purifying. It ſtimulates and ferments all the paſſions; but it rectifies none of them: and thus leaving the appetites unſubdued, Pride, vanity, and ambition inſinuate themſelves into the impotent and diſordered mind, under the diſguiſe of purity, holineſs, and perfection; and while they are at work, religion, which lent them theſe more honeſt appellations, will be ſo far from curbing the owner in the uſe of oblique means, that the ſtrongeſt influence of fanaticiſm will be naturally directed to puſh him upon them, as the beſt inſtruments for the ready introduction of what he calls the truth.

Nor does the phyſical ſtate of the enthuſiaſt's mind give any ſtronger check to fraudulent practice than the moral; for when this paſſion or affection hath taken poſſeſſion of a great genius, who, if he chance to have a lively imagination, is as ſubject to its controul as the meaneſt, the violence of his fervours makes him impatient of ſtop or defeat in what he takes to be the cauſe of God, and conſequently makes him caſt about for any kind of means to reprove or repair it; readily perſuadiing himſelf that any means are lawful: and his ſuperior genius will enable him to find them, and when found, to improve them in their utmoſt uſe, to all the arts of fraudulent addreſs. Hence, if we examine the hiſtory of mankind, we ſhall ſee, that the founders of empires and falſe religions, which theſe artiſts contrive ſhould ſupport one another, were frantic enthuſiaſts, but at the ſame time ſufficient maſters of themſelves to turn with proper addreſs that ſpirit which they had catched and communicated, to the advancement of their proper ſchemes. And it is obſervable, that whenever one of theſe perſonated actors was not perfect in both his parts, he was ſoon hiſſed off the ſtage. The reaſon is evident; it ariſes from the nature of things. Without enthuſiaſm the adventurer could never kindle that fire in his followers, which is ſo neceſſary to conſolidate their mutual intereſts; for no one can heartily deceive numbers, who is not firſt of all deceived himſelf, or in other words, ſeems not to be in earneſt. But then, on the contrary, when the ſpirit of fanaticiſm is ſufficiently ſpread and inflamed, it can never produce any great or notable iſſue, unleſs the raiſer and dictator of the machine be ſo far maſter of himſelf, as to be able to water only, in the name of a diſciple, verily I ſay unto you, He ſhall in no wiſe loſe his reward.

CHAP. XI.

John ſendeth his diſciples to Chriſt. Chriſt's teſtimony concerning John. The opinion of the people both concerning John and Chriſt. Chriſt upbraideth the unthankfulneſs and impenitence of Chorazin, Bethſaida, and Capernaum; and praiſing his Father's wiſdom in revealing the goſpel to the ſimple, he calleth to him all ſuch as feel the burden of their ſins.

AND it came to paſs, when Jeſus had made an end of commanding his twelve diſciples, he departed thence, to teach and to preach in their cities.

2 Now when John had heard in the priſon the works of Chriſt, he ſent two of his diſciples,

3 And ſaid unto him, Art thou He that ſhould come, or do we look for another?

4 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, Go, and ſhew John again thoſe things which ye do hear and ſee:

Ver. 2. Luke vii. 18.

turn the point of this powerful inſtrument to the objects of his project, and keep it conſtantly directed to their advancement.

Indeed, the ſucceſsful directors of this drama have generally exhibited more of art in their later ſcenes, and more of enthuſiaſm in their former; the reaſon of which too is not leſs evident: Fanaticiſm is a kind of ebullition or critical ferment of the infected mind, which a vigorous nature can work through, and by ſlow degrees be able to caſt off. Hence hiſtory informs us of ſeveral ſucceſsful impoſtors, who ſet out in all the blaze of fanaticiſm, and ended their career in all the depth and ſtillneſs of politics; A prodigy in our nature, but not the rareſt, and exhibited with ſuperior ſplendor by the famous Ignatius Loyola.

This illuſtrious perſon, who verified the obſervation of one that almoſt equalled him in his trade, "That a man is never ſo high, as when he does not know whither he is going," began his extacies in the mire, and yet ended in the direction and execution of councils, which, even in his own lifetime, began to give the law to Chriſtendom. Amidſt all theſe diſtractions of human reaſon, and obliquities of worldly politics, we ſee a ſpiritual empire ſuddenly ariſe; we mark its progreſs, we trace its extent, we examine its eſtabliſhment; and comparing all its parts with their reference to a whole, we find it in effect to have, what was fancied of old Rome, every eſſential character of eternity; yet was this ſurpriſing revolution brought about by means intirely different from thoſe by which all the great changes and eſtabliſhments among mankind have been introduced; I mean fraud and fanaticiſm.

What then are we to conclude,—but that the religion of Jeſus is as divine in its origin, as it is pure and perfect in its eſſence; and that its author was as free from all the viſions and obliquities of enthuſiam, as he was replete with all the wiſdom and virtue of heaven? See Bp. Warburton's ſermons, vol. i. p. 283.

Chap. XI. Ver. 1. Had made an end of commanding] Had finiſhed his inſtructions to, &c. Heylin. In their cities—means "in the other cities of the Jews;" for the pronoun is often put without having a noun going before, to which it refers. Compare Luke iv. 15. v. 17. Or elſe, by the cities here mentioned, we may underſtand thoſe cities of Galilee, of which the Apoſtles were. See Acts ii. 7. The attentive reader will obſerve, that the chapters are again here very ill divided, as this verſe ſhould certainly cloſe the laſt chapter. See Bengelius's Greek Teſtament, the diviſions whereof are the moſt judicious I have met with.

Ver. 2. Now when John had heard, &c.] Mr. L'Enfant, with ſome others, thinks, that John was ſo diſcouraged by his own long impriſonment, that he began himſelf to doubt whether Jeſus was himſelf the Meſſiah; and agreeably to this he ſuppoſes, that when our Lord ſays, happy is he that is not offended in me, he meant it as a caution to John that he ſhould be upon his guard againſt ſo dangerous a temptation. But, conſidering what clear evidence John had before received by a miraculous ſign from heaven, and what expreſs and repeated teſtimonies he himſelf had borne to Jeſus, I cannot imagine this to have been poſſible; eſpecially as he foreſaw and foretold that he muſt himſelf quickly be laid aſide. John iii. 30. But his diſciples might very probably be offended at this circumſtance, as well as at the freedom of Chriſt's converſation, ſo different from the auſterity uſed among them, and therefore he might think it neceſſary to put them in the way of further ſatisfaction; not to ſay that the warmth of John's temper might render him ſomething uneaſy at the reſerve which Chriſt maintained, and that he might imagine it agreeable to the good deſign of his own office thus to urge a more expreſs declaration. This appears an eaſy and natural ſolution of the difficulty ariſing from this event. Some writers, however, and thoſe of diſtinction, are of different ſentiments, obſerving that John ſent the meſſage for his own ſake principally. His diſciples, it is ſaid, came and related to him Chriſt's miracles, particularly the two reſurrections which had been lately performed. But the more and greater miracles Jeſus wrought, the higher muſt the opinion have been which the Baptiſt's diſciples entertained of him His miracles, inſtead of weakening, ſhould have ſtrengthened their faith in him, and in their maſter's teſtimony concerning him. Beſides, had the greatneſs of his miracles really ſtaggered their faith, it is not eaſy to underſtand how they ſhould have been diſpoſed to believe Chriſt's teſtimony concerning himſelf, rather than their maſter's; Not to mention that Jeſus bad the diſciples go, and carry his anſwer to John; Go, tell John what ye hear and ſee; plainly implying, that John had ſent the meſſage for his own ſake chiefly, and not for the ſake of his diſciples. The Baptiſt entertaining an high opinion of his own gift, thought it was neceſſary that he ſhould preach the Goſpel, and prepare men for the erection of Chriſt's kingdom. From the very beginning of his impriſonment, therefore, both he and his diſciples had certainly been expecting that the Divine Power, of which Jeſus was every day giving freſh proofs, would have been exerted in bringing about his releaſe; and though they had not hitherto perceived any appearance of ſuch a miracle, they had ſtill waited with patience, and entertained hopes of it: But when John got notice that twelve illiterate fiſhermen were choſen to preach the Goſpel, and furniſhed with miraculous powers for that purpoſe, and that two perſons of no conſideration at all were raiſed from thedead, while he was ſuffered to lie idle and uſeleſs in priſon; He began at length to find, that Jeſus did not put that value upon his ſervices which he thought they deſerved, and of conſequence that no miracle would be wrought for his deliverance. His patience therefore, being quite tired, he ſent this meſſage to Jeſus, Art thou He that ſhould come, or do we look for another? Not as if he entertained any doubt of his being the Meſſiah, but by aſking the queſtion, he complained that Jeſus had not acted the part which he thought the Meſſiah ſhould have acted.—That this was the Baptiſt's frame of mind when he ſent his diſciples to Chriſt, may be gathered alſo from the anſwer which he received. Mr. Bell, in his excellent treatiſe on the divine miſſions of John the Baptiſt, and Jeſus Chriſt, part iii. ſect. 8. has ſhewn, that this remarkable meſſage, viewed in every light, ſupplies us with one of the moſt ſatisfactory, circumſtantial proofs of the integrity and divine character of Jeſus and the Baptiſt, which the Goſpel affords; and whether we can point out the particular motives which actually induced the true Elias to ſend his diſciples with ſuch a meſſage to the true Meſſiah, or not, is an inquiry of no real importance at all, however it might gratify our curioſity to be able to ſolve the queſtion; ſince in the mean time it appears abundantly plain, that no ſuch meſſage could on any account have been ſent from John to Jeſus, had they in reality been no better than impoſtors. See the note on ver. 4. The reader will find more on this ſubject in Jortin's diſcourſes, p. 196. Bp. Atterbury's, vol. iii. p. 35. and Archbp. Tillotſon's, ſerm. 117.

Ver. 3. Art thou He that ſhould come] It ſeems that by their ſpeaking of the Meſſiah in the phraſe, he that cometh, or he that is coming, [῾Ο ἐρχόμενος] the pious Jews in the moſt lively manner expreſſed their confident expectation of him, and their eager longing for his appearance, as the greateſt and moſt welcome meſſenger of God to man, and the moſt deſirable perſon that ever did or ſhould come into the world. See Mark xi. 9, 10. and comp. Pſ. cxv. 26. Dan. xvii. 13, &c Bp. Pearſon juſtly obſerves, that this, among many other arguments, proves that the notion of two Meſſiahs, the one ſuffering, the other triumphant, is a vain dream of the modern Jews, altogether unknown to the ancients. See Chandler's defence, p. 7. and Pearſon on the creed, p. 183.

Ver. 4. Go, and ſhew John, &c.] This anſwer is a clear reference to a ſignal prophecy of Iſaiah concerning the Meſſiah; and therefore it is manifeſt that Jeſus referred the enquirers for conviction at once to the evidence of prophecies and miracles. The finger of God is manifeſt in the whole occurrence. It could not be by chance that John ſent his diſciples to propoſe this important queſtion to our Lord, at the very time when he was enabled to give the fulleſt ſatisfaction to it, and to confirm in ſo remarkable a manner the teſtimony of the Baptiſt. It could not be by chance, that enquiry was made after his divine character, at that critical period when he was diſplaying the ſtrongeſt marks of it; in the ſame hour when he was engaged in curing many of their infirmities and plagues, and of evil ſpirits, and in giving ſight to thoſe who had been born blind, (See Luke vii. 24.) We ſee then the propriety of this enquiry, without deducing it from any ſuppoſed doubts or diſcontents in the mind of the Baptiſt himſelf, or even any incredulity in his diſciples. John had frequently declared our Lord to be the Meſſiah, which was indeed the grand purpoſe of his own miſſion. But without his doubting, 5 The blind receive their ſight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleanſed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raiſed up, and the poor have the goſpel preached to them.

6 And bleſſed is he whoſoever ſhall not be offended in me.

7 And as they departed, Jeſus began to ſay unto the multitudes concerning John, What went ye out into the wilderneſs to ſee? A reed ſhaken with the wind?

8 But what went ye out for to ſee? A man clothed in ſoft raiment? behold, they that wear ſoft clothing are in kings houſes.

9 But what went ye out for to ſee? A prophet? yea, I ſay unto you, and more than a prophet.

10 For this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I ſend my meſſenger before thy face, which ſhall prepare thy way before thee.

11 Verily, I ſay unto you, among them that are born of women, there hath not riſen or his diſciples diſbelieving this teſtimony, they muſt all alike have been ſenſible that this teſtimony could have no force, till it ſhould be confirmed by the event, and till our Lord ſhould prove himſelf to be what John aſſerted him to be. The prophets had deſcribed the Meſſiah: John had pointed out our Saviour to the world, as the perſon by them deſcribed. His teſtimony, therefore, muſt have been overthrown, had it not afterwards appeared that all things which John ſpake of this man were true. Hence it was natural, nay, it was neceſſary, that he ſhould ſend his diſciples to our Lord, that they might ſee the prophetical deſcriptions of the Meſſiah, and the teſtimony of their Maſter verified in him. And when the buſineſs of his own miſſion was accompliſhed, when his doctrine and his teſtimony of our Lord's divine character had made the due impreſſions upon the people; when the report of the mighty works of Chriſt had reached him in priſon, and he perceived that our Saviour began to diſplay that divine power which the prophets had aſcribed to the Meſſiah; he then ſaw this was the ſeaſon pointed out to him by Providence for ſending his diſciples to make this enquiry. See Rotheram on the origin of faith.

Ver. 5. The blind receive their ſight] Nothing could be more appoſite, natural, and convincing, than ſuch an anſwer as this; which took its riſe from what Chriſt was then doing, and reſted on the moſt apparent teſtimony of God himſelf, in aſtoniſhing miracles, to which they knew their maſter made no pretences: (See John x. 41.) miracles of ſo beneficent a nature, that no auſterities of a retired life were by any means comparable to them; and miracles receiving an additional luſtre, from their being foretold by a prophet many ages before; even by Iſaiah the prophet, by whom the Baptiſt was ſo particularly deſcribed, that, as he himſelf had frequently referred to him, (Matth. iii. 3. Luke iii. 4—6. John i. 23.) ſo his diſciples muſt, no doubt, have made themſelves peculiarly familiar with his writings. Theſe, and many other particulars, are ſet in a moſt beautiful light by the maſterly hand of Bp. Atterbury, in his poſthumous ſermons, vol. i. p. 41—50. Archbp. Tillotſon alſo has largely ſhewn the correſpondence between the prophecies and events here referred to. See his 117th ſermon, and Dr. Thomas Jackſon's works, vol. ii. p. 470. The laſt circumſtance mentioned in this verſe, The poor, &c. diſtinguiſhed the Meſſiah from all the heathen philoſophers and prieſts; for whereas they concealed the myſteries or depths of their doctrines from the vulgar, and thoſe who were not initiated, He opened his to every one, without diſtinction; to the poor as well as the rich, to the unlearned as well as the learned. It diſtinguiſhed him likewiſe from the prophets who went before him, they being chiefly ſent to monarchs; whereas Chriſt diſcovered the treaſures of life to the illiterate. It diſtinguiſhed him from the Scribes and doctors of the Jews, who taught none but the rich, and charged very highly for their inſtructions, deſpiſing and neglecting the poor, who were ſtiled the off-ſcourings of the earth, and holding it as a maxim, that the Spirit reſted upon the rich only. It might have convinced the Jews, that their ideas of the Meſſiah were falſe: They looked upon the Meſſiah as a temporal prince, who ſhould ſubdue the world to their yoke; but He placed his glory in ſubduing ſin, and in overcoming iniquity. It might have ſerved to convince the Jews that he was diſintereſted: Inſtead of paying his court to the great, he applied himſelf to the diſtreſſed; and inſtead of engaging the prieſts and Scribes for his diſciples, he preached to the vulgar, and choſe twelve illiterate and poor men to be the propagators of his doctrine. To ſpeak the blind to ſight, to command the lame to walk, to reſtore the deaf to hearing by a ſingle word, and to call the dead to life, were ſuch miracles as plainly ſhewed him to be the Meſſiah. But theſe cures were only the cures of bodily diſeaſes: His office was likewiſe to include in it the cure of our mental diſtempers; and therefore our bleſſed Lord adds, as the heightening and diſtinguiſhing criterion of his character, that he preached the goſpel to the poor. Others put a different ſenſe upon the clauſe Πτωχοὶ εὐαγγελίζονται, tranſlating it actively, the poor preach the goſpel; as if Jeſus intended to inſinuate, that the Baptiſt had no reaſon to be diſpleaſed with the election of twelve illiterate fiſhermen to preach the Goſpel, while he, whoſe gifts were far ſuperior to theirs, was ſuffered to lie uſeleſs in priſon,—becauſe this alſo was one of the characters of the Meſſiah's reign, mentioned by Iſaiah. According to this interpretation, our Lord's meaning was, "Go, and tell your maſter, that the miracles which you have ſeen me perform, are the very miracles which Iſaiah long ago predicted the Meſſiah ſhould perform; and that the perſons I have choſen to aſſiſt me in preaching the Goſpel, are ſuch as the ſame prophet has pointed out for that work." See the paſſages in the margin, Macknight, and Sherlock.

Ver. 6. Bleſſed is he whoſoever, &c.] See the note on ch. v. 29. It was foretold of the Meſſiah, that the world ſhould be offended at him, Iſai. viii. 14. liii. 1, 3. This is intimated in the preſent words; wherein our Saviour hints, that notwithſtanding the great works which he did among them, which teſtified of him that he came from God; notwithſtanding the predictions of the prophets concerning the Meſſiah were ſo clearly and punctually accompliſhed in him; notwithſtanding all this, they would take offence at him upon one account or other, and reject him and his doctrine: But even this,—that they rejected him, and would not own him for the Meſſiah, was another ſign and evidence that he was the true Meſſiah foretold by the prophets; for, among other things, this was expreſly predicted concerning him, that he ſhould be deſpiſed and rejected of men. See Archbp. Tillotſon.

Ver. 7, 8. What went ye out, &c.] Theſe, and the following queſtions, are in the ſtile of the Hebrews; and, according to the idiom of their language, imply a ſtrong negation. The reader by recurring to the book of Job will meet with many paſſages to confirm this obſervation: So that, according to this interpretation, the meaning is, "When ye went into the wilderneſs to John, with what deſign did you go?—Not to ſee the reeds waving on the banks of Jordan;—nor becauſe he made a magnificent appearance, &c." They went not to ſee a reed ſhaken with the wind; i. e. no trifling, mean, wavering, or inconſtant object, but one employed on a meſſage of great importance; ſteady, upright, and conſiſtent in his teſtimony. In this queſtion the courage and conſtancy of the Baptiſt is applauded. By ſoft raiment, ver. 8. is meant ſuch as is made of ſilk; which was ſo ſcarce and valuable in thoſe early ages, that it was ſold for its weight in gold. It was not to gaze at the ſplendid appearance of ſuch as frequent the courts of princes, that they went into the wilderneſs to hear and contemplate the meſſage of a man, plain indeed in his appearance; but who, by the auſterity of his life, ſanctity of his manners, and diligence in performing the commiſſion which he had received from above, drew the regard of the whole people. In this queſtion, the auſtere mortified life of the Baptiſt is praiſed, and the ſpiritual nature of the Meſſiah's kingdom inſinuated. His forerunner did not reſemble any of the officers who attended the courts of earthly princes; and conſequently he himſelf was in no reſpect to be like an earthly prince. See Heylin, Grotius, and Macknight.

Ver. 10. This is He of whom it is written] See the note on Mal. iii. 1. Dr. Hammond obſerves, that what is here before thy face, is in Malachi before my face. Hence it apears that Chriſt, here referred to by the word thy, is there the ſame with God; or, yet farther, that the face of God, ſignifying often his coming or preſence; and the ſending before his face, the ſending an harbinger or forerunner in a journey, (Luke ix. 52.) This coming of Chriſt into the world, is the coming of God himſelf; this Preſence of his on the earth, the Preſence of God himſelf; and ſo the ἱλαςήριον, or covering of the ark, noting the Preſence of God, appears to have been meant as a type of Chriſt, Rom. iii. 25.

Ver. 11. Among them that are born of women] "As he is, with regard to his moral and religious character, one of the beſt men, ſo he has ſome peculiar honours ſuperior to any prophet of former generations: Nevertheleſs, there is a ſenſe in which He that is leaſt in the kingdom of heaven, not only in its final glories, but even here on earth, is greater than He. For my miniſters, and people in general, ſhall receive ſuperior ſupplies of the Spirit, and know many important truths relating to my Goſpel, which have not been revealed to John himſelf." By the leaſt in the kingdom of heaven, is not meant the ſame as ch. v. 19. What is expreſſed by leaſt, μικρότερος, might have been rendered leſs; i. e. in appearance more abject; yet, by being a member of the kingdom of heaven, He has thereby an advantage over John, whoſe commiſſion was ſuperſeded by our Saviour's miniſtry; for John himſelf ſays, He muſt increaſe, but I muſt decreaſe. The kingdom of heaven was declared to be at hand, when the firſt meſſenger came preaching in the wilderneſs; and after the deſcent of the Holy Spirit upon the Apoſtles, the information of the inſpired Chriſtian muſt have exceeded his, who was to diſcern the great Perſon of whom he was to bear record, by the deſcent and reſidence of the Spirit of God upon him. The miniſtry of John was preparatory to that of Jeſus. He was to lead our feet into the way of peace; a greater than John the Baptiſt: notwithſtanding, he that is leaſt in the kingdom of heaven, is greater than he.

12 And from the days of John the Baptiſt until now, the kingdom of heaven ſuffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.

13 For all the prophets, and the law, propheſied until John.

14 And if ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come.

15 He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

16 But whereunto ſhall I liken this generation? It is like unto children ſitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows, 17 And ſaying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented.

18 For John came neither eating nor drinking; and they ſay, He hath a devil:

peace; to proclaim the kingdom of heaven; and therefore he who was inferior in other reſpects to John, muſt have advanced beyond him, ſo have been greater than he, if a member of the kingdom of heaven. But this may perhaps be ſet in a ſtronger light: Our Lord honoured the Baptiſt with the magnificent title of one that was more than a prophet, (ver. 9.) for four reaſons; 1. He was the ſubject of ancient prophecies, and had long been expected by the people of God under the idea of Elias, a name given him by Malachi, becauſe he was to poſſeſs the ſpirit and power of Elias: 2. His conception and birth had been accompanied with miracles: 3. When the ſeaſon of his inſpiration came, he was favoured with a clearer revelation concerning the Meſſiah, than had been enjoyed by many of the prophets under the law: 4. By his ſermons he prepared the Jews for receiving the Goſpel, and conſequently began that more excellent diſpenſation. But though the Baptiſt thus excelled all the preceding prophets, the leaſt inſpired perſon in the kingdom of heaven, the leaſt apoſtle or preacher of the Goſpel, was greater than he; becauſe, by conſtantly attending on Jeſus, they were much better acquainted with his character, diſpoſition, and doctrine, than the Baptiſt, who had ſeen him only tranſiently: wherefore, in reſpect of their perſonal knowledge of the Meſſiah, the apoſtles greatly excelled the Baptiſt. Further, they were employed not in making preparation for, but in erecting the Meſſiah's kingdom. Hence they were greater than the Baptiſt, in reſpect to the dignity of their office: Moreover, having gifts beſtowed on them to fit them for that office, far ſuperior to his, they were greater in reſpect of their illumination; they had the ſpirit ſo dwelling in them, that on all occaſions they could declare the will of God infallibly, being as it were living oracles. To conclude, as they had been likewiſe the ſubject of ancient oracles, Acts ii. 16. they had been long expected by the people of God. See Macknight, and Sharpe's ſecond argument. Greater, ſays Wetſtein, is the dignity of a companion of Chriſt, than of an harbinger; as much as John excelled the prophets, ſo much do the diſciples of Chriſt excel John. The time of the prophets was the night; in the time of John the morning began to appear; the diſciples of Chriſt were illuminated with the brighteſt rays of the ſun. See Olearius's 33d and following obſervations.

Ver. 12, 13. The kingdom of heaven ſuffereth violence] Is violently invaded. Wat. Dr. Heylin renders it, The kingdom of heaven is entered by force, and they who ſtrive with all their might take it, as by violence. The kingdom of heaven was indeed the inheritance both of Jews and Gentiles; but the Jews eſteemed all thoſe who knew not the law accurſed. However, they neglected to accept the gracious terms of the Goſpel, while the publicans and ſinners, complying with theſe terms, entered into that inheritance, which the Jews thought they had no legal claim to. Hence they are ſtiled the violent, becauſe he who is obliged to make uſe of violence to ſecure any thing, cannot be ſuppoſed to have a legal claim to that thing. By referring to the parallel place, Luke vii. 29. the meaning of the preſent verſes will more evidently appear: and all the people who heard him [i. e. John] ſays our Lord, and the publicans juſtified God, being baptiſed with his baptiſm. The meaning is, that while John executed his miniſtry, the people, particularly the publicans, juſtified God, by receiving his baptiſm; or, to expreſs the matter differently, by believing on John, they declared the Son of God's righteouſneſs, and vindicated the divine wiſdom in ſending him. Hence we ſee the reaſon why faith is ſo abſolutely required, and ſo highly commended in Scripture; for can there be a more ſacred duty than to attribute to God the glory of his righteouſneſs, by believing what he hath revealed; or a more heinous blaſphemy than to rob him of his veracity, by rejecting the doctrine which comes from him? The ſenſe we have given of this verſe of St. Luke is confirmed by the paſſage before us, where our Lord expreſſes himſelf ſomewhat differently, but to the ſame purpoſe; the general import whereof is, "The tax-gatherers, ſoldiers, harlots, and others of the ſame ſtamp, perſons of the moſt abandoned characters, whom ye look upon as having no right to become members of the Meſſiah's kingdom, enter into it; and this you think a violence done to the kingdom of heaven; but in reality it it is not ſo, becauſe the law and the prophets, the diſpenſation which makes a diſtinction between men, was virtually ſet aſide at the coming of John, in whoſe miniſtry the kingdom of heaven began,—that diſpenſation, which admits all perſons equally, upon their faith and repentance: For if ye will believe it, he is the Meſſiah's forerunner, whom Malachi predicted under the name of Elijah." Dr. Heylin, upon the 13th verſe, obſerves, that to propheſy, in the Scripture language, is the ſame as to preach; and the ſenſe is, "The prophets and the law were your guides and inſtructors till John came; now God gives you another maſter in me, and John is that Elias who was to prepare the way before me;" or, in other words, "Repentance, ſuch as John taught and practiſed, is the neceſſary preparation for that kingdom of God which I come to eſtabliſh in the hearts of men." St. Auſtin obſerves upon this verſe, "God hath ſo ordained, that it is in every man's power to be happy: The kingdom of heaven ſuffers violence: to deſire, to reſolve, to endeavour, to ſtrive, is to be qualified; and no man ever failed in his attempt, who was willing to take it by force."

Ver. 14. And if ye will receive it] There is nothing for the particle it in the original, therefore Dr. Heylin reads, him; and if this be the proper ſupplement, ſays he, we muſt underſtand that total perfect repentance which conſtitutes the common character both of him and Elias. For more on this ſubject we refer the reader to Mal. iv. 5, 6. and Bullock on Prophecy, pref. p. 50.

Ver. 15. He that hath ears to hear, &c.] Dr. Clarke obſerves, that theſe words are a ſtrong and general appeal to the reaſon and underſtanding of all unprejudiced and impartial men, and an exhortation to them to uſe the powers of reaſon and underſtanding which God hath given them. They are highly expreſſive of the authority of the perſon who ſpeaks; of the reaſonableneſs, truth, and excellence of the thing that is ſpoken; and of the capacity men have, and the obligation they are under, to hearken to and obey what is thus delivered unto them. Hence they are often uſed by Chriſt, when he is ſpeaking things of great importance, and which deſerve the moſt ſerious conſideration of mankind.

Ver. 16, 17. But whereunto ſhall I liken, &c.] For the better underſtanding of our Saviour in this place, ſee Luke vii. 29, 30. To ſhew the Phariſees more plainly the perverſeneſs of their diſpoſition, our Saviour told them they were like children at play, who never do what their companions deſire them; peeviſh and froward, and diſpleaſed with every thing. The phraſe it is like, in St. Matthew's ſtile, often ſignifies only, in general, that the thing ſpoken of may be illuſtrated by the following ſimilitude. Compare ch. xiii. 24, 45. xviii. 23. xx. 1. xxii. 2. In Judea it was uſual, at feaſts, to have muſic of an airy kind, accompanied with dancing; Luke xv. 25. and at funerals melancholy airs, to which were joined the lamentations of perſons hired for the purpoſe. Sec ch. ix. 23. The children therefore in that country, imitating theſe things in their diverſions, while one band of them performed the muſical part, if the other, happening to be froward, would not anſwer or lament as the game directed, it naturally gave occaſion to the complaint, we have piped unto you, and you have not danced, &c. which at length was turned into a proverb; and we find it frequently quoted both in Jewiſh and heathen writers. The mourning airs here ſpoken of fitly repreſent the ſeverity of the Baptiſt's manners, and the mournful doctrine of mortification and repentance which he preached: On the other hand, the chearful airs beautifully repreſent our Lord's ſweet diſpoſition, affable condeſcenſion, and engaging method of giving inſtruction; ſo that every thing was tried which could poſſibly have influence, to bring the Jews to repentance. See Grotius and Wetſtein.

Ver. 18, 19. For John came neither eating, &c.] Our Lord juſtifies the application of the proverb in the preceding verſe to the Phariſees, by obſerving, that the divine wiſdom had tried every method prope for converting them, but in vain: For, firſt of all, the Baptiſt wa ſent unto them, in the ſtern dignity of their ancient prophets, ſo tha it was natural to think they would have reverenced him; nevertheleſs they rejected him altogether. Such, it ſeems, was the pride o malice of the Phariſees, that when they found their own oſtentatio and hypocritical mortifications utterly eclipſed by the real auſteriti of this holy man's life, they impudently affirmed, that his living i deſarts, his ſhunning the company of men, the coarſeneſs of hi clothing, the abſtemiouſneſs of his diet, with the other ſeveriti which he practiſed, were all the effects of madneſs, or religious me lancholy: John came neither eating bread, nor drinking wine, (Luk vii. 23.) and they ſay he hath a devil; literally, he hath a dæm This method of converting the Phariſees proving unſucceſsfu God ſent his only Son in a more familiar manner, ver. 19. Je did not practiſe thoſe mortifications which rendered the Baptiſt r markable: He fared like other men, and went into mixed compani 19 The Son of man came eating and drinking; and they ſay, Behold, a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and ſinners. But wiſdom is juſtified of her children.

20 Then began he to upbraid the cities wherein moſt of his mighty works were done, becauſe they repented not:

21 Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethſaida! for if the mighty works which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in ſackcloth and aſhes.

22 But I ſay unto you, It ſhall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon, at the day of judgment, than for you.

23 And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, ſhalt be brought down to hell: for if the mighty works which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day.

24 But I ſay unto you, That it ſhall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom, in the day of judgment, than for thee.

25 At that time Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, becauſe thou haſt hid theſe things from the wiſe and prudent, and haſt revealed them unto babes.

26 Even ſo, Father: for ſo it ſeemed good in thy ſight.

not avoiding the ſociety even of publicans and ſinners. But neither would they hear Him; for notwithſtanding he maintained the ſtricteſt temperance himſelf, and never encouraged the vices of others, either by diſſimulation or example, they attributed that free way of living to a certain looſeneſs of diſpoſition; But wiſdom is juſtified by her children. Theſe words appear to be a Jewiſh proverb, ſee Iſai. xlv. 25. Luke vii. 29. Wiſdom here implies the method which God followed in bringing the Jews to Chriſtianity. The auſterity of John the Baptiſt, and the meekneſs of Jeſus Chriſt, is what St. Luke calls the counſel of God, ch. vii. 10. The children of wiſdom mean the wiſe, the diſciples of wiſdom: they are the babes mentioned in the 25th verſe of this chapter. The clauſe may be paraphraſed, "They who are truly wiſe and religious muſt needs approve this beautiful variety in the conduct of Providence, and ſee that the difference in our manner of living ſuits the purpoſes of our reſpective appearances, and is adapted to promote the general deſign of God's glory, and man's ſalvation." Dr. Waterland renders the clauſe, and the doctrine is condemned by its own children, or diſciples; in which he follows Elſner, who thinks that the words were ſpoken by the Phariſees: but the interpretation appears very unnatural, and by no means comparable with that above given.

Vor. 20—24. Then began he to upbraid the cities] After reproving the Phariſees, Jeſus denounced heavy judgements againſt Chorazin, Bethſaida, and Capernaum, cities which he had often bleſſed with his preſence; for though they had heard him preach many awakening ſermons, and ſeen him perform many aſtoniſhing miracles, ſuch as would have converted Tyre, Sidon, and Sodom, cities infamous for their impiety, contempt of religion, pride, luxury, and debauchery; yet, ſo great was their obſtinacy, that they perſiſted in their wickedneſs, ſpite of all He had done to reclaim them. The words woe unto thee do not contain an imprecation againſt thoſe cities, but only a denunciation of the judgements which they were bringing down upon themſelves by their impenitence. The expreſſion long ago, or long ſince, ver. 21. ſeems to refer to the time when Ezekiel reproved the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon for their enormous crimes; and intimates, that if Ezekiel had enforced his remonſtrances by the aid of ſuch miracles as he himſelf had wrought in the cities of Judea, it was probable that they would have been as exemplary for their penitence as the Ninevites were. See Jonah iii. 6. From hence our Lord infers the guilt of thoſe who rejected his doctrine, although it was ſupported by ſuch miraculous powers. But though the obduracy of the Tyrians and Sidonians in the time of Ezekiel was not comparable to the Galileans in the time of Chriſt, their puniſhment was nevertheleſs juſt and equitable; for they violated every principle of morality and humanity. In their commerce they were guilty of the greateſt frauds, and inſulted the Jews, their confederates and allies, in their diſtreſſes, when ſubdued by the Chaldeans. Their nearneſs to Judea, their common language, their daily commerce, could not but bring them acquainted with the worſhip of the true God, eſpecially as prophets were raiſed expreſly to correct their faults. Theſe and other advantages were ſufficient to have converted the Phœnicians, if they would have attended to them; and on the other hand, were ſufficient to manifeſt their obduracy, if they diſregarded them, though they had not the benefit of thoſe extraordinary miracles, which infinite wiſdom had reſerved for the times of the Meſſiah. See Grotius's excellent note. By the day of judgement, ver. 22. Dr. Hammond underſtands the temporal calamities to be brought on theſe places by the Romans, who did indeed ſhortly after over-run the whole country, and make dreadful ravages in ſome of theſe cities; but there is no evidence that the deſtruction of thoſe Jewiſh cities was more dreadful than that of Tyre and Sidon, and it was certainly leſs ſo than that of Sodom and Gomorrah: Beſides, our Lord plainly ſpeaks of a judgement which was yet to come on all theſe places here mentioned. Capernaum, ver. 23. was famous for its fiſhery, commerce, and every other advantage of a maritime ſituation. Here our Lord had fixed his abode for ſome time, and frequently converſed with its inhabitants; it was therefore in the moſt flouriſhing condition, and exalted to the higheſt pitch of glory, as the phraſe which art exalted to heaven implies. Compare Dan. iv. 22. Brought down to hell is a Scripture phraſe, uſed to denote an utter deſtruction, a total overthrow. See Iſa. xiv. 13, 15. lvii. 9. 1 Sam. ii. 6. Dr. Heylin renders it, ſhalt be brought to utter deſtruction. "This prophecy hath been ſo exactly fulfilled, ſays Mr. L'Enfant, in the deſtruction of Capernaum, that, according to the relation of travellers, there are not now above eight cottages where it ſtood." The word hell ᾅδης, does not ſignify here the place of the damned, but only, as we have frequently obſerved, the condition and place of the dead; the ſepulchre. See Epheſ. iv. 9. Inſtead of But I ſay, &c. ver. 24. the MS. reads Moreover, &c.

Ver. 25. At that time Jeſus anſwered and ſaid] Doddridge reads this, Jeſus took occaſion to ſay; and when the words ſo introduced, ſays he, are not a reply to any preceding ſpeech, I apprehend the verſion here given expreſſes the ſenſe of them with great exactneſs. Dr. Heylin renders it, Jeſus continuing his diſcourſe, ſaid; and Mr. Pilkington, in his remarks, obſerves, after the generality of commentators, that this phraſe is derived from the Hebrew, which not only ſignifies to anſwer, but likewiſe to utter a ſentence, or begin a diſcourſe; and thus the Hebrew word, Job. iii. 2. is not anſwered, but ſpoke. We make this obſervation once for all, and it removes any little objection againſt the propriety of the writings of the New Teſtament, becauſe the word anſwered is ſometimes made uſe of where there is no previous queſtion. Inſtead of I thank thee, Heylin reads, I praiſe thee; literally, I confeſs or acknowledge thee.—To acknowledge God for what he is, is the higheſt kind of praiſe. [Becauſe thou haſt hid.] God is often ſaid in Scripture to do thoſe things which he determines to permit, and which he foreſees will be in fact the conſequence of thoſe circumſtances in which his creatures are placed, though their wills are laid under no conſtraint. See on Exod. ix. 34, 35. 2 Sam. xii. 11, 12. xxiv. 1. 1 Kings xxii. 22, 23. In this ſenſe alone could God be ſaid to hide thoſe things from the learned men of that age, which he revealed ſo plainly, that honeſt and well-diſpoſed perſons, though children in underſtanding, might come to the knowledge of them. See ch. x. 34, 35. It ſeems they were but a few, and thoſe generally of the lower ſort of people, who embraced the doctrine of Chriſt, and aſſiſted him in erecting his kingdom; circumſtances which, in the eyes of common wiſdom, were melancholy and mortifying; but our Lord foreſaw, that by the direction of God, theſe very circumſtances would become the nobleſt demonſtrations of his perſonal dignity, the cleareſt proofs of the excellency of his religion, and the moſt ſtupendous inſtances of his power, who, by ſuch weak inſtruments eſtabliſhed his religion in every part of the habitable world, againſt the policy, power, and malice of devils, and men combined to oppoſe him. Beſides, had the great rulers and learned Scribes, the nobles, the wits, and geniuſes been converted, it muſt have been prejudicial to the Goſpel in ſeveral reſpects, as ſuch converts and teachers might probably have made the Gentiles look upon it as a trick of ſtate: perhaps alſo they would have mixed it with things foreign to its nature; our Lord, therefore wiſely made the rejection of the Goſpel by the great men of the nation, and the reception of it by perſons in lower ſtations, matter of eſpecial thankſgiving both now and afterwards in Judea, Luke x. 21. Babes, νηπίοι, in Scripture language, are perſons whoſe faculties are not improved by learning; but who, to that ſagacity and underſtanding which is purely natural, join the beſt diſpoſitions of heart; ſuch as meekneſs, modeſty, innocence, honeſty, humility, docility, and all the other engaging qualities which are to be found in children. This is plain from ch. xviii. 3. Babes therefore ſtand in oppoſiton, not to men of ſound judgement and reaſon, but to proud politicians, and men of learning, who are ſo full of themſelves, that they diſdain to receive inſtruction from others, and who make all their abilities ſubſervient to their advancement in this world. See Macknight, L'Enfant, Stockius.

Ver. 26. Even ſo, Father] The Pruſſian editors render this verſe

27 All thing are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, ſave the Son, and he to whomſoever the Son will reveal him.

28 Come unto me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you reſt.

29 Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye ſhall find reſt unto your ſouls.

30 For my yoke is eaſy, and my burden is light.

Ver. 27. Ch. xxviii. 18. John iii. 35. xiii. 3. xvii. 2. John i. 18. vi. 46. x. 15.—V. 29. John xiii. 15. Phil. ii. 5. 1 Pet. ii. 21. 1 John ii. 6. Zech. ix. 9. Phil. ii. 7, 8. Jer. vi. 16.—V. 30. 1 John v. 3.

Thus it is, O Father, becauſe ſuch was thy will; and Mr. Wynne obſerves, that poſſibly the Greek would be more properly rendered, Be it ſo, O Father, ſince ſuch has been thy pleaſure. See Luke x. 21.

Ver. 27. All things are delivered, &c.] "Every thing relating to the ſalvation of the world is committed to my care by God." And no one knoweth, &c.—"Knoweth his dignity, what he hath done, and what he is yet to do, for the ſalvation of the world." Neither knoweth any one the Father, but the Son, &c. "None but the Son and his diſciples fully know the perfections and counſels of the Father." It is evident from this verſe, that there is ſomething inexplicably myſterious in the nature and perſon of Chriſt, which indeed appears in the moſt convincing manner from the account elſewhere given of his Divinity in Scripture. See Doddridge, and Hammond who interprets the verſe differently. Our Lord here addreſſing himſelf to his diſciples, ſhews why men, wiſe and underſtanding in other things, do not know this; namely, becauſe none can know it by mere natural reaſon; none but thoſe to whom He revealeth it.

Ver. 28. Come unto me, &c.] Our Saviour here ſhews to whom he is pleaſed to reveal theſe things. Warmed with the moſt ardent love to men, he graciouſly invites all who are weary of the ſlavery of ſin, and deſire to be in a ſtate of reconciliation with God, to come unto him, or to believe in him: Not becauſe he expected any advantage from them, but becauſe he both knew how to give them relief, and was willing to do it, upon no other motive however, but merely to ſatisfy the immenſe deſire he had to do them good. In this invitation our Lord ſeems to have had his eye on Iſai. l. 4. where the Meſſiah is introduced, ſaying, The Lord hath given me the tongue of the learned, that I ſhould know how to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to him that is weary; for, his having all things delivered to him of the Father, is parallel to the Lord's giving him the tongue of the learned; and his inviting all who labour and are heavy laden, is the end mentioned by the prophet for which the tongue of the learned was given him; and this, poſſibly, is the reaſon why many critics, by the Reſt offered in this invitation, underſtand that freedom from the burdenſome ſervices of the law which Chriſt has granted to men, through the promulgation of the Goſpel, termed in the prophecy, ſpeaking a word in ſeaſon to him that is weary; And it muſt be owned that this interpretation is favoured by the ſubſequent clauſe, in which men are invited to take on them Chriſt's yoke, from the conſideration that it is eaſy, in compariſon of Moſes's yoke; and his burden, from the conſideration that it is light, in compariſon of the ceremonial precepts of the law. There is no reaſon, however, for confining the reſt of the ſoul here offered, to that particular privilege of the Chriſtian religion; it is more natural to think that it comprehends therewith all the bleſſings of the Goſpel whatſoever. Dr. Doddridge has well paraphraſed it, "All ye that labour, and are heavy-burdened, whether with the diſtreſſes of life, or with the ſenſe of guilt, (ſee Pſ. xxxii. 4.) or with the load of ceremonial obſervances." It has been well obſerved that Chriſtianity gives reſt to the ſoul, becauſe, 1ſt, it clearly informs the judgement concerning the moſt important points, removing all doubts concerning them; becauſe, 2dly, it ſettles the will in the choice of what is for its happineſs; becauſe, 3dly, it directs the paſſions aright, and ſo keeps them under good government. See my ſermon on this text, Diſcourſes on the miracles, vol. i.

Ver. 29, 30. Take my yoke upon you] The word yoke is uſed even by the heathen philoſophers, to ſignify doctrines and precepts. It is ſo applied Acts xv. 10. and St. John, interpreting this paſſage in his firſt Epiſtle, ch. v. 3. ſubſtitutes the word commandments inſtead of yoke. The meaning is, "My doctrine and precepts are eaſy and pleaſant; in which reſpect they are diſtinguiſhed from the Moſaical ceremonies, and alſo from the traditionary precepts of your doctors, who bind up heavy loads of duty, and lay them upon men's ſhoulders." Some have apprehended, ſays Dr. Doddridge, that when our Lord ſays, I am meek, and lowly of heart, He intends peculiarly to recommend the imitation of his humility and meekneſs, as what would eſpecially conduce, in the natural conſequence of things, to promote the repoſe and tranquility of their minds. But I apprehend that our Lord chiefly means to remind them of the general lenity of his temper; which would engage him to decline all grievous impoſitions, and unneceſſary burdens, and tenderly to inſtruct them in the way of pardon and life. See ch. xii. 19, 20. Dr. Heylin reads this, For I am a mild and condeſcending Maſter. Ἐλαφρὸν, ver. 30. properly ſignifies both light and pleaſant; and χρηστὸς, eaſy, may be alſo rendered good, gentle, and agreeable; and ſo with great propriety may expreſs that true pleaſure and chearfulneſs, which are the genuine reſult of a ſincere ſubjection to Chriſt's government. That Chriſt's yoke is eaſy, and his burden light, muſt be acknowledged, becauſe all his affirmative precepts are as neceſſary to the ſouls of men, as food is to their bodies; and for his negative injunctions, abſtinence from drink is not more expedient to perſons ſwelled with the dropſy, than they are to all who would preſerve the health and vigour of their ſouls. The obedience therefore which he required, is ſuch a reaſonable obedience as every well-informed mind muſt rejoice in; and the pleaſures which he promiſes, are the pleaſures of goodneſs, the moſt extenſive, ſatisfying, and durable of all pleaſures, being to the mind a delicious and continual feaſt. See Macknight and Hammond.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XI.

Whatever were the motives that inclined the holy Baptiſt to ſend his diſciples to Jeſus, which we cannot doubt were the beſt, we certainly ſhould be thankful for the enquiry; as from thence we derive a convincing teſtimony of the truth of that Goſpel, which is ſtrongly ſupported by the evidence of prophecy and of miracles. If at any time tempted to doubt the truth of Chriſtianity, we ſhould recollect the various and unanſwerable proofs of it, which are contained in the comprehenſive words of our Redeemer, ver. 4—6. Proofs, ariſing from the miracles, and from the prophetic teſtimony which was borne to him. Our Lord pronounces a bleſſing upon thoſe who ſhall not be offended in him. It is our wiſdom and our duty to conſider what thoſe things are in the doctrine or circumſtances of Chriſt, which have proved the moſt dangerous ſtumbling-blocks, and endeavour to fortify our ſouls againſt thoſe temptations which may ariſe from them: So the trial of that faith, which is a much more valuable treaſure than gold which periſheth, though tried in the fire, may be found unto praiſe, and honour, and glory.

How happy would it be, if we could learn to correct the natural inconſiſtencies of our temper and conduct by wiſe reflections! How much more improving would our attendance on the miniſtrations of God's ſervants be, were we ſeriouſly to aſk ourſelves to what purpoſe we attend! What went ye out to ſee? ver. 7—9. It ought ſurely to be followed with ſuch conſiderations, ſince it is intended to lead us to the kingdom of heaven. A glorious prize, too glorious to be obtained by faint wiſhes and inactive deſires. There is a ſenſe in which it ſtill ſuffers violence, (ver. 12.) and how ſad is the degeneracy of our nature, that we ſhould exert ſo little warmth in ſuch a purſuit, and ſo much for every trifle!

Inſtead of that holy ardor with which men ſhould preſs into it, they fold their hands in their boſoms, and loſe themſelves in ſoft luxurious dreams, till the precious opportunity is for ever gone. How eager then, my ſoul, ſhould we be, to preſs into that heavenly city, where our home and our privileges are! where we are free denizens, and have our names enrolled in the book of God!

Whatever meaſures good men take, they will never eſcape the cenſures of the world: However contrary in their manners the Baptiſt and the holy Jeſus, they were equally reproached by the Phariſees. The moſt unſpotted innocence, and the moſt unparalleled excellence, will not always be a defence againſt the reproach of tongues. Nay, a man's beſt gifts, and beſt actions, which are both well intended, and well calculated for edification, may be made the matter of his reproach. It was true, in ſome ſenſe, that Chriſt was a friend to publicans and ſinners, (ver. 19.) the beſt friend they ever had; for He came into the world to ſave ſinners, great ſinners, even the chief. So he ſaid very feelingly, who had been himſelf, not a publican and a ſinner, but a Phariſee and a ſinner: But this is, and will be Chriſt's praiſe to eternity, and they forfeited the benefit of it, who thus turned it to his reproach. For ourſelves we ſhall diſcover in all things ſufficient cauſe to adore the wiſdom and goodneſs of God, when happily, we are of the number of the true children of this incarnate wiſdom.

What can we imagine more dreadful than the guilt and condemnation of thoſe who, hear the Goſpel only to deſpiſe it? How can we read the doom of Chorazin, Bethſaida, and Capernaum, (ver. 21—24.) without trembling for ourſelves, leſt we ſhould incur the like terrible ſentence?—We, (who have now the written word in our hands, the Goſpel preached, and Goſpel ordinances adminiſtered to us, and who live under the diſpenſation of the Spirit,) have advantages not inferior to thoſe of theſe ungrateful cities; and our account in the laſt day will be accordingly. The profeſſors, therefore, of this age, whether they go to heaven, or to hell, will be the greateſt debtors in either of theſe places: If to heaven, the greateſt debtors to divine mercy, for thoſe rich means which brought them thither: If to hell, the greateſt debtors to divine juſtice, for thoſe rich means which would have kept them thence!

Still we ſee the Goſpel hidden from many, who are eſteemed the wiſeſt and moſt ſenſible of mankind; (ver. 25.) and, bleſſed be God, we ſtill ſee it revealed to ſome, who, in compariſon of them, are but babes. Let not this offend us. But rather, taking our notions from the word of God, let us learn to honour thoſe babes, as poſſeſſed of the trueſt wiſdom, and adore the riches of divine grace, if we are in their number, while many of ſuperior capacities are left to ſtumble at this ſtone, till they fall into final ruin.

How ſolemn a truth have we in the words of Chriſt, ver. 27. All things are delivered unto me, &c.! Chriſt is the ſovereign diſpenſer of ſalvation

CHAP. XII.

Chriſt reproveth the blindneſs of the Phariſees concerning the breach of the ſabbath, by ſcriptures, by reaſon, and by a miracle: he healeth the man poſſeſſed who was blind and dumb. Blaſphemy againſt the Holy Ghoſt ſhall never be given. Account ſhall be made of idle words: He rebuketh the unfaithful who ſeek after a ſign, and ſheweth who is his brother, ſiſter, and mother.

AT that time Jeſus went on the ſabbath-day through the corn; and his diſciples were an-hungred, and began to pluck the ears of corn, and to eat.

2 But when the Phariſees ſaw it, they ſaid unto him, Behold, thy diſciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the ſabbath-day.

3 But he ſaid unto them, Have ye not read what David did when he was an-hungred, and they that were with him,

4 How he entered into the houſe of God, and did eat the ſhew-bread, which it was not lawful for him to eat, neither for them which were with him, but only for the prieſts?

5 Or have ye not read in the law, how that on the ſabbath-days the prieſts in the temple profane the ſabbath, and are blameleſs?

6 But I ſay unto you, That in this place is one greater than the temple.

7 But if ye had known what this meaneth, I will have mercy, and not ſacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltleſs.

Ver. 1. Deut. xxiii. 25. Mark ii. 23. Luke vi. 1.—V. 3. 1 Sam. xxi. 6.—V. 4. Exod. xxv. 30. Lev. xxiv. 5. Exod. xxix. 32, 33. Lev. viii. 31. xxiv. 9.—V. 5. Numb. xxviii. 9. John vii. 22.—V. 6. 2 Chron. vi. 18.—V. 7. Hoſ. vi. 6. Ch. ix. 13.

ſalvation, and the Lord of all things, by the donation of his Father. All the ſprings, and the whole diſpenſation of the divine favours, are in the hand of Chriſt; as Prieſt and Sacrifice, as Saviour and Mediator, Head and Pattern, Paſtor and Sovereign Judge of men. There is no knowledge of the Father and the Son, no belief of the myſtery of the Holy Trinity, but what is a gift of God, by Jeſus Chriſt, and according to his will. How lovely is this dependance! Bleſſed Lord! we accept it with joy; we deſire to depend on thee. Make us to know the Father: Make thyſelf known to us; but let the love in us be yet greater than the knowledge!

Under all our troubles and afflictions, after our miſcarriages, in our temptations, and in our inability to do good, our only remedy is, to have recourſe to Chriſt; and how ſweet is it to be able to fly to a Redeemer, who comes to meet us, in order to ſollicit us to come to Him! ver. 28. Sinners, wearied in the ways of iniquity, throw yourſelves into the boſom of this amiable Shepherd, who, while on earth, took ſo much pains to ſeek you, and to bring you back to his fold. Penitents, humbled under the weight of your crimes, unite yourſelves to this ſanctifying victim, who bore your ſins on the croſs. Chriſtians, overburdened with the multitude of your defects, and with the greatneſs of your duties, lift up yourſelves to this eternal High-prieſt, who is at the right hand of God his Father, continually making interceſſion for you. The bleſſed Jeſus excepts none; all are invited, all are urged to come to Him. None ſhall ſeek, and not find: None ſhall go to Chriſt, without receiving reſt. He himſelf promiſes, and ſhall we not believe?

Jeſus Chriſt is the ſole teacher of humility, ver. 29. Learn of ME, ſays the bleſſed Saviour, with great and peculiar propriety; for it was a lecture of philoſophy until then unknown to the world. Humility was a virtue, which had not ſo much as a name before Chriſtianity. But, ſuppoſing it had been known to the world before our Saviour, yet no mere mortal was fitted to teach it in perfection; and therefore it was a doctrine and a diſcovery reſerved for, and peculiarly adapted to the character and condition of Jeſus Chriſt; who not only humbled himſelf to the meanneſs of our nature, but vouchſafed to aſſume one of the loweſt and moſt abject conditions of life, to teach us perfect humility in all its parts and circumſtances; that humility, without which we can find no reſt to our ſouls. Pride is the ſource of a thouſand diſquietudes.

It is not ſufficient to go to Chriſt by faith, we muſt take upon us the yoke of his law and Goſpel, that we may conform our lives thereto, and ſtudy his diſpoſition and behaviour, in order to imitate them. In the ſchools of the world ſome ſtudy philoſophy, others phyſic, law, &c. in the ſchool of Chriſt, every one muſt ſtudy meekneſs and humility; for to theſe two the whole ſcience of Chriſtianity may be reduced; meekneſs of charity, calm and ſedate in the midſt of wrongs, injuries, affronts, perſecutions; without envy, without malice, without revenge: Humility of heart, remote from all inordinate and worldly deſires, by which pride is nouriſhed; aſcribing nothing to itſelf, and deſiring nothing; ready to part with all things, to be placed below all men, to remain in ſilence and oblivion. Lord, vouchſafe to teach us this ſcience, writing it in our hearts by thy love!

How eaſy and ſweet is it to ſerve Chriſt, even in bearing his croſs! How hard and painful is the ſlavery of the world, of ſin, and of our own paſſions, even with all their falſe pleaſures! That ſatisfaction, peace, and comfort, which grace gives here below, and that which hope encourages us to expect in heaven, make a Chriſtian full amends for all his pains in ſubduing his paſſions, and in oppoſing the world.

Chap. XII. Ver. 1. On the ſabbath-day] See the note on Luke vi. 1. where the Evangeliſt points out the ſabbath and day whereon this happened. Through the corn, means through the paths that were in the corn. The word στάχυας may indifferently ſignify ears of any kind of grain; but it moſt probably was barley, which was ripe at that time in Judea.

Ver. 2. When the Phariſees ſaw it, they ſaid, &c.] The Jews were allowed by the law, when they came into the ſtanding corn of their neighbours, to pluck ſome ears, and eat them, Deut. xxiii. 25. But as they were by the ſame law forbid to reap on the ſabbath-day, the Phariſees, perverſely enough, accounted this action of the diſciples to be a kind of reaping. They looked alſo upon the rubbing the ears of corn in their hands as a breach of the law, becauſe they were not allowed by it to dreſs their victuals on the ſabbath-day. See L'Enfant's introduction, p. 159.

Ver. 3, 4. But He ſaid unto them] Concerning this tranſaction, ſee the note on Mark ii. 25, 26. By the houſe of God is not meant the temple, for it was not yet built; but the court of the tabernacle, which was at that time pitched at Nob, one of the prieſts cities in the tribe of Benjamin.

Ver. 5. Or have ye not read in the law] He did not mean that theſe words were to be found in the law, but that they might read in the law, that the high-prieſts were obliged on the ſabbath-day to perform ſuch ſervile work in the temple, as, conſidered ſeparately from the end of it, was a profanation of the ſabbath; and yet were guiltleſs, becauſe it was neceſſary to the public worſhip, on account of which the ſabbath was inſtituted. From Numb. xxviii. 9. it appears, that beſides the continual burnt-offerings, the prieſts were obliged on the ſabbaths to ſacrifice two lambs extraordinary, by which their ſervile work was that day double of what it was on the other days of the week. This, though really no profanation of the ſabbath, might, according to the common notion of the Jews, be ſo termed; and therefore, in ſpeaking of it, our Lord calls it ſo. See Macknight and Calmet.

Ver. 6. But I ſay unto you, that in this place, &c.] "If you reply, that the prieſts were not culpable in thoſe actions, becauſe they were undertaken for the temple ſervice,—I acknowledge it; but at the ſame time it ſhould be obſerved, that if the temple, with its ſervice, is of ſuch importance as to merit a particular diſpenſation from the law of the ſabbath, I and my diſciples, whoſe buſineſs of promoting the ſalvation of men is of equal importance, may on that account, with equal reaſon, take the ſame liberty, in a caſe of the like neceſſity." Every prophet was greater than the temple; and hence it was that Elijah ventured to ſacrifice out of the temple; but our bleſſed Lord was greater than any prophet, as appears from ver. 41. It ſhould be obſerved, that Chriſt and his Apoſtles were ſo taken up in the diſcharge of their duty, that they had not leiſure to prepare food for the ſabbath; they were therefore under a neceſſity either to intermit their prophetic office, or to act contrary to the literal ſenſe of the law. Now, as the Jews did not intermit the office of the prieſthood on account of the law concerning the ſabbath, ſo neither ſhould the prophetic office be intermitted on that account, eſpecially as it was ſuperior in its dignity, and more extenſive in its benefits. According to this interpretation, the reading μεῖζον, a greater work, inſtead of μείζων, a greater perſon, which is authorized by a number of MSS. will have a peculiar elegance. "There is here a much more noble work carrying on than the temple ſervice." Or the common reading may be retained thus: "If the ſervile work done in the temple on a ſabbath is not reckoned an offence, becauſe it is undertaken on account of the temple worſhip, the rubbing of the ears of corn, for which you blame my diſciples, cannot be any; ſeeing they do it in order to ſupport life, while they are employed in the ſervice of one who is greater than the temple." For the human nature of Jeſus was a much more auguſt temple, in reſpect of the eſſential habitation of the Divinity, than that of Jeruſalem. See Grotius, Hammond, Wetſtein, Mill.

Ver. 7. I will have mercy, &c.] I delight in mercy (ſo θέλω, ſignifies, 8 For the Son of man is Lord even of the ſabbath-day.

9 And when he was departed thence, he went into their ſynagogue:

10 And behold, there was a man which had his hand withered. And they aſked him, ſaying, Is it lawful to heal on the ſabbath-days? that they might accuſe him.

11 And he ſaid unto them, What man ſhall there be among you, that ſhall have one ſheep, and if it fall into a pit on the ſabbath-day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out?

12 How much then is a man better than a ſheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the ſabbath-days.

13 Then ſaith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand: and he ſtretched it forth; and it was reſtored whole, like as the other.

14 Then the Phariſees went out, and held a council againſt him, how they might deſtroy him.

15 But when Jeſus knew it, he withdrew himſelf from thence: and great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all,

16 And charged them that they ſhould not make him known:

17 That it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by Eſaias the prophet, ſaying,

18 Behold, my ſervant, whom I have choſen; my beloved, in whom my ſoul is well pleaſed: I will put my ſpirit upon him, and he ſhall ſhew judgement to the Gentiles.

19 He ſhall not ſtrive, nor cry; neither ſhall any man hear his voice in the ſtreets.

20 A bruiſed reed ſhall he not break, and ſmoking flax ſhall he not quench, till he ſend forth judgement unto victory.

21 And in his name ſhall the Gentiles truſt.

ch. xxvii. 43.) more than ſacrifice; for this is the Hebrew form of compariſon. See the note on ch. ix. 13. Works of mercy, acts of kindneſs and beneficence are eſſential duties, and preferable to all the ceremonial law, named here, (from its principal act,) ſacrifice, when that comes in competition with them. As the ſenſe of ſo many important ſcriptures depends upon it, it may be proper to obſerve, that according to the genius of the Hebrew language, one thing ſeems to be forbidden, and another commanded, when the meaning only is, that the latter is greatly to be preferred to the former. The text before us is a remarkable inſtance; as likewiſe Joel ii. 13. Matt. vi. 19, 20. John vi. 27. Luke xii. 4, 5. Col. iii. 2. And it is evident that Gen. xlv. 8. Exod. xvi. 8. John v. 30. vii. 19. and many more paſſages, are to be expounded in the ſame comparative ſenſe. See Doddridge, Heylin, L'Enfant.

Ver. 8. For the Son of man is Lord, &c.] See on Mark ii. 27. The expreſſion even of the ſabbath-day, καὶ τοῦ σαββατου, certainly implies, that the ſabbath was an inſtitution of great and diſtinguiſhed importance. It may perhaps alſo refer to that ſignal act of authority which Chriſt afterwards, by the miniſtry of his Apoſtles, exerted over it, in changing it from the ſeventh to the firſt day of the week.

Ver. 9. When he was departed thence] There can be no doubt as to the connection of this ſtory with the preceding, in which all the Evangeliſts agree; and indeed, had not St. Luke told us, that it was on another ſabbath, the words of St. Matthew would have led us to imagine it had been the ſame day. Perhaps our Lord might ſpend moſt of the week in the town, to which the fields abovementioned belonged. See Doddridge and Chemnitz.

Ver. 10. And they aſked him, &c.] That is, the Phariſees, ver. 14. who, when they ſaw Jeſus going to perform the cure, put this queſtion to him, Is it lawful, &c.? by which they declared in the ſtrongeſt terms their opinion of its unlawfulneſs: But in ſo doing they had no intention to prevent the action which they knew he was reſolved upon, but to render him odious to the common people; expecting that he would openly declare ſuch things lawful, in oppoſition to the definitions of the doctors, who had all determined that to perform cures upon the ſabbath was a violation of the holy reſt: Or if he ſhould give no anſwer to their queſtion, as it implied an affirmation of the unlawfulneſs of what he was about to attempt, they thought it would render him inexcuſable, and give the better colour to their accuſation. The word θεραπεύειν, rendered to heal, is very extenſive, and properly includes all the care, labour, and attendance which the caſe of any diſtempered or wounded perſon can require; as I apprehend our Engliſh word cure alſo does, though through the poverty of our language we are forced to apply it to thoſe miraculous effects, which were ſo inſtantaneouſly produced by the healing word of our bleſſed Redeemer. What Syriac word the Phariſees might uſe we know not; but it is plain the queſtion is put in very general terms, which beſt favoured their baſe purpoſe of founding an accuſation on our Lord's anſwer. See Doddridge and Macknight.

Ver. 11. That ſhall have one ſheep) Who if he have but one ſheep that on the ſabbath-day ſhould fall into a pit, will not, &c.? The ſtreſs is not here to be laid upon a man's having only one ſheep, but upon one only falling into a pit. The following Jewiſh ſaying is mentioned by ſome writers: "It is unlawful to do any ſervile work on the ſabbath-day, unleſs it is on purpoſe to ſave a life;" which comprehends alſo brutes. From what is ſaid here, and Luke xiii. 15. xiv. 5. it appears, that this was then a common ſaying. The firſt clauſe of the next verſe might be rendered, Of how much greater value is a man than a ſheep? To do well, καλῶς ποιεῖν, implies all the offices of humanity and tenderneſs, and is oftentimes uſed in oppoſition to doing evil or killing, when it bears the ſame ſenſe as it does here; and the context ſeems to require it, namely, to preſerve life. To peform the lovely pleaſing acts of kindneſs and beneficence, is preferable to ſacrifice, or any ceremonial performance; the former being a more eſſential duty, more pleaſing to God, and more beneficial to mankind. See Doddridge, L'Enfant, Heylin.

Ver. 15. But when Jeſus knew it] But Jeſus, knowing it, withdrew, Wat.

Ver. 16. And charged them, &c.] To what we have obſerved concerning the reaſons why our Lord deſired to conceal his mighty works, in the note on ch. viii. 4. may be added the following remarks by Mr. Locke: "This concealment of himſelf, ſays he, will ſeem ſtrange in one who was come to bring light into the world, and was to ſuffer death for the teſtimony of the truth. This reſervedneſs will be thought to look as if he had a mind to conceal himſelf, and not to be known to the world for the Meſſiah, nor to be believed as ſuch; but we ſhould be of another mind, and conclude this proceeding of His according to divine wiſdom, and ſuited to a fuller manifeſtation and evidence of his being the Meſſiah, when we conſider that he was to fill up the time foretold for his miniſtry; and, after a life illuſtrious in miracles and good works, attended with humility, meekneſs, patience, and ſuffering, and every way conformable to the prophecies of him, ſhould be led as a ſheep to the ſlaughter, and with all quiet ſubmiſſion be brought to the croſs, though there were no guilt nor fault found in him. This could not have been, if, as ſoon as he appeared in public, and began to preach, he had preſently profeſſed himſelf to have been the Meſſiah, the king who owned that kingdom which he publiſhed to be at hand; for the ſanhedrim would then have laid hold of it, to have got him into their power, and thereby have taken away his life; at leaſt they would have diſturbed his miniſtry, and hindered the work he was about. That this made him cautious, and avoid as much as he could the occaſions of provoking them, and falling into their hands, is plain from John vii. 1.

Ver. 17—21. That it might be fulfilled, &c.] Concerning this prophecy we refer the reader to the notes on Iſai. xlii. 1, &c. juſt obſerving, that it is not quoted here exactly according to the Hebrew original, the Evangeliſt having contracted it; neither is it quoted according to the verſion of the LXX. who have but indifferently paraphraſed this paſſage of Iſaiah.

Ver. 20. And ſmoking flax] And the twinkling lamp ſhall he not extinguiſh, till he ſend forth judgement to eternity; or, till he hath made juſtice victorious. Wat. It is ſaid at ver. 18. that he ſhall teach the nations judgement; by which I underſtand, ſays Dr. Heylin, that ſelf-judgement, [the noſce teipſum reduced to practice] which is the ground of all morality, and commonly named judgement in the Scripture. This at firſt muſt be greatly defective: ſelf-knowledge is then dim, as the ſmoaking wick, and good purpoſes weak as the broken reed; yet, under the conduct of Chriſt, theſe unpromiſing diſpoſitions will improve by continual acceſſions of life and ſtrength; while the feeble contrite novices perſiſt in their endeavours to judge rightly of themſelves, i. e. as God judges of them: and at length their judgement will be conformed to the divine judgement, and they will condemn in themſelves all that God condemns. At laſt Chriſt, by the renovation of their nature, will cauſe judgement to paſs in their favour, which I take to be the purport of that phraſe, rendering judgement victorious.

Ver. 21. And in his name, &c.] St. Matthew hath here followed 22 Then was brought unto him one poſſeſſed with a devil, blind and dumb: and he healed him, inſomuch that the blind and dumb both ſpake and ſaw.

23 And all the people were amazed, and ſaid, Is not this the ſon of David?

24 But when the Phariſees heard it, they ſaid, This fellow doth not caſt out devils, but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils.

25 And Jeſus knew their thoughts, and ſaid unto them, Every kingdom divided againſt itſelf, is brought to deſolation; and every city or houſe divided againſt itſelf, ſhall not ſtand:

26 And if Satan caſt out Satan, he is divided againſt himſelf; how ſhall then his kingdom ſtand?

27 And if I by Beelzebub caſt out devils, by whom do your children caſt them out? therefore they ſhall be your judges.

28 But if I caſt out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you.

29 Or elſe how can one enter into a ſtrong man's houſe, and ſpoil his goods, except he firſt bind the ſtrong man? and then he will ſpoil his houſe.

30 He that is not with me, is againſt me; and he that gathereth not with me, ſcattereth abroad.

Ver. 22. See ch. ix. 32. Mark iii. 22. Luke xi. 15.—V. 24. Ch. ix. 34. Mark iii. 22. Luke xi. 15.—V. 27. Gr. Beelzebul: and ſo ver. 24.—V. 29. Iſai. xlix. 24. Luke xi. 22.

the LXX. In Iſaiah it is, and the iſles ſhall wait for his law: But the meaning of both paſſages is the ſame; for the Evangeliſts uſe the name of God with that latitude which it has in the Hebrew language, wherein it denotes the Deity himſelf, his perfections, his worſhip, his laws, and in one word, every thing relating to religion. In the language of the Old Teſtament, the iſles commonly denote the idolatrous nations to the weſt of Judea. The prophet's meaning therefore is, that the heathen nations, charmed with the humanity and gentleneſs of the Meſſiah's kingdom, the equity of his government, and the beauty and rectitude of his laws, ſhall truſt in him, or obtain for themſelves protection and ſafety by becoming his ſubjects. See Macknight and Vitringa.

Ver. 22. One poſſeſſed, &c.] A demoniac. Wat.

Ver. 24. This fellow doth not caſt out, &c.] The Phariſees affirmed that Jeſus performed his miracles particularly on poſſeſſed perſons by the aſſiſtance of Beelzebub, for two reaſons; firſt, Jeſus had all along been at great pains to oppoſe thoſe ſuperſtitions which moſt of the teachers and people of that age looked upon as the eſſentials of religion, and extolled as the principal branches of piety. Hence they took him that decried them to be a very flagitious perſon; And becauſe it is ſuppoſed, Deut. xiii. 1—3. that a falſe prophet might work ſigns and wonders, with an intention to turn men from the worſhip of God, They thought our Lord was a deceiver of that kind; affirming that he performed all his miracles by the aſſiſtance of evil ſpirits, and with a view to ſeduce the people from their obedience to God. Secondly, The demons, in addreſſing Jeſus, honoured him with the title of the Meſſiah. This, it is probable his enemies ſaid, the devil would never have done, had he not been in compact with them. Hence we ſee the reaſon why our Lord, on ſeveral occaſions, ſtrictly charged the devils not to make him known: He would not have their teſtimony, becauſe it was a real defamation, and becauſe he foreſaw that a bad uſe would be made of it by men of evil minds. The truth is, the account which the Phariſees gave of Chriſt's miracles, and which they endeavoured to propagate, in order to prevent the effect which they might have had upon the people, though it was altogether falſe and malicious, and even abſurd in the ſight of impartial judges; yet, placed in the light juſt now mentioned, had ſome ſhew of argument in it, at leaſt to perſons whoſe prejudices and intereſts were favoured by it. Accordingly, among other cauſes, it contributed not a little to the infidelity of the Jews, which, to any thinking mind, cannot but be matter of great wonder, conſidering what multitudes were witneſſes of the many miracles which Jeſus performed on the ſick of all ſorts; on the blind, the deaf, the dumb, the maimed, and the lame; on paralytics, lunatics, demoniacs, and other miſerable objects; nay, and on dead perſons, whom he raiſed again to life; on the winds, and on the ſeas; in a word, on every part of nature. See the note on ch. x. 25. It may be proper to obſerve once for all, that the word fellow is not in the Greek, but inſerted by our tranſlators. In the original it is Οὗτος, He, or this man; the term is certainly uſed contemptuouſly.

Ver. 25, 26. And Jeſus knew their thoughts, &c.] It frequently happens, that, through ignorance or weakneſs, men form wrong judgements of things; a misfortune which, becauſe it neceſſarily ſprings from the imperfection of human nature, does not deſerve the very harſheſt cenſure; but when wrong judgements proceed from evil diſpoſitions, they become highly culpable: therefore, to ſhew that the judgement which the Phariſees paſſed at this time upon our Lord's miracles was of the latter kind, the Evangeliſt obſerves, that Jeſus knew their thoughts; knew that the wickedneſs of their hearts, and not the weakneſs of their underſtandings, had led them to form the opinion they had uttered, if it was their real opinion; or rather to affirm it contrary to their conviction; which was the reaſon that at the concluſion of his defence he reprimanded them in the ſharpeſt manner. Accordingly, addreſſing himſelf both to them and the people, He demonſtrated the abſurdity of their calumny, by an argument drawn from the common affairs of life: Every kingdom, &c. as much as to ſay, "If evil ſpirits aſſiſt me in working miracles for the confirmation of my doctrine, they do what they can to promote the ſpiritual worſhip and ardent love of the true God, and as effectually as poſſible excite men to the practice of univerſal juſtice, benevolence, temperance, and ſelf-government; all theſe virtues being powerfully recommended by my doctrine. But thus to make the evil ſpirits fight againſt themſelves, is evidently to make them ruin their own intereſt, unleſs it can be thought that the ſtrength and welfare of a ſociety is advanced by jarring diſcord, and deſtructive civil wars: Your judgement therefore of my conduct is palpably malicious and abſurd. This anſwer of our Lord's demonſtratively proves, that Beelzebub and Satan are names of the ſame perſon; and conſequently that Satan was conſidered as the prince of thoſe demons who were caſt out by Chriſt, and who are elſewhere repreſented as his angels. It may not be improper to add here, that the Jewiſh rabbies call every demon by the name of Satan, and often uſe the name in the plural number. So they call Sammael (which is but another name for Beelzebub) "the head or prince of all the Satans." See Caſaubon on the place, and Archb. Tillotſon's ſermons, vol. iii. p. 545.

Ver. 27. By whom do your children, &c.] Your ſons, υἱοὶ. Dr. Chandler paraphraſes the verſe thus: "You do not impute the miracles of your prophets to Beelzebub, but on the evidence of theſe miracles you receive them as the meſſengers of God; nevertheleſs you reject me, who work greater and more numerous miracles than they, and impute them to the power of evil ſpirits. Is this conduct of a piece? Wherefore theſe prophets ſhall be your judges; they ſhall condemn you." Others, however, ſuppoſe, and as it ſeems to me with better reaſon, that by your ſons is meant your diſciples, or your countrymen in general; for that many of the Jews did at this time attempt to caſt out devils, is plain from Mark ix. 38. Luke ix. 49. Acts xix. 13. and Joſephus Antiq. lib. viii. c. 2. Calvin thinks that God conferred a power of this kind on ſome particular perſons amongſt the Jews anciently, that by thus proving his preſence among them, he might retain the nation in the faith of his covenant; and that the people, having experienced God's power in thoſe inſtances, came fooliſhly to inſtitute for themſelves the office of an exorciſt. Agreeably to this it may be obſerved, that our Lord's argument does not require that the demons were actually expelled by theſe exorciſts; it is ſufficient that the Jews thought they were expelled, and did not condemn thoſe pretended miracles, as they did Chriſt's real ones. See Whitby and Grotius on the place.

Ver. 28. Then the kingdom of God is come unto you] That is, "You may thereby diſcover that I am the Meſſiah, or that King who was promiſed to the Jews." The miracles of Jeſus Chriſt, and the manner in which he performed them, were manifeſt demonſtrations of his having been ſent from God, (ſee John iii. 2.) and conſequently, that what he ſaid of himſelf was true. But the caſting out of devils, in particular, was a miracle which proved Chriſt to be the Meſſiah, ſince he came into the world on purpoſe to deſtroy the works of the devil. See 1 John iii. 8. John xii. 31. Heb. ii. 14. and L'Enfant.

Ver. 29. A ſtrong man's houſe] The houſe of the ſtrong one: the demon. The word man ought not here to be interpolated. See Iſai. xlix. 24, &c. The ſtrong one is the ſame as the evil one, and the Prince of this world. The argument ſuppoſes, that the ſtrong one is actually preſent to guard his houſe; and indeed the caſe in queſtion proves the preſence of Satan. The houſe of the ſtrong one, into which Chriſt entered, was the world; fitly called Beelzebub's houſe, or palace, becauſe there he is ſerved by luxury, luſt, covetouſneſs, pride, anger, and other evil paſſions of men. The goods or veſſels belonging to this ſtrong one, which Chriſt ſpoiled, are the wicked,—called Beelzebub's veſſels metaphorically; as St. Paul is called by Chriſt his choſen veſſel, Acts ix. 15. Or, if we chuſe to peruſe the allegory more cloſely, by the veſſels or furniture of Beelzebub's houſe we may underſtand the luſts and paſſions of mens hearts, the inſtruments by which he keeps poſſeſſion of them. See Heylin, Macknight, and Chemnitz.

Ver. 30. He that is not with me, &c.] "If, according to the maxims of the world, thoſe are reckoned enemies who do not aſſiſt us againſt our foes; I, who am ſo deeply engaged in the oppoſition to Satan,

31 Wherefore I ſay unto you, All manner of ſin and blaſphemy ſhall be forgiven unto men: but the blaſphemy againſt the Holy Ghoſt ſhall not be forgiven unto men.

32 And whoſoever ſpeaketh a word againſt the Son of man, it ſhall be forgiven him: but whoſoever ſpeaketh againſt the Holy Ghoſt, it ſhall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come.

33 Either make the tree good, and his fruit good: or elſe make the tree corrupt, and his fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by his fruit.

34 O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, ſpeak good things? for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth ſpeaketh.

35 A good man out of the good treaſure of the heart, bringeth forth good things: and an evil man out of the evil treaſure, bringeth forth evil things.

36 But I ſay unto you, That every idle word that men ſhall ſpeak, they ſhall give account thereof in the day of judgement.

37 For by thy words thou ſhalt be juſtified, and by thy words thou ſhalt be condemned.

Ver. 31. Mark iii. 28. Luke xii. 10. Hebr. vi. 4. x. 26, 29. 1 John v. 16. Acts vii. 51.—V. 32. 1 Tim. i. 13.—V. 33. Ch. vii. 17. Luke vi. 43, 44.—V. 34. Ch. iii. 7. xxiii. 33. Luke vi. 45.

ought much rather to be reckoned his enemy; and he who does not ſet himſelf, according to his ability, to gather ſubjects into my kingdom with me, is but vainly and fooliſhly ſcattering abroad, and however is otherwiſe employed, waſtes his time and labour, in what will at laſt turn to no ſolid account. Much more criminal and fatal then muſt the character and conduct of thoſe be, who, with deliberate implacable malice, oppoſe my cauſe, and are reſolved, at all adventures, to do their utmoſt to bear it down, as you are attempting to do by theſe vile inſinuations which you have now ſuggeſted." See Doddridge, and the note on Mark ix. 40.

Ver. 31, 32. Wherefore I ſay, &c.] The inference in theſe verſes is not particularly connected with the member of the diſcourſe immediately preceding it; but it ariſes from the whole ſeries of the reaſoning: as if our Lord had ſaid, "Since all theſe arguments make it evident that I perform my miracles by the Spirit of God, you ſhould not aſcribe them to the devil; yet this blaſphemy may be forgiven you, becauſe you may repent and believe, upon receiving ſtronger proofs of my miſſion from God. When that period cometh, namely, after I am raiſed from the dead by the Holy Ghoſt; when his miraculous gifts are ſhed down upon believers, and the nature of the Meſſiah's kingdom is more fully made known, the foundation of your prejudices againſt me ſhall be wholly removed: Wherefore, if you ſhall then ſpeak againſt the Holy Ghoſt, by maliciouſly affirming that his gifts and miracles come from the devil, it ſhall not be forgiven you; becauſe it is a ſin which you cannot poſſibly repent of, inaſmuch as further evidence ſhall not be offered you; but you ſhall be puniſhed for it both in this world, and in the world to come:" Or, we may tranſlate the clauſe differently; "It ſhall not be forgiven him, neither in this age, neither in the age to come;" importing, that no expiation was provided for the blaſphemy of the Spirit, neither under the Jewiſh or Chriſtian diſpenſation. St. Mark adds, ch. iii. 30. Becauſe they ſaid, He hath an unclean ſpirit; ſignifying, that our Lord declared the irremiſſibleneſs of the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt on this occaſion, that the Phariſees might be awakened to a ſenſe of their danger, in approaching ſo near as they did to that ſin, when, being unable to deny his miracles, they repreſented them as performed by the aſſiſtance of the devil. The reader deſirous of ſeeing the above interpretation indubitably confirmed, is referred to Dr. Whitby's note, and 4th appendix to St. Matthew, and to John Hales's tracts. Archbp. Tillotſon, vol. i. ſerm. 17. has endeavoured to prove, that the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt was that which theſe Phariſees committed in aſcribing the miracles of Chriſt to Satan: And certainly, if they perſiſted in that blaſphemy, after the full demonſtration of Chriſt's miſſion, this was really to ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt. Dr. Clarke's paraphraſe, vol. vi. ſerm. 1. nearly agrees with what we have above given; but for the ſatisfaction of the reader on a ſubject of ſo much enquiry, we ſhall here ſubjoin it: "Since it is, as evident as it is poſſible for any thing to be, that the works which I do are by the immediate authority of God, and by the power of the Holy Spirit; therefore, whoſoever ſhall reſiſt this great conviction, by ſo unreaſonable and obſtinate a degree of malice, as to aſcribe theſe very works, theſe greateſt and higheſt evidences of divine authority, to the power of the devil; to ſuch a perſon God will never afford any further means of conviction; and therefore, though all other blaſphemies, and all particular ſins whatſoever, may be repented of and forgiven, yet he who is guilty of this total corruption of mind, this maliciouſly perverſe and deſperate rejecting of the greateſt, and higheſt conviction which God vouchſafes to afford men, ſhall never have granted him any further means of repentance and forgiveneſs. Every particular kind or ſort of ſin whatſoever, and all other blaſphemies whatſoever, ſhall be forgiven men: Even he that ſpeaks againſt me, (ſays our Lord) in all other reſpects; or calumniates me, upon any other account whatſoever, and is not at firſt convinced by my preaching and exhortations, may yet afterwards be convinced by the mighty works he ſhall ſee, and by the power of the Holy Ghoſt, and ſo repent and be forgiven: But he who obſtinately reſiſts even this greateſt and moſt extraordinary method which God has thought fit to make uſe of for the converſion of mankind, and maliciouſly reviles the moſt evident operations of the Spirit of God; ſuch a one has no further means left, by which he might be convinced and brought to repentance, and conſequently he can never be forgiven." Dr. Waterland, inſtead of blaſphemy, reads reviling; and the MS. renders the paſſage throughout in the potential mood, ver. 31. All—blaſphemy may be forgiven unto men; but—againſt the Holy Ghoſt, cannot, &c. ver. 32. And whoſoever, &c. it may be forgiven him; but, &c. it cannot—nor in the world to come.

Ver. 32. Whoſoever ſpeaketh a word, &c.] The prejudices which alleviated the ſin of the Jews, who rejected Jeſus during his own life-time, and which, in the period here referred to, were to be removed, aroſe from ſuch cauſes as theſe: 1ſt, His parentage and place of abode: for his countrymen, being well acquainted with both, would not allow him to be the Meſſiah, becauſe they imagined when the Meſſiah came, no man would know from whence he was, John vii. 27. 2d. The old prophet Elias had not appeared to uſher in the Meſſiah, as they expected, according to the doctrine of the Scribes, Matth. xvii. 10. founded on the prophecy, Mal. iv. 5. 3d. Chriſt's mean condition of life occaſioned violent prejudices againſt him in the minds of the Jews, who firmly believed that their Meſſiah would be ſurrounded with all the pomp and ſplendor of an earthly prince, and who, in ſpeaking of him, had been accuſtomed to give him the high-ſounding titles of the King of Iſrael, and Son of God. But by our Lord's reſurrection from the dead, and by the deſcent of the Spirit on the Apoſtles, the foundation of all theſe prejudices was ſapped: Then he was demonſtrated to be the Son of God with power, Rom. i. 4. Then he was known to have come down from heaven, John vi. 60, 62. Then he was exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remiſſion of ſin, Acts v. 31. A kingly dignity, infinitely ſuperior to all the moſt dazzling honours of an earthly diadem. See Macknight.

Ver. 33. Either make the tree good, &c.] "If you make my miracles Beelzebub's, you muſt make my doctrine his alſo: All the good I do, you muſt ſay is his work; all the exhortations by which I excite ſinners to repentance, are his; the knowledge which I give you of the way of life, and the motives I offer for your encouragement to enter upon it, are his. On the other hand, if you make my doctrine God's, you muſt make my miracles his likewiſe; for men judge of the nature of an agent by the actions which he does, juſt as they judge of trees by the fruit they produce; for which reaſon you may eaſily know that I am not in league with Beelzebub, but that you yourſelves are ſo." Or we may give the words another turn, thus: "Since you, Phariſees, pretend to extraordinary holineſs, your words and actions ſhould be all holy; judge therefore candidly, and ſpeak reverently of the divine diſpenſations; or if you will blaſpheme, lay aſide your pretenſions to religion; for however ſpecious theſe may be, your true characters will be diſcovered by your words and actions, even as a tree is known by its fruit. See Macknight and L'Enfant.

Ver. 34—37. O generation of vipers! &c.] Without attending to the context, and our Saviour's general argument, which he is here very cloſely purſuing, interpreters have been ſtrangely perplexed with the phraſe, every idle word, in ver. 36. which they have many of them conſidered as a diſtinct and ſeparate injunction; whereas it is cloſely connected with that calumnious and blaſphemous way of ſpeaking, proceeding out of an evil heart, which our Saviour is ſo ſharply condemning in the Phariſees. He declares, that the atrociouſneſs of the blaſphemy againſt the Holy Spirit is not leſſened by its being a ſin committed in words; the reaſon whereof is obvious: Words are only the dreſs of thought; they expreſs the diſpoſition of mens hearts, and conſequently partake of the nature of thoſe diſpoſitions, on which account we ſhall be rewarded or puniſhed for our words as well as for our actions. The malicious and blaſphemous heart can diſcover its malignity only by malicious and blaſphemous words, and thoſe are the idle or wicked words whereof our Saviour here ſpeaks, as the context indiſputably proves. The editors of the Pruſſian Teſtament have obſerved very well, that the LXX, whoſe ſtile the Apoſtles generally make uſe of, render the Hebrew word שקר ſheker, which ſignifies falſhood, reviling, calumny,—by vain, or unprofitable. Compare the Hebrew with the LXX, Exod. v. 9. xx. 14. Deut. v. 17. Hoſea xii. 1. Mic. i. 14. Hab. ii. 3. and ſee Epheſ. v. 6. where the word vain is joined with deceit and impoſture. Now it is manifeſt from ver. 31, 32. that our Saviour is not ſpeaking here of idle or impertinent, but of falſe, reviling, and blaſphemous: For this reaſon ſome MSS. read πονηρον, wicked, and thus 38 Then certain of the Scribes and of the Phariſees anſwered, ſaying, Maſter, we would ſee a ſign from thee.

39 But he anſwered and ſaid unto them, An evil and adulterous generation ſeeketh after a ſign; and there ſhall no ſign be given to it, but the ſign of the prophet Jonas:

40 For as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly: ſo ſhall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.

41 The men of Nineveh ſhall riſe up in the judgement with this generation, and ſhall condemn it: becauſe they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and behold, a greater than Jonas is here.

42 The queen of the ſouth ſhall riſe up in the judgement with this generation, and ſhall condemn it: for ſhe came from the uttermoſt parts of the earth to hear the wiſdom of Solomon; and behold, a greater than Solomon is here.

43 When the unclean ſpirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, ſeeking reſt, and findeth none.

Ver. 38. Ch. xvi. 1. Mark viii. 11. Luke xi. 16, 29. 1 Cor. i. 22.—V. 39. Iſai. lvii. 3.—V. 40. Jonah i. 17.—V. 41. Luke xi. 32. See Jer. iii. 11. Ezek. xvi. 51. Rom. ii. 27. Jonah iii. 5.—V. 42. 1 Kings x. 1. 2 Chron. ix. 1. Luke xi. 31.—V. 43. Luke xi. 24. Job i. 7. 1 Pet. v. 8.

thus St. Chryſoſtom underſtood it. To what theſe editors obſerve we may add, that the word idle was uſed formerly, and perhaps at the time when our tranſlation was made, to convey the idea of wicked; for though we read now in the firſt verſe of the firſt pſalm of Sternhold's verſion, to wicked wight his ear, in ſome ancient copies it is to idle wight. Though it is unqueſtionably certain that, for the reaſon above given, words will conſtitute part of our juſtification or condemnation at the day of judgement; yet it is very difficult to believe or ſuppoſe that our Saviour meant to render criminal, and ſubject to judgement, every unprofitable and uſeleſs word which falls from the lips of frail creatures like us. See James i. 26. iii. 3, 10. and what I have ſaid more on this ſubject, Chriſtian's Magazine, vol. ii. p. 517.

Ver, 38, 39. Then certain of the Scribes, &c.] Though our Saviour's reaſoning was clear and unanſwerable, yet ſome of the Scribes and Phariſees, deſirous to divert the diſcourſe to another topic, and fully demonſtrating the hardneſs of their hearts, required a ſign from heaven; as much as to ſay, "Maſter, thou profeſſeſt thyſelf a teacher of extraordinary authority, and we may juſtly expect ſome proportionable proof of it: Now theſe ſuppoſed diſpoſſeſſions which we have lately ſeen or heard of, are ſo liable to fraud and colluſion, that we cannot fully acquieſce in them, but would gladly ſee a more remarkable and convincing ſign from thee; and particularly ſome ſuch celeſtial appearance as ſeveral of our ancient prophets gave." The words of St. Luke, xi. 16. expreſly fix it to this ſenſe: And St. Matthew, in another ſtory of this kind, ch. xvi. 1. tells us, they demanded a ſign from heaven. (See Mark viii. 11. the note on ch. iv. 6. and John vi. 30.) And they might probably conclude, that they had the better excuſe for making ſuch a propoſal, as Moſes, Joſhua, Samuel, and Elijah had given ſuch ſigns. Jeſus told them, that their requiring a ſign after ſo many miracles were wrought to convince them, ſhewed them to be a wicked and adulterous generation, a ſpurious breed, which had degenerated from the faith and piety of their great progenitor Abraham; for which reaſon they ſhould have no other ſign, but ſuch as they were every day beholding in his miraculous works, the ſign of the prophet Jonah excepted. He meant hereby the miracle of his own reſurrection from the dead, typified by the deliverance of Jonah from the fiſh's belly, and to which he often appealed, as the great evidence of his miſſion from God. We may juſt obſerve, that as the reſurrection of Chriſt was attended with the appearance of a deſcending angel, it was with greater exactneſs than is generally obſerved, the very thing that theſe Phariſees demanded; a ſign from heaven. Some have objected to our Saviour, as being unwilling to give all the evidence of his miſſion which he might have given, on account of his refuſing a ſign when it was demanded. But to this it may be replied, that as the perſons who made this demand were actuated by no laudable motives, but by perverſeneſs and prejudice, which had already made them withſtand the cleareſt evidence, and the greateſt miracles, and which it was in vain to expect to conquer by working more miracles; It was therefore as reaſonable to refuſe to work more, as it is not to perſiſt in reaſoning with a man, who ſhews that he reaſons only for the ſake of contention, without any concern to diſcover truth. But when we recollect what was the ſign which they deſired, the objection is even abſurd. It was a ſign which they were led to expect only by their falſe notions of a temporal Meſſiah; it was abſolutely inconſiſtent with the truth of the Meſſiah's character: To have given it, would have been to become juſt ſuch a deliverer as the Jews expected; it was therefore impoſſible that it could be given: Inſtead of giving it, it was proper to affirm expreſly, as Jeſus did affirm, that it never would be given; and that it did not belong to the Meſſiah, juſtly conceived. Whenever a ſign was aſked, he appealed for the certainty of his Miſſion to his own reſurrection from the dead. So far was he from refuſing any rational evidence of his miſſion, that even their perverſeneſs hindered him not from voluntarily pointing out the ſtrongeſt. His reſurrection was in itſelf the moſt ſtupendous miracle, and its force was increaſed by its being in this manner appealed to; for it thus became the accompliſhment of the prophecies uttered by him. But there is a farther propriety in his foretelling it, when they required a ſign: It was a plain inſinuation that their opinion of the manner of the Meſſiah's appearance was wrong; that he was not ſuch a prince as they expected; for by it he informed them expreſly, that he muſt be put to death before he entered on his kingdom. His anſwer was therefore fit for leading them to a juſter interpretation of Daniel's prophecy (ch. vii. 13, 14.), and for preventing their rejection of the Meſſiah, becauſe he wanted a character which was never predicted of him. See Dr. Gerard's "diſſertations on ſubjects relating to the genius and evidences of Chriſtianity," p. 186, &c. and John vi. 30.

Ver. 40. For as Jonas was three days and three nights] See the note on Jonah i. 17. Inſtead of the whale's, we ſhould read the fiſh's belly. It is no where in the Old Teſtament ſaid that it was a whale, and κητος ſignifies any large fiſh in general. See Mintert on the word. The heart of the earth is an Hebraiſm for the earth. See what Ezekiel ſays of the city of Tyre, which was ſituated on the ſea-ſhore, ch. xxvii. 4. xxviii. 2. Our Saviour, in the expreſſion here uſed, alludes to Jonah ii. 2. The miraculous preſervation of Jonah for three days in the belly of a fiſh, was to the Ninevites a certain proof of his miſſion from God, being credibly atteſted to them, either by the mariners, who threw him overboard at a great diſtance from land; or by ſome other perſons, who, happening to ſee the fiſh vomit him alive upon the ſhore, might inquire his ſtory of him, and who, in the courſe of their buſineſs, met him afterwards at Nineveh, where they confirmed his preaching by relating what they had ſeen. In like manner Chriſt's reſurrection from the dead, after having been three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, being credibly atteſted to the Jews, ſhould clearly demonſtrate that he came from God.

Ver. 41, 42. The men of Nineveh, &c.] The Ninevites being judged at the ſame time with the men of that generation, and their behaviour being compared together, ſhould make the guilt of the latter appear in its true colours, and condemn them: For though they were idolaters, they repented at the preaching of Jonah; a ſtranger, a poor perſon, and one who continued among them only three days, and wrote no miracle among them to make them believe him; But the men of that generation, though worſhippers of the true God by profeſſion, could every day hear unmoved the much more powerful preaching of a prophet infinitely greater than Jonah; even the preaching of the eternal Son of God, who confirmed his doctrine by the moſt aſtoniſhing miracles. Our Saviour likewiſe told them, that the queen of the ſouth, being compared in the day of judgement with them, would condemn them; ſhe having undertaken a long journey to hear the wiſdom of Solomon, whereas they would not hear one much wiſer than Solomon, though he was come to their very doors; or, if they condeſcended to hear his wiſdom, they would not embrace it. See the note on 1 Kings x. 1. From the uttermoſt parts of the earth, Dr. Waterland renders the remote, &c. And Sir David Dalrymple, (in ſome hints with which he hath favoured me, and for which I take this opportunity to return him my thanks) reads ἐκ τῶν περάτων τῆς γῆς, from the utmoſt bounds of the land. "I do not think, ſays he, that γῆ is uſed in the New Teſtament for the earth: γῆ is the land, by eminence; οικουμενη, the Roman empire, κοσμος, the earth." One cannot help remarking the very ſublime manner, yet the perfect modeſty and decorum, wherewith our Lord here ſpeaks of himſelf. The humble form of his appearance, and his neceſſary reſerve in declaring himſelf the Meſſiah in ſo many words, made it yet more expedient, that by ſuch phraſes as theſe before us, he ſhould ſometimes intimate it; and indeed, his ſaying that he was greater than Solomon, that moſt illuſtrious of all the deſcendants of David, was as plain an intimation as could well be given.

Ver. 43—45. When the unclean ſpirit, &c.] Our Lord here finiſhes his defence, alluding to the occaſion of the diſpute, ver. 22. with a parable of a poſſeſſed perſon, who, having had the devil expelled out of him, received him back again, and thereby was brought into a worſe condition than ever. "When the unclean ſpirit is gone out of a man, &c. i. e. when convictions are raiſed in the mind of a ſinner, whether by God's word, or the chaſtiſements of his providence, the man forms many ſtrong reſolutions againſt his ſins; the evil ſpirit thus expelled walks to and fro in deſart places, ſeeking to ſeduce God's ſubjects from their allegiance; but meeting with little opportunity 44 Then he ſaith, I will return into my houſe from whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, ſwept, and garniſhed.

45 Then goeth he, and taketh with himſelf ſeven other ſpirits more wicked than himſelf, and they enter in and dwell there: and the laſt ſtate of that man is worſe than the firſt. Even ſo ſhall it be alſo unto this wicked generation.

46 While he yet talked to the people, behold, his mother and his brethren ſtood without, deſiring to ſpeak with him.

47 Then one ſaid unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren ſtand without, deſiring to ſpeak with thee.

48 But he anſwered and ſaid unto him that told him, Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?

49 And he ſtretched forth his hand towards his diſciples, and ſaid, Behold, my mother, and my brethren.

50 For whoſoever ſhall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the ſame is my brother, and ſiſter, and mother.

tunity of gratifying his malicious diſpoſitions in theſe ſolitudes, he leaves them, in hopes of getting acceſs into his former habitation; then he ſaith, I will return, &c. That is, notwithſtanding the man had ſo peremptorily reſolved againſt his ſins, the devil findeth him void of all his former convictions, good thoughts, and reſolutions, but at the ſame time completely furniſhed with his luſts and paſſions, and every thing that can make him a commodious habitation for an evil ſpirit. Then taketh he with himſelf ſeven other ſpirits; i. e. a great many; the number ſeven denoting perfection, whether of good things or bad;—and they get an eaſy acceſs, and take a ſevenfold ſtronger poſſeſſion of the man than before. Even ſo ſhall it be unto this wicked generation, who reſiſt the convictions which my doctrine and miracles have raiſed in them." This parable, therefore, is deſigned to teach men in every age, the danger of reſiſting their convictions, and of breaking through their reſolutions; the effect being commonly to render them much more obdurate and abandoned than before. See 2 Pet. ii. 20. By ἀνύδρων are meant deſarts. See Pſ. cvi. 14. LXX. and ſo Waterland renders it. Dr. Whitby, and ſome others, interpret this of the Devil's being caſt out of Judea, yet finding no reſt in the deſarts of heatheniſm, becauſe there alſo the Apoſtles caſt them out: which drove them to return again to the Jews, and to make them worſe than before. Dr. Doddridge thinks, that after the devil was driven out, he would be under a kind of reſtraint for a while; and that the circumſtance of his going into deſart places is beautifully imagined, to repreſent thoſe malignant beings, as impatient at the ſight of mankind, when reſtrained from hurting them, and as chuſing, on ſuch occaſions, to ſeek their reſt in the proſpect of a ſandy deſart: But it is needleſs thus to ſtretch the minute circumſtances of a parable. If the moral intended is clearly expreſſed by the chief ſtrokes of it, a variety of leſſer circumſtances may without any particular ſignification be added, to unite and enliven the principal members of the compoſition. In the interpretation of a parable, therefore, we are not under the leaſt neceſſity of aſſigning a moral meaning to every particular circumſtance; At the ſame time, if all of them naturally ſuggeſt ſuch a meaning, the parable is ſo much the more perfect: In this of the ejected demon, the circumſtance of his going away to deſarts after he was diſpoſſeſſed, ſeems to be one of the kind above mentioned; and, like the other parts of the allegory, was adapted to the notions of the people for whom it was deſigned. It ſeems the Jews believed that evil ſpirits frequented deſarts, when they were not directly employed in hurting mankind. See the tranſlation which the LXX have given of Iſai. xiii. 21. They who have read the ſad account which Joſephus gives of the temper and conduct of the Jews after the aſcenſion of Chriſt, and juſt before their final deſtruction by the Romans, muſt acknowledge, that no emblem could have been more proper to deſcribe them, than that which our Saviour here uſes. Their characters are the vileſt that can be conceived, and they preſſed on to their own ruin, as if they had been poſſeſſed by legions of devils, and wrought up to the laſt degree of Madneſs. See Macknight, Calmet, and Chemnitz.

Ver. 46. Behold, his mother and his brethren] See ch. xiii. 55. Mary was attended by her ſiſter's children, who were the couſins, or, according to the Hebrew dialect, the brethren of Chriſt, (ſee on ch. x. 2.) and who waited on her during her ſtay in Capernaum; a piece of reſpect which her Son could not ſhew, on account of the duties of his miniſtry. It was on occaſion of their application to him, that Jeſus uttered that excellent ſaying in the ſubſequent verſes, which will never be forgotten while there are memories in the world to retain it, or tongues to repeat it.

Ver. 48. Who is my mother, &c.] To ſuppoſe that our Lord here intends to put any ſlight on his mother, would be very abſurd: He only took the opportunity of expreſſing his affection to his obedient diſciples, in a peculiarly endearing manner, which could not but be a very great comfort to them, and would be to Suſanna, Joanna, Mary Magdalen, and the other pious women who ſat near him, (Luke viii. 2, 3.) a rich equivalent for all the fatigue and expence which their zeal for their heavenly Maſter occaſioned. And as this ſeems to have been towards the beginning of their progreſs, it is obſervable that our Lord appears to have been peculiarly concerned for their encouragement. See Luke xi. 27, 28. and Doddridge.

Ver. 50. The ſame is my brother, and ſiſter, and mother] He is my brother, or ſiſter, or brother. Doddridge. This ſhort ſpeech of our Lord, related by the Evangeliſt with great ſimplicity, is, without his ſeeming to have deſigned it, one of the fineſt encomiums imaginable. Could the moſt elaborate panegyric have done Jeſus Chriſt and his religion half the honour which this divine ſentiment hath done them? Whoſoever ſhall do the will of my father, &c. "I regard obedience to God ſo highly, that I prefer the relation it conſtitutes, and the union which it begets, to the ſtrongeſt ties of blood. They who do the will of my Father have a much greater ſhare in my eſteem than my kinſman; as ſuch, I love them with an affection tender and ſteady, like that which ſubſiſts between the neareſt relations; nay, I reckon them and them only my brethren, my ſiſters, and my mother." An high commendation this, and not a reflection upon our Lord's mother, who no doubt was among the chief of thoſe who did the will of God. What veneration ſhould reign in the hearts of men for Jeſus and his religion, which exhibits an idea of ſuch perfection and goodneſs! See Macknight and Calmet.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XII.

We may obſerve with pleaſure the zeal which the attendants of Chriſt expreſſed, who choſe on a ſacred feſtival to expoſe themſelves to hunger as well as toil, (ver. 1.) rather than they would loſe the benefit of his inſtructions, which, like the heavenly manna on the day preceding the ſabbath, were then poured out in a double plenty. But what numerous auditory is ſo candid as to contain none who come, like theſe Phariſees, with a deſire to cavil rather than to learn? The malignity of their temper ſufficiently appeared in taking exception at ſo ſmall a circumſtance. ver. 2. Indeed, this is the character of hypocrites, and of thoſe who have only a falſe zeal; they are offended at things in their nature innocent, and even ſometimes at ſuch as are good, neceſſary, and acceptable to God, whilſt they themſelves neglect the moſt eſſential duties of religion, and eſpecially the great duty of charity.

What our Lord ſays upon this occaſion, and chiefly the expreſſion I will have mercy, and not ſacrifice, ver. 7. deſerves our beſt attention. The Chriſtian religion deals not in forms and ceremonies, nay, diſpenſes even with rituals of divine appointment, when humanity and benevolence interfere with the obſervation of them. How great then the perverſeneſs and wickedneſs of thoſe, who ſacrifice mercy itſelf, not merely to ceremonies of divine original, but to their own arbitrary inventions, ſuperſtitious dreams, and precarious, though confident determinations. We ſhould practiſe habitual caution and candour, leſt before we are aware we condemn the innocent and the pious, and become guilty of what is much more diſpleaſing in the ſight of God, than the faults which a peeviſh and cenſorious temper may fancy it diſcovers in our brethren.

The change of the Jewiſh into the Chriſtian and ſpiritual ſabbath ſhews, that Chriſt is not only the Lord, ver. 8. but alſo the truth and completion of it. When, Lord, wilt thou change this ſabbath into that of eternity! into that unchangeable reſt, which thou reſerveſt for the people of God?

There are but too many Chriſtians, it is to be feared, who regard their cattle even more than the ſouls committed by Providence to their care, and therefore, no doubt, more than their own too. ver. 11, 12. If we owe a great deal to a man, let him be what he will, how much more to a Chriſtian, together with whom we help to form the body of Chriſt? Strange corruption of the heart of man, to whom it muſt be proved, that he is permitted at all times to do good!

The malice of the Phariſees did not reſtrain the benevolence of our compaſſionate Saviour, nor deprive the poor patient of his cure. ver. 13. The fear of giving offence to Phariſaical perſons ſhould never hinder an Evangelical labourer from going forward with God's work, according to his rules and maxims. We ſhould never be overcome of evil.

The bare will of Jeſus Chriſt has an Almighty Power of reſtoring life and vigor to our ſouls. He makes the affliction evident, in order to make known his mercy, and to excite that of the Phariſee: Stretch forth thine hand. When God deſigns to heal the withered hand of a ſinner, he need only give command, and the ſinner begins

The parable of the ſower and the ſeed: The expoſition of it. The parable of the tares, of the muſtard-ſeed, of the leaven, of the hidden treaſure, of the pearl, of the draw-net caſt into the ſea: and how Chriſt is contemned of his own countrymen.

THE ſame day went Jeſus out of the houſe, and ſat by the ſea-ſide.

preſently to ſtretch it forth to him by prayer, and towards his neighbour by alms, and by all the aſſiſtances which he owes. Lord, my ſoul is before thee, like this hand; vouchſafe to ſhew it the ſame ſaving mercy!

How ſtriking is the prudence of our Lord, who avoided every thing that looked like vanity or oſtentation! How ſtriking his humility, meekneſs and condeſcenſion! ver. 15, 16. Surely face does not more exactly anſwer to face in water, than the character of Chriſt drawn by the prophet to his temper and conduct as deſcribed by the Evangeliſts. How ſhould Zion rejoice, and the daughter of Judah ſhout, that ſuch a king cometh unto her, meek, and having ſalvation! He diſcourages nobody; he bears with the weakneſs of men with great patience, and while there is any good in us, He forſakes us not. This ought on one hand, to encourage and make us confide in him; and on the other, induce us to imitate him; to be humble, meek, and peaceable as he was; to avoid vain-glory, and a deſire of praiſe; to ſhun quarrels and diſputes; to exerciſe great forbearance towards men; to make allowances for, and condeſcend to their weakneſs.

The Spirit of Chriſt is not a ſpirit of contention, murmuring, clamour, or litigiouſneſs: He ſhall not ſtrive nor cry! He who loves all theſe, belongs not to him. The meekneſs of Jeſus Chriſt, as his Father's miniſter, was particularly foretold, to teach the clergy that their miniſtry is not a miniſtry of pride, imperiouſneſs, and violence; but of humility, moderation, and mildneſs.

We have here another triumph of Chriſt over the evil ſpirit, ver. 22. and another proof of the horrible corruption of human nature; how prone it is to be captious and cavilling; and at the ſame time how full of blindneſs, prejudice, and malignity againſt Chriſt and the Goſpel.—Who could have thought the Holy One, and the Wiſdom of God, who gave the cleareſt evidence of his excellent character as divine, and every way greater that of Solomon, or any of the prophets, ſhould ever have been traduced as a confederate with the devil, or that it ſhould have ever entered into the heart of man to blaſpheme the bleſſed Spirit in the higheſt manifeſtations of his glory, and ſtigmatize him as an evil ſpirit? If we ſhut our eyes and hearts againſt the rich means of grace which Chriſt has given us, in vain do we call for further evidence, and better means to convince us: No ſigns from heaven would prevail upon us, and the very heathens muſt reproach us, and riſe up in judgement againſt us. ver. 39, 40.

How great is the danger and the aggravation of ſinning againſt light and grace! The more convictions are ſtifled, the greater is the hardneſs that enſues; till at length Satan obtains a ſecure dominion over the ſinner, and the worſt of all condemnation will paſs upon him in the great day; ver. 45. How ſhould the thoughts of ſuch a day to come make us dread every word as well as action, which will then make againſt us! ver. 36, 37. How ſhould it incite us to ſet a watch on the door of our lips, and to labour daily to uſe our tongue ſo, that it may be indeed, as it is called in Scripture, our glory. For this purpoſe we ſhould endeavour to lay up a good treaſure of Chriſtian knowledge and experience in our hearts, ver. 35. That while too many are poiſoning thoſe round about them with erroneous principles and vicious diſcourſes, the opening of our lips may be of righteous things; and we may ſtill be ready, upon all proper occaſions, with freedom, variety, and ſpirit, to bring forth good and profitable things from the good treaſure of our hearts, which may edify thoſe who hear us, and may go from one heart to another.

But let us remember, that before the lips can be ſanctified, and the life holy, the heart muſt be changed; and certainly it is the greateſt comfort to hear that by Goſpel grace the heart may be changed. It is matter of the greateſt thankfulneſs thus expreſly to be told, that all manner of ſin and blaſphemy ſhall be forgiven, upon our true repentance; while it is aweful to hear, that the blaſphemy againſt the Holy Ghoſt is excepted. Thoſe who, while they cannot deny the facts of Chriſtianity, yet deſpiſe and oppoſe its doctrines, ſhould tremble to think how near they approach to the boundaries of this ſin. But let not the humble ſoul, that trembles at God's word, meditate terror to itſelf from ſuch a paſſage; which, when viewed in its due connection, cannot with any ſhadow of reaſon be thought to belong to any but thoſe who obſtinately reject the Goſpel, and maliciouſly oppoſe it, when made known to them with its fulleſt evidence.

In vain do men ſeek for ways of accommodation to ſoften the Goſpel; there is no medium between loving God, and being his enemy; between belonging to Chriſt, or to the devil; between being governed by charity, or by ſelf-love, ver. 30. If we would belong to Chriſt as we ought, we muſt give ourſelves intirely to him. He alone has paid down the price for us; he alone ought to be our Lord.

The devil ceaſes not to tempt thoſe whom Chriſt has taken from him: He has no other joy but only in doing hurt to man: He makes new efforts, and takes new precautions, that he may not fail to ruin us; whilſt we, perhaps, uſe none at all to eſcape him. The reaſon is, becauſe he counts our loſs his gain and delight, and we count not our ſalvation our proper buſineſs. How much is a relapſe to be dreaded! This renders the ſinner more intolerable than before, through his ingratitude and perfidiouſneſs, ver. 43—45. Habits are formed and ſtrengthened by relapſes, and relapſes are multiplied and become more incurable, through new habits. How is it that the ſinner hath not eyes to ſee what a ſoul is, when deſerted by the Holy Ghoſt and his precious gifts, and made a ſlave to as many contrary habits as it were to ſeven devils, to whom it has ſurrendered up itſelf by ſin? What compaſſion would a poor galley-ſlave, loaded with ſeven chains, raiſe in our hearts!—With what terror then ought we to be affected at the idea of a captive ſoul, reduced by frequent relapſes under the power of ſeven devils!

What can be more gracious and indulgent than thoſe declarations, by which our Redeemer draws us, as with the cords of a man, and as with the bands of love? Behold my mother and my brethren! All obedient believers are nearly related to Jeſus Chriſt. They wear his name, they bear his image, they have his nature, they are of his family. He loves them, owns them, converſes freely with them, as his relations. He bids them welcome to his table, provides for them, ſees that they want nothing proper for them. When he died, he left them rich legacies: Now he is in heaven, he keeps us a correſpondence with them by his Spirit, continually intercedes for them, and will at length,—glorious iſſue of His relationſhip!—receive them to his eternal kingdom, and confeſs them before men, before angels, and before his Father himſelf. Who, then, would not exert their utmoſt endeavour to do the Will of God; that they may be thus dear, thus nearly allied to that Redeemer, who ought, by ſo many tender, ſo many intereſting bonds, to be dear to them?

Chap. XIII. Ver. 1, 2. The ſame day] This is the plain and literal meaning of the original, and it may be underſtood of the day when the mother and relations of our Saviour came to him. It muſt, however, be obſerved, that this expreſſion is not always to be taken literally, but may only ſignify at that time, or on one of thoſe days, as St. Luke words it, ch. v. 17. It ſeems the calumnies of the Phariſees had not the effect intended; for the crowd was now become ſo great, that neither the houſe, nor the court before it, could contain the people who came; Jeſus therefore carried them out to the ſea-ſide, and taught them: And becauſe there were many ſtill coming and going, he judged it neceſſary to enter into a boat, for the conveniency of being heard and ſeen by all, which he might eaſily be, if the ſhore thereabouts was ſomewhat circular and declining, after the manner of an amphitheatre. Thus commodiouſly ſeated in the veſſel, he delivered many doctrines of the higheſt importance, wiſely making choice of ſuch for the ſubject of his ſermons when he had the greateſt number of hearers, becauſe there was a probability of doing the moſt good by them.

Ver. 3. He ſpake to them in parables]. The word παραβολὴ, ſignifies a compariſon or ſimile; a transferring the ideas or properties which are in one ſubject generally familiar and well known, to another leſs known and underſtood, in order to heighten and enliven that other the more to the mind. It is a putting of one thing for another, that the matter intended to be taught may not immediately appear from the bare letter, and the caſe put, but when the key is given may ſtrike more fully and ſtrongly on the mind; for a parable is exactly what we call "putting a caſe;" when one thing is ſaid and ſuppoſed, with a deſign to teach, illuſtrate, and inforce ſome other. Such are our Saviour's parables; ſo that to underſtand them, we muſt look beyond the letter: In ſuch as he hath not himſelf interpreted, we ſhall either find the key from his general application, or from the connection wherein the parable ſtands with his miracles or his diſcourſes. And while, carefully attending hereto, we explain the other circumſtances agreeably to the ſubject in hand, and the analogy of faith, there is no doubt but we ſhall obtain all the profit which was intended to be conveyed to us by this moſt pleaſing, beautiful, and perſuaſive method of inſtruction. That parables were very familiar, and much in uſe among the eaſtern nations, and particularly thoſe of Paleſtine, we learn from the concurrent evidence of all writers on the ſubject; and, for the moſt part, as Sir Iſaac Newton (on Daniel, p. 148.) obſerves, "Both Chriſt, and his forerunner John, as well as the old prophets, were wont in their parabolical diſcourſes to allude to things preſent, and ſuch as immediately offered themſelves." See the note on ch. v. 1, and 1.. Theſe are ſome of the reaſons why our Saviour ſpoke in parables: 1ſt. As a judicial puniſhment upon thoſe who were hardened againſt, and ill diſpoſed to the truth; and ſometimes as a more lively method to convince and confute them, even from their own mouths: 2d. As a means to awaken the attention, and whet the inquiry of thoſe who were well diſpoſed, and to lead them to a ſerious examination, and diligent in parables, ſaying, Behold, a ſower went forth to ſow;

4 And when he ſowed, ſome ſeeds fell by the way-ſide, and the fowls came and devoured them up:

5 Some fell upon ſtony places, where they had not much earth: and forthwith they ſprung up, becauſe they had no deepneſs of earth:

6 And when the ſun was up, they were ſcorched; and becauſe they had no root, they withered away.

7 And ſome fell among thorns; and the thorns ſprung up, and choked them:

8 But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, ſome an hundred-fold, ſome ſixty-fold, ſome thirty-fold.

9 Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

10 And the diſciples came, and ſaid unto him, Why ſpeakeſt thou unto them in parables?

11 He anſwered and ſaid unto them, Becauſe it is given unto you to know the myſteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given.

12 For whoſoever hath, to him ſhall be given, and he ſhall have more abundance: but whoſoever hath not, from him ſhall be taken away even that he hath.

13 Therefore ſpeak I to them in parables: becauſe they ſeeing, ſee not; and hearing, they hear not, neither do they underſtand.

14 And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Eſaias, which ſaith, By hearing ye ſhall hear, and ſhall not underſtand; and ſeeing ye ſhall ſee, and ſhall not perceive:

ſearching after the truth; and as a method the moſt natural, beautiful, and inſtructive, to teach from common and familiar objects, the moſt divine and important leſſons, and to imprint them on the memory. 3d. As a veil to the myſteries of his kingdom, and a method leſs offenſive to convey ſome very ungrateful and unpalatable truths, ſuch particularly as the rejection of the Jews, the calling of the Gentiles, &c. 4th. As a leſſon of man's natural blindneſs, and ignorance in ſpiritual matters, unleſs Chriſt, by his grace, is pleaſed to open the underſtanding, and enlighten the mind. And all this, 5thly, to fulfil the prophecies concerning him, in this reſpect, as well as to comply with the cuſtoms and manners of the nation, with whom this method of inſtruction was familiar." See the Preface to my ſermons on the miracles and parables, p. 6.

In this chapter our Lord delivers ſeven parables, directing the four former, as being of general concern, to all the people; the three latter to his diſciples. He began with the parable of the ſower, who caſt his ſeed on different ſoils, which, according to their natures, brought forth either plentifully, or ſparingly, or not at all. By this ſimilitude he repreſented the different kind of hearers, with the different effects which the doctrines of religion have upon them, according to their different diſpoſitions. In ſome theſe doctrines are ſuppreſſed altogether; in others they produce the fruits of righteouſneſs, more or leſs, according to the goodneſs of their hearts. A parable of this kind was highly ſeaſonable, now that the multitude ſhewed ſuch an itching deſire to hear Chriſt's ſermons, while perhaps they neglected the end for which they ought to have heard them. This parable too was exquiſitely proper for an introduction to all the reſt, as our Lord anſwers in it, a very obvious, and a very important queſtion: "The ſame ſower Chriſt, and the ſame preachers ſent by him, always ſow the ſame ſeed; why hath it not always the ſame effect?" He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. See Bengelius, and the note on ch. xi. 15.

Ver. 4. And when he ſowed, &c. the fowls] And as he ſowed, &c. the birds. Wat. and MS. It is obſervable that our Lord points out the great hindrances of our bearing fruit, in the ſame order as they occur. The firſt danger is, that the birds will devour the ſeed; if it eſcape this, there is yet another danger, namely, leſt it be ſcorched and wither away; it is not long after this that the thorns ſpring up, and choke the good ſeed. A vaſt majority of thoſe who hear the word of God receive the ſeed as by the way-ſide; of thoſe who do not loſe it by the birds, yet many receive it as on ſtony ground: Many of them who receive it in a better ſoil, yet ſuffer the thorns to grow up and choak it; ſo that few even of thoſe endure to the end, and bear fruit to perfection: and yet in all theſe caſes it is not the will of God which hinders, but their own voluntary perverſeneſs. See Weſley's notes on the New Teſtament.

Ver. 6. And when the ſun was up] This was the reaſon that, upon the ſun's appearing, they were ſcorched, &c. Pruſſian editors.

Ver. 8. But other fell into good ground] But another part falling on good ground, bore fruit, one grain yielding an hundred, another ſixty, another thirty. Pruſſian editors. See Gen. xxvi. 12. The fruitfulneſs of the ſeed which was ſown on good ground is not to be underſtood, ſays Macknight, of the field's producing an hundred times as much as was ſown on it; but it is to be underſtood of a ſingle grain producing an hundred grains, which it might eaſily do where it met with a good ſoil, and was properly nouriſhed; but there are many accidents by which the produce of a field, ſo rich as to be capable of nouriſhing a hundred grains by a ſingle root, is reduced within ordinary bounds: The parable mentions ſome of them; part of the ſeed is trodden down by paſſengers, part is ſtarved in bad ſoil among rocks, and part is choked by weeds; ſo that the hundred-fold increaſe of a ſingle ſeed mentioned in the parable is certainly juſt.

Ver. 9. Who hath ears, &c.] He that hath, &c. Wat.

Ver. 10, 13. And the diſciples came, &c.] See the note on Mark iv. 10. The anſwer which our Lord here returns to his diſciples is remarkable: "You my diſciples, ſays he, who are of an humble docible temper, and are content to uſe means, and to reſort to me for the underſtanding of ſuch things as I deliver, to you it ſhall be no diſadvantage that they are clothed in parables; for, beſides that I am ready to interpret every thing to you, my diſcourſes are ſo ordered, as to become plain and intelligible to ſuch unprejudiced minds: the truth will ſhine through the veil, and the ſhadow ſhall guide you to the body and ſubſtance. But as for thoſe proud and ſelf-conceited Phariſees, who are tranſported with their own prejudices, and will neither underſtand nor practiſe things plainly delivered, for the juſt hardening them, and ſuch as they are, I deliver myſelf in a manner which will not readily be apprehended by men of their temper. They ſhall choke themſelves with the huſks, while you feed upon the kernel. They have brought this wilful blindneſs upon themſelves, that in ſeeing they ſee not; and this wilful deafneſs, that in hearing they hear not, neither underſtand. This is elegantly paraphraſed in the verſion of 1727. They overlook what they ſee, and are inattentive to what they hear: The Hebraiſm, however, is peculiarly emphatical. The account which Jamblichus gives of the obſcurity of Pythagoras is ſomething ſimilar to what our Saviour ſays here. "Pythagoras ſtudied ſome obſcurity in his dictates, that thoſe only who were virtuouſly diſpoſed, and ſo prepared for his notions, might be benefited by his diſcourſes; but as for others, they (as Homer ſaith of Tantalus) ſhould be ſurrounded with ſuch things as were in themſelves deſirable, but not be able to touch them? The word myſtery, ver. 11. ſignifies in general whatever is hidden and unknown. The heathens were accuſtomed to give that name to their religious and ſecret ceremonies; but Jeſus Chriſt uſes it here to denote ſome particulars which were to happen relative to the Goſpel, the preaching of it, and the ſucceſs it was to meet with in the world, which were at that time unknown, and conſequently myſteries, till they were revealed. See ver. 5. and compare 2 Cor. ii. 7. and Mintert on the word μυστήριον. We have an expreſſion in Juvenal parallel to the latter clauſe of the 12th verſe,

> Nil habuit Codrus—et tamen illud
> Perdidit infelix totum nil.—— Sat. iii. l. 208.
> 'Tis true, poor Codrus nothing had to boaſt,
> And yet, poor Codrus all that nothing loſt. DRYDEN.

This ſentence of our Lord, which hath the appearance of a paradox, is often made uſe of by him. He that hath, is, he that improveth thoſe advantages which God hath given him, and continually receives more, till he hath attained to a full meaſure of them: He that hath not, is, he that doth not improve the like advantages, but makes ſo ill a uſe of them, that they ſtand him in no more ſtead than if he had them not. Shall be taken even that he hath, means the talents or advantages wherewith he hath been intruſted. This ſentence is explained by the parable of the talents, ch. xxv. 14, &c. See alſo Luke viii. 18. In the paſſage before us, we have the grand rule of God's dealings with the children of men, a rule fixed as the pillars of heaven: This is the key to all his providential diſpenſations, as will appear to men and angels on the great day; and therefore, in purſuance of this general rule, I ſpeak to them in parables, ſays our Saviour, ver. 13. "I do not give more knowledge to this people, becauſe they uſe not that which they have already: Having all the means of ſeeing, hearing, underſtanding, they uſe none of them; they do not effectually ſee, or hear, or underſtand any thing."

Ver. 14, 15. And in them is fulfilled, &c.] See the note on Iſai. vi. 9. The prophet's meaning is, that the Jews ſhould certainly 15 For this people's heart is waxed groſs, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have cloſed; leſt at any time they ſhould ſee with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and ſhould underſtand with their heart, and ſhould be converted, and I ſhould heal them.

16 But bleſſed are your eyes; for they ſee: and your ears; for they hear.

17 For verily I ſay unto you, That many prophets and righteous men have deſired to ſee thoſe things which ye ſee, and have not ſeen them; and to hear thoſe things which ye hear, and have not heard them.

18 Hear ye therefore the parable of the ſower.

19 When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and underſtandeth it not, then cometh the wicked one, and catcheth away that which was ſown in his heart. This is he which received ſeed by the way-ſide.

20 But he that received the ſeed into ſtony places, the ſame is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it;

21 Yet hath he not root in himſelf, but dureth for a while: for when tribulation or perſecution ariſeth becauſe of the word, by and by he is offended.

22 He alſo that received ſeed among the thorns, is he that heareth the word; and the care of this world, and the deceitfulneſs of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful.

hear the doctrines of the Goſpel without underſtanding them, and ſee the miracles which confirmed theſe doctrines without perceiving the finger of God in them; not becauſe the evidences of the Goſpel, whether internal or external, were inſufficient to eſtabliſh it, but becauſe the corruption of their hearts hindered them from diſcerning thoſe evidences: For this people's heart is waxed groſs, &c. In Iſaiah the paſſage is worded ſomewhat differently, Make the heart of this people fat, &c. Now this form is peculiar to the prophetical writings, implying no more than an order to the prophet ſimply to foretel that the Jews would make their own hearts hard, ſenſual, proud, and ſtubborn; and their ears heavy, and ſhut their eyes, &c. They would ſhut their eyes againſt the miracles, and their ears againſt the doctrines of the Goſpel, as if they were afraid of being converted and healed; having the ſtrongeſt averſion to hear or ſee what was contrary to their inclination. See Jer. i. 9. Ezek. xliii. 3. Gen. xli. 13. This prophecy, therefore, and its citation, are exactly the ſame; only the prophecy repreſents the thing as to happen,—Make the heart of this people, &c. whereas the citation repreſents it as already come to paſs,—This people's heart is, &c. "This people have made themſelves ſo wicked and proud, that they will neither hear nor ſee any thing oppoſite to their luſts; ſo that they appear as if they were reſolved not to be converted." This interpretation of the prophecy, and of its application made by St. Matthew, is confirmed by Iſaiah himſelf, ch. vi. 11. Then ſaid I, Lord, how long? How long are they to be in this miſerable condition? And he anſwered, till the cities be waſted without inhabitant, and the houſes without man, and the land be utterly deſolate; their blindneſs is to remain, till utter deſtruction falls upon them as a nation, overturning the conſtitution of their church and ſtate." It is confirmed alſo by the ſubjects of the parables to which our Lord applied this prophecy: For, had he told the Jews plainly, what he told them in an obſcure manner by the parable of the ſower, namely, that a principal part of the Meſſiah's office was to inſtil the doctrines of true religion into the minds of men, and that the chief effect of his power on earth ſhould be to ſet them free from the tyranny of their luſts, that they might become fruitful in goodneſs; Had he plainly declared what he inſinuated in the parable of the grain of muſtard, which grew ſo great, as to ſhelter the fowls of heaven under its branches,—that the Gentiles were to be governed by the Meſſiah, not as ſlaves, but free-born ſubjects, and to enjoy all the privileges of his kingdom on an equal footing with the Jews; Had he taught them plainly, what he inſinuated obſcurely, by the parable of the ſown ſeed, which ſprang up ſilently, and by the parable of the leaven hid in a quantity of meal, that the kingdom of the Meſſiah was neither to be erected nor ſupported by the violence of war, but by the ſecret force of truth, whoſe operation, though ſtrong, is altogether imperceptible;—I ſay, had our Lord taught his hearers theſe things in plain terms, they would have rejected them, been greatly offended, and probably have forſaken him altogether. So oppoſite were the doctrines mentioned to their favourite notions and expectations. In the mean time, if it be aſked why he handled ſuch ſubjects at all, ſince he delivered them in terms ſo obſcure? The anſwer is, it was expedient for the confirmation of the Goſpel, that he himſelf, in his own life-time, ſhould give ſome hints of the nature of it, and of the reception it was to meet with; becauſe the Jews, comparing the events with theſe parabolical predictions, would be diſpoſed thereby to acquieſce more peaceably in the admiſſion of the Gentiles into the church, without ſubjecting them to the Moſaical inſtitutions; a thing they were not brought to do but with the utmoſt difficulty. See Macknight, and more in the note on Mark iv. 11. Dr. Doddridge renders theſe verſes, And in them is the prophecy of Iſaiah fulfilled, which ſaith, By hearing you ſhall hear, but you ſhall not underſtand, and ſeeing you ſhall ſee, but ſhall not perceive. For the heart of this people is grown ſtiff with fatneſs, and they hear with heavy ears, and draw up their eyes, [as if they were more than half aſleep] leſt at any time they ſhould ſee, &c. The MS. before me reads, ver. 14. By hearing ye will hear, and will not underſtand,—will ſee, and will not perceive: Ver. 15. Leſt—they might ſee—might underſtand—might be converted.

Ver. 17. Verily, I ſay unto you, that, &c.] This is what ſets the diſciples above all prophets, and renders them greateſt in the kingdom of heaven. See ch. xi. 11. and comp. Pſ. cxix. 174. Luke ii. 25, 29, 30. x. 23, 24. John viii. 56. 1 Pet. i. 10, 12.

Ver. 19. When any one heareth, &c.] From this interpretation of the parable by our Saviour, we learn, that the ſeed ſignifies the doctrines of true religion; and the various kind of ground, the various kinds of hearers: The compariſon between the Deity and the ſower, is frequent amongſt the Jewiſh writers, and ſeed is among almoſt all nations uſed for doctrine or inſtruction. The ground by the highway ſide, which is apt to be beaten by men's treading upon it, is an image of thoſe who have their hearts ſo hardened with impiety, that though they hear the Goſpel preached, it makes no impreſſion at all upon them; becauſe they either hear it inattentively, or if they attend, they quickly forget it. This inſenſibility and inattention is ſtrongly repreſented by the beaten ground along the highway, into which the ſeed never entering, it is bruiſed by the feet of men, or picked up of birds. When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, or Goſpel, and underſtandeth, or conſidereth it not, (for συνιέναι ſignifies both) then cometh the wicked one, &c. The devil is ſaid to come and catch the word from this ſort of hearers, not becauſe he has power to rob men of their knowledge, or religious impreſſions, by any immediate act; but becauſe they expoſe themſelves, through careleſſneſs, to the whole force of the temptations which he lays in their way, and particularly to thoſe which ariſe whether from the commerce of men, (a circumſtance obſerved by St. Luke, who tells us that the ſeed was trodden down) or from their own head-ſtrong luſts, which, like ſo many hungry fowls fly to, and quickly eat up the word out of their mind. The perturbation occaſioned by the paſſions of this kind of hearers, and by the temptations which they are expoſed to, renders them altogether inattentive in hearing; or if they attend, it hardens them againſt the impreſſion of the word, and effaces the remembrance of it in an inſtant; inſomuch, that the pernicious influence of evil paſſions and bad company cannot truly be repreſented by any lower figure, than that the word is taken away by the devil, whoſe agents ſuch perſons and luſts moſt certainly are. See Macknight, and my ſermons on this parable. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt clauſe, This is it which is ſown by the way-ſide.

Ver. 20, 21. But he that received—into ſtony places] The ſtony, or rocky ground, repreſents thoſe hearers, who, ſo far receive the word into their hearts, that it ſprings up in good reſolutions, which perhaps are accompanied with a partial reformation of ſome ſins, and a temporary practice of ſome virtues. Neverthéleſs, they are not thoroughly affected with the word; it does not ſink deep enough to remain in their minds; and therefore, when perſecution ariſes for the ſake of the Goſpel, and ſuch hearers are expoſed to fines, impriſonments, corporal puniſhments, baniſhment, and death, or even to any great temptation of an ordinary kind, which requires firmneſs to repel it, thoſe good reſolutions, which the warmth of the paſſions had raiſed ſo quickly in hearing, do as quickly wither, becauſe they are not rooted in juſt apprehenſions of the reaſons which ſhould induce men to lead ſuch lives; juſt like vegetables, which not having depth of ſoil ſufficient to nouriſh them, are ſoon burnt up by the ſcorching heat of the mid-day ſun.

Ver. 22. He alſo that received ſeed among the thorns] The ground full of thorns, which ſprang up with the ſeed and choaked it, repreſents all thoſe who receive the word into hearts full of worldly cares; which ſooner or later deſtroy whatever convictions or good reſolutions are raiſed by the word. Worldly cares are compared to thorns, not only becauſe of their pernicious efficacy in choaking the word, but becauſe it is with great pains and difficulty that they are eradicated. In the parable, the hearers of this denomination are diſtinguiſhed from thoſe who receive the ſeed on ſtony ground, not ſo much by the effect of the word upon their minds, as by the different nature 23 But he that received ſeed into the good ground, is he that heareth the word, and underſtandeth it; which alſo beareth fruit, and bringeth forth ſome an hundred-fold, ſome ſixty, ſome thirty.

24 Another parable put he forth unto them, ſaying, The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which ſowed good ſeed in his field:

25 But while men ſlept, his enemy came and ſowed tares among the wheat, and went his way.

26 But when the blade was ſprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares alſo.

27 So the ſervants of the houſholder came and ſaid unto him, Sir, didſt not thou ſow good ſeed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares?

28 He ſaid unto them, An enemy hath done this. The ſervants ſaid unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up?

29 But he ſaid, Nay; leſt while ye gather up the tares, ye root up alſo the wheat with them.

of each; for in both the ſeed ſprang up; but brought forth no fruit. The ſtony ground hearers are incapable of retaining the impreſſions made by the word; they have no root in themſelves; no ſtrength of mind; no firmneſs of reſolution, to reſiſt temptations from without. Whereas the thorny ground hearers have the ſoil, but then it is filled with the cares of the world, the deceitfulneſs of riches, and the love of pleaſure, which ſooner or later ſtifle the impreſſions of the word; and by this means, in the iſſue, they are as unfruitful as the former. But both are diſtinguiſhed from the way-ſide hearers by this, that they receive the word, and yield to its influences in ſome degree; whereas the others do not receive the word at all, hearing without attention; or, if they do attend, forgetting it immediately. The way-ſide hearers hold the firſt place in the parable, becauſe they are by far more numerous than the reſt; and the good ground hearers the laſt, becauſe they are but few in number. The phraſe ἀπατη τοῦ πλούτου, the deceitfulneſs of riches, is very elegant, and admirably expreſſes the various artifices by which people, in the purſuit of riches, excuſe themſelves from day to day, in putting off religious cares,—and the confounding diſappointment which often mingles itſelf with their labours, and even with their ſucceſs. Comp. Prov. xi. 28. Luke xviii. 24. 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10, 17. 2 Tim. ii. 4. iv. 10.

Ver. 23. But he that received ſeed into the good ground] St. Luke hath expreſſed this rather more fully, ch. viii. 15. But that on the good ground are they, who, in an honeſt and good heart, having heard the word, keep it,—in oppoſition to the way-ſide, which never received the ſeed at all, but bearing it on its ſurface, offered it to the devouring birds;—and bring forth fruit with patience; in oppoſition both to the ſtony and thorny grounds, which nouriſhed the ſeed that was caſt into them only for a while; the former till the ſun aroſe, the latter till the thorns ſprang up. The goodneſs of heart for which this kind of hearers are applauded, conſiſts in their capacity; which, having been duly cultivated by them, they underſtand what they hear. The honeſty of their heart conſiſts in their diſpoſition to believe the truth, though contrary to their prejudices, and to practiſe it, though oppoſite to their inclinations: All who hear the word with theſe qualifications, and join thereto firmneſs of reſolution, and the government of their paſſions, never fail to bring forth, ſome an hundred fold, ſome ſixty, ſome thirty; fruits of righteouſneſs, in proportion to the different degrees of ſtrength in which they poſſeſs the graces neceſſary to the profitable hearing of the word. See Macknight, and Bp. Beveridge's 9th ſermon, vol. x. 8vo.

Ver. 24, 25. The kingdom of heaven is likened, &c.] The kingdom of heaven may be compared to, &c. or, literally, is like to: It is a phraſe often uſed by our Lord, to ſignify that the following parable, in its principal circumſtances, bears a reſemblance to what comes to paſs in the kingdom of heaven; i. e. the evangelical diſpenſation. See ch. xi. 16. and Luke vii. 32. Reſpecting the Tares, ſee the note on ver. 30. The great and judicious Bp. Sherlock hath admirably illuſtrated this parable. Take away the dreſs of parable, ſays he, and what our Saviour here delivers amounts to this: "There will always be a mixture in the world of good and bad men, which no care or diligence can prevent; and though men may and will judge that the wicked ought immediately to be cut off by the hand of God, yet God judges otherwiſe, and delays his vengeance for wiſe and juſt reaſons, ſparing the wicked at preſent, for the ſake of the righteous; reſerving all to the great day in which the divine juſtice ſhall be fully diſplayed, and every man ſhall receive according to his own works." The view of this parable has, in ſome parts of it, I think, been miſapplied. It is intended to repreſent the neceſſary condition of mankind, ſome being good, ſome bad; a mixture, which from the very nature of mankind is always to be expected;—and to juſtify God in delaying the puniſhment of thoſe ſins, which all the world think are ripe for vengeance. This being the view of the parable, it is going out of the way to conſider the particular cauſes to which the ſins of men may be aſcribed; for the queſtion is not from whence the ſins of men ariſe, but why, from whatever cauſe they ſpring, they are not puniſhed? In the parable therefore our Lord aſſigns only a general reaſon of the wickedneſs of the world,—an enemy hath done this. But there are who think they ſee another reaſon aſſigned in the parable; namely, the careleſſneſs of the public governors and rulers, intimated in thoſe words, But while men ſlept, his enemy came and ſowed tares among the wheat; and this text always finds a place in ſuch complaints. And there is indeed no doubt but that the negligence of governors and magiſtrates, civil and eccleſiaſtical, may be often one cauſe of the ignorance and wickedneſs of the people; but that it is aſſigned as a cauſe in the parable cannot be proved; for theſe words while men ſlept, inſtead of charging the ſervants with negligence, plainly ſhew, that no care or diligence of them could prevent the enemy. Whilſt they were awake, their care was awake alſo, and the enemy had no acceſs; but ſleep they muſt, nature requires it, and then it was that the enemy did the miſchief. Had it been ſaid, while men played, or were careleſs or riotous, that would have been a charge upon them; but to ſay while men ſlept, is ſo far from proving that their negligence cauſed it, that it plainly proved their diligence could not prevent it. For what will you ſay? Should huſbandmen never ſleep?—It is a condition upon which they cannot live, and therefore their ſleeping cannot be charged as their crime. This circumſtance therefore in the parable is to ſhew, not the fault of the huſbandmen, but the zeal and induſtry of the enemy to do miſchief. Watch him as narrowly as you will, yet ſtill he will break through all your care and diligence. If you do but ſtep aſide, compelled by the call of nature to eat, to drink, or to ſleep, he is ready to take the opportunity to ſow his tares; and the ground, which will not anſwer the huſbandman's hope without his toil, and labour, and coſt, will produce the ill ſeed of its own accord, and yield but too plentiful a crop. Farther, the character of the huſbandmen throughout the parable agrees to this expoſition: when they ſaw the tares ſpring up, they betrayed no conſciouſneſs of guilt or negligence; they did not come with excuſes to their maſter, but with a queſtion, which plainly ſpeaks how little they miſtruſted themſelves: Sir, didſt thou not ſow good ſeed in thy field? From whence then hath it tares? Would any ſervant, who had ſuffered the field to grow wild by his own lazineſs, have expoſtulated the caſe in ſuch a manner? The maſter, far from charging any of his family with the fault, lays it at another door, An enemy hath done this. Upon which the ſervants, not ſparing of their own pains, were deſirous to go to work immediately, and to root out all the tares at once. What is there in all this that ſuits with the character of a lazy, idle, negligent ſervant? What is there that does not ſpeak a care and concern for their maſter's affairs? As ſoon as they diſcover the tares, they go directly to their maſter, and inform him, and offer their ſervice to root them out. In this particular he corrects their judgement, though he does not condemn their diligence. And in truth, one main view of the parable is, to correct the zeal of thoſe who cannot ſee the iniquity of the world without great indignation; and not being able to ſtop or to correct it themſelves,—are apt to call upon God to vindicate his own cauſe, by taking the matter to himſelf, and puniſhing the evil-doers. The men who have this zeal and warmth againſt iniquity, are not commonly the idle negligent rulers; nor can we ſuppoſe that our Saviour would paint the ſame men in ſuch different colours in the compaſs of a ſhort parable; repreſenting them idle and careleſs at the 25th verſe, active and zealous at the 28th. Beſides, as was obſerved before, to charge the wickedneſs of the world upon the negligence of this or that part of men, anſwers no purpoſe of the parable, which is, to juſtify the wiſdom of Providence, in permitting the ſins of men to go unpuniſhed for the preſent. But the juſtification does not ariſe from conſidering the cauſes of iniquity, but from conſidering the effect which immediate puniſhment would have. In the other way, now explained to you, this circumſtance, that while men ſlept, the tares were ſown, promotes the main end of the parable, and completes the juſtification of the Providence of God; for this ſhews, that offences muſt needs come: They are not to be prevented, without diſturbing the very courſe of nature; without God's interpoſing miraculouſly to ſuſpend the workings of ſecond cauſes, ſince all care exerciſed in an human way is too little; for even when men ſleep,—and ſleep they muſt—the enemy will ſow his tares. Since therefore the parable ſhews, that iniquity can neither be prevented, nor immediately puniſhed, conſiſtently with the Wiſdom and Goodneſs of God; it ſhuts out every complaint, and forces us to acknowledge that God is juſt in all his ways, and righteous in all his dealings with mankind. See his diſcourſes, vol. iii. diſc. 8. part 1.

Ver. 27. So the ſervants of the houſholder] Οἰκοδεσπότης ſeems to ſignify, in this connection, "the proprietor of the eſtate:" He is ſuppoſed to be the maſter of the field, and of ſome lodge or farm-houſe, in which theſe ſervants dwelt.

Ver. 29. But he ſaid, nay, &c.] Theſe words account for the juſtice of God in ſuſpending his judgements. To ſee the full force 30 Let both grow together until the harveſt: and in the time of harveſt I will ſay to the reapers, Gather ye together firſt the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn.

31 Another parable put he forth unto them, ſaying, The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of muſtard-ſeed, which a man took and ſowed in his field:

32 Which indeed is the leaſt of all ſeeds; but when it is grown, it is the greateſt among herbs, and becometh a tree, ſo that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof.

33 Another parable ſpake he unto them; The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three meaſures of meal, till the whole was leavened.

Ver. 30. Ch. iii. 12.—V. 31. Mark iv. 30. Luke xiii. 19.—V. 33. Luke xiii. 20. The word in the Greek ſignifies a meaſure containing about a peck and a half, wanting a little more than a pint.

of the reaſon in this reſpect, it is neceſſary we ſhould underſtand what ſort of ſinners are ſpoken of, for this reaſon is not always applicable to all caſes; many ſinners are ſpared upon other accounts than this which is here given: The ſinners intended in this paſſage are ſpared merely on account of the righteous, that they may not be involved in the puniſhment due to the ſins of others; but ſome ſinners are ſpared out of a mercy which regards themſelves, in hopes of their amendment. The ſinners repreſented by the tares are ſuch, of whoſe repentance and amendment there is no hope; for tares, let them grow ever ſo long, will ſtill be tares, they can never turn to wheat. And our Saviour has told us, that theſe ſinners ſhall certainly be puniſhed at the laſt; which cannot certainly be ſaid of any but incorrigible ſinners: Theſe ſinners, therefore, being conſidered as incorrigible, there was no room to juſtify the delay of puniſhment from any circumſtances ariſing out of their own caſe. Even the mercy of God was excluded in this reſpect; for if the incorrigible ſinner be the object of mercy, no ſinner need fear puniſhment. Our Saviour, therefore, gives them up intirely, and juſtifies the wiſdom and goodneſs of God in ſparing them, from other motives. The intereſts of good and bad men are ſo united in this world; there is ſuch a connection between them in many reſpects, that no ſignal calamity can befal the wicked, but the righteous muſt have his ſhare in it. This was Abraham's plea when he interceded with the Lord for the men of Sodom. In public calamities it is evident that all muſt be ſufferers without diſtinction: Fire and ſword, famine and peſtilence, rage indifferently in the borders of the righteous and the ſinner, and ſweep away one as well as the other. Thus far then the reaſon of this verſe moſt certainly extends, and ſhews us the mercy of God, in forbearing to appear againſt ſinners in ſuch puniſhments as would bring upon the beſt of men the puniſhments due only to the worſt. You ſee a great wicked man in a proſperous condition, and you think his happy tranquility a perpetual reproach to the providence of God: You would not have God rain fire and brimſtone upon the city for the ſake of this great offender, ſince many innocent perſons would neceſſarily ſuffer in the ruin? No; but you would have God take him ſuddenly away by ſome ſecret and ſilent method; or you would have him puniſhed in his fortune, and reduced to that puniſhment which his ſins deſerve. This you think would be very juſt and reaſonable, and highly becoming the wiſdom of God. But do you not conſider, that there is no great man who is not related to others? are all the relations and dependants of this great ſinner as wicked as himſelf? Is there not one good man the better for him? Are his children all reprobates? Or would you turn out a family of innocent children to ſeek their bread in the ſtreets, rather than let the iniquity of the father go unpuniſhed for a few years! Till you can anſwer theſe queſtions, you muſt not pretend to arraign the wiſdom and goodneſs of God, in ſparing this offender. Now theſe conſiderations plainly ſhew the equity and goodneſs of God, in delaying the puniſhment of the wicked; in both the caſes above-mentioned you ſee mercy triumphs over juſtice, and the guilty is preſerved for the ſake of the innocent, which is ſuch an act of goodneſs, as no man ſurely has reaſon to complain of. Nor will the juſtice of God ſuffer in this account, as will plainly appear from the following conſiderations: The parable is evidently intended as an anſwer to the common objection againſt Providence, drawn from the proſperity of ſinners, or the impunity of offenders. Aſk the man who makes this objection againſt God's government, why he thinks it unbecoming the wiſdom of God to delay the puniſhment of ſinners? He will readily anſwer, becauſe it is contrary to his juſtice; and to ſupport his reaſon, he will farther add, that it is an undoubted maxim of juſtice, that all ſinners deſerve puniſhment. And here I think he muſt ſtop; for he cannot enter into particular caſes, unleſs he knew more of man than he does, or can know. In anſwer to this, our Saviour owns the truth of the general maxim, as far as it relates to the deſert of ſinners; and therefore teaches us, that God has appointed a day in which he will judge the world: But then he ſhews, from ſuperior reaſons of juſtice, that the application of the principle in the preſent caſe is wrong; for though it be juſt to puniſh all ſinners, yet to puniſh them immediately, would deſtroy the very reaſon which makes it juſt to puniſh them. It is juſt to puniſh them, that there may be a difference made between the good and the bad, according to their deſerts, that their puniſhment may be a diſcouragement to vice, and an encouragement to virtue. Now our Lord ſhews in this parable, that the immediate puniſhment of the wicked would quite deſtroy theſe ends of juſtice; for the righteous and the wicked, like the wheat and the tares growing together in one field, are ſo mixed and united in intereſts in this world, that, as things ſtand, the wicked cannot be rooted out, but the righteous muſt ſuffer with them: Conſequently, the immediate deſtruction of the wicked, ſince it muſt inevitably fall upon the righteous alſo, would make no proper diſtinction between the good and the bad; could be no encouragement to virtue, for the virtuous would ſuffer; could be no diſcouragement to vice, for vice would fare as well as virtue: And therefore it is not only reaſonable to delay the puniſhment of the wicked, but even neceſſary, to the obtaining the ends of juſtice, ſince they cannot be obtained in their immediate deſtruction. See Bp. Sherlock's 8th diſcourſe, part 1 and 2. vol. 3.

Ver. 30. Gather the tares, and bind them in bundles] The word tares does not ſeem to expreſs the meaning of the original ζιζανια: for tares, with us, are not noxious weeds, but a ſerviceable kind of pulſe, of great uſe for cattle, and very eaſily diſtinguiſhed in their growth from wheat; whereas the original expreſſes ſomewhat (and the ſcope of the parable demands it) which is of no ſervice at all; fit only to be burned, and which cannot eaſily be diſtinguiſhed from the good corn till both are grown up; and to theſe particulars anſwer either what are called the deaf ears in wheat, which cannot be diſcerned till the time of harveſt; or rather a weed called darnel, the infelix lolium, which grows up with wheat, and unleſs gathered out of it before it be reaped, is very prejudicial to the corn. Dr. Johnſon, indeed, in his Dictionary, ſays, that "tares (from teeren, Dutch, to conſume) are a weed that grows among corn." The original word, as ſome very able Grecians tell us, is not found except in the Evangeliſts, and certain of the fathers; and they give it different derivations. Suidas ſays, that ζιζανιον is Η εν τω Σιτω αιρα, quaſi φθειρα, and thus he correſponds with Dr. Johnſon. But the word is moſt probably of eaſtern original, from the Chaldee זזן zezen, cibavit, as Martinus obſerves in his Lexicon, to whom we refer the reader.

Ver. 31, 32. Another parable put He forth] The former parables relate chiefly to unfruitful hearers; theſe that follow, to thoſe who bear good fruit. In the preſent parable our Lord ſhews, that notwithſtanding the Goſpel appeared at firſt contemptible, by reaſon of the ignominy ariſing from the crucifixion of its Author, the difficulty of its precepts, the weakneſs of the perſons by whom it was preached, and the ſmall number and mean condition of thoſe who received it; yet, having in itſelf the ſtrength of truth, it would grow ſo great as to fill the earth, affording ſpiritual ſuſtenance to perſons of all nations, who ſhould be admitted to it, not in the quality of ſlaves, as the Jews imagined, but as free-born ſubjects of the Meſſiah's kingdom, enjoying therein equal privileges with the Jews. This ſenſe of the parable is the more probable, as our Lord ſeems now to have had his eye on Nebuchadnezzar's dream, Dan. iv. 10, 12. in which the nature and advantages of civil government are repreſented, by a great tree with ſpreading branches, fair leaves, and much fruit. This parable was well calculated to encourage the diſciples; who, judging of the Goſpel by its beginning, might have been apt to fall into deſpair, when, inſtead of ſeeing it preached by the learned, countenanced by the great, and inſtantly received with applauſe by all, they found it generally oppoſed by men in high life, preached only by illiterate perſons, and received by few beſides the vulgar. Theſe, to be ſure, were melancholy circumſtances, and what muſt have given great offence: Yet in proceſs of time they became ſtrong confirmations of the Chriſtian religion. The treaſure of the Goſpel was committed to earthen veſſels, that the excellency of the power might appear to be from God. The phraſe, the leaſt of all ſeeds, is an exaggeration frequently uſed in common diſcourſe, and ſignifies one of the leaſt; ſo ſmall, that it was proverbially uſed by the Jews to denote a very little thing. "The globe of the earth, ſay the rabbies, is but a grain of muſtard-ſeed, when compared with the expanſe of the heavens." See ch. xvii. 20. The term tree is applied by botaniſts to plants of the larger kind, which grow to the magnitude of ſhrubs; and for that reaſon are termed plantæ arboreſcentes. Dr. Waterland, inſtead of the greateſt among herbs, reads, the largeſt of the pulſe kind. The Talmud mentions a muſtard-tree ſo large that a man might with eaſe ſit in it; and another, one of whoſe branches covered a tent. It is certain, that we ſhould be much miſtaken, if we judged of vegetables or animals in the eaſtern or ſouthern countries, merely by what thoſe of the ſame ſpecies are with us. The word κατασκηνοῦν, rendered lodge, ſignifies, "They find ſhelter, and paſs their time there." See Tremellius, and Lightfoot's Hor. Heb. on the place.

Ver. 33. The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven] The meaning of this parable is commonly thought to be the ſame as that of the preceding; but there ſeems to be this difference between them: The parable of the grain of muſtard-ſeed repreſents the ſmallneſs of the Goſpel in its beginnings, together with its ſubſequent greatneſs; whereas the parable of the leaven, which being hid in a quantity of meal

34 All theſe things ſpake Jeſus unto the multitude in parables; and without a parable ſpake he not unto them:

35 That it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by the prophet, ſaying, I will open my mouth in parables; I will utter things which have been kept ſecret from the foundation of the world.

36 Then Jeſus ſent the multitude away, and went into the houſe: and his diſciples came unto him, ſaying, Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field.

37 He anſwered and ſaid unto them, He that ſoweth the good ſeed, is the Son of man;

38 The field is the world; the good ſeed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one;

39 The enemy that ſowed them, is the devil; the harveſt is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels.

40 As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; ſo ſhall it be in the end of this world.

41 The Son of man ſhall ſend forth his angels, and they ſhall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity;

42 And ſhall caſt them into a furnace of fire: there ſhall be wailing and gnaſhing of teeth.

43 Then ſhall the righteous ſhine forth as the ſun, in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

44 Again the kingdom of heaven is like unto treaſure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and ſelleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field.

45 Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant-man, ſeeking goodly pearls:

46 Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and ſold all that he had, and bought it.

47 Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net that was caſt into the ſea, and gathered of every kind:

meal, fermented the whole, expreſſes in a very lively manner both the nature and ſtrength of the operation of truth upon the mind; for though the doctrines of the Goſpel, when firſt propoſed, ſeemed to be loſt in that enormous maſs of paſſions and worldly thoughts with which mens minds were filled, yet did they then moſt eminently exert their influence, converting mens thoughts and deſires into a conformity to truth. The preciſe difference, therefore, between this and the foregoing parable is, that the former repreſents the extenſive propagation of the Goſpel from the ſmalleſt beginning; but this the nature of the influence of its doctrines upon the minds of particular perſons. Our Saviour mentions here three meaſures of meal in particular, becauſe this ſeems to be the quantity they uſually kneaded at once. See Gen. xviii. 6. Macknight, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 34, 35. And without a parable ſpake he not, &c.] That is, "not at that time," or "to the people who then heard him." See the note on ver. 1. L'Enfant obſerves, that the quotation from the Pſalms is not a prophecy of the manner in which Chriſt was to teach, but only an application made by the Evangeliſt of the words of the Pſalmiſt, to the myſterious manner in which our Saviour taught. And Doddridge and ſeveral others are of the ſame opinion, ſuppoſing this paſſage quoted by way of alluſion. See on ch. i. 22. But Dr. Whitby's interpretation ſeems to me preferable, who obſerves, that the ſenſe may be this:—Our Saviour ſpake in parables, that what David, filled with the prophetic ſpirit, ſaid of himſelf, might be fulfilled alſo in that Son of David, of whom he was a type; for he being our great lawgiver, might more truly ſay, Hear my law, O my people, Pſ. lxxviii. 1. See the note on Pſ. xlix. 4. Olearius's 49th obſervation, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 38. The children of the kingdom] This is an Hebraiſm, ſignifying the heirs of the kingdom. ch. viii. 12. where the unbelieving Jews are named the children of the kingdom, in oppoſition to the Gentiles, becauſe, being born within the covenant, the kingdom was theirs, if they had not rejected it by their unbelief. Here the children of the kingdom are the true believers, as the children of the wicked one are the reprobate and diſobedient. See John viii. 41, 44.

Ver. 39. The end of the world] Of the age, literally; an Hebraiſm frequently uſed in the New Teſtament. Comp. the next verſe, and Heb. i. 2. What follows is an alluſion to Joel iii. 13. See alſo Rev. xiv. 15.

Ver 41. The Son of man ſhall ſend forth, &c.] The reader muſt obſerve how high an idea our Saviour here gives his diſciples of himſelf, when he ſpeaks of the angels as his attendants, who were at the laſt day to wait on him, and at his order to aſſemble the whole world before him: They ſhall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, παντα τα σκανδαλα; all things which are an offence to others, by laying ſtumbling-blocks in their way; Καὶ τοὺς, &c. "EVEN all the tranſgreſſors of the law; for ſo καὶ ſhould be rendered in this and many other places of the New Teſtament.

Ver. 42. A furnace] The furnace, Wat.

Ver. 43. Then ſhall the righteous ſhine forth, &c.] In this beautiful expreſſion our bleſſed Saviour ſeems to allude to Dan. xii. 3. They that are wiſe ſhall ſhine, &c. The righteous, in travelling to heaven, are apt frequently to fall, by reaſon of the ſtumbling-blocks which lie in their way; of which ſtumbling-blocks, as our Lord here informs us, the perſons with whom they converſe frequently prove none of the leaſt miſchievous. By theſe falls they are ſullied to ſuch a degree, that their beauty is in a great meaſure obſcured. Hence they are often held in no eſtimation; nay, it may be, are abſolutely contemned. But when they enter into the kingdom of their Father, it ſhall fare quite otherwiſe with them: Being then freed from all the humbling circumſtances which attend mortality, cleanſed alſo from ſin, and the pollutions of ſin, wherewith they are now diſfigured, they ſhall ſhine like the ſun in the firmament for brightneſs and beauty, and ſhall find no diminution of their ſplendor by age. A noble image this to repreſent the glory and happineſs of righteous men with God their Father. The exclamation at the end of the verſe intimates, that truths of greater importance and ſolemnity cannot be uttered, than thoſe which reſpect the final miſery of the wicked, and the inconceivable happineſs of the righteous; and that all who have the faculty of reaſon ought therefore to regard them with becoming attention. See Macknight and Calmet.

Ver. 44—46. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treaſure] Theſe three following parables are propoſed not to the multitude, but peculiarly to the Apoſtles. The parable of the treaſure, which a man found hidden in a field, was deſigned to teach us, that ſome meet with the Goſpel as it were by accident, and without ſeeking after it, agreeably to what the prophet Iſaiah ſays, ch. lxv. 1. that God is found of them who ſeek him not. On the other hand, the parable of the merchant, who inquired after goodly or beautiful pearls, and found one of great value, informs us, that mens receiving the Goſpel is often the effect of a diligent ſearch after truth. The Goſpel is fitly compared to a treaſure, as it enriches all who profeſs it; and to a pearl, becauſe of its beauty and preciousneſs: Both the parables repreſent the effect of divine truth upon thoſe who find it, whether by accident or upon inquiry. Being found and known, it appears exceeding valuable, and raiſes in mens breaſts ſuch a vehemency of deſire, that they willingly part with all they have for the ſake of obeying its precepts; and when they part with all on account of it, think themſelves incomparably richer than before. The ſacred writers elſewhere compare and prefer wiſdom to jewels. See Job xxviii. 15, 19. Prov. iii. 15. viii. 11.

Ver. 47—50. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net] This parable intimates, that by the preaching of the Goſpel a viſible church ſhould be gathered on earth, conſiſting both of good and bad men, mingled in ſuch a manner, that it would be difficult to make a proper diſtinction between them; but that at the end of the world the bad ſhall be ſeparated from the good, and caſt into hell; which the parable repreſents under the image of caſting them into the furnace of fire, becauſe that was the moſt terrible puniſhment known in the eaſtern countries. See Dan. iii. 6. This parable will appear peculiarly proper, if we conſider that it was ſpoken to fiſhermen, who had been called from their employments with a promiſe that they ſhould catch men. ch. iv. 19. It differs from the parable 48 Which, when it was full, they drew o ſhore, and ſat down, and gathered the ood into veſſels, but caſt the bad away.

49 So ſhall it be at the end of the world: he angels ſhall come forth, and ſever the icked from among the juſt, 50 And ſhall caſt them into the furnace f fire: there ſhall be wailing and gnaſhing f teeth.

51 Jeſus ſaith unto them, Have ye underſtood all theſe things? They ſay unto him, Yea, Lord.

52 Then ſaid he unto them, Therefore very ſcribe which is inſtructed unto the kingdom of heaven, is like unto a man that s an houſholder, which bringeth forth out f his treaſure things new and old.

53 And it came to paſs, that when Jeſus had finiſhed theſe parables, he departed thence.

54 And when he was come into his own country, he taught them in their ſynagogue, inſomuch that they were aſtoniſhed, and ſaid, Whence hath this man this wiſdom, and theſe mighty works?

55 Is not this the carpenter's ſon? is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James, and Joſes, and Simon, and Judas?

56 And his ſiſters, are they not all with us? whence then hath this man all theſe things?

57 And they were offended in him. But Jeſus ſaid unto them, A prophet is not without honour, ſave in his own country, and in his own houſe.

58 And he did not many mighty works there, becauſe of their unbelief.

rable of the tares in its extent, repreſenting the final ſtate and judgement of wicked men in general; whereas that of the tares deſcribes the miſerable end of hypocrites. The word σαπρὰ rendered bad, ver. 48. generally ſignifies corrupt or putrid, and ſeems an alluſion to the drawing up ſome dead fiſh in the net with the living. It has been obſerved, that this in the ſtrongeſt terms repreſents the hopeleſs ſtate of ſinners at laſt. See Herbery's diſcourſe of future puniſhment.

Ver. 51, 52. Have ye underſtood, &c.] When Jeſus had finiſhed his parables, he aſked his diſciples if they underſtood them; and upon their anſwering in the affirmative, he told them, that every teacher of the Jewiſh religion, who was converted to Chriſtianity, and made a preacher of the Goſpel, might, by reaſon of the variety of his knowledge and his ability to teach, be compared to a prudent maſter of a family, who nouriſhes them with the fruits both of the preſent and of the preceding years, as their need requires. See ch. xxiii. 34. Our Saviour hath given the pattern and example of ſuch a teacher in his diſcourſe contained in this chapter; and by the similitude of the houſholder, he ſhews his diſciples the uſe they were to make of the knowledge they had acquired, whether from the old revelation tranſmitted to them by the prophets, or from the new revelation, of which Jeſus was the author and diſpenſer. See Macknight and Wetſtein. Dr. Clarke, in his ſermons, vol. x. ſerm. 4. gives the following expoſition of the 52d verſe: "Thoſe throughly qualified to be ſucceſsful preachers of the Goſpel ſhould be able on all occaſions to bring forth out of their memory, as out of a copious ſtorehouſe, inſtructions ſuited to perſons of all capacities." Concerning the word treaſures, ſee the note on ch. ii. 11.

Ver. 54. Into his own country] Nazareth is ſo called, becauſe it was the town in which Jeſus was brought up, and to diſtinguiſh it from Capernaum, where he commonly reſided. This wiſdom ſignifies this learning. They were amazed to find in Jeſus Chriſt ſuch extraordinary learning, without having ever been taught by their doctors. Theſe mighty works, in the Greek is δυναμεις, virtues. The word denotes both miracles, and the power of performing them.

Ver. 55. Is not this the carpenter's ſon?] In St. Mark, ch. vi. 3. it is, Is not this the carpenter? Ὁ τέκτων. Accordingly Juſtin Martyr tells us, and the ancient Chriſtians were all of the ſame opinion, that Jeſus was employed in this occupation. Their canons required that all parents ſhould teach their children ſome trade; and probably the poverty of the family engaged Chriſt, while he was at home with Joſeph, to work at his. What an additional proof this of the humiliation of the bleſſed Redeemer for our ſakes! By comparing ch. xxvii. 56. Mark xv. 40. John xix. 25. with this paſſage, it appears, that the four perſons mentioned here were the ſons of Mary, ſiſter to the virgin Mary, and the wife of Cleophas, or Alpheus, which is the ſame name. See ch. x. 3. xii. 46. By James is meant James the Leſſer, whom St. Paul calls our Lord's brother. Galat. i. 19. Joſes, or Joſeph (for it is the ſame name) is the only ſon of Mary, the wife of Alpheus, who never was an Apoſtle. Simon is he who is called the Cananite, or Zealot, to diſtinguiſh him from Simon Peter. And Judas or Jude, is the author of the Epiſtle which goes under that name, wherein he ſtiles himſelf the brother of James.

Ver. 56. Whence then, &c.] This, like many other things which have ſince been objected againſt the Goſpel of Chriſt, is as much the language of ſtupidity as of infidelity; for the meanneſs of Chriſt's education was a demonſtration, that his teaching in ſo excellent a manner muſt be the effect of ſome extraordinary and divine influence on his mind.

Ver. 57. And they were offended in him] The Nazarenes not being able to reconcile the miracles and wiſdom of Jeſus Chriſt with the meanneſs of his birth, were full of doubts and uncertainties: They could not tell what to ſay or think of him, ſuſpecting perhaps that he was a ſorcerer. The word unbelief, uſed in the next verſe, ſerves to explain all this. And we learn from Luke iv. 22. that notwithſtanding their unbelief, they could not forbear praiſing and admiring him. Doddridge renders the next clauſe, "A prophet is no where leſs eſteemed than in his own country, and among his relations, even in his own family;" which is plainly the ſenſe of the words, though ours is a literal tranſlation: for a prophet may be, and often is, affronted at a diſtance from home, as our Saviour himſelf found by frequent experience. (See John iv. 44. Luke iv. 24.) The expreſſion is proverbial, ſignifying that thoſe who poſſeſs extraordinary endowments are no where in leſs requeſt than among their relations and acquaintance. The reaſon is, ſuperior merit never fails to be envied; and envy, ever induſtrious in its ſearch, commonly finds ſome way or other to turn the knowledge it has of perſons to their diſadvantage.

Ver. 58. And he did not, &c.] We are not to underſtand theſe words as if the power of Chriſt was here diſarmed; but only that they brought but few ſick people to him for a cure, Mark vi. 5. He did not judge it convenient to obtrude his miracles upon them, and ſo could not honourably and properly perform them. On the ſame principle it is that faith, in ſome caſes, though not in all, is made the condition of receiving a cure. Compare ch. ix. 29. Mark ix. 23. and Acts xiv. 9. Chriſt ſaw proper to make it ſo here, as he well might, conſidering what the Nazarenes muſt undoubtedly have heard of him from other places, and what they had themſelves confeſſed but juſt before, of mighty works being wrought by his hands; which ſhews indeed that their unbelief did not ſo much conſiſt in a doubt of his miraculous power, as of his divine miſſion, which to any unprejudiced perſon's mind that power ſo abundantly proved. In this view therefore it is hard to ſay, how he could with honour have laviſhed away his favours on ſo unworthy a people. Dr. Clarke explains this, "He could not do any mighty works there, conſiſtently with his rule and method of acting, or with his preſent purpoſes and deſigns." See vol. ix. ſerm. 3. the note on Mark vi. 6. Doddridge and Olearius. The reaſon, ſays one, why many mighty works are not wrought now is, not that the faith is every where planted, but that unbelief every where prevails.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

We have in this chapter one more prophetic teſtimony to the divine character and miſſion of our great Redeemer,—his ſpeaking in parables; and certainly, we ſhould think ourſelves peculiarly favoured, that while the great truths of the Goſpel were veiled in obſcurity, and hid from the ſight of thoſe who had rendered themſelves unworthy of clearer information, we, with the diſciples of our Lord, are permitted to know the myſteries of the kingdom, and are indulged with the cleareſt and fulleſt intelligence of thoſe great and intereſting truths, which many prophets and righteous men have anxiouſly wiſhed to know, but have not known them.

We ſhould for ever fix it in our minds, that more abundant light and information requires a proportionably higher degree of holineſs and virtue; to whom much is given, of them much will be required. And as from the parable of the ſower we are clearly informed, that increaſe and improvement depend, under the influence of God's grace, upon ourſelves; that the ſeed and the ſower being always the ſame, the ſucceſs of that ſeed, andthe fruitfulneſs of it, ariſes from the ſoil; We ſhould be eſpecially careful duly to prepare our hearts, to bring that good and honeſt, that humble and teachable, that attentive and conſiderate diſpoſition to the hearing of the Goſpel, which will always be abundantly recompenſed with a right knowledge, and the zealous practice of that Goſpel.

CHAP. XIV.

Herod's opinion of Chriſt. Wherefore John Baptiſt was beheaded. Jeſus departeth into a deſart place: where he feedeth five thouſand men with five loaves and two fiſhes: he walketh on the ſea to his diſciples: and landing at Genneſaret, healeth the ſick by the touch of the hem of his garment.

AT that time, Herod the Tetrarch heard of the fame of Jeſus,

2 And ſaid unto his ſervants, This is John the Baptiſt; he is riſen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do ſhew forth themſelves in him.

3 For Herod had laid hold on John, and bound him, and put him in priſon for Herodias' ſake, his brother Philip's wife.

Ver. 1. Mark vi. 14. Luke ix. 7.—V. 2. Or, are wrought by him.—V. 3. Luke iii. 19, 20.

When we review mankind, and conſider the various purſuits in which they are engaged, the idleneſſes and the occupations, the buſineſs and the pleaſures which ſo totally engroſs the minds of the generality, we cannot wonder at the little influence which the preaching of the word of Chriſt hath upon them. Cares are Thorns to the poor, wealth to the rich, the deſire of other things to all. Riches are called deceitful, and with great propriety: for they ſmile and betray, kiſs and ſmite into perdition; they put out the eyes, harden the heart, ſteal away the divine life, fill the ſoul with pride, anger, and love of the world, and make men enemies to the whole croſs of Chriſt; and all the while are eagerly deſired, and vehemently purſued even by thoſe who believe there is a God; nay, who profeſs to believe the Goſpel of Chriſt.

How great is the forbearance and long-ſuffering of our God! However pernicious the tares, however abandoned the wicked; however they defy his power, defile his gifts, and diſhonour his works, he will not ſuffer them to be rooted up; he will not, in terrible vengeance, exert the ſeverity of his judgements upon them. And ſhall our forbearance and lenity be leſs than God's! When we behold vice triumphant, nay, when we ſuffer beneath its oppreſſions, or in any reſpect feel its fatal conſequences, let us preſerve our ſouls in patience, and remember that a day is coming, when the great ſeparation will be made; when all things that offend ſhall be caſt out of the kingdom of heaven; and when the diſtinguiſhed righteous ſhall ſhine forth, bright and pure as the ſun, in that kingdom of the Father. Glorious and triumphant conſolation! what more do we want to ſuſtain us, amidſt all the evils and difficulties of this act of probation? What more can we want to encourage us to maintain the faith of Chriſt, and to make ourſelves of the numbers of thoſe righteous?

The bleſſed Jeſus renewed his viſit to Nazareth, ver. 54. though the people of that place had attempted to murder him on his firſt preaching among them: So ſhould we never be weary of well-doing, nor refuſe to renew our attempts on the moſt obſtinate ſinners, where the intereſts of their immortal ſouls are concerned. Blind and deaf though they may be while hardened in guilt, to the dreadful danger of their unhappy ſtate; yet we, as having our eyes open by Almighty grace to that danger, ſhould be the more prone to compaſſionate and relieve them.

But though theſe Nazarenes were aſtoniſhed at his wiſdom, and could not but allow the mighty works which he had wrought; yet they went on, perverſe and ungrateful, to reject him, and in ſo doing were condemned out of their own mouth. Well would it be if theſe perſons afforded us the only inſtance of ſuch ſelf-condemnation. Well would it be, if, amongſt thoſe who profeſs the faith of Chriſt, who acknowledge his wiſdom and mighty works, none were found, who in heart and life rejected him, diſavowing by their actions what their lips continually expreſſed. Formality of profeſſion is ever to be moſt dreaded by thoſe, who, brought up in an eſtabliſhed faith, receive their creed by tradition, and without due examination; and therefore we cannot be too carefully guarded againſt it.

How much did theſe Nazarenes loſe by their obſtinate prejudices againſt Jeſus! How many diſeaſed bodies might have been cured, how many loſt ſouls might have been recovered and ſaved, had they given him a better reception! Their unbelief as it were diſarmed Chriſt himſelf of his power to do good, and rendered him a favour of death rather than of life to their ſouls: And ſtill the ſame deſtructive principles will work the ſame deſtructive conſequences; faith ſeems to have put the Almighty Power of God into the hands of men, while unbelief ſeems even to tie up the hands of Omnipotence. It is a ſin pregnant with every other; and with reſpect to the diſpenſation of the Goſpel, one which diſcovers no leſs blindneſs than diſingenuity in the mind: For what could the Lord have done more for his vineyard than he hath done in it? What more abundant and convincing teſtimony could he have given, in proof of the divine miſſion of his Son, than he hath graciouſly afforded to mankind? Prophecies clear and continued, miracles mighty and indiſputable, wiſdom pure and perfect. The Nazarenes allowed this wiſdom; and we ſhall do well to obſerve, that the very argument which they made uſe of to ſupport their rejection of this mighty Prophet, is in itſelf a ſtrong proof of his divine miſſion. Whence hath this carpenter's ſon this wiſdom? Born and educated amongſt us, without any of the means of improvement in human learning, putting his hand to the nail, and his right-hand to the workman's hammer? Whence this wiſdom, theſe mighty works, to a man ſo mean, ſo low, ſo utterly uninſtructed, unlettered, unaided? O ye Nazarenes, can ye want an anſwer?—This wiſdom is from God! O wiſdom of the Son of God! O power of the Father! who canſt at the ſame time diſcover thyſelf to the eyes of reaſonable men, and conceal thyſelf from ſuch as are carnal; My faith owns, adores, invokes thee, as the uncreated and incarnate wiſdom, as the light of angels and men, hid under the obſcurity of our fleſh, veiled in the voluntary meanneſs of thy humiliation, and debaſed in the proud conceits of ſelf-ſufficient philoſophers of this world.

Chap. XIV, Ver. 1. Herod the Tetrarch] Herod is called Tetrarch, becauſe he inherited but a fourth part of his father's dominions. However, he exerciſed the regal authority in Galilee, and is ſtiled a king, ver. 9. and Mark vi. 14. This was Herod Antipas. See ch. ii. 1.

Ver. 2, This is John the Baptiſt] From Luke ix. 7. we learn, that Herod and his courtiers were ſtrangely perplexed reſpecting the fame of Jeſus, which occaſioned many ſpeculations amongſt them. Some ſuppoſed that it was John riſen from the dead, others that it was Elias, and others one of the old prophets; but Herod declared it to be his opinion that it was John; and therefore, ſays he, mighty works do ſhew forth themſelves in him, i. e. extraordinary and miraculous powers were exerted by him. Eraſmus indeed thinks, that as Herod was of the Sect of the Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the ſoul, (compare ch. xvi. 6. Mark viii. 15.) he might ſay this by way of irony to his ſervants, ridiculing the notions of the vulgar, and thoſe who joined in that opinion; And this ſolution might have paſſed, had not Herod been perplexed on this occaſion, Luke vii. The image of the Baptiſt, whom he wrongfully put to death, preſented itſelf often to his thoughts, and tormented him; therefore, when it was reported that he was riſen from the dead, and was working miracles, Herod, fearing ſome puniſhment would be inflicted on him for his crime, in the confuſion of his thoughts ſaid, that John was riſen from the dead, notwithſtanding he was a Sadducee. Nay, he might ſay this, although he had heard of Jeſus and his miracles before, there being nothing more common than for perſons in vehement perturbations to talk inconſiſtently. Beſides, it is no eaſy matter to arrive at a ſteady belief of ſo great an abſurdity as the annihilation of the human mind. The being of a God, the immortality of the ſoul, the rewards and puniſhments of a future ſtate, with the other great principles of natural religion, often obtrude themſelves upon unbelievers, in ſpite of all their efforts to baniſh them; and leave a ſting behind them in the conſcience, whoſe pain, however it may be concealed, cannot eaſily be allayed. Of this Herod is a remarkable example; for notwithſtanding he was a king, his conſcience made itſelf heard and felt, amidſt all the noiſe, the hurry, the flatteries, and the debaucheries of a court.

Ver. 3. For Herod had laid hold on John] Here is a digreſſion in the hiſtory, from this to the 13th verſe, in which the Evangeliſt gives us an account of the Baptiſt's death, though he does not tell us preciſely when it happened. St. Mark indeed ſeems to aſſign it as the cauſe of the Apoſtles return from their circuit; and St. Matthew and St. Luke mention it as the reaſon why Jeſus retired with them to the deſart of Bethſaida. It is therefore probable that John was put to death while the Apoſtles were firſt abroad, perhaps not long before Jeſus became the ſubject of converſation at court: Hence, becauſe he was but lately dead, the vulgar, the courtiers, and even Herod himſelf, believed that he was riſen, when they heard the fame of Chriſt's miracles. In ſome of his private conferences with the king, the Baptiſt had been ſo bold as to reprove him for his adultery with Herodias. This princeſs was grand-daughter to Herod the Great, by his ſon Ariſtobulus, and had formerly been married to her uncle, Herod-Philip, the ſon of her grandfather by Mariamne. Some time after that marriage, this Herod Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee, and ſon of Herod the Great by Malthace, happening, in his way to Rome, to lodge at his brother's houſe, fell paſſionately in love with Herodias, and on his return made offers to her; ſhe accepted his addreſſes, deſerting her huſband, who was only a private perſon, (Philip, Tetrarch of Iturea, mentioned Luke iii. 1. being a different perſon from this Philip) that ſhe might ſhare with the Tetrarch in the honours of a crown. On the other hand, to make way for her, he divorced his wife, the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia. As Antipas was Herod the Great's ſon, he was brother to Herod Philip the huſband of Herodias, and uncle to Herodias herſelf; wherefore both parties being guilty of inceſt as well as adultery, they deſerved the rebuke which the Baptiſt gave them, with a courage highly becoming the meſſenger of God: for though he had experienced the advantage of the Tetrarch's friendſhip, he was not afraid to diſpleaſe him when his duty required it. Herod had with great pleaſure heard John's diſcourſes, and by his perſuaſion had done many good actions; Mark vi. 29. but now that he was touched to the quick, he reſented it to ſuch a degree, that he laid his monitor in irons. Thus it happens ſometimes, that they who do not fear

God

4 For John ſaid unto him, It is not lawful for thee to have her.

5 And when he would have put him to death, he feared the multitude, becauſe they counted him as a prophet.

6 But when Herod's birth-day was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleaſed Herod.

7 Whereupon he promiſed with an oath, to give her whatſoever ſhe would aſk.

Ver. 4. Lev. xviii. 16. xx. 21.—V. 5. Ch. xxi. 26. Luke xx. 6.—V. 6. Gr. in the midſt.

God ſincerely, will go certain lengths in the obedience of his commandments, provided ſomething is remitted to them by way of indulgence; but when they are more ſtraitly preſſed, throwing off the yoke, they not only become obſtinate, but furious; which ſhews that no man has any reaſon of ſelf-complacency becauſe he obeys many of the divine laws, unleſs he has learned to ſubject himſelf to God in every reſpect, and without exception. Joſephus aſſerts another reaſon for the apprehenſion of John; namely, his exceſſive popularity. See his Antiq. l. xviii. c. 5. Macknight, and Jortin.

Ver. 4. For John ſaid unto him, &c.] Poſſeſſed of great credit with Herod, and with the people, it is not poſſible to ſuppoſe that the Baptiſt would have incurred Herod's jealouſy and diſpleaſure, had he been an impoſtor, and an aſſociate of a pretended Meſſiah,—for fear of blaſting at once all their pre-concerted deſigns. Certainly, he would now, more than ever, have employed all his art to keep the influence he had acquired with the king and the people. But how oppoſite to all this was his conduct: At this critical point of time, in this peculiar ſituation, when both his own and his confederate's intereſt abſolutely required him to act in the manner juſt mentioned, He even proceeded to reprove Herod himſelf for the wickedneſs of his life. An impoſtor, in John's particular ſituation, could not but have reflected, at the firſt thought of ſo dangerous a ſtep as that which occaſioned his death, that it was not his own immediate aſſiſtance only of which his aſſociate would be deprived by his deſtruction,—though this alone would have been ſufficient to prevent him from adopting it; but he would beſides have conſidered, that his own impriſonment and death would probably ſtrike ſuch a panic into the people, however zealous they had before been in his favour, as would reſtrain them from liſtening afterwards to Jeſus, or paying the ſame regard they might otherwiſe have done to his pretenſions: Nay, nothing was more probable, than that John's public miniſtry being put to ſo ignominious an end, would even deſtroy that good opinion of John himſelf, which they had hitherto entertained, and induce them to believe, that notwithſtanding his fair outſide, he could be no better than an impoſtor. For by what arguments could John think it poſſible, that the Jews would perſuade themſelves he was really ſent to be the divine forerunner of this triumphant Meſſiah, when they ſhould have ſeen him ſeized by Herod's order, impriſoned, and put to death? Beſides, therefore, John's regard to his own ſucceſs, his liberty, and even his life itſelf, which no impoſtor can be thought deſirous of expoſing to certain deſtruction for no reaſon; his connection with Jeſus, if they were deceivers, and the neceſſary dependance of both upon the mutual ſucceſs and aſſiſtance of each other, muſt unqueſtionably have reſtrained John from provoking at this time the inveterate hatred of Herodias, and drawing on himſelf Herod's violent ſuſpicion and diſpleaſure. So that the remarkable behaviour of John, in this important particular, and at ſo critical a conjuncture, affords us one of the ſtrongeſt preſumptive proofs imaginable, that neither he nor Jeſus could poſſibly be deceivers. See on Mark i. 14. and Bell's Inquiry, p. 384.

Ver. 6. But when Herod's birth-day was kept] If Herod's reſentment of the freedom which John the Baptiſt took with him was great, that of Herodias was much greater. The crime ſhe was guilty of being odious, ſhe could not bear to have it named, and far leſs reproved. She was therefore enraged to the higheſt pitch, and nothing leſs than the Baptiſt's head would ſatisfy her. Therefore Herodias had a quarrel againſt him, and would have killed him, but ſhe could not, Mark vi. 19. Ever ſince he offended her, ſhe had been plotting againſt his life, but could not yet accompliſh her purpoſe; For (ver. 20.) Herod feared, or reverenced John, &c. Great and powerful as the king was, he ſtood in awe of John, though in low life, and durſt not attempt any thing againſt him; Such force has virtue ſometimes upon the minds of the higheſt offenders. Herodias, therefore, finding that ſhe could not prevail againſt the Baptiſt in the way of direct ſolicitation, watched an opportunity to deſtroy him by craft. At length one offered itſelf. Herod, on his birth-day, made a ſumptuous entertainment for the great lords, generals, and other great perſons of his kingdom; wherefore, as it was the cuſtom in thoſe countries, for princes to beſtow favours at their feaſts, ſometimes of their own accord, ſometimes in conſequence of petitions which were then preſented, Herodias thought the birth-day a fit opportunity to get the Baptiſt deſtroyed. With this view ſhe propoſed to Salome, her daughter by Philip, who was now of age, and had followed her mother's fortunes, to dance before the company at the birth-day; pretending, no doubt, that it would turn out greatly to her advantage, becauſe the king, in the exceſs of his good humour, would probably bid her name what ſhe would pleaſe to have, as the reward of her complaiſance; or if he ſhould not, ſhe might, conſiſtently enough with good manners, beg him to grant her the boon ſhe was moſt deſirous to obtain; only, before ſhe named any particular favour, it would be proper to come out and conſult with her mother. The Evangeliſts, indeed, do not abſolutely ſpeak of this previous agreement, but St. Mark gives the ſtrongeſt hint of it, ch. vi. 21. And when a convenient day [ἐυκαίρον, a favourable opportunity,] was come, that Herod, &c. for, as he had mentioned the attempts which Herodias had made without ſucceſs, to deſtroy the Baptiſt,—by calling this a convenient day, on account of the feaſt, he inſinuates, that ſhe thought the entertainment afforded a favourable opportunity to take away the Baptiſt's life; conſequently he directs us to conſider all the favourable tranſactions of the birth-day, which have any reference to the Baptiſt's death, as the effect of Herodias's contrivance. Beſides, a previous agreement between the mother and the daughter muſt be admitted, in order to account for the latter's dancing before the company on the birth-day: The reaſon is, in ancient times it was ſo far from being the cuſtom for ladies of diſtinction to dance in public, that it was reckoned indecent if they were ſo much as preſent at public entertainments: We need refer only to the inſtance of queen Vaſhti, who thought it ſo diſhonourable, that rather than ſubmit to it, even when commanded by Ahaſuerus, ſhe forfeited her crown. We may likewiſe remark, that notwithſtanding Herodias was a lady of no diſtinguiſhed character for virtue, ſhe had ſuch a regard to decency and reputation, that ſhe did not appear at this birth-day feaſt. We may therefore believe, that it was an extraordinary thing for young ladies of quality to dance before large companies of men at public entertainments; and if ſo, the reader muſt be ſenſible, that this dance of Herodias's daughter could not happen by accident, but muſt have been brought about by ſome contrivance or another. See Calmet, Macknight, and Lardner's Credibility, part. i. vol. i. p. 23.

Ver. 7. He promiſed with an oath] It is probable from ver. 9. (where, as well as in Mark vi. 26. it is oaths, in the plural) that this oath was repeatedly given; becauſe, according to the manners of the eaſt, it was diſgraceful for women of rank to appear in public, and they never did appear, unleſs they were ſent for, or had an important requeſt to make. (See Eſth. v. 2, 3. and the former note.) It was immediately concluded that Salome's extraordinary condeſcenſion, proceeded from her having ſome favour to aſk of the king: Beſides, the honour ſhe was doing to the day and to the company, might be interpreted as a public acknowledgement of Herod's civility to her, and at the ſame time judged a becoming expreſſion of her gratitude. As for the king, he conſidered the reſpect ſhewn his gueſts as terminating upon himſelf; and having greatly injured the young lady by debauching her mother, he was caught with flattery, and grew vain. His fancy alſo being heated with wine and muſic, and the applauſe of his gueſts, the ſight of the young lady dancing, and the idea of her mother, whom he paſſionately loved, he made her the promiſe which he imagined ſhe was ſilently ſoliciting; a promiſe, which though it had the air of royal munificence, ſuited but ill with the gravity of wiſdom. See Mark vi. 22, 23. and Macknight.

Ver. 8. And ſhe, being before inſtructed] Being before urged. Doddridge. When the plot had thus ſucceeded, and the young lady had obtained the king's promiſe, ſhe went out to conſult with her mother, who immediately diſcloſed her purpoſe, bidding her aſk the Baptiſt's head. A counſel of this kind, no doubt, ſurpriſed Salome, for ſhe did not ſee of what uſe the head could be to her; beſides, ſhe might think the demand improper, as their quarrel with the Baptiſt, and the cauſe of it, was univerſally known: Not to mention, that when ſhe conſented to dance, it was natural to imagine her fancy had been running on very different objects; probably, therefore, at the firſt ſhe ſcrupled to comply, as may be gathered alſo from the force of the word προβιβασθεῖσα, (rendered in our verſion before inſtructed) by which St. Matthew expreſſes the effect her mother's ſolicitation had upon her. According to Heſychius, προσβαζειν, ſignifies to urge, excite, or impel, and conſequently ſuppoſes reluctance in the perſon urged. Herodias, however, full of the fierceſt reſentment againſt the holy man, would take no denial. She peremptorily inſiſted that her counſel ſhould be followed, without queſtion repreſenting to her daughter that John had attempted to expel and ruin them both; and that, conſidering the opinion which the king ſtill entertained of him, he might, ſome time or other, though in irons, regain Herod's favour, and accompliſh his deſign; for which reaſon, the preſent opportunity of taking away his life was not to be neglected, if ſhe regarded her own ſafety. Theſe, and the like arguments, wrought up Salome to ſuch a pitch, that ſhe not only conſented to do as ſhe was bidden, but became hearty in the cauſe; for we read in Mark vi. 25. (where the narration is by far the moſt circumſtantial, and very animated) that ſhe came in, εὐθέως μετα σπουδῆς, immediately, with eagerneſs; and while all the gueſts ſat mute, expecting what mighty thing would be aſked, ſhe demanded the holy Baptiſt's head, as of greater value to her than half the kingdom. Give me, here, (fearing, if he had time to conſider, he would not do it) John the Baptiſt's head in a charger, —Πίναξ, a large diſh, which the antiquated word charger well expreſſes. We may juſt obſerve, that it was and is cuſtomary with princes in the eaſtern parts of the world, to require the heads of thoſe they had ordered to be executed to be brought to them, that they may be aſſured of their death: The grand ſignior does it to this day. See Lardner's Credibil. as above, Beza, and Blackwall's ſacred claſſics, vol. i. p. 383.

8 And ſhe, being before inſtructed of her mother, ſaid, Give me here John Baptiſt's head in a charger.

9 And the king was ſorry: nevertheleſs, for the oath's ſake, and them which ſat with him at meat, he commanded it to be given her.

10 And he ſent, and beheaded John in the priſon.

11 And his head was brought in a charger, and given to the damſel: and ſhe brought it to her mother.

12 And his diſciples came, and took up the body, and buried it, and went and told Jeſus.

13 When Jeſus heard of it, he departed thence by ſhip into a deſart place, apart: and when the people had heard thereof, they followed him on foot out of the cities.

14 And Jeſus went forth, and ſaw a great multitude, and was moved with compaſſion toward them, and he healed their ſick.

15 And when it was evening, his diſciples came to him, ſaying, This is a deſart place, and the time is now paſt; ſend the multitude away, that they may go into the villages, and buy themſelves victuals.

16 But Jeſus ſaid unto them, They need not depart; give ye them to eat.

17 And they ſay unto him, we have here but five loaves, and two fiſhes.

18 He ſaid, Bring them hither to me.

19 And he commanded the multitude to ſit down on the graſs, and took the five loaves, and the two fiſhes, and looking up to heaven, he bleſſed, and brake, and gave the loaves to his diſciples, and the diſciples to the multitude.

20 And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the fragments that remained twelve baſkets full.

21 And they that had eaten were about five thouſand men, beſides women and children.

22 And ſtraightway Jeſus conſtrained his diſciples to get into a ſhip, and to go before him unto the other ſide, while he ſent the multitudes away.

Ver. 13. Ch. xii. 15. Mark vi. 32. Luke ix. 10.—V. 14. Ch. ix. 36.—V. 15. Mark vi. 35. Luke ix. 12. John vi. 5.—V. 19. Ch. xv. 36.

Ver. 9. And the king was ſorry] Sudden horror, no doubt, ſeized every heart on hearing Salome's requeſt; the king's gaiety vaniſhed; he was confounded and vext; but being unwilling to appear either raſh, or fickle, or falſe, before a company of the firſt perſons in his kingdom for rank and character, he commanded her requeſt to be granted; not one of the gueſts being ſo friendly, as to ſpeak the leaſt word to divert him from his mad purpoſe, though he gave them an opportunity to do it, by ſignifying to them that he performed his oath out of regard to the company: Perhaps they dreaded the reſentment of Herodias. Thus, out of a miſplaced regard to his oath and his gueſts, king Herod committed a moſt unjuſt and cruel action, which will ever reflect the greateſt diſhonour upon his memory. See Macknight, and the note on Numb. xxx. 2.

Ver. 10. And he ſent and beheaded John] This was contrary to the law of Moſes, whereby it was enjoined that malefactors ſhould be publickly executed. Thus the Baptiſt, having performed his office, died, ſoon after Chriſt had begun his miniſtry. God took him then to himſelf, as St. Chryſoſtom has obſerved, that the people might no longer be divided between him and Chriſt, but might the more readily follow the Meſſiah. His reputation, however, ended not with his life: The people continued to honour his memory; inſomuch, that when Herod had loſt an army by a great overthrow, the Jews, as Joſephus informs us, ſaid that it was a divine judgement, and a juſt puniſhment inflicted upon him for putting John to death. See his Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7. Chryſoſtom's 28th homily upon John, and Jortin's diſcourſes, p. 187.

Ver. 11. And his head was brought in a charger] The head of the prophet, whoſe rebukes had awed the king in his looſeſt moments, and whoſe exhortations had often excited him to virtuous actions, was immediately brought pale and bloody in a charger, and given to the daughter of Herodias, in preſence of the gueſts; which proves that the priſon in which they confined the Baptiſt was at hand, in Tiberias, where Herod kept his court, and not in Machoerus Caſtle, as the interpolater of Joſephus affirms. The maiden forgetting the tenderneſs of her ſex, and the dignity of her rank, with a ſteady cruelty, agreeably to her relation to ſo bad a woman, received the bloody preſent, and carried it to her mother; who enjoyed the whole pleaſure of revenge, and feaſted her eyes with the ſight of her enemy's head, now rendered ſilent and harmleſs. St. Jerome tells us, that Herodias treated the head in a very diſdainful manner, pulling out the tongue, which ſhe imagined had injured her, and piercing it with a needle: Thus they gratified themſelves in the indulgence of their luſts, and triumphed in the murder of this holy prophet, till the righteous judgement of God overtook them all: For Providence intereſted itſelf very remarkably in the revenge of this murder on all concerned; for Herod's army was defeated in a war, occaſioned by marrying Herodias; (ſee the laſt note) and both he and Herodias, whoſe ambition occaſioned his ruin, were afterwards driven from their kingdom in great regret, and died in baniſhment at Lyons in Gaul; and if any credit may be given to Nicephorus, Salome,—who was afterwards infamous for a life ſuitable to this beginning,—fell into the ice, as ſhe was walking over it, which cloſing ſuddenly, cut off her head. See Whitby, Doddridge, and Univ. Hiſtory, vol. x. p. 632. 8vo.

Ver. 13. When Jeſus heard of it, he departed, &c.] Into the deſart of Bethſaida, Luke ix. 10. on the other ſide of the ſea, John vi. 1. and conſequently in the tetrarchy of Philip, who was a meek and peaceable prince. Perhaps by this retreat Jeſus propoſed to ſhun Herod, who deſired to ſee him, and might be contriving ſome method of obtaining an interview with him; for he had perfect knowledge not only of the converſation which paſſed at the court of Galilee, but of Herod's thoughts alſo. It is true he remained but a little while, perhaps two or three days only, under Philip's juriſdiction; for Herod's perplexity quickly wore off, and therefore, though about the time that our Lord retired, he might be contriving means to get a ſight of him, yet as he ſoon returned to his former ſtate of mind, he troubled himſelf no farther with the matter. See Luke xxiii. 8.

Ver. 15. When it was evening] When Jeſus was come aſhore, he taught the multitude with his uſual goodneſs, and healed their ſick, (ver. 14.) ſpending ſeveral days in theſe charitable offices. The words of the text lead us to this ſuppoſition; for the diſciples came and told him, it was time to diſmiſs the people; And when it was evening,—i. e. at three o'clock in the afternoon, for the Jews had two evenings, one of which commenced when the ſun had declined, and the greater part of the day was ſpent, and the other when the ſun was ſet. The firſt evening, which began at three, is here meant, as appears from ver. 23. where another evening is ſaid to have come after the people were fed and diſmiſſed; namely, the ſecond evening, which began at ſun-ſetting. See ch. xxviii. 1.—At this time his diſciples came to him, ſaying, &c. which implies, that the people had now no meat remaining, and therefore, as it was the cuſtom in thoſe countries to have two or three days proviſions with them when they travelled, (ſee on Luke x. 34.) we may reaſonably preſume, that the multitude had been with Jeſus ſeveral days before the diſciples had any thoughts of diſmiſſing them. The time is now paſſed, is interpreted by ſome, the time of dining. Ωρα denotes the ſeaſon of doing any thing, and here it ſeems to ſignify the ſeaſon of the peoples attending on Chriſt, which was now paſſed, becauſe they had continued with him till their proviſions were conſumed. See Macknight and L'Enfant.

Ver. 19. And he commanded the multitude, &c.] See the note on John vi. 11. where this miracle is related more circumſtantially, and where we ſhall ſpeak more fully concerning it. In the mean time, I will beg leave to refer the reader to vol. ii. diſc. 16. of my ſermons on the miracles.

Ver. 22. Jeſus conſtrained his diſciples] We learn from John vi. 15. that in conſequence of this great miracle the people were deſirous to take him by force, and make him a king; but Jeſus knowing both the purpoſes of the multitude, and the inclination of the diſciples, which moſt probably led them to encourage thoſe purpoſes, He ordered the latter to get into their boat, and to go before him to the other ſide of the creek, to the city of Bethſaida, while he ſhould diſmiſs the former. The diſciples therefore expreſs great unwillingneſs to depart: They would not go till He conſtrained or obliged them to depart. It ſeems they would gladly have detained the people, with whom they fully agreed in ſentiment; for it was their opinion alſo, that He who could feed ſuch a number with ſo little, had no reaſon to conceal himſelf; but, without running the 23 And when he had ſent the multitudes away, he went up into a mountain apart to pray: and when the evening was come, he was there alone.

24 But the ſhip was now in the midſt of the ſea, toſſed with waves: for the wind was contrary.

25 And in the fourth watch of the night, Jeſus went unto them, walking on the ſea.

26 And when the diſciples ſaw him walking on the ſea, they were troubled, ſaying, It is a ſpirit; and they cried out for fear.

27 But ſtraightway Jeſus ſpake unto them, ſaying, Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid.

28 And Peter anſwered him and ſaid, Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee on the water.

29 And he ſaid, Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ſhip, he walked on the water, to go to Jeſus.

30 But when he ſaw the wind boiſterous, he was afraid; and beginning to ſink, he cried, ſaying, Lord, ſave me.

31 And immediately Jeſus ſtretched forth his hand, and caught him, and ſaid unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didſt thou doubt?

32 And when they were come into the ſhip, the wind ceaſed.

33 Then they that were in the ſhip came, and worſhipped him, ſaying, Of a truth thou art the Son of God.

34 And when they were gone over, they came into the land of Genneſaret.

35 And when the men of that place had

Ver. 23. Mark vi. 46. John vi. 16.—V. 30. Or, ſtrong.—V. 34. Mark vi. 53.

leaſt riſque, might take the title of Meſſiah whenever he pleaſed. Beſides, they certainly ſuppoſed that the favourable moment was come, the people being in ſo proper a temper, that if Jeſus but ſpake the word, they would all to a man have liſted under him, and formed an army immediately. See Macknight and Doddridge.

Ver. 24, 25. The ſhip was now in the midſt of the ſea] The diſciples having met with a contrary wind, could not keep their courſe to Bethſaida, which was ſituated northwards, about a league or two from the deſart mountain on which the miraculous dinner was given. If Bethſaida had been at a greater diſtance, Jeſus would hardly have ſent the diſciples away, nor would they have conſented to go; but as it was only a few miles off, He could eaſily walk thither on foot. See the note on John vi. 17. The diſciples rowed therefore againſt the wind, to keep as near their courſe as poſſible, and were toſſed violently up and down, [βασανιζόμενοι] all night, and ſo had gotten only one league from the ſhore, John vi. 19. when towards the concluſion of the fourth watch, or about five o'clock in the morning, Jeſus on the mountain looked at them; but they did not ſee their maſter, though he beheld their diſtreſs, and was about to appear for their relief. See the reflections. The Jewiſh night was divided into four watches, each containing about three of our hours, eſpecially ſo near the equinox; the firſt began at ſix in the evening, the ſecond at nine, the third at midnight, and the fourth at three in the morning. Calmet thinks they learned this diviſion from the Romans. Walking on the ſea was thought ſo impracticable, that the picture of two feet walking on the ſea was an Egyptian hieroglyphic for an impoſſibility; and in the Scripture it is mentioned as the prerogative of God, that he alone treadeth upon the waves of the ſea. Job ix. 8. Thus Jeſus aſſerted and proved his divinity. See Calmet's dictionary under the the word HOURS, and Grotius, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 26. When the diſciples ſaw him—they were troubled] It is well known, that it is never intirely dark on the water; not to urge that the moon might perhaps now be in the laſt quarter, as it muſt have been, if this was about three weeks before the paſſover. By that little light therefore, which they had, the diſciples ſeeing Jeſus, but not perfectly diſcerning who he was, were much terrified, and ſaid, It is certainly an apparition, or evil ſpirit, [φαντασμά] for no human body, they conceived, could thus be ſupported by the water. It was a common opinion among the Jews, that ſpirits appeared ſometimes in an human ſhape; and they conceived that evil ſpirits appeared more frequently in the night than in the day-time.

Ver. 28—30. And Peter anſwered him, &c.] St. Peter, a man of a warm and forward temper, looking at Jeſus walking upon the ſea, was exceedingly ſtruck with it, and conceived a mighty deſire of being enabled to do the like; wherefore, without weighing the matter, he immediately begged that Jeſus would bid him come to him on the water. He did not doubt but his maſter would gratify him, as he thought he paid him a compliment, his requeſt inſinuating, that he would undertake any thing, however difficult, at Chriſt's command. There was no height of obedience to which Peter would not ſoar. That this was the true language of his actions, may be gathered from the circumſtance before us; It would have been perfectly ridiculous in the Apoſtle to have aſked ſuch a proof of the perſon's being Jeſus who ſpake to him, as, had it failed, it would have become fatal to himſelf. No man in his ſenſes can be ſuppoſed to have deſired a proof of that kind; Peter's requeſt therefore ſhould have been tranſlated, Lord, ſeeing it is thou, command me, &c. the particle εἰ being here put for ἐπεὶ, ſee Acts iv. 9, 11, 17. in the Greek. To ſhew Peter the weakneſs of his faith, and to bear down that high opinion which he ſeems to have entertained of himſelf, as well as to demonſtrate the greatneſs of his own power, Jeſus granted his requeſt: For, in ſupporting him on the water, together with himſelf, Jeſus appeared greater than in walking thereon ſingly. Beſides, it might be deſigned to obviate the conceit of thoſe ancient heretics, who from this paſſage of the Sacred Hiſtory pretended to prove, that our Lord did not aſſume a real human body, but only the appearance of one. Peter being thus permitted to walk upon the ſea, it flattered his vanity not a little, when, deſcending from the veſſel, he found the water firm under his feet. Hence at the firſt he walked towards his maſter with abundance of confidence; the wind becoming more boiſterous than before, made a dreadful noiſe, and the ſea raging at the ſame time, ſhook him in ſuch a manner, that he was on the point of being overturned: His courage ſtaggered; in the hurry of his thoughts he forgot that Jeſus was at hand, and fell into a panic; and now the ſecret power of God, which, while Peter entertained no doubt, had made the ſea firm under him, began to withdraw itſelf: In proportion as his faith decreaſed, the water yielded, and he ſunk. In this extremity he looked round for Chriſt, and upon the very brink of being ſwallowed up, cried out, in a great conſternation of ſpirit, Lord, ſave me! Peter probably could ſwim, as moſt fiſhermen can, compare John xxi. 7. and perhaps he might venture on the attempt which he now made with ſome ſecret dependance on his art, which God, for wiſe reaſons, ſuffered to fail him. The verb καταποντίζεσθαι, rendered to ſink, is very expreſſive, and may intimate, that he felt himſelf ſinking with ſuch a weight, that he had no hope of recovering himſelf, and expected nothing but that he ſhould go directly to the bottom of the ſea. See Macknight, Doddridge, Mintert, and the note on ch. xviii. 6.

Ver. 31. Jeſus ſtretched forth his hand, &c.] Peter did not doubt that it was Jeſus who walked upon the water; he might have been convinced of that, as we obſerved in the former note, before he left the veſſel; nay, muſt have been convinced of it while he was ſinking, otherwiſe he would not have called to him for aſſiſtance; but he was afraid that Jeſus could not or would not ſupport him againſt the wind, which blew more fiercely than before: A doubt moſt unreaſonable and culpable, ſince it was as eaſy to ſupport him againſt the ſtorm, as to keep him upon the water, which Jeſus had virtually promiſed to do by his permiſſion, and which he had actually performed, when Peter firſt left the veſſel. See the Reflections, and the parallel places.

Ver. 34. They came into the land of Genneſaret] The land of Genneſaret was a large tract of ground on the weſtern ſhore of the lake, in part of which Capernaum appears from hence to have been ſituated; for though St. Matthew and St. Mark only ſpeak of their coming to the land of Genneſaret, and putting to ſhore there, (See Mark vi. 53.) It is plain from St. John's account, that Jeſus, at his landing, came to Capernaum; for it was there the people found him, who followed in the morning to the other ſide of the ſea. See Doddridge, and compare John vi. 22, 24. and ver. 59.

Ver. 35, 36. And when, &c.] And the men—knowing him, ſent out, &c. Wat. and MS. Jeſus ordinarily reſided in the neighbourhood of Capernaum; but he had been long abſent, namely, ever ſince his mother had taken him with her to Nazareth; ſee ch. xiii. 54. and Mark vi. 6. wherefore the inhabitants, glad of this new opportunity, came with their ſick in ſuch crowds, that it was impoſſible for Jeſus to beſtow particular attention on each of them; which, when the ſick obſerved, they beſought him, that they might only touch the hem, the border, or fringe of his garment, when as many as touched it were made perfectly whole, and that whether they were good or bad people; not becauſe there was any virtue in his garments, otherwiſe the ſoldiers who obtained them at his crucifixion might have wrought miracles, but becauſe Jeſus willed it to be ſo; for it was now the acceptable time, the day of ſalvation, foretold by Iſai. xliii. 8. and Chriſt's volition was ſufficient to remove any diſtemper whatever. This pitch of faith ſeems to have been wrought in the ſick multitude by the inſtance of her who had lately been cured of a flux of blood at Capernaum, upon touching the hem of our Lord's garment. See Luke viii. 43. Macknight, and Chemnitz.

knowledge of him, they ſent out into all that country round about, and brought unto him all that were diſeaſed;

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XIV.

Men of flagitious lives are, and ever muſt be, ſubject to great uneaſineſs: Whatever calm and repoſe of mind they may ſeem for a ſeaſon to enjoy, yet anon, a quick and pungent ſenſe of guilt, awakened by ſome accident, ariſes like a whirlwind, ruffles and diſquiets them throughout, and turns up to open view, from the very bottom of their conſciences, all the filth and impurity which had ſettled itſelf there: Of this truth, there is not perhaps in the whole book of God, a more apt and lively inſtance than that of Herod in the chapter before us, ver. 1, 2.

The crying guilt of John the Baptiſt's blood ſat but ill, no doubt, on the conſcience of Herod, from the moment of his ſpilling it. However, his inward anguiſh and remorſe were ſtifled and kept under for a time, by the ſplendor and luxury in which he lived, till he heard of the fame of Jeſus; and then his heart ſmote him, at the remembrance of the inhuman treatment he had given to ſuch another juſt and good man; and wrung from him a confeſſion of what he felt, by what he uttered on that occaſion. He ſaid,—this is John, &c. There could not be a wilder imagination than this, or which more betrayed the agony and confuſion of thought under which he laboured. He had often heard John the Baptiſt preach, and muſt have known that the drift of all his ſermons was to prepare the Jews for the reception of a prophet mightier than him, and whoſe ſhoes he was not worthy to bear. And yet, no ſooner does that prophet arrive, but Herod's frighted conſcience gives him no leiſure to recollect what his meſſenger had ſaid; and immediately ſuggeſts to him, that this was the murdered Baptiſt himſelf!

Herod, though circumciſed, appears to have been little better than a heathen in his principles and practices; or, if ſincerely a Jew, at moſt only of the ſect of Sadducees, who ſaid there was no reſurrection; and yet, under the preſent pangs and terrors of his guilt, he imagines that John was riſen from the dead, on purpoſe to reprove him.

It was the Baptiſt's diſtinguiſhing character, that he did no miracles, (John x. 41.) nor pretended to the power of doing them; and yet, even from hence the diſturbed mind of Herod concludes that it muſt be he, becauſe mighty works did ſhew forth themſelves in him. And ſo great was his conſternation and ſurpriſe, that it broke out before thoſe who ſhould leaſt have been witneſſes of it: For he whiſpers not his guilty fears to a boſom friend, to the partner of his crime, and of his bed; but forgets his high ſtate and character, and declares them to his very ſervants. Surely nothing can be more juſt and appoſite than the alluſion of the prophet, in reſpect to this wicked Tetrarch: He is like the troubled ſea, when it cannot reſt, whoſe waters caſt up mire and dirt, Iſai. lvii. 20. And ſuch is every one, who ſins with an high hand, againſt the clear light of his conſcience: Although he may reſiſt the checks of it at firſt, yet he will be ſure to feel the laſhes and reproaches of it afterwards. The avenging principle within us will certainly do its duty, upon any eminent breach of ours; and make every flagrant act of wickedneſs, even in this life, a puniſhment to itſelf. See Bp. Atterbury's ſermons, vol. iv. p. 96. and the Reflections on Mark vi.

Who can help obſerving, on occaſion of this remarkable event, how myſterious are the ways of that Providence, which left the life of ſo holy a man as the Baptiſt in ſuch infamous hands? Which permitted it to be ſacrificed to the malice of an abandoned harlot, to the petulancy of a vain girl, and to the raſhneſs of a fooliſh, and perhaps an intoxicated prince, who made the prophet's head the reward of a dance: ver. 8, 9. The ways of God are unſearchable; but we are ſure that He can never be at a loſs to repay his ſervants in another world, for the greateſt ſufferings they endure in this, and even for life itſelf, when given up in his cauſe.

What ſtrange kind of religion was this in Herod, to remember God in the midſt of ſin, to no other end but to make his name ſubſervient thereto by a ſcandalous oath; inſtead of thinking of him with reverential awe, in order to renounce his paſſion! An oath is criminal, and by conſequence void, when it cannot be performed without ſin and injuſtice.

We may reaſonably conclude, that death could never be an unſeaſonable ſurpriſe to ſo holy a man as the Baptiſt, ver. 10. When the executioner came into the priſon by night, (perhaps breaking in upon his ſlumbers) and fulfilled his bloody commiſſion, almoſt as ſoon as he declared it,—a ſoul like his might welcome the ſtroke, as a means of liberty and glory: Aſſured, that the tranſient agony of a moment would tranſmit it to a kingdom, where the leaſt of its inhabitants would be in holineſs, honour, and felicity, ſuperior to John in his moſt proſperous and ſucceſsful ſtate on earth.

We ſee here the fruit of a bad education; a wicked daughter of a wicked mother, ver. 11. They are ſerviceable to one another in order only to ſin and damnation! This is a dreadful example for their ſex, which is naturally ſo ſoft, timorous, and baſhful. A woman could not arrive at once at ſuch an exceſs of fury, as to prefer the preſent of an head, ſwimming in blood, before every other favour which ſhe might have aſked; But revenge, a paſſion ever to be dreaded in its leaſt approach, cauſes a perſon to take pleaſure in that, which, if paſſion were abſent, would raiſe the utmoſt horror.

The hiſtory of this birth-day, tranſmitted to poſterity in the Scriptures, ſtands a perpetual beacon, to warn the great, the gay, and the young, to beware of diſſolute mirth. Admoniſhed by ſo fatal an example, they ought to maintain, even in the midſt of their jollity, an habitual recollection of ſpirit, leſt reaſon at any time, enervated by the pleaſures of ſenſe, ſhould ſlacken the rein of wiſdom, or let it drop, though but for a moment; becauſe their headſtrong paſſions, ever impatient of the curb, may catch the opportunity, and ruſh with them into follies, whoſe conſequences will be unſpeakably, and it may be, perpetually bitter!

How magnificent a proof did He who is the bread of life give of his power and goodneſs, by feeding ſo great a multitude with a few loaves and fiſhes! ver. 17—21. This was one of the moſt aſtoniſhing, and at the ſame time moſt extenſively convincing, of all the miracles which Jeſus performed during the courſe of his miniſtry, and therefore every one of the Evangeliſts have recorded it; and what is remarkable, it is the only one found in each of their hiſtories. We ſhall have occaſion to conſider it more fully hereafter: Obſerving only at preſent, that though the people ſat on the ground, under no canopy but the ſky, and had only barley bread, and, as it ſeems, cold, or dried fiſhes to eat, and probably nothing but water to drink, yet was there more real grandeur diſplayed by the maſter of this feaſt, than by Ahaſuerus in that royal feaſt, which was intended to ſhew the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honour of his excellent majeſty, (Eſth. i. 4, 7.) when the veſſels and the beds were of gold and of ſilver, upon a pavement of porphyry, marble, and alabaſter.

When the day had been thus employed in healing and feeding the people, Chriſt retired to a mountain to pray; ver. 23. Thus muſt ſecret devotion attend our public labours, for the inſtruction and ſalvation of men, if we would ſecure that divine bleſſing, without which, neither the moſt eloquent preaching, nor the moſt engaging and benevolent conduct, can command or promiſe ſucceſs. The proper diſpoſitions and circumſtances for praying well, are retirement from the world, elevation of heart, ſolitude, and the ſilence and quiet of the night.

There is no manner of calm where Chriſt is not: The diſciples, wanting their Maſter, were toſſed on the billows of diſtreſs, ver. 24. When the ſtormy waves of affliction beat upon, and are ready to overwhelm God's people, they are apt to think he hath forgotten them, though his eye is all the while upon them; though he takes particular notice of every thing which befals them, and is about to work their deliverance in a manner altogether unexpected. In ſuch caſes, he oftentimes on a ſudden calms the ſtorm, makes every thing ſerene around them, and at length brings them ſafe into the haven where they would be. So Jeſus, who had left his diſciples alone in the preſent danger, that he might teach them to rely, in the greateſt extremities, on the providence of God, went to ſave them walking upon the ſea.

Happy would the Chriſtian be, could he always diſcern his Lord, and always conceive of him aright! But alas! how often does He appear to his diſordered mind as the object of terror, (ver. 26.) rather than of confidence! And in a day of darkneſs, while he may ſeem to treat his ſuffering people with neglect, inſtead of ſeeking him with the more earneſt importunity, how are they ready to be overwhelmed with fears, and to conclude he has forgotten them. Speak, Lord, to the hearts of all ſuch, to the hearts of all who doubt or diſbelieve; who fear, or are troubled; ſpeak the powerful, the efficacious word, It is I; and their incredulity will be changed into faith, their doubts into hope, their fear into fortitude.

At the command of Jeſus, Peter ventured to go to him on the ſea; and through what ſtorms and dangers may we not ſafely venture, if we are ſure that our Lord calls us? ver. 28, 29. Yet the rebuke which he ſuffered may warn us, not raſhly to throw ourſelves on unneceſſary trials. Warned by this example, we ſhould beware of preſumption and ſelf-ſufficiency, and in all our actions take care not to be precipitate. Wherever God calls, we are boldly to go; not terrified at the danger and difficulty of the duty; His providence being always able to ſupport and protect us. But he who goes without a call, or proceeds further than he is called; who ruſhes into difficulties and temptations without any reaſon, may, by the unhappy iſſue of his conduct, be made to feel how dangerous a thing it is for any one to go out of his ſphere. Lord, ſay to my ſoul Come, and it will then go to thee, and do whatever thou wouldeſt have it, without the leaſt apprehenſion from the world!

In how many circumſtances of life does the Chriſtian appear, to his own imagination, like Peter beginning to ſink in the waves: But, in the time of our diſtreſs, let us cry to Jeſus for help; and while we are lifting up the hands of faith and prayer, we may humbly hope that Chriſt will ſtretch forth his omnipotent arm for our reſcue. It is good always to be dependant upon the divine arm, weak and frail as we are; ſince not one moment paſſes, but we have occaſion to ſay, Lord, ſave me!

naan, and other great multitudes: and with ſeven loaves, and a few little fiſhes, feedeth four thouſand men, beſides women and children.

THEN came to Jeſus Scribes and Phariſees, which were of Jeruſalem, ſaying,

2 Why do thy diſciples tranſgreſs the tradition of the elders? for they waſh not their hands when they eat bread.

3 But he anſwered and ſaid unto them, Why do ye alſo tranſgreſs the commandment of God by your tradition?

4 For God commanded, ſaying, Honour thy father and mother: and, He that curſeth father or mother, let him die the death.

5 But ye ſay, Whoſoever ſhall ſay to his father or his mother, It is a gift by whatſoever thou mighteſt be profited by me,

6 And honour not his father or his mother, he ſhall be free. Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition.

7 Ye hypocrites, well did Eſaias propheſy of you, ſaying,

8 This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me.

9 But in vain they do worſhip me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.

10 And he called the multitude, and ſaid unto them, Hear, and underſtand:

11 Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man.

12 Then came his diſciples, and ſaid unto him, Knoweſt thou that the Phariſees were offended after they heard this ſaying?

13 But he anſwered and ſaid, Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, ſhall be rooted up.

14 Let them alone: they be blind lead-

Chap. XV. Ver. 1, 2. Then came to Jeſus, &c.] The law of Moſes required external cleanneſs as a part of Religion: not however for its own ſake, but to ſignify with what carefulneſs God's ſervants ſhould purify their minds from moral pollutions: accordingly theſe duties were preſcribed by Moſes with ſuch moderation, as was fitted to promote the end of them; but in proceſs of time they came to be multiplied prodigiouſly: for the ancient doctors, to ſecure the obſervation of thoſe precepts which were really of divine inſtitution, added many commandments of their own, as fences to the former; and the people, to ſhew their zeal, obeyed them. For example, becauſe the law, Levit. xv. 11. ſaith, Whomſoever he toucheth that hath an iſſue, and hath not rinſed his hands in water, he ſhall waſh his clothes, and bathe himſelf in water, and be unclean until the evening; the people were ordered to waſh their hands immediately on their return from places of public concourſe, and before they ſat down to meat, leſt by touching ſome unclean perſon in the crowd, they might have defiled themſelves. The Phariſees were very zealous in theſe trifles, and from this ſource came that endleſs variety of purifications not preſcribed by the law, but ordained by the elders; ſuch as the waſhing of cups and pots, brazen veſſels and tables, Mark vii. 4. not becauſe they were dirty, but from a principle of religion, or rather of ſuperſtition. Theſe ordinances, though they were of human invention, came at length to be looked upon as eſſential in religion; nay, were exalted to ſuch a pitch, that, in compariſon of them, the law of God was ſuffered to lie neglected and forgotten; inſomuch that in ſome of the Jewiſh writings we find theſe blaſphemous maxims: "The words of the Scribes are more lovely than the words of the law; the words of the ancients are more weighty than thoſe of the prophets." See L'Enfant and Wetſtein.

Ver. 3—6. But he anſwered, &c.] It was eaſy for our Lord to retort upon the Phariſees the charge of impiety which they had brought againſt his diſciples, being themſelves guilty of the groſſeſt violations of the divine law, through the regard which they ſhewed to their own traditions. Accordingly he produces an inſtance of an atrocious kind: "God, ſaith he, has commanded children to honour their parents;" i. e. among other things, to maintain them when reduced; for as the greater includes the leſs; ſo honour, ver. 4. imports aſſiſtance and maintenance when they are wanted, as appears from ver. 5. And honour is uſed for maintenance 1 Tim. v. 17. and elſewhere.—"Nevertheleſs, ſays our Lord, you Phariſees preſumptuouſly make light of the divine commandment, and of the aweful ſanction annexed; affirming, that it is a more ſacred duty to enrich the temple than to nouriſh one's parents, though they be in the utmoſt neceſſity; and pretending that what is offered to the Great Parent is better beſtowed, than that which is given for the ſupport of our parents on earth, as if the intereſt of God was different from that of his creatures. Nay, ye impiouſly teach, that a man may lawfully ſuffer his parents to ſtarve, if he can ſay to them It is a gift, &c. i. e. what ſhould have ſuccoured you is given to the temple. Thus have you hypocrites made void the commandment of God, though of immutable and eternal obligation, by your frivolous traditions; and diſguiſed with a cloak of piety the moſt horrid and unnatural action whereof a man can be guilty." See the note on Mark vii. 11. Dr. Heylin reads the 5th and 6th verſes thus: But you ſay, that whoever will declare to his father or mother, that what he might aſſiſt them with is an oblation, ſhall hereby be free from his obligation to maintain them. Thus you invalidate the command of God by your tradition. Dr. Doddridge reads it: But you aſſert, that any one may ſay to his father or mother, Let that be a gift, by which thou mighteſt receive an advantage from me; and he ſhall not honour his father and mother. Thus, &c. See Capellus and Sir Norton Knatchbull. Dr. Waterland renders the beginning of ver. 6. He ſhall pay no [further] honour to his father or his mother. Thus, &c. or, He is not obliged to regard his father, &c. And the verſion of 1729 gives the ſenſe of the paſſage thus: "But your doctrine is this, If any man declares to his father or mother, that whatever he has to give for their relief is dedicated to the temple, he is not obliged to regard, &c.

Ver. 7—9. Ye hypocrites, &c.] See the note on Iſai. xxix. 13. In St. Mark our Lord makes this citation at the beginning of his diſcourſe, ch. vii. 6, 7. poſſibly therefore he cited and applied it twice; firſt, at the beginning, as St. Mark tells us; and having proved that it was truly applicable to the Scribes and Phariſees, he applied it again at the concluſion of his argument, as St. Matthew affirms. We have ſeveral examples of the like repetitions in the Goſpels, See Mark x. 7. compared with Matth. xix. 4.—ch. xxiv. 5. compared with ver. 11. 24. and Luke xxii. 18. compared with Matth. xxvi. 29. Dr. Doddridge renders the laſt clauſe of ver. 9. While they teach doctrines that are human injunctions; the mere precepts of men, which have no ſtamp of the divine authority upon them.

Ver. 11. Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth] Our Lord addreſſing the multitude, obſerved to them, that nothing could be more abſurd than the precepts which the Scribes and Phariſees endeavoured to inculcate; anxious about trifles, they neglected the great duties of morality, which are of unchangeable obligation. They ſhuddered with horror at hands unwaſhed, but were perfectly eaſy under the guilt of impure minds; although not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man, i. e. rendereth a man impure in the ſight of God, but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man; becauſe, in the ſight of God, cleanneſs and uncleanneſs are qualities not of the body, but of the mind, which can be polluted by nothing but ſin. Our Lord did not at all mean to overthrow the diſtinction which the law had eſtabliſhed between things clean and unclean in the matter of man's food; that diſtinction, like all the other emblematical inſtitutions of Moſes, was wiſely appointed, being deſigned to teach the Iſraelites how carefully the familiar company and converſation of the wicked is to be avoided: He only affirmed, that in itſelf no kind of meat can defile the mind, which is the man, though by accident it may: A man may bring guilt upon himſelf by eating what is pernicious to his health, or by exceſs in the quantity of food and liquor; and a Jew might have done it by preſumptuouſly eating what was forbidden by the Moſaic law, which ſtill continued in force; yet in all theſe inſtances the pollution would ariſe from the wickedneſs of the heart, and be proportionable to it; which is all our Lord aſſerts. See Macknight, Doddridge, Calmet.

Ver. 13. Every plant, &c.] Every plantation, φυτεία, i. e. doctrine. The metaphor was familiar in the time of our Lord, and is ſtill uſed by the Jewiſh writers, with whom to pull up plantations ſignifies "to deny articles of faith." See Heylin and Wetſtein.

Ver. 14. They be blind leaders, &c.] "Teachers who fooliſhly think to lead their diſciples to perfection by the obſervation of precepts wherein there is not the ſmalleſt degree of true piety; and ers of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both ſhall fall into the ditch.

15 Then anſwered Peter and ſaid unto him, Declare unto us this parable.

16 And Jeſus ſaid, Are ye alſo yet without underſtanding?

17 Do not ye yet underſtand, that whatſoever entereth in at the mouth, goeth into the belly, and is caſt out into the draught?

18 But thoſe things which proceed out of the mouth, come forth from the heart, and they defile the man:

19 For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, falſe witneſs, blaſphemies.

20 Theſe are the things which defile a man: but to eat with unwaſhen hands defileth not a man.

21 Then Jeſus went thence, and departed into the coaſts of Tyre and Sidon.

22 And behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the ſame coaſts, and cried unto him, ſaying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou ſon of David; my daughter is grievouſly vexed with a devil!

23 But he anſwered her not a word. And his diſciples came and beſought him, ſaying, Send her away, for ſhe crieth after us.

24 But he anſwered and ſaid, I am not ſent but unto the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael.

25 Then came ſhe, and worſhipped him, ſaying, Lord, help me!

26 But he anſwered and ſaid, It is not who will not be convinced of the contrary; for which cauſe both the guides and the guided, who prefer ignorance to knowledge, and ſuperſtition to religion, ſhall fall into the ditch of eternal perdition. Therefore let them alone; concern not yourſelves about them." A plain direction how to behave with regard to all ſuch.

Ver. 15. Declare unto us this parable] The diſciples, not underſtanding their maſter's doctrine concerning meats, deſired him when they were come home to explain it. See Mark vii. 17. He complied, and ſhewed them that meats being of a corporeal nature, cannot defile the mind, or make a man a ſinner in the ſight of God, unleſs when uſed immoderately, or in oppoſition to the commandment of God, in which caſe the pollution ariſes from the man, and not from the meat; whereas that which proceedeth out of a man's mouth, coming from his heart, really pollutes the mind. See ver. 18. The verb φράσον, rendered declare, ſignifies properly, make known, or explain. Comp. ch. xiii. 36.

Ver. 19. Evil thoughts] Διαλογισμοὶ πονηροὶ, evil reaſonings: So I chuſe to render it, ſays Dr. Doddridge, as better ſuiting both the original and the occaſion, and as containing a more univerſal and important truth; for thoſe thoughts only defile the heart, which it willingly admits, and does as it were hold a parley and converſe with; and I fear there are multitudes in the preſent age like theſe Phariſees, who are contracting immenſe guilt by thoſe corrupt and ſophiſtical reaſonings, on the ſubtilty of which they may highly value themſelves and each other. See Mark vii. 22. Dr. Heylin renders it ill deſigns; and inſtead of blaſphemies, he reads calumnies. The original word includes all reviling, backbiting, and evil-ſpeaking. It is remarkable, that three of the crimes here mentioned as pollutions of the mind, namely, murder, falſe-witneſs, and blaſphemy, were on this very occaſion committed by the perſons who charged our Lord with Impiety, becauſe he neglected ſuch ceremonial precepts of religion as were of human invention: for whilſt they feigned the higheſt reverence for the divine law, they were making void its moſt eſſential precepts. At the very time that they condemned the diſciples for ſo ſmall an offence as eating with unwaſhen hands, contrary only to the traditions of the elders, the Scribes and Phariſees were murdering Jeſus by their calumnies and falſe-witneſſings, notwithſtanding it was the ſole ſtudy of his life to do them all the good poſſible.

Ver. 20. Theſe are the things which defile a man] Thus our Lord defended his diſciples by a beautiful chain of reaſoning, wherein he has ſhewn the true nature of actions, and loaded with perpetual infamy the Jewiſh teachers and their brood, who in every age and country may be known by features exactly reſembling their parents; the main ſtrokes of which are, that by their frivolous ſuperſtitions they weaken and ſometimes deſtroy the eternal and immutable rules of righteouſneſs. It may be proper juſt to obſerve, that St. Matthew repreſents theſe evil things as proceeding out of the mouth, ver. 18. not ſo much by way of contraſt to meats which enter by the mouth into a man, as becauſe ſome of them are committed with the faculty of ſpeech, ſuch as falſe-witneſs and blaſphemy; and others of them are helped forwards by its aſſiſtance; as adultery, deceit, &c.

Ver. 21, 22. Then Jeſus went thence] It may eaſily be believed, that the Phariſees were highly offended at the liberty which Jeſus took in the preceding diſcourſe; for he had plucked off from them the maſk wherewith they had covered their deformity, and rendered themſelves ſo venerable in the eyes of the vulgar. Accordingly, their plots being levied againſt his reputation and life, he judged it proper to retire into the remote regions which lay between the cities of Tyre and Sidon, propoſing to conceal himſelf a while. Sidon was a very ancient town, having been built by Sidon, the eldeſt ſon of Canaan, the ſon of Ham, the ſon of Noah. It appears from Joſhua xxii. 9. that the whole country weſtward of Jordan was called Canaan, that on the eaſt being named Gilead. From the ſame book, ch. xix. 28, 29. we learn that Tyre and Sidon were cities in the lot of Aſhur, which Tribe having never been able wholly to drive out the natives, their poſterity remained even in our Lord's time. Hence he did not preach the doctrine of the kingdom in this country, becauſe it was inhabited principally by heathens, to whom he was not ſent; ſee ch. x. 5. Neither did he work miracles here with that readineſs which he ſhewed every where elſe. The reaſon was, he propoſed to ſhun the Phariſees by concealing himſelf; but he could not be hid. It ſeems he was perſonally known to many of the Gentiles in this country, who no doubt had often heard and ſeen him in Galilee. See Mark iii. 8. As for the reſt, they were ſufficiently acquainted with him by his fame, which had ſpread itſelf very early through all Syria; ſee ch. iv. 24. In one of the towns of this remote country there lived a Canaanitiſh woman, whoſe daughter was poſſeſſed with a devil. She was a deſcendant of the ancient inhabitants, and by religion a heathen, as ſeems plain from St. Mark, who calls her a Greek, a Syrophœnician by nation, ch. vii. 26. For ſince the woman's nation is mentioned in the latter clauſe, the title of a Greek, which is given her in the former, muſt certainly be the denomination of her religion. Keuchenius thinks, that the epithet χαναναία, a Canaanite, denotes the woman's occupation,—ſhe merchandized; and ſupports his notion by the like uſe of the word in the Old Teſtament: But this conjecture will not hold, becauſe our Lord's reply to her, ver. 26. It is not meet, &c. plainly imports that ſhe was a heathen; nor is this leſs evident from what he ſaid to the diſciples, I am not ſent but unto the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael. But though this woman was ignorant of the true religion, ſhe had conceived a very great, honourable, and juſt opinion not only of our Lord's power and goodneſs, but even of his character as Meſſiah, which ſhe had gained a knowledge of by converſing with the Jews; for when ſhe had heard of his arrival, ſhe went in queſt of him, and meeting him as he paſſed along the ſtreet, ſhe addreſſed him with the title of Son of David, or promiſed Meſſiah, and cried after him for a cure of her daughter. See Macknight. Heylin renders the laſt clauſe of the 22d verſe, My daughter is in a grievous manner poſſeſſed by a demon.

Ver. 23. But he anſwered her not a word] Jeſus did not ſeem to regard the woman, intending that the greatneſs of her faith ſhould be made to appear; An end, highly worthy the wiſdom of Jeſus; becauſe it not only juſtified his conduct in working a miracle for an heathen, but was a ſharp rebuke to the Jews for their infidelity. In the mean time his diſciples, being ignorant of his deſign, were uneaſy at the woman's importunity, thinking, that if ſhe was permitted to follow them, they ſhould ſoon be diſcovered. Deſirous, therefore, to get rid of her, they intreated their maſter to diſmiſs her, as he was uſed to diſmiſs ſuch petitioners; i. e. with the grant of her requeſt. The verſion of 1729 renders this clauſe, His diſciples came and intreated him to grant her requeſt; for, ſaid they, ſhe is very importunate with us. As it appears from Mark vii. 24. that Chriſt was entered into a houſe, and that the application of this woman prevented his being concealed, as he deſired to have been; it ſhould ſeem, that having learned that Jeſus was there, watched for the diſciples, as they went in and out, and having cried after them ſome time, ſhe at length got admittance into the houſe, and with the profoundeſt reſpect accoſted him; at firſt from ſome diſtance, and then drew near and threw herſelf at his feet. See Doddridge, and ſermon 15. vol. ii. of my diſcourſes on the miracles.

Ver. 24. I am not ſent, but, &c.] See the note on ch. x. 5. "Though I am come to ſave all the nations of the world, my miniſtry muſt be confined to the Iſraelites." Thus at firſt Jeſus ſeemed to refuſe both the woman's requeſt, and the diſciples interceſſion in her behalf; our Lord's anſwer was well adapted to their own prejudices. And as they entertained high notions of the Jewiſh prerogative, they were ſo well ſatisfied with the reply, that we hear them no more pleading for this unhappy Gentile.

Ver. 26. It is not meet to take the children's bread, &c.] The Jews gloried meet to take the children's bread, and to caſt it to dogs.

27 And ſhe ſaid, Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their maſter's table.

28 Then Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour.

29 And Jeſus departed from thence, and came nigh unto the ſea of Galilee; and went up into a mountain, and ſat down there.

30 And great multitudes came unto him, having with them thoſe that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and caſt them down at Jeſus' feet; and he healed them:

31 Inſomuch that the multitude wondered when they ſaw the dumb to ſpeak, the maimed to be whole, the lame to walk, and the blind to ſee: and they glorified the God of Iſrael.

32 Then Jeſus called his diſciples unto him, and ſaid, I have compaſſion on the multitude, becauſe they continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat: and I will not ſend them away faſting, leſt they faint in the way.

Ver. 29. Mark vii. 31. Ch. iv. 18.—V. 30. Iſai. xxxv. 5, 6. Ch. xi. 5. Luke vii. 22.—V. 32. Mark viii. 1.

gloried greatly in the honourable title of God's children, becauſe of all nations they alone knew and worſhipped the true God: They gave the name of dogs to the heathens for their idolatry and other pollutions, by which they had degraded themſelves from the rank of reaſonable creatures. This appellation marked the impurity of the Gentiles, and their odiouſneſs in the ſight of God; at the ſame time conveying an idea of the contempt in which they were held by the holy nation: Though in ſome reſpects it was applicable, it muſt have been very offenſive to the heathens. Nevertheleſs, this good woman neither refuſed it, nor grudged the Jews the honourable title of children: She acknowledged the juſtneſs of what Chriſt ſaid, and by a ſtrong exerciſe of faith, drew an argument from it, which the candour and benevolence of his diſpoſition could not reſiſt. Wetſtein obſerves, that our Saviour ſpoke this in conformity to the ſentiments and prejudices of the Jews, and therefore he changes the word κυῶν into the ſofter one of κυνάριον, little dog; but I doubt whether this obſervation is not too refined.

Ver. 27. And ſhe ſaid, Truth, Lord] Ναὶ, Κύριε, which is ſometimes uſed as a form of aſſenting, and ſometimes of intreating. See Phil. ver. 20. "I acknowledge, Lord, the truth and juſtice of what thou haſt ſaid; nevertheleſs let me have ſuch kindneſs as the dogs of any family enjoy: From the plenty of miraculous cures which thou beſtoweſt on the Jews, drop the offal of this one to me, who am a poor diſtreſſed heathen; for by it they will ſuffer no greater loſs than the children of a family do by the crumbs which are caſt to the dogs." See Macknight, and Blackwall's Claſſicks, Vol. i. p. 143.

Vor. 28. Then Jeſus anſwered—O woman! great is thy faith] Jeſus having thus made it evident that the woman poſſeſſed a very high degree of faith, a juſt notion of his power and goodneſs, and of her own unworthineſs, wrought with pleaſure the cure which ſhe ſolicited on behalf of her daughter, and at the ſame time gave her faith the praiſe which was due to it. As ſoon as ſhe had uttered the ſentiment which was ſo acceptable to Chriſt, he willed the ejection of the demon; and though ſcarce any time paſſed between her uttering that ſentiment and his anſwer, ſo great was his power and goodneſs, that the devil was expelled before he ſpake, Go thy way, the demon is gone out of thy daughter, Mark vii. 29. Dr. Waterland, inſtead of hour in this verſe, reads inſtant. The ſucceſs which this Canaanitiſh woman's ſuit met with from Jeſus, teaches us two leſſons of great importance: 1ſt. That God is no reſpecter of perſons, but always accepts ſincere faith and fervent prayer, proceeding from an humble penitent heart. 2d. That it is our duty to continue in prayer with earneſtneſs, although the anſwer thereof ſhould be long deferred. But ſee more in the Reflections.

Ver. 29—31. And Jeſus departed from thence.] Jeſus at length departing from the coaſts of Tyre and Sidon, returned to the ſea of Galilee, through the region of Decapolis, on the eaſt-ſide of Jordan. See Mark vii. 31. Having tarried in Decapolis a conſiderable time, the fame of his being in that country reached every corner; wherefore, to avoid the crowds, he retired into a deſart mountain beſide the ſea of Galilee. Here the ſick, the lame, the dumb, the blind, and the maimed were brought to him from all quarters, and laid down around him by their friends who followed him thither. The ſight of ſo many people in diſtreſs moved the compaſſion of the Son of God exceedingly; for he graciouſly healed them all; particularly on the dumb, who are commonly deaf alſo, He not only conferred the faculty of hearing and pronouncing articulate ſounds, but he conveyed into their mind at once the whole language of their country, making them perfectly acquainted with all the words in it, their ſignifications, their forms, their powers, and their uſes, ſo as to comprehend the whole diſtinctly in their memories; and at the ſame time he gave them the habit of ſpeaking it both fluently and copiouſly! This was a kind of miracle very aſtoniſhing; but the change produced in the bodies of men was but the leaſt part of it: what paſſed in their minds was the grand and principal thing, being an effect ſo extenſive, that nothing inferior to infinite power could have produced it. With reſpect to the blind reſtored to ſight by this great light of the world, they ſaw every object diſtinctly, and immediately bore, without any inconvenience, the full force of unaccuſtomed light! A moſt wonderful circumſtance, but which was univerſally the caſe, ſo far as we can judge by all the ſtories of the blind reſtored to ſight which occur in the Goſpels. And with reſpect to the maimed—κυλλοὺς, that is, perſons who had loſt their legs and arms, and who are here diſtinguiſhed from the lame or crippled, (ſee Mark ix. 43.) Jeſus gave new members in their ſtead; but when he thus created ſuch parts of their bodies as were wanting, without having any thing at all as a ſubject to work upon, the ſpectators could not have been more ſurpriſed, had they ſeen him form a whole human body out of the duſt of the earth. The Jewiſh multitudes ſeem to have apprehended the greatneſs of theſe miracles more diſtinctly than the generality of Chriſtians; for we are told, ch. ix. 33. when Jeſus opened the mouth of the dumb man, the multitude marvelled, ſaying, It was never ſo ſeen in Iſrael. See alſo ch. xii. 22, 23. Mark vii. 8. On this occaſion likewiſe they were not ſilent, nor unaffected: They glorified the God of Iſrael; acknowledging that in this event was fulfilled the prophecy of Iſaiah, ch. xxxv. 5. This clauſe makes it probable, that many heathens were now preſent with our Lord, beheld his miracles, and formed a juſt notion of them. It ſeems his fame ſpreading itſelf into the neighbouring countries, had made ſuch an impreſſion even upon the idolatrous nations, that numbers of them came from far, to hear and ſee the wonderful man of whom ſuch things were reported, and if poſſible to experience his healing goodneſs; wherefore, when they beheld theſe effects of his power, they were exceedingly ſtruck with them, and broke forth in praiſes of the God, by whoſe aſſiſtance and authority he acted: and it may be alſo, from that time forth devoted themſelves to his worſhip. See Macknight, Beza, aud Elſner.

Ver. 32—38. I have compaſſion on the multitude] Σπλαγχνίζομαι, a a very expreſſive word, ſignifying My bowels yearn, or are moved, See ch. ix. 36. It is pleaſing to remark the ſtrong compaſſion which our bleſſed Lord continually diſcovered in all his actions toward mankind. The multitude, it is probable, intent on hearing Chriſt and ſeeing his miracles, had lodged two nights together in the fields, as the ſeaſon of the year was pleaſant, this event happening quickly after the paſſover: And beſides, that the great number of the cures which had been wrought but juſt before might animate them,—perhaps they might conclude, that the miraculous power of Chriſt, which was diſplayed in ſo many glorious inſtances around them, would either preſerve their health from being endangered by the large dews which fell in the night, or reſtore them from any diſorder they might contract by their eagerneſs to attend on his miniſtry. The multitude having now, as on a former occaſion, conſumed all the proviſion they brought with them, Jeſus would not ſend them away without feeding them, leſt they might have fainted on the road home. The diſciples, who it ſeems did not reflect on the former miraculous dinner, imagined that Jeſus propoſed to feed this great multitude in the natural way; and were greatly ſurpriſed, and ſtrongly hinted the impracticability of ſo doing, ver. 33. Jeſus did not reprove them for theſe wrong notions, but meekly aſked them what meat they had; and upon their telling him they had ſeven loaves and a few little fiſhes, he ordered them to be brought, and out of theſe made a ſecond dinner for the multitude by miracle. The Evangeliſt having, in the hiſtory of the former dinner, deſcribed the manner in which the multitudes were ſet down, thought it needleſs on this occaſion to ſay any thing of that particular; probably becauſe they were ranged before in companies, by hundreds and by fifties. Few or none of theſe perſons, it is moſt probable, were preſent at the former dinner; they ſeem to have been principally ſuch as followed Jeſus from the coaſts of Tyre and Sidon, and the neighbouring heathen country: Hence they are ſaid, on ſeeing his miracles, to have glorified the God of Iſrael. This dinner was in all reſpects like to the firſt, except in the number of loaves and fiſhes of which it was made, the number of perſons who were preſent at it, and the number of baſkets which were filled with the fragments that remained. One cannot but remark with what wiſdom Jeſus choſe to be ſo much in deſarts during this period of his miniſtry: He was reſolved, in the diſcharge of the duties of it, to make as little noiſe as poſſible, to avoid crowds, and to be followed only by ſuch as had diſpoſitions proper for profiting by his inſtructions; and to ſay the truth, not a great many others would have accompanied him into ſolitudes, where they were to ſuſtain the inconveniences of hunger and the weather for ſeveral days together. As the multitude on this and the 33 And his diſciples ſay unto him, Whence ſhould we have ſo much bread in the wilderneſs, as to fill ſo great a multitude?

34 And Jeſus ſaith unto them, How many loaves have ye? And they ſaid, Seven, and a few little fiſhes.

35 And he commanded the multitude to ſit down on the ground.

36 And he took the ſeven loaves and the fiſhes, and gave thanks, and brake them, and gave to his diſciples, and the diſciples to the multitude.

37 And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left, ſeven baſkets full.

38 And they that did eat, were four thouſand men, beſide women and children.

39 And he ſent away the multitude, and took ſhip, and came into the coaſts of Magdala.

Ver. 36. Ch. xiv. 19. 1 Sam. ix. 13.—V. 39. Mark viii. 10.

the like occaſions remained long with Jeſus, doubtleſs his doctrine diſtilled upon them all the while like dew, and as the ſmall rain upon the tender herb; if ſo, what ſatisfaction and edification ſhould we find in the divine diſcourſes which he then delivered, were we in poſſeſſion of them! The refreſhment we receive from ſuch of them as the inſpired writers have preſerved, raiſes an ardent deſire of the reſt. At the ſame time it muſt be acknowledged, that we are bleſſed with ſo much of Chriſt's doctrine as is fully ſufficient to the purpoſes of ſalvation. See Macknight, Doddridge, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 39. And came into the coaſts of Magdala] Bengelius has very properly ſeparated this verſe from the preſent chapter, and placed it at the beginning of the next; for it was on the coaſts of Magdala that the Phariſees came to our Saviour. Compare Mark viii. 10. where it is ſaid, that Jeſus came into the parts of Dalmanutha: But the Evangeliſts may be eaſily reconciled, by ſuppoſing that Dalmanutha was a city and territory within the diſtrict of Magdala. Reland (Palæſt. p. 884.) mentions a caſtle called Magdala, not far from Gamaba, which he thinks gave this region its name. See Hammond, Calmet, and Wetſtein.

REFLECTIONS ON THE STORY OF THE CANAANITISH WOMAN.

The Good Shepherd walks the wilderneſs to ſeek one ſheep ſtrayed from many: If there be but one Syrophenician ſoul to be gained to the church, Chriſt goes to the coaſts of Tyre and Sidon to fetch her, ver. 21. Why are we weary to do good, when our Saviour underwent this perpetual toil in healing bodies, and winning ſouls?

No nation carried ſuch brands and marks of a curſe as Canaan; yet, to the ſhame of theſe careleſs Jews, even a faithful Canaanite is a ſuppliant to Chriſt, whilſt they neglect ſo great ſalvation. God is no accepter of perſons; in every nation they who fear him will obtain his favour. This woman doth not ſpeak, but cry; need and deſire have raiſed her voice to an important clamour; the God of mercy is quick to hear; yet he loves a loud and vehement ſolicitation; not to make himſelf inclinable to grant, but to make us capable of receiving bleſſings. They are words, and not prayers, which fall from careleſs lips.—Neither doth her vehemence ſo much argue her faith, as her addreſs, O Lord, thou Son of David! What proſelyte, what diſciple could have ſaid more? O bleſſed Syrophenician! who taught thee this abſtract of divinity? What can we Chriſtians confeſs more, than the Deity, the humanity, and the Meſſiahſhip of our glorious Saviour? His Deity as Lord, his humanity as a Son, his Meſſiahſhip as the Son of David. Whoever would come to Chriſt effectually, muſt come in the right ſtile; apprehending a true God, a true man, a true God and man: Any of theſe ſevered from the other, makes Chriſt an idol, and our prayers ſin.

Being thus acknowledged, what ſuit is ſo fit for the Son of David as mercy? Have mercy on me! It was her daughter that was tormented; yet ſhe ſays, Have mercy on Me. Perhaps her poſſeſſed child was ſenſeleſs of her miſery: the parent feels both her ſorrow and her own. As ſhe was a good woman, ſo a good mother. No creature is ſo unnatural as the reaſonable, who hath put off affection.

My daughter is grievauſly vexed with a devil. It was this which ſent her to Chriſt; it was this which muſt incline Chriſt to her.—I doubt whether ſhe had inquired after Chriſt, if it had not been for her daughter's diſtreſs. Our afflictions are the files and whetſtones which ſet an edge on our devotions; neither are they ſtronger motives to our ſuit than to Chriſt's mercy. We cannot have a better ſpokeſman to God than our own miſery; that alone ſues, and pleads, and importunes for us; that, which ſets men at a diſtance, whoſe compaſſion is finite, attracts God to us. Who can plead diſcouragements in his acceſs to the throne of grace, when our wants are our forcible advocates, and all our worthineſs is in a capable miſery?

Who would expect any other than a kind anſwer to ſo pious and faithful a petition? But behold, he anſwered her not a word! O holy Saviour, we have often found cauſe to wonder at thy words; never, till now, at thy ſilence: A miſerable ſuppliant cries and ſues, whilſt the God of mercies anſwereth not! He that comforts the afflicted, adds affliction to the comfortleſs by a willing diſreſpect! Whether for the trial of her patience and perſeverance; whether for the more ſharpening of her deſires, and raiſing of her zealous importunity; whether for the more ſweetening of the bleſſing, by the difficulty of obtaining it; whether for the engaging of his diſciples in ſo charitable a ſuit; whether for the wiſe avoidance of exception from the captious Jews; or, laſtly, for the drawing of an holy and imitable pattern of faithful perſeverance, and to teach us not to meaſure God's hearing of our ſuit by his preſent anſwer, or his preſent anſwer by our own ſenſe;—The wiſdom of Jeſus reſolved upon ſilence.

It was no ſmall fruit of this ſilence, that the diſciples were thereupon moved to pray for a favourable diſmiſſion of this woman; they felt her miſery, and became ſuitors for her, unrequeſted. It is our duty, in caſe of neceſſity, to intercede for each other; and by how much the more familiar we are with Chriſt, ſo much the more to improve our intereſt for the relief of the diſtreſſed. We are bidden to ſay Our Father, not mine: He cannot pray, or be heard for himſelf, who is no man's friend but his own. No prayer, without faith; no faith, without charity; no charity, without mutual interceſſion.

That which urged them to ſpeak for her, is urged to Chriſt by them for her obtaining; ſhe crieth after us, ver. 23. Prayer is as an arrow, if it be drawn up but a little, it goes not far; but if it be pulled to the head, flies ſtrongly, and pierces deep: heartleſs motions do but teach us to deny; fervent ſuits offer violence both to earth and heaven.

Chriſt would not anſwer the woman, but he anſwers his diſciples, I am not ſent, &c. ver. 24. But who can tell whether his ſilence or his anſwer be more grievous? Whilſt he ſaid nothing, his forbearance might have been ſuppoſed to proceed from the neceſſity of ſome greater thoughts. But now his anſwer profeſſeth that ſilence to have proceeded from a willing reſolution not to anſwer. Yet is not this woman hereby to be diſcouraged. Neither the ſilence of Chriſt, nor his denial, can repulſe her: As if ſhe ſaw no arguments of diſcouragement, ſhe comes, and worſhips, and cries Lord, help me! no contempt can caſt her off. Faith is an undaunted grace. It hath a ſtrong heart and a bold forehead; even denials cannot diſmay it, much leſs delays. The woman's firſt ſuit was for mercy, now for help. There is no uſe of mercy but in helpfulneſs. To be pitied without aid, is but an addition to miſery. Who can blame us, if we care not for an unprofitable compaſſion? The very ſuit was gracious. She ſaith not, Lord, if thou canſt—help me, like the father of the lunatick; but profeſſes the power, while ſhe begs the act, and gives glory, where ſhe would have relief.

Who now can expect other than a fair and yielding anſwer to ſo humble, ſo faithful, ſo patient a ſuppliant? What can ſucceed well, if a prayer of faith, from the knees of humility, ſucceed not?—And yet, behold! her diſcouragement is doubled with her ſuit. It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to caſt it to dogs. Firſt his ſilence implied a contempt; then his anſwer defended his ſilence; now his ſpeech expreſſes and defends his contempt. Lo, he hath turned her from a woman to a dog; and, as it were, ſpurns her from his feet with a harſh repulſe. What ſhall we ſay? Is the Lamb of God turned lion? Doth that clear fountain of mercy run blood? O Saviour! did ever ſo hard a word fall from thoſe mild lips? Thou calledſt Herod fox, and moſt worthily; he was crafty and wicked;—The Scribes and Phariſees a generation of vipers;—they were venomous and cruel. Judas a devil,—he was both covetous and a traitor:—But here,—was a woman in diſtreſs, and diſtreſs challenges mercy;—a good woman, a faithful ſuppliant, a Canaanitiſh diſciple, a Chriſtian Canaanite;—yet treated by thee with great ſeverity; by thee, who wert all goodneſs and mercy. How different are thy ways from ours! Even thy ſeverity argues favour: The trial had not been ſo ſharp, if thou hadſt not found the faith ſo ſtrong, if thou hadſt not meant the iſſue ſo happy!

What ordinary patience would not have been overſtrained with ſuch a repulſe? How few but would have fallen into paſſionate expoſtulations! "Art thou the prophet of God, who ſo diſdainfully entertaineſt poor ſuppliants? Is this the comfort that thou dealeſt to the diſtreſſed? Is this the fruit of my humble adoration, of my faithful profeſſion?"—But here was nothing of this kind; On the contrary, her humility grants all; her patience overcomes all; and ſhe meekly anſwers, Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their maſter's table. "Thou, O Lord, art truth itſelf; thy words can be no other than truth; thou haſt called me a dog, and indeed ſuch I am; a poor outcaſt, a ſinner, and a Gentile. Give me therefore the favour and privilege of a dog, that I may gather up ſome crumbs of mercy from under that table whereat thy children ſit. This bleſſing, though great to me, yet to the infinitude of thy power and mercy, is but as a crumb to a feaſt. I preſume not to preſs to the board, but to creep under it: Deny me not thoſe ſmall offals, which elſe would be ſwept away, and loſt in the duſt!"

Oh, woman, ſay I, great is thy humility, great is thy patience; but, O woman, ſaith my Saviour, great is thy faith! He ſees the root, we the ſtock; nothing but faith could thus temper the heart,

CHAP. XVI.

The Phariſees require a ſign. Jeſus warneth his diſciples of the leaven of the Phariſees and Sadducees. The people's opinion of Chriſt, and Peter's confeſſion of him. Jeſus foreſheweth his death, reproveth Peter for diſſuading him from it: and admoniſheth thoſe that will follow him, to bear the croſs.

THE Phariſees alſo with the Sadducees came, and tempting, deſired him that he would ſhew them a ſign from heaven.

2 He anſwered and ſaid unto them, When it is evening, ye ſay, It will be fair weather, for the ſky is red.

3 And in the morning, It will be foul weather to-day, for the ſky is red and lowring. O ye hypocrites, ye can diſcern the face of the ſky; but can ye not diſcern the ſigns of the times?

4 A wicked and adulterous generation ſeeketh after a ſign; and there ſhall no ſign be given unto it, but the ſign of the prophet Jonas. And he left them, and departed.

5 And when his diſciples were come to the other ſide, they had forgotten to take bread.

6 Then Jeſus ſaid unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Phariſees, and of the Sadducees.

7 And they reaſoned among themſelves, ſaying, It is becauſe we have taken no bread.

8 Which when Jeſus perceived, he ſaid unto them, O ye of little faith, why reaſon ye among yourſelves becauſe ye have brought no bread?

9 Do ye not yet underſtand, neither remember the five loaves of the five thouſand, and how many baſkets ye took up?

10 Neither the ſeven loaves of the four thouſand, and how many baſkets ye took up?

11 How is it that ye do not underſtand that I ſpake it not to you concerning bread, that ye ſhould beware of the leaven of the Phariſees, and of the Sadducees?

12 Then underſtood they how that he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Phariſees, and of the Sadducees.

13 When Jeſus came into the coaſts of Ceſarea Philippi, he aſked his diſciples, ſaying, Whom do men ſay that I, the Son of man, am?

Ver. 1. Ch. xii. 38. Mark viii. 11. Luke xii. 54.—V. 4. Ch. xii. 39.—V. 5. Mark viii. 14.—V. 6. Luke xii. 1.—V. 9. Ch. xiv. 17. John vi. 9.—V. 10. Ch. xv. 34.—V. 13. Mark viii. 27. Luke ix. 18.

thus ſtrengthen the ſoul, thus charm the tongue. It is no marvel if that chiding end in favour; be it unto thee even as thou wilt: Never did ſuch grace go away uncrowned: The beneficence had been ſtrait, if thou hadſt not carried away more than thou ſuedſt for; Lo, thou that cameſt a dog, goeſt away a child. Thou that wouldeſt but creep under the children's feet, art ſet at their elbow, art fed with full diſhes. The way to ſpeed well at God's hand, is to be humbled in His eyes, and in our own. It is quite otherwiſe with God than with men: With men, we are ſo accounted of, as we account of ourſelves; he ſhall be ſure to be vile in the ſight of others, who is vile in his own; with God nothing is got by vain oſtentation, nothing is loſt by abaſement. He that humbleth himſelf, ſhall be exalted! See Bp. Hall's contemplations, vol. i. p. 190.

Chap. XVI. Ver. 1. The Phariſees alſo] Dr. Waterland reads, And the Phariſees with, &c. While Jeſus was in Dalmanutha, or Magdala, the Phariſees, having heard of the ſecond miraculous dinner, and fearing that the whole common people would acknowledge him for the Meſſiah, reſolved to confute his pretenſions fully and publickly: For this reaſon they came forth with the Sadducees, who, though the oppoſers and rivals of the Phariſees in all other matters, joined them in their deſign of oppreſſing Jeſus, and together with them demanded of him the ſign from heaven. It ſeems the Jews, underſtanding the prophecy Dan. vii. 13. literally, expected that the Meſſiah would make his firſt public appearance in the clouds of heaven, and take unto himſelf glory and a temporal kingdom. See the note on ch. xii. 38, 39. Agreeably to this, Joſephus, deſcribing the ſtate of affairs in Judea under Felix, tells us, "That the deceivers and impoſtors pretending to inſpiration, endeavoured to bring about changes, and ſo making the people mad, led them into the wilderneſs, as if it had been to ſhew them ſigns of liberty:" Wherefore, when the Phariſees deſired Jeſus to ſhew them the ſign from heaven, they certainly meant, that he ſhould demonſtrate himſelf to be the Meſſiah, by coming in a viſible and miraculous manner from heaven with great pomp, and by wreſting the kingdom out of the hands of the Romans. Theſe hypocrites craftily feigned an inclination to believe, if he would but give them ſufficient evidence of his miſſion: However, their true deſign was, that by his failure in the proof which they required, He ſhould expoſe himſelf to general blame. It was upon the ſame principles that they continued their demands in the Apoſtles time; (ſee 1 Cor. i. 22.) though ſo many ſigns from heaven had then been given, in the voice from thence, in the preternatural darkneſs at our Lord's crucifixion, in the deſcent of angels in repeated inſtances, and in that of the Holy Spirit in a viſible form, as well as in moſt ſenſible effects." See Joſephus's Jewiſh War, b. ii. c. 12. and Lardner's Credibil. l. i. c. 5.

Ver. 2, 3. He—ſaid unto them, &c.] Our Saviour's reply may be thus paraphraſed. "It is moſt apparent you aſk this out of a deſire to cavil, rather than to learn the divine will: For, in other caſes you take up with degrees of evidence, far ſhort of thoſe which you here reject. As for inſtance, you readily ſay in an evening, It will be fair weather to-morrow; becauſe the ſky is this evening of a bright and fiery red: And in the morning,—It will be tempeſtuous weather today, for the ſky is red and lowring. O ye hypocrites, you know how to diſtinguiſh the face of the heavens, and to form from thence probable conjectures concerning the weather, and can you not diſtinguiſh the ſigns of the preſent times; and ſee, by the various miracles which are daily performed amongſt you, by the prophetic, and various other tokens which attend mine appearance, that this is indeed the period which you profeſs to deſire with ſo much eagerneſs, and which you might diſcern with much leſs ſagacity." Dr. Lightfoot has obſerved, that the Jews uſed to value themſelves highly on their ſkill in prognoſticating the weather; and Grotius, in his note on this place, has ſhewn what a variety of ſigns marked out that time for the arrival of the Meſſiah. The Syriac verſion, inſtead of the times, reads very well, the time, Καιρον. See Doddridge, Lightfoot, and Grotius.

Ver. 5. And when his diſciples were come, &c.] This would be rendered more properly, Now the diſciples, going to the other ſide, had forgotten to take bread; for it is more agreeable to the nature of the thing to ſuppoſe, that this converſation happened as they ſailed, than when they were come to the other ſide, where they might eaſily have been ſupplied with bread. The verſion of 1729 renders it, Now at their departure to go to the other ſide, &c. And with it Dr. Heylin and the Pruſſian editors agree. It ſeems Jeſus and the diſciples had tarried ſo long in Dalmanutha, that they had conſumed the ſeven baſkets of fragments, which they had taken up after the late miraculous dinner. Our Saviour took occaſion from hence to give his diſciples a ſolemn charge to beware of the doctrines of the Phariſees and Sadducees, which he called leaven, becauſe of its pernicious influence to ſour men's tempers with pride and other evil paſſions. For, as thoſe hypocrites chiefly enjoined the obſervation of frivolous traditions, their doctrine was a great enemy to the principles of true piety, and puffed men up with an high conceit of their own ſanctity. The ſlowneſs of the diſciples underſtanding ſhewed itſelf on this occaſion, as it had done on many others. As they had forgotten to take bread with them, and had often heard the doctors prohibit the uſe of the leaven of heathens and Samaritans, they thought he forbad them to buy bread from bakers of either ſect, leſt it might be made with impure leaven, and ſo they looked on the advice as an indirect reproof of their careleſſneſs. Our Saviour, after properly reproving them, ſoon gave them to underſtand his meaning. See ver. 12. Macknight, and Calmet.

Ver. 13. When Jeſus came into the coaſts, &c.] When Jeſus came into the territories of, or was going towards Cæſarea Philippi, he aſked his diſciples, ſaying, Who do men ſay I am? The Son of man? Heylin, and MS. Cæſarea Philippi, while it was poſſeſſed by the Canaanites, was called Leſhem, Joſh. xix. 47. and Laiſh, Judg. xviii. 27. But when when the children of Dan took it, they named it after their progenitor. In later times it was called Paneas, from the mountain beneath which it ſtood. The ſituation of Paneas pleaſed Philip the Tetrarch ſo exceedingly, that he reſolved to make it the ſeat of his court; for which purpoſe he enlarged and adorned it with many ſumptuous buildings, and called it Cæſarea in honour of the Roman emperor: the Tetrarch's name, however, was commonly added to diſtinguiſh it from the other Cæſarea, ſo often mentioned in the Acts, which was a fine port in the Mediterranean ſea, and had been rebuilt by Herod the Great, and named in honour of Auguſtus Cæſar. See the note on Acts viii. 40. Joſephus gives Philip ſo good a character, that ſome have thought our Lord retired into his territories for ſecurity from the inſults of his enemies elſewhere. See L'Enfant's Introduction, p. 27.

Ver. 14. And they ſaid, ſome, &c.] Perhaps they who held Chriſt to be Elias, did not think him the Meſſiah, but only his forerunner. This being the received opinion of the whole nation, that Elias was to come before the Meſſiah, and anoint him when he came. They who thought he was John the Baptiſt riſen from the dead, ſpeak ſuitably to the opinion of the Phariſees, "who, ſaith Joſephus, held that there was for good men an eaſy return to life." That he was Jeremiah, or one of the prophets, was the conſequence of an opinion which prevailed, that the Meſſiah was to come not from the living, but from the dead: As they thought none of that age of piety ſufficient to bear him, and that the reſurrection was to begin with his kingdom, they might eaſily be induced to think, that he would be one who ſhould riſe from the dead; and as God had ſaid of Jeremiah, that he was ſet to root up, pull down, and deſtroy kingdoms, &c. ch. i. 5—10. and as it was their opinion that the great buſineſs of the king Meſſiah was to pull down all the nations which ruled over them, and make them tributaries and ſervants to the Jews, they might on this account pitch on him, as the fitteſt perſon to be the Meſſiah. See Whitby, Craddock's Harmony, and 2 Macc. ii. 5. Mr. L'Enfant thinks, that they mentioned Jeremiah rather than any other prophet, becauſe the ancient Jews uſed to place Jeremiah at the head of the prophets. It ſeems to follow, both from the queſtion in the preceding and in the following verſe, that Jeſus had not as yet directly aſſumed the title of the Meſſiah, at leaſt in their hearing.

Ver. 17, 18. Bleſſed art thou, Simon Bar-jona! &c.] Bar-jona is the Son of Jona. Some authors ſuppoſe, that John and Jona are one and the ſame name. Fleſh and blood is an Hebraiſm, ſignifying his own reaſon, or any natural power whatſoever. This knowledge had not been communicated to him, either by the ſentence of the Sanhedrim, declaring Jeſus to be the Meſſiah, or by the authority of any human teſtimony whatſoever, but merely by the teaching of God. See on John vi. 45. "Bleſſed and happy art thou, O Peter; for this confeſſion which thou haſt made is not a bare human conjecture, formed by report, or by the unaſſiſted ſagacity of thy own mind, but my Father in heaven hath diſcovered it to thee, and wrought in thy ſoul this cordial aſſent, in the midſt of thoſe prejudices againſt it, which preſent circumſtances might ſuggeſt." Our Saviour goes on, and promiſes (alluding to his ſurname of Peter, which comes from Πετρα, a rock) that he ſhould have a principal concern in eſtabliſhing his kingdom. "Thou art, as thy name ſignifies, a ſubſtantial Rock; and as thou haſt ſhewn it in this good confeſſion, I aſſure thee, that upon this rock I will build my church: faith in me, as the Son of God, ſhall be its great ſupport, and I will uſe thee as a glorious inſtrument in raiſing it." This is evidently one of thoſe Scriptures, the ſenſe of which might be moſt certainly fixed by the particular tone of voice and geſture with which it was ſpoken: If our Lord altered his accent, and laid his hand on his breaſt, it would ſhew, that he ſpoke not of the perſon, but of the confeſſion of Peter,—as moſt Proteſtant divines have underſtood it; and meant to point out himſelf as the great foundation. Compare 1 Cor. iii. 10, 11. And it is obſervable, to confirm this ſenſe, that our Lord, when he ſays upon this rock, does not make uſe of the word Πὲτρος, referring to Peter himſelf, but πέτρα, which is an appellative noun, and immediately refers to Peter's confeſſion; but if our Saviour turned to the other apoſtles, and pointed to Peter, that would ſhew he meant to intimate the honour he would do him, in making him an eminent ſupport to his church. This is the ſenſe in which many of the commentators have underſtood it. However, to be a foundation in this ſenſe was not his honour alone; his brethren ſhared with him in it. (See Epheſ. ii. 20. Rev. xxi. 14.) as they did alſo in the power of binding and looſing. (See Matth. xviii. 18. John xx. 23.) Upon the whole, how weak the arguments are which the Papiſts draw from hence to ſupport the ſupremacy of Peter in their wild ſenſe of it, is ſufficiently ſhewn by Bp. Burnett on the Articles, p. 198. Calvin. Inſtit. l. iv. c. 6. Dr. Barrow on the Creed, ſerm. 28. Dr. Patrick, in his ſermon on the text, and many others needleſs to be named. There ſeems a reference in the expreſſion before us to the common cuſtom of building citadels upon a rock. The gates of hell, or of death, is a periphraſis for hell or death itſelf. So the phraſe is uſed Iſai. xxxviii. 10. where Hezekiah, ſpeaking of himſelf, ſays, I ſhall go, ἐν πύλαις ᾅδου, to the gates of Hades, i. e. "I ſhall die." Our Lord's meaning therefore is, that the Chriſtian church ſhould never be deſtroyed; no, not by the united force of men and devils combined againſt it. See More's Theological Works, page 110. Whitby, Grotius, &c.

Ver. 19. And I will give unto thee the keys] As ſtewards of great families, eſpecially of the royal houſhold, bore a key, (probably a golden one, as Lords of the bedchamber do with us, in token of their office,) the phraſe of giving a perſon the key naturally grew into an expreſſion of raiſing him to great power. See the note on Iſai. xxii. 22. The keys of the kingdom of heaven, which on this occaſion are given to Peter, are to be underſtood metaphorically; for our Lord's meaning was, that Peter ſhould open the gates of the kingdom of heaven, or Goſpel diſpenſation, both to Jews and Gentiles; i. e. ſhould be the firſt who preached the Goſpel to them, particularly the latter; and in this ſenſe Peter ſeems to have underſtood the matter himſelf, Acts xv. 7. Or by the keys, we may underſtand power and authority, which is ſometimes the meaning of the metaphor: And according to this interpretation, the power of binding and looſing, added to the power of the keys, may be conſidered as explicatory thereof: "After my aſcenſion into heaven, I will give thee, and thy companions in the apoſtolate, authority to order all the affairs of my church; ſo that whatſoever thou ſhalt bind on earth, ſhall be bound in heaven, &c." It can be no objection againſt this interpretation, that it connects the idea of binding and looſing with that of the keys, contrary to the exact propriety of the two metaphors; for all who have ſtudied the Scriptures know, that in many paſſages the ideas and expreſſions are accommodated to the ſubject matter, rather than to the precedent metaphors. The power of binding and looſing now conferred on Peter, and afterwards on all the Apoſtles, (ſee ch. xviii. 18.) was a power of declaring the laws of the Goſpel, and the terms of ſalvation; for in the Jewiſh nation, to bind and looſe were words made uſe of by the doctors to ſignify the unlawfulneſs or lawfulneſs of things. Wherefore our Lord's meaning was, "Whatever things thou ſhalt bind up from men, or declare forbidden on earth, ſhall be forbidden by heaven; and whatſoever things thou ſhalt looſe to men, or bid to be done, ſhall be lawful and obligatory in the eſteem of heaven." Accordingly it may be obſerved, that the gender made uſe of in both paſſages agrees to this interpretation: In that under conſideration it is ὅ, not ὃν; in the other it is ὅσα, not ὅσους. There are ſome, however, who by the power of binding and looſing underſtand the power of actually retaining and remitting men's ſins directly; and in ſupport of their opinion, they produce John xx. 23. Whoſeſoever ſins ye remit, &c. But the expreſſion of remitting or forgiving ſins, is uſed by our Lord to denote the removal of their temporal puniſhment. See for a proof ch. ix. 2. and viii. 17. It may therefore be juſtly doubted, whether our Lord ever beſtowed on his Apoſtles a particular power of remitting and retaining any thing but the temporal puniſhment of men's ſins; unleſs we chooſe to call the power of declaring the terms of ſalvation, now committed to Peter, and afterwards to the Apoſtles, a power of remitting and retaining men's ſins, becauſe, according to thoſe terms, men ſhall either be acquitted or condemned. This high power of declaring the terms of ſalvation, and precepts of the Goſpel, the Apoſtles did not enjoy in its full extent till the memorable day of Pentecoſt, when they received the Holy Ghoſt in the plenitude of his gifts. After this, their deciſions on points of doctrine and duty being all given by inſpiration, were infallible definitions, and ratified in heaven. Here then was an immenſe honour conferred on the Apoſtles, and what muſt yield great conſolation to all believers. There is nothing doubtful in the Goſpel, much leſs falſe; but we may ſafely reſt the ſalvation of our ſouls on the diſcoveries there made to us, ſince they are all originally derived from God. See Doddridge, Macknight, Lightfoot, Bp. Hoadly, and the other writers on this controverted paſſage of Scripture.

20 Then charged he his diſciples that they ſhould tell no man that he was Jeſus the Chriſt.

21 From that time forth began Jeſus to ſhew unto his diſciples, how that he muſt go unto Jeruſalem, and ſuffer many things of the elders, and chief prieſts, and ſcribes, and be killed, and be raiſed again the third day.

22 Then Peter took him, and began to rebuke him, ſaying, Be it far from thee, Lord: this ſhall not be unto thee.

23 But he turned, and ſaid unto Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art an offence unto me: for thou ſavoureſt not the things that be of God, but thoſe that be of men.

24 Then ſaid Jeſus unto his diſciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himſelf, and take up his croſs, and follow me.

25 For whoſoever will ſave his life, ſhall loſe it: and whoſoever will loſe his life for my ſake, ſhall find it.

26 For what is a man profited, if he ſhall gain the whole world, and loſe his own ſoul? or what ſhall a man give in exchange for his ſoul?

Ver. 20. Then charged he his diſciples, &c.] Jeſus forbad his diſciples to tell any man that he was the Meſſiah, becauſe, according to the divine decree, he was to be rejected by the great Men as a falſe Chriſt, and to ſuffer the puniſhment of death. Circumſtances, which could not fail to give his followers great offence, as they did not yet underſtand the nature of his kingdom; for which reaſon he thought it better to leave every one to form a judgement of his character from his doctrine and miracles, than in all places to aſſume the title of Meſſiah publickly, under ſuch diſadvantages. Or, his meaning may have been, "Becauſe it is determined that the Meſſiah ſhall ſuffer death, it is not proper to aſſume that title publickly, leſt the people declaring in my behalf, endeavour to prevent the execution of the divine decree." The Romans certainly, ſays Mr. Locke, would not have ſuffered him, if he had gone about preaching that he was the King whom the Jews expected: Such an accuſation would have been forwardly brought againſt him by the Jews, if they could have heard it out of his own mouth, and if that had been his publick doctrine to his followers, which was openly preached by his Apoſtles after his death, and of which they were accuſed, Acts xvii. 5, 9. Though the magiſtrates of the world had no great regard to the talk of a king who had ſuffered death, and appeared no longer any where; yet, if our Saviour had openly declared this of himſelf in his life-time, with a train of diſciples and followers, every where owning and crying him up for their king, the Roman governors of Judea could not have forborne to take notice of it, and to make uſe of their force againſt it. In this the Jews were not miſtaken, and therefore they made uſe of it, as the ſtrongeſt accuſation, and likelieſt to prevail with Pilate againſt him, for the taking away his life, it being treaſon, and an unpardonable offence, which could not eſcape death from a Roman deputy, without the forfeiture of his own life. See Luke xxiii. 2. and the note on Matth. xii. 16. Dr. Waterland, following many of the MSS. leaves out the word Jeſus.

Ver. 21. From that time forth began Jeſus, &c.] Though all the circumſtances mentioned in this verſe were marks of the Meſſiah, yet, ſays Mr. Locke, how little they were underſtood by the Apoſtles, or ſuited to their expectation of the Meſſiah, appears from the manner in which they were received by Peter, ver. 22. Peter had twice before acknowledged Jeſus to be the Meſſiah, and yet here he cannot bear the thought that he ſhould ſuffer, and be put to death, and be raiſed again: Whereby we may perceive how little Jeſus had explained to the Apoſtles what perſonally concerned himſelf. They had been a good while witneſſes of his life and miracles, and thereby being grown into a belief that he was the Meſſiah, were in ſome degree prepared to receive the particulars which were to fill up the character, and anſwer the prophecies concerning him. This, from henceforth, he began to open to them, though in a way out of which the Jews could not form an accuſation; the time of the accompliſhment of all, in his ſufferings, death, and reſurrection, now drawing on, (for this was in the laſt year of his life,) he being to meet the Jews at Jeruſalem but once more at the paſſover, and then they were to have their will upon him; wherefore he might now begin to be a little more open concerning himſelf, though yet ſo as to keep himſelf out of the reach of any accuſation, which might appear juſt or weighty to the Roman deputy.

Ver. 22. Then Peter, &c.] Then Peter—began to expoſtulate with him, &c. Wat. Dr. Doddridge renders προσλαβόμενος, by taking him by the hand; Dr. Fuller ſuppoſes that Ἵλεώς σοι, ſhould be rendered, may God have compaſſion upon thee: Heinſius, Grotius, and Le Clerc give the ſame interpretation; and the accurate Dr. Scott, who is followed by Dr. Heylin, renders it, Mercy on thee! which is moſt literal. The phraſe, as uſed by the LXX, generally ſignifies God forbid! or, as we render it, be it far from thee. See 1 Sam. xiv. 45. 2 Sam. xx. 20. 1 Kings xxi. 3. 1 Chron. xi. 19. comp. 1 Macc. ii. 21. and ſee Doddridge, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 23. Get thee behind me, Satan!] See Luke iv. 8. The word Satan, which is originally Hebrew, and has from thence been taken into ſeveral languages, is often uſed in the Old Teſtament, as we have had occaſion to obſerve, to ſignify an adverſary; and the expreſſion has appeared ſo harſh to ſome, as coming from the mouth of Chriſt to one of his Apoſtles, that they have rather choſen to tranſlate it, O mine adverſary. The verſion of 1729 reads the verſe, But he frowned upon Peter, and ſaid, Out of my ſight, pernicious obſtacle to my deſigns! your views are all worldly, regardleſs of what is divine." But as the Evangeliſts have made uſe of the word Σατανᾶ, which muſt be owned to have a ſound as odious in the Greek, as it has now with us; we may conclude that it was uſed by Chriſt, or his rebuke to Peter would have been otherwiſe expreſſed by ſome Greek word ſignifying an adverſary. Nor can the word appear at all too harſh, when we conſider that the tendency of Peter's ſaying, though it might be ſpoken out of a ſingular affection to his Maſter, was to obſtruct the great deſign for which he came into the world, and none but Satan could deſire to prevent, what he was ready to ſubmit to for the ſalvation of loſt ſinners. Dr. Young, in his ſermons, vol. ii. p. 137. rendering Ἵλεώς σοι, favour thyſelf, ſuppoſes that our Lord calls Peter Satan, becauſe he now fell on that advice, which Satan uſes the moſt ſucceſsfully of all his artifices, to undo men,—that of ſelf-indulgence, and ſo makes this Scripture an introduction to his diſcourſe on ſelf-denial. See Rom. viii. 5. Philip. iii. 19. and Col. iii. 2. It is remarkable that our Lord, immediately after conferring upon St. Peter the high dignity before-mentioned, openly, in the hearing of all his diſciples, calls him Satan or adverſary; and declares that he had then no reliſh for the divine appointments, but was influenced merely by human views, and expectations of worldly intereſt. If the papiſts rightly attended to this paſſage of the Sacred Hiſtory, they would ſee their fancies of the primacy of St. Peter which they build upon it, in a better light than they ſeem to do. See Macknight, Doddridge, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 24. If any man will come after me] Becauſe Peter's improper behaviour, juſt before mentioned, proceeded from his love of the world and its pleaſures, Jeſus declared publickly, that all who would be his diſciples, and ſhare with him in the glory of his kingdom, muſt deny themſelves; i. e. be in conſtant readineſs to renounce every earthly pleaſure, with life itſelf, when called to do ſo; (ſee Luke xiv. 33.) and in ordinary caſes, take up his croſs; ſee on ch. x. 38. After having undergone many afflictions, the diſciples of Chriſt may ſtill look for more; which, when laid upon them, they muſt ſuſtain with equal patience, following their maſter, in the footſteps of his afflictions. This indeed is a hard and difficult leſſon, but at the ſame time it is abſolutely neceſſary; becauſe, if in order to preſerve our temporal life, we diſpleaſe Chriſt, ver. 25. we ſhall loſe what is really and truly our life,—the eternal happineſs of our ſouls: whereas, if we will die rather than diſobey him, we ſhall obtain infinite and endleſs joys. See the next note. Dr. Clarke paraphraſes the latter part of ver. 25. "Whoever parts with his virtue and good conſcience to ſave his temporal life, ſhall loſe that which is eternal; and by eſcaping the firſt death for a time, ſhall incur the penalty of the ſecond death for ever." See ſermon iv. vol. 7. and for an expoſition of ver. 17, 18. his 17th ſermon, vol. 8.

Ver. 26. For what is a man profited, &c.] To carry home the argument more cloſely, he puts them in mind of the method according to which men eſtimate things. If God ſhould offer the riches of Solomon, the ſtrength of Sampſon, the policy of Ahitophel, the beauty of Abſalom, the eloquence of Apollos, univerſal monarchy, and all kind of pleaſures, and ſay, Take them for one hour, and then die,—who is the man that would not immediately reject the propoſed condition, and reply that life is better than them all? But will men forego every earthly thing for life?—the life of the body; and will they not part with them, nay, and with life itſelf, for their ſouls? ſince the longeſt any one can enjoy this life with its pleaſures, is, in compariſon of eternity, no longer than he enjoys the good things above mentioned, who dies in the ſame hour he receives them. The latter part of this verſe is rendered, and loſe his own life; Ψυχὴ, (the ſame word as is uſed, ver. 25.) or what ſhall a man give as a ranſom for his life? The word ἀντάλλαγμα, properly ſignifies a ranſom, and in this connection leads us to reflect, how willing a condemned malefactor would be, to give up all he had gotten by his crimes to buy his pardon, and how vain his attempt muſt in this caſe prove. Τὴν Ψυχὴν ζημιωθέσθαι, does not merely ſignify to loſe the life, which might be applied to a man who accidentally met death in the purſuit of gain,—as a merchant, who ſhould be loſt in his voyage; but it properly imports the undergoing a capital execution; which is an idea of much greater terror, as well as of much ſtricter propriety in the preſent caſe. See Job ii. 4. Luke ix. 25. Raphelius's Annot. and Archbp. Tillotſon's Sermons, vol. 3.

Ver. 27. For the Son of man ſhall come, &c.] That the argument in the preceding verſe, by which the neceſſity of ſelf-denial is ſo clearly eſtabliſhed, might have the greater weight, our Lord ſpake more particularly concerning the rewards and puniſhments of a future ſtate; aſſuring his diſciples, that they are all to be diſtributed by himſelf, the Father having appointed him univerſal judge; ſo that his enemies cannot flatter themſelves with the hope of eſcaping condign puniſhment, nor his friends be in the leaſt afraid of loſing their reward: and to encourage them the more, he told them, He would come to judge the world, not in his preſent low and contemned ſtate, but moſt magnificently arrayed, both in his own glory, and in his Father's. See Luke ix. 26. He would come, not attended by twelve weak diſciples, but ſurrounded with numberleſs hoſts of mighty angels, to reward every man, not with the honours of a temporal kingdom, great offices and large poſſeſſions, but with the joys of immortality. See the Reflections at the end of this chapter.

Ver. 28. Verily I ſay unto you] Becauſe the doctrine of Chriſt's being conſtituted univerſal judge might appear to the diſciples incredible at that time, on account of his humiliation, he told them, that ſome of them ſhould not taſte of death till they ſaw him coming in his kingdom; and by that had not only a proof of his being the judge, but an example of the judgement he was to execute: "Do not doubt that there ſhall be a day of judgement, when I ſhall come clothed with divine majeſty, and attended by millions of angels, to render unto men according as their actions in this life have been, good or bad: there are ſome here preſent who ſhall not die till they have ſeen a faint repreſentation of the glory in which I will come, and an eminent example of this my power, exerciſed on the men of the preſent generation." Accordingly, the diſciples ſaw their maſter coming in his kingdom, when they were witneſſes of his transfiguration, reſurrection, and aſcenſion, had the miraculous gifts of the Spirit conferred upon them, and lived to ſee Jeruſalem with the Jewiſh ſtate deſtroyed, and the Goſpel propagated through the greateſt part of the then known world. Raphelius, Albert, and ſome other critics would have the latter part of the verſe tranſlated, till they ſhall ſee the Son of man going into his kingdom; underſtanding it of the diſciples beholding Chriſt's aſcenſion into heaven, where he took poſſeſſion of his mediatorial kingdom, and which without doubt was a very proper proof of his coming again to judge the world; But the common tranſlation appears much more natural and juſt, as well as the ſenſe above given; eſpecially as our Lord's manner of ſpeaking intimates, that moſt of thoſe preſent ſhould be dead before the event referred to; but his aſcenſion happened a few months after this. This verſe, ſays Mr. Locke, which imports the dominion that ſome there preſent ſhould ſee him exerciſe over the nation of the Jews, was ſo covered, by being annexed to ver. 27.—where Chriſt ſpeaks of the manifeſtation and glory of his kingdom at the day of judgement—that though his plain meaning be, that the appearance and viſible exerciſe of his kingly power was ſo near, that ſome there ſhould live to ſee it; yet if the foregoing words had not caſt a ſhadow over theſe latter, but had been left plainly to be underſtood, as they plainly ſignified, that he ſhould be a king, and that it was ſo near, that ſome there ſhould ſee him in his kingdom,—this might have been laid hold on, and made the matter of a plauſible and ſeemingly juſt accuſation againſt him by the Jews before Pilate. This ſeems to be the reaſon of our Saviour's inverting here the order of the two ſolemn manifeſtations to the world of his rule and power, thereby perplexing at preſent his meaning, and ſecuring himſelf, as was neceſſary, from the malice of the Jews, which always lay ready to entrap him, and accuſe him to the Roman governor: and they would no doubt have been ready to alledge theſe words,—Some here ſhall not taſte, &c. againſt him, as criminal, had not their meaning been, by the former verſe, perplexed, and the ſenſe at that time rendered unintelligible, and not applicable by any of his auditors to a ſenſe that might have been prejudicial to him before Pontius Pilate; for how well the chief of the Jews are diſpoſed towards him, St. Luke tells us, ch. xi. 54. which may be a reaſon to ſatisfy us reſpecting the ſeemingly doubtful and obſcure way of ſpeaking uſed by our Saviour in other places: his circumſtances being ſuch, that without ſuch a prudent carriage and reſerve, he could not have gone through the world, which he came to do, nor have performed all the parts of it in a way correſpondent to the deſcriptions given of the Meſſiah, and which would be afterwards fully underſtood to belong to him when he had left the world.

REFLECTIONS ON OUR SAVIOUR's COMING TO JUDGEMENT. VER. 27.

How aweful an event does our great Redeemer here offer to the ſerious contemplation of all mankind! In the glory of his Father, accompanied with a mighty hoſt of holy angels, He ſhall deſcend from heaven with a ſhout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, making all heaven, earth, and hell to reſound. The dead of all countries and times hear the tremendous call. Hark! the living filled with joy, exult at the approach of God; or, ſeized with inexpreſſible terror, ſend up doleful cries, and are all changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye.* Behold; the dead preſs forth from their graves, following each other in cloſe proceſſion; the earth ſeems quick, and the ſea gives up its dead. Mark the beauty, the boldneſs, and the gladneſs of ſome, ſpringing up to honour; but the ghaſtly countenances, the trembling, the deſpair of others, ariſing to ſhame and everlaſting contempt. See how amazed and terrified they look! with what vehemence they wiſh the extinction of their being! Fain would they fly, but cannot: impelled by a force as ſtrong as neceſſity, they haſten to the place of judgement. As they advance, the ſight of the tribunal from afar ſtrikes new terror: they come on in the deepeſt ſilence, and gather round the throne by thouſands of thouſands. In the mean time, the angels having brought up their bands from the uttermoſt parts of the earth, fly round the numberleſs multitudes, ſinging melodiouſly with loud voices, for joy that the day of general retribution is come,—when vice ſhall be thrown down from its uſurpation, virtue exalted from its debaſement to a ſuperior ſtation, the intricacies of providence unravelled, the perfections of God vindicated, the church of God purchaſed with his blood cleared of them that do iniquity and of every thing that offendeth, and eſtabliſhed unpeccable for ever. Let God ariſe! let his enemies be ſcattered! as ſmoke is driven away, ſo drive them away: as wax melteth before the fire, ſo let the wicked periſh at the preſence of God. But let the righteous be glad! let them rejoice before God! yea, let them exceedingly rejoice! Pſ. lxviii. 1. For ſtrong is the Lord God who judgeth. Rev. xviii. 8.

And now the Son of man appears on the throne of his glory, and all nations, princes, warriors, nobles, the rich, the poor, all intirely ſtripped of their train and attendance, and every external diſtinction, ſtand naked and equal before him, ſilently waiting to be ſentenced to their unchangeable ſtate; and every individual is filled with an aweful conſciouſneſs that he in particular is the object of the obſervation of Almighty God, manifeſt in his ſight, and actually uuder his eye, ſo that there is not one ſingle perſon concealed in the immenſity of the crowd. The judge, who can be biaſſed by no bribe, ſoftened by no ſubtle inſinuations, impoſed upon by no feigned excuſes, having been himſelf privy to the moſt ſecret actions of each, needs no evidence, but diſtinguiſhes with an unerring certainty.

He ſpeaks! Come from among them, my people, that ye receive not of their plagues. They ſeparate; they feel their judge within them, and haſten to their proper places, the righteous on the one hand of the throne, and the wicked on the other; not ſo much as one of the wicked daring to join himſelf to the juſt. Here the righteous, moſt beautiful with the brightneſs of virtue, ſtand ſerene in their looks, and full of hope at the bar of God,—a glad company! Whilſt the wicked, confounded at the remembrance of their lives, and terrified with the thought of what is to come, hang down their heads, inwardly curſing the day of their birth, and wiſhing a thouſand and a thouſand times, that the rocks would fall on them, and the mountains cover them:—But in vain; for there is no eſcaping nor appealing from this tribunal.

Behold, with mercy ſhining in his countenance and mild majeſty, the king invites the righteous to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom prepared for them from the creation of the world: But with angry frowns he drives the wicked away, into puniſhment that ſhall have no end, no refreſhment, no alleviation, everlaſting puniſhment!—O the rejoicing! O the lamenting! The triumphant ſhouting of aſcending ſaints, caught up in the clouds, to be ever with the Lord! The horror, the deſpair, the hideous ſhrieking of the damned, when they ſee hell gaping, hear the devils roaring, and feel the unſpeakable torment of an awakened conſcience!

Now they bitterly cry for death;—but death flies from them. Now they envy the righteous, and gladly would be ſuch;—but all too late! Lo! the Son of God bows his head,—the ſignal for his ſervants; the heavens and the earth depart, their work being at an end. See—with what a terrible thundering noiſe the heavens paſs away,—the elements melt with fervent heat, and the earth, and all the works that be therein, are burnt up! the frame of nature diſſolves! earth, ſeas, ſkies, all vaniſh together, making way for the new heaven and the new earth.—It appears!—The happy land of Promiſe, formed by the hand of God, large, beautiful, and pleaſant, a fit habitation for his favourite people, and long expected by them as their country. Here all the righteous, great and ſmall, are aſſembled, making one vaſt bleſt ſociety, even the kingdom and city of God. Here God manifeſts himſelf in a peculiar manner to his ſervants, wipes away all tears from off their faces, and adorns them with the beauties of immortality, glorious to behold. Here they drink fulneſs of joys, from the cryſtal river proceeding out of the throne of God and of the lamb, and eat of the tree of life; and there ſhall be no more death, neither ſorrow nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more pain; but every one happy in himſelf, imparts the bleſſing to his fellows: for mutual love warms every breaſt; love like that which ſubſiſts between the CHAP. XVII.

The transfiguration of Chriſt: he healeth the lunatick, foretelleth his own paſſion, and payeth tribute.

AND after ſix days, Jeſus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart,

2 And was transfigured before them: and his face did ſhine as the ſun, and his raiment was white as the light.

3 And behold, there appeared unto them Moſes and Elias talking with him.

4 Then anſwered Peter, and ſaid unto Jeſus, Lord, it is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moſes, and one for Elias.

5 While he yet ſpake, behold, a bright cloud overſhadowed them: and behold, a voice out of the cloud, which ſaid, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed; hear ye him.

6 And when the diſciples heard it, they fell on their face, and were ſore afraid.

7 And Jeſus came and touched them, and ſaid, Ariſe, and be not afraid.

8 And when they had lifted up their eyes, they ſaw no man, ſave Jeſus only.

Father and the Son; mutual conference on the ſublimeſt ſubjects refreſhes every ſpirit with the divine repaſts of wiſdom, and joys flowing from the tendereſt friendſhip, fixed on the ſtable foundation of an immoveable virtue, gladden every heart. All the ſervants of God ſerve him in perfect holineſs, ſee his face, feel tranſports of joy, and by the reflection of his glory, ſhine as the ſun in the firmament for ever and ever. And there ſhall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither the light of the ſun; for the Lord God hath given them light, and they ſhall reign for ever and ever.

Happy day! happy place, and happy people! O bleſt hope of joining that glorious ſociety!—All the ſervants of God ſhall ſerve him, and ſee his face.—Serve God, and ſee his face!—What an immenſity of felicity is here!—Imagination faints with the fatigue of ſtretching itſelf to comprehend the vaſt, the unmeaſurable thought.

Chap. XVII. Ver. 1. And after ſix days] That is, about ſix days if we reckon excluſively, and about eight days if we reckon incluſively, after our Lord had accepted the title of Meſſiah. See the note on Luke ix. 28. who has it, about eight days after. The two accounts differ only as if one ſhould ſay, that Chriſt appeared to his diſciples after his death, another after his reſurrection: the connection with the end of the former chapter muſt be attended to here, as in many other places. Heylin. Tradition has generally conferred the honour of the transfiguration on mount Tabor, famed in ancient hiſtory for the victory which Deborah and Barak gained over Siſera, Judg. iv. 14. Reland obſerves, that this tradition took its riſe from Mark ix. 2. where it is ſaid, that Jeſus carried Peter, James, and John into an high mountain apart by themſelves. It ſeems the words κατ' ιδιαν, apart, were thought to deſcribe the poſition of the mountain; and becauſe Tabor is very high, and ſtands in the plain of Eſdraelon, at a diſtance from other hills, they thought it could be ſaid of no other mountain ſo properly, that it is an high mountain by itſelf. Hence the tradition of our Lord's being transfigured might ariſe; eſpecially as this mountain is not only high, but verdant alſo, and woody, and of a beautiful regular form; neverthele ſs the order of the figure determines the transfiguration to ſome mountain not far from Cæſarea Philippi, rather than to Tabor, which was ſituated in the ſouth of Galilee: for after the transfiguration, when Jeſus had cured an epileptic, it is ſaid, Mark ix. 30. that they departed and paſſed through Galilee, and then came to Capernaum. Now it is not very probable that the Evangeliſt would in this manner have related our Lord's journey from the mount of transfiguration to Capernaum, if that mountain had been in Galilee, the region in which Capernaum ſtood; eſpecially if, as the continuators of Chemnitz's Harmony affirm, the word παραπορευεσθαι ſignifies to paſs through quickly, ſecretly, and as it were in a journey; yet, upon the faith of the tradition mentioned above, the Chriſtians very early built a monaſtry and church on the top of Tabor, which, according to the accounts of travellers, ſpreads itſelf into an ample plain, ſurrounded with a wood. The church was dedicated to Jeſus and his two attendants Moſes and Elias, and from 2 Pet. i. 18. they call the mountain itſelf the Holy Mountain. Our Lord admitted to the ſingular honour of his transfiguration Peter his moſt zealous, James his moſt active, and John his moſt beloved diſciple. It was neceſſary that this remarkable occurrence ſhould be ſupported by ſufficient evidence: hence it was that three of the diſciples were choſen, becauſe ſo many witneſſes were required to eſtabliſh a fact by the Jews, and no more were choſen, becauſe this number was ſufficient. Beſides this reaſon for electing theſe three perſons in particular, we may add, that Peter was the moſt ſanguine and the moſt forward ſpeaker amongſt the apoſtles, that James was the firſt martyr, and that John being the ſurvivor of all the other apoſtles, gave a ſanction to this record, as it is moſt probable that he had a ſight of all the other Goſpels, and likewiſe confirmed it by his perſonal teſtimony as long as he lived. See Macknight, Reland's Palæſt. Illuſt. l. 1. and Maundrell's Journey, p. 112.

Ver. 2. And was transfigured before them] The word μεταμορφώθη implies either that there was a transformation made on the ſubſtance of his body, according to the import of the word in Ovid and other writers, (ſee Phil. iii. 21.) or that the outward appearance only of his body was altered, as ſeems moſt probable from the manner in which St. Luke hath expreſſed it. In this transfiguration the face of Jeſus became radiant and dazzling; for it ſhone like the ſun in its unclouded meridian clearneſs, and ſo was incomparably more glorious than the face of Moſes at the giving of the law: at the ſame time his garments acquired a ſnowy whiteneſs, far beyond any thing which human art could produce; a whiteneſs bright as light, and ſweetly refulgent, but in a degree inferior to the radiancy of his countenance. Thus for a little while, during the ſtate of his humiliation, the Son of God permitted the glory of his divinity to break forth as it were, and ſhine through the veil of his human nature with which it was covered. See Macknight and Calmet.

Ver 3. And behold there appeared—Moſes and Elias] See the note on Luke ix. 30, &c. reſpecting the remainder of this tranſaction.

Ver. 8. And when they had lifted up their eyes, &c.] This transfiguration of our Lord was intended for ſeveral important purpoſes. About ſix days before it happened, Jeſus had predicted his own ſufferings and death; at the ſame time, to prevent his diſciples from being dejected by the melancholy proſpect, as well as from falling into deſpair when the diſmal ſcene ſhould open, he told them, that though in appearance he was nothing but a man, and affliction was generally to be the lot of his diſciples, he would come hereafter in great glory as univerſal Judge, and render unto every man according to his deeds; ch. xvi. 27, 28. And for proof of this he declared, that ſome of themſelves ſhould not taſte of death till they ſaw him coming in his kingdom; ſaw a lively repreſentation of the glory which he ſpake of, and were witneſſes to the extent of his power as Judge, on his enemies, the unbelieving Jews, who were to be puniſhed by him with the moſt terrible deſtruction that ever befel any nation. The firſt article of his promiſe he fulfilled by the transfiguration, wherein he gave three of his apoſtles both a viſible repreſentation, and alſo a clear proof of the glory in which he will come to judgement. That this was one principal end of the transfiguration, and of the voice from heaven which attended it, we learn from St. Peter, who urges both, to demonſtrate the certainty of Chriſt's coming: (2 Epiſt. i. 16—18.) For we have not followed cunningly-deviſed fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but were eye-witneſſes of his Majeſty. For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came ſuch a voice to him from the excellent glory, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed." And this voice which came from heaven, we heard when we were with him in the holy mount.—Nevertheleſs, other purpoſes might likewiſe have been ſerved by the transfiguration: As, 1. The conference which our Lord had with Moſes and Elias, concerning the ſufferings he was to meet with in Jeruſalem, might animate him to encounter them with reſolution, and make his diſciples ſenſible how agreeable it was to the doctrine of of Moſes and the prophets, that the Meſſiah ſhould be evil-intreated and die, before he entered into his glory.—2. The appearing of theſe two great men, ſo long after they had gone into the inviſible world, was a ſenſible proof, and a clear example of the immortality of the ſoul, very neceſſary in thoſe times, when the opinion of the Sadducees was ſo prevalent.—3. To find Moſes and Elias aſſiſting Jeſus in the new diſpenſation, muſt have given great ſatisfaction to the Jews, and particularly to the Apoſtles, who thus could not doubt that the Goſpel was the completion and perfection of the law. For, had it not been ſo, Moſes, the giver of the law, and Elias, who with a flaming zeal had maintained it in times of the greateſt corruption, would not have appeared on earth to encourage Jeſus in his deſign of ſetting it aſide.—4. The three Apoſtles were allowed to be witneſſes of their Maſter's glory in the mountain, that they might not be offended by the depth of affliction into which they in particular were ſoon to ſee him plunged.—5. The transfiguration demonſtrated, that all the ſufferings befalling Jeſus were on his part perfectly voluntary, it being as eaſy to have delivered himſelf from dying, as to have adorned himſelf with celeſtial glory.—6. The glory with which our 9 And as they came down from the mountain, Jeſus charged them, ſaying, Tell the viſion to no man, until the Son of man be riſen again from the dead.

10 And his diſciples aſked him, ſaying, Why then ſay the ſcribes, that Elias muſt firſt come?

11 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, Elias truly ſhall firſt come, and reſtore all things.

12 But I ſay unto you, That Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatſoever they liſted: likewiſe ſhall alſo the Son of man ſuffer of them.

13 Then the diſciples underſtood that he ſpake unto them of John the Baptiſt.

14 And when they were come to the multitude, there came to him a certain man kneeling down to him, and ſaying, 15 Lord, have mercy on my ſon: for he is lunatick, and ſore vexed: for oft-times he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water.

16 And I brought him to thy diſciples, and thy could not cure him.

17 Then Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, O faithleſs and perverſe generation, how long ſhall I be with you? how long ſhall I ſuffer you? Bring him hither to me.

18 And Jeſus rebuked the devil; and he departed out of him: and the child was cured from that very hour.

19 Then came the diſciples to Jeſus apart, and ſaid, Why could not we caſt him out?

20 And Jeſus ſaid unto them, Becauſe of your unbelief: for verily I ſay unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of muſtard-ſeed, ye ſhall ſay unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it ſhall remove; and nothing ſhall be impoſſible unto you.

21 Howbeit, this kind goeth not out, but by prayer and faſting.

22 And while they abode in Galilee, Jeſus ſaid unto them, The Son of man ſhall be betrayed into the hands of men:

Ver. 9. Ch. xvi. 20.—V. 10. Mal. iv. 5. Ch. xi. 14. Mark ix. 11.—V. 11. Luke i. 16, 17. Acts iii. 21.—V. 12. Ch. xi. 14. Mark ix. 12.—V. 13. Ch. xi. 14.—V. 14. Mark ix. 14. Luke ix. 37.—V. 20. Lord's body was adorned in the transfiguration, exhibited a ſpecimen of the beauty and perfection of the glorified bodies of the ſaints after their reſurrection. This the Apoſtle intimates, Philip. iii. 21. Who ſhall change our vile body, that it may be faſhioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able to ſubdue all things unto himſelf. It is alſo intimated by St. Luke: For although the glory of Moſes and Elias at the transfiguration was vaſtly inferior to that of Jeſus, he ſays expreſly, that they appeared in glory; not becauſe they appeared in heaven, but becauſe they appeared with glorified bodies, like to thoſe which the ſaints ſhall have in heaven. There can be no doubt of this, with reſpect to Elias, for his body was changed and fitted for immortality when he was tranſlated; and as for Moſes, though he had not his own body, he might have one formed for the occaſion. See Macknight.

Ver. 9. And as they came down, &c.] Jeſus and his diſciples having been in the mountain all night, (See Luke ix. 37.) the transfiguration may be ſuppoſed to have happened either in the day-time, or in the night; that it happened in the night-time is probable, from the diſciples falling aſleep while Jeſus prayed; a circumſtance which could hardly happen by day to all the three, and in the open air. Next morning, as they were coming down from the mountain, Jeſus charged the Apoſtles to conceal what they had ſeen, till he ſhould ariſe from the dead. He knew that the world, and even his own diſciples, were not yet capable of comprehending the deſign of his transfiguration, nor of the appearance of Moſes and Elias; and that if this tranſaction had been publiſhed before his reſurrection, it might have appeared incredible, becauſe nothing hitherto but afflictions and perſecutions had attended him. See Macknight, and for an explication of the following verſes, the note on Mark ix. 10, &c.

Ver. 11. Elias truly, &c.] True, Elias was to come firſt, and to ſet all things right: ver. 12. But I tell you, &c. Wat.

Ver. 15. For he is lunatic] Σεληνιάζεται. The Engliſh word lunatic always implies madneſs; but the Greek word is applied to any diſeaſe which is under the influence of the moon, ſuch as the epilepſy, which was the diſtemper wherewith this man's ſon was afflicted. See alſo for this ſtory the parallel places in St. Mark and St. Luke, who relate it more circumſtantially than St. Matthew.

Ver. 18. That very hour] That very inſtant. Wat.

Ver. 20. Becauſe of your unbelief] When the diſciples were come with our Lord, they aſked him the reaſon why they could not caſt out that particular demon; to which he replies, becauſe of your unbelief.—"Knowing that you doubted whether I could enable you to caſt out this demon, I ordered it ſo, that he would not go out at your command, for a reproach of the weakneſs of your faith." We may obſerve that the diſciples had attempted to caſt him out. To encourage them, our Lord deſcribes to them the efficacy of the faith of miracles; If ye have faith as a grain of muſtard-ſeed, &c. "If you have but the leaſt degree of the faith of miracles, ye may ſay to the vaſt mountain from whence we juſt now came down, Move thyſelf, and go to ſome other place, and it ſhall obey you. Ye ſhall by that faith be able to accompliſh the moſt difficult things, in all caſes where the glory of God and the good of his church are concerned." It is certain that the faith which is here ſpoken of may ſubſiſt without ſaving faith: Judas had it, and ſo had many, who thereby caſt out devils, and yet will at laſt have their portion with them. It is only a ſupernatural perſuaſion given a man that God will work miracles by him at that hour. Now, though I have all this faith ſo as to remove mountains, yet if I have not the faith which worketh by love, I am nothing. Not only the perſons on whom the power of working miracles was beſtowed, were obliged to have faith likewiſe, in order to the exerciſe of that power; but it was a different kind of faith from that which was neceſſary in the ſubject of the miracles. For it conſiſted, firſt, in a juſt and high notion of the divine power, by which the miracle was to be effected. Secondly, as we obſerved, in a firm perſuaſion that the miracle was to be wrought at that particular time. Now this perſuaſion was to ſpring from a two-fold ſource: 1. A conſciouſneſs of the power which Chriſt had conferred on them when he ordained them his Apoſtles: 2. It was to ariſe from a ſenſible impreſſion made upon their minds by the Spirit of God, ſignifying to them that a miracle was to be performed at that time. Accordingly the Apoſtles, and ſuch of the firſt Chriſtians as were afterwards honoured with the power of miracles, never attempted to exerciſe it without feeling an impreſſion of this kind; as is plain from St. Paul's leaving Trophimus at Miletum ſick. Wherefore, as the nine had, in all probability, attempted to cure the youth ſpoken of in this ſtory, or had made the attempt with ſome degree of doubtfulneſs, it is no wonder that they were unſucceſsful. To remove mountains is a proverbial expreſſion, which ſignifies the doing of any thing ſeemingly impoſſible, as we may learn from Zech. iv. 7. When the Jews had a mind to extol any of their doctors, they were uſed to ſay of him, that he plucked up mountains by the roots. In this deſcription of the efficacy of faith, there is a beautiful contraſt between the ſmallneſs of the grain of muſtard-ſeed, to which their faith is compared, and the vaſt ſize of the mountain that was to be removed thereby. Dr. Heylin finely remarks, "All inanimate nature is paſſive to Deity, and therefore infallibly executes what it is deſigned for. When faith is conſummate in the human nature, that becomes alike ſuſceptible of the divine energy."

Ver. 21. This kind goeth not out, &c.] Prayer and faſting could have no relation to the ejection of demons, but ſo far only as they had a tendency to increaſe the faith of Miracles in him, who had that power formerly conferred upon him. For example, prayer, by impreſſing a man's mind with a more intimate ſenſe that all things whatſoever depend upon the infinite and incomprehenſible power of God, raiſes his idea of that power to a greater ſublimity than can be done in the way of ordinary ſpeculation. And as for faſting, by weakening the animal life, it ſubdues ſuch paſſions as are nouriſhed by continual repletion of body. Hence faſting has a tendency to free the mind from the dominion of paſſion, which never fails to occaſion a great inward perturbation, and at times is found to make even the beſt men inattentive, at leaſt to the more ſilent impreſſions of God's Spirit. Faſting therefore produces an inward quietneſs and calm, very favourable to the growth of faith. Dr. Sykes would read the laſt clauſe By conſtant faſting, εν ϖροσευχῆ νηςεια, a criticiſm founded on mere conjecture, contrary to all the copies known in the world, and advanced ſingly to favour an hypotheſis. See his "Enquiry into the meaning of the demoniacs," and 1 Cor. vii. 5.

Ver. 22. And while they abode in Galilee] It ſhould ſeem that the wonder of the diſciples was accompanied with proportionably high 23 And they ſhall kill him, and the third day he ſhall be raiſed again: and they were exceeding ſorry.

24 And when they were come to Capernaum, they that received tribute-money, came to Peter, and ſaid, Doth not your maſter pay tribute?

25 He ſaith, Yes. And when he was come into the houſe, Jeſus prevented him, ſaying, What thinkeſt thou, Simon? of whom do the kings of the earth take cuſtom or tribute? of their own children, or of ſtrangers?

26 Peter ſaith unto him, Of ſtrangers. Jeſus ſaith unto him, Then are the children free.

27 Notwithſtanding, leſt we ſhould offend them, go thou to the ſea, and caſt an hook, and take up the fiſh that firſt cometh up; and when thou haſt opened his mouth, thou ſhalt find a piece of money: that take, and give unto them, for me and thee.

Ver. 24. Mark ix. 33. Called in the original, didrachma, being in value fifteen pence: See Exod. xxx. 13. xxxviii. 26.—V. 27. Or, a ſtater. It is half an ounce of ſilver, in value 2*s*. 6*d*. after 5*s*. the ounce.

expectations of happineſs in that temporal kingdom, which they were now convinced Jeſus could eaſily erect. Our Lord knowing this, thought fit, when they came to Galilee, the country where he had the greateſt train of followers, to moderate his diſciples ambition, not only by concealing himſelf for a while, forbearing to preach and work miracles as he returned through Galilee, but alſo by predicting a third time his own ſufferings and death. Upon this they were exceeding ſorry, taking no comfort from the mention he made of his reſurrection: the prediction concerning his death raiſed ſuch fears in their minds, that they durſt not aſk him to explain it; eſpecially as they remembered that he had often inculcated it, and reprimanded Peter for being unwilling to hear it.

Ver. 24. And when they were come to Capernaum] Joſephus has expreſly aſſerted, that each of the Jews uſed yearly to pay a didrachma, or half-ſhekel, the piece of money here mentioned, and in value about fifteen pence of our currency, to the ſervice of the temple, (ſee Antiq. l. xviii. c. 9.) a cuſtom which probably took its riſe from the demand of that ſum from each of the Iſraelites whenever they were numbered, Exod. xxx. 13. Thus Caſaubon, Hammond, and many other great critics underſtand it. It was gathered every year through all their cities; and, as it ſhould ſeem from the manner of the collector's making the demand, was a voluntary thing, which cuſtom rather than law had eſtabliſhed. See Neh. x. 32. Beza is of opinion, that it was the poll-tax levied by the Romans, after Judea was reduced into the form of a province, (ſee ch. xxii. 17.) and which Agrippa Major, in the reign of Claudius, remitted to the Jews. If this was the tribute which the collectors demanded of Peter, the import of their queſtion was this: "Is your maſter of the ſect of Judas of Galilee, whoſe opinion is, that taxes ſhould be paid to no foreign power?" They demanded the tribute for Jeſus from Peter, either becauſe the houſe in which Jeſus lived was his, or becauſe they obſerved him to be of a more forward diſpoſition than the reſt, or becauſe none of them were with him at that time but Peter. See Macknight.

Ver. 25—27. He ſaith, Yes] Peter told the collectors, that his maſter would pay tribute, and conſequently, made a ſort of promiſe to procure it for them; yet when he conſidered the matter more maturely, he was afraid to ſpeak to the Meſſiah concerning his paying taxes upon any pretences whatſoever. In the mean time, Jeſus knowing both what had happened, and what was turning in Peter's thoughts, ſaved him the pain of introducing the diſcourſe: Jeſus prevented him, ſaying, what thinkeſt thou, Simon, &c.? Hereby inſinuating, that becauſe he was himſelf the Son of the Great King, to whom heaven, earth, and ſea, and all things in them belong, he was not obliged to pay tribute, as not holding any thing by a derived right from any king whatever. Or if, as is more probable, the contribution was made for the ſervice and reparation of the temple, his meaning was, that being the Son of Him to whom the tribute was paid, he could juſtly have excuſed himſelf. Nevertheleſs, that he might not give offence, He ſent Peter to the lake, with a line and a hook, telling him, that in the mouth of the firſt fiſh that came up he ſhould find a ſtater, a Grecian piece of money ſo called, equal in value to two didrachma, or one ſhekel of Jewiſh money, the ſum required for himſelf and for Peter. There can be no reaſon to ſuppoſe, with ſome commentators, that the piece of money was created on this occaſion; but if the fiſh had accidentally ſwallowed, perhaps as it was falling into the water near ſome other prey, one cannot forbear remarking how illuſtrious a degree of knowledge and power our Lord diſcovers in the event before us. Jeſus choſe to provide the tribute-money by miracle, whether becauſe the diſciple who carried the bag was abſent, or becauſe he had not ſo much money as was neceſſary. Farther, he choſe to provide it by this particular miracle rather than any other, becauſe it was of ſuch a kind as to demonſtrate that he was the Son of the Great Monarch worſhipped in the temple, and who rules the univerſe. Wherefore, in this very manner of paying the tax, he ſhewed Peter that he was free from all taxes; and at the ſame time gave his followers this uſeful leſſon, that in matters which affect their property in a ſmaller degree, it is better to recede ſomewhat from their juſt rights, than by ſtubbornly inſiſting on them, to offend their brethren, or diſturb the ſtate. Inſtead of ſtrangers, ver. 25, 26. Dr. Waterland and the MS read others. We poſtpone the Reflections on the transfiguration, and the cure of the lunatic, to the other Evangeliſts, and ſubjoin here

REFLECTIONS ON OUR LORD's PAYMENT OF THE TRIBUTE-MONEY.

All the other hiſtories ſet forth the power of Chriſt, this ſhews both his power and his obedience; his power over the creature, his obedience to the civil authority. Capernaum was one of his own cities; to his hoſt therefore the collectors repair for the tribute. Doth not your maſter, ſay they, pay tribute? All Capernaum knew that Chriſt was a great prophet; his doctrine had raviſhed them, his miracles had aſtoniſhed them; yet when it comes to a money matter, his ſhare is as deep as the reſt. Queſtions of profit admit no difference; and whatever reverence may be challenged by the ſacred tribe, who cares how little they receive, how much they pay? Yet no man knows with what mind this demand was made, whether in a churliſh grudging at Chriſt's immunity, or in an aweful addreſs to the ſervant, rather than the maſter.

Peter had a ready anſwer at hand; I do not hear him require them to ſtay till he ſhould go in, and learn his maſter's reſolution, but, as one well acquainted with the mind and practice of his Lord, he anſwers, Yes; Peter well knowing that He not only gave but preached tribute. When the Herodians had laid ſnares for him, ſuppoſing that ſo great a prophet would be for inſiſting on the liberty and exemption of God's choſen people, he repels their artifices in their own way, and tells them that the ſtamp argued the right,—Give unto Cæſar the things that are Cæſar's. O Saviour! if thou by whom kings reign didſt not with-hold the payment of tribute, what power under thee can deny it to thoſe who rule for thee?

The demand was made without doors; but no ſooner is Peter come in, than he is prevented by his maſter's queſtion, What thinkeſt thou, Simon? Of whom, &c. The very interrogation was a ſufficient anſwer to his intended inquiry. He who could thus know the heart, was certainly, by true right, liable to no human exaction. But O Saviour! may I preſume to aſk, What this is to thee? Thou haſt ſaid, my kingdom is not of this world; how then doth it concern thee what is done by the kings of the earth, or impoſed upon the ſons of earthly kings? Thou wouldeſt be the ſon of an humble virgin, and chooſedſt not a royal but a ſervile ſtate; but it is thy divine royalty and Sonſhip which thou here juſtly urgeſt. Hence the argument is irrefragable: "If the kings of the earth do ſo privilege their children, that they are free from all tributes and impoſitions, how much more ſhall not the King of heaven give this immunity to his only Son? So that in true reaſon I might claim an exemption for me and my train."

Our Saviour was free, and yet would not urge that freedom. He was free by natural right, yet he would not be ſo by voluntary diſpenſation, leſt an offence might be taken. Surely, had there followed an offence, it had been taken only, and not given; Woe be to that man by whom the offence cometh! It cometh by him who gives it; it cometh by him takes it when it is not given; no part therefore of this cenſure could have cleaved unto our Lord either way: yet ſuch was his goodneſs, that he would not ſuffer an offence even to be unjuſtly taken at that which he might juſtly have denied. We may learn from hence, that meekneſs of wiſdom, which will teach us to ſeek the intereſt of others rather than our own, and to conſider how we may edify mankind by the abundance of our good works, rather than how we may excuſe ourſelves in the omiſſion of any.

To avoid the unjuſt offence even of publicans, Jeſus will work a miracle. What would not one of a loving ſpirit do for peace? Any thing ſurely, which is not expreſly forbidden in th the word of God. Peter is ſent to the lake, and that not with a net, but with a hook: He know a net might incloſe many fiſhes, an hook could take but one. The diſciple was now in his own trade; with that hook he muſt go and angle for the tribute-money! a fiſh ſhall bring him a ſtater in his mouth, and that fiſh which bites firſt. What an unuſual bearer is here! What an unlikely element to yield a piece of ready coin! I adore thine infinite knowledge and power, O Saviour! which could make uſe of the unlikelieſt means, and ſerve thyſelf of the very fiſhes of the ſea, in a buſineſs of earthly and civil employment. Thy knowledge, in penetrating into the bowels of this animal, though in the ſea; thy power, in directing the very fiſh to Peter's hook, though thou thyſelf waſt at a diſtance! how muſt this have encouraged both Peter and his brethren in a firm dependance on the Divine Providence!

It was not out of need that our Saviour did this: What veins of CHAP. XVIII.

Chriſt warneth his diſciples to be humble and harmleſs, to avoid offences, and not to deſpiſe the little ones: teacheth how we are to deal with our brethren, when they offend us, and how often to forgive them; which he ſetteth forth by a parable of the king, who took account of his ſervants, and puniſhed him who ſhewed no mercy to his fellow.

AT the ſame time came the diſciples unto Jeſus, ſaying, Who is the greateſt in the kingdom of heaven?

2 And Jeſus called a little child unto him, and ſet him in the midſt of them,

3 And ſaid, Verily I ſay unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye ſhall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.

4 Whoſoever therefore ſhall humble himſelf as this little child, the ſame is greateſt in the kingdom of heaven.

5 And whoſo ſhall receive one ſuch little child in my name, receiveth me.

6 But whoſo ſhall offend one of theſe little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-ſtone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the ſea.

7 Woe unto the world becauſe of offences! for it muſt needs be that offences come; but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh!

8 Wherefore, if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off, and caſt them from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands or two feet, to be caſt into everlaſting fire.

9 And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and caſt it from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes, to be caſt into hell-fire.

10 Take heed that ye deſpiſe not one of gold and mines of ſilver lay open to his command! but out of a deſire to inſtruct Peter, that whilſt He would be tributary to Cæſar, the very fiſhes of the ſea were tributaries to him. How ſhould this encourage our dependance on that omnipotent hand of the Saviour, which hath heaven, earth, and ſea at his diſpoſal! ſtill he is the ſame for us his members, as he was for himſelf the head: Rather than offences ſhall be given to the world, by a ſeeming neglect of his dear children, he will cauſe the very fowls of heaven to bring them meat, and the fiſhes of the ſea to bring them money. O let us then ever look up to Him by the eye of our faith, and not be wanting in our dependance upon Him, who cannot be wanting in his providential care of us. See Bp. Hall.

Chap. XVIII. Ver. 1. At the ſame time came the diſciples] This chapter is connected with the two preceding; for after Chriſt had delivered the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter, and had taken him up into the mountain with James and John, leaving the reſt of his apoſtles, theſe three ſeem to have exalted themſelves above their collegues, and to have been envied by them. In conſequence of their ambition, they began to inquire which of them ſhould hold the higheſt dignities under the Meſſiah? who ſhould be his general, his privy-counſellor, and his ſteward? (ch. xx. 21.) he who firſt embraced his doctrine? or he who is the neareſt in blood to him? or he to whom he has been the moſt frequent gueſt? or he who is the eldeſt? And as St. Matthew treats more largely of this contention of the Apoſtles than the other Evangeliſts, he ſeems to inſinuate, that he was aimed at, by the inquiry of his collegues, and deſpiſed for the infamy of his former life; but that he was happily and fully vindicated and comforted by our Lord's anſwer. Wetſtein.

Ver. 2. Jeſus called a little child] See Luke ix. 46. Mark ix. 33. To check the fooliſh emulation of his diſciples, Jeſus called a little child to him, and having ſet him in the midſt, that they might conſider him attentively, he ſhewed them by the ſweetneſs, docility, and modeſty viſible in its countenance, what the temper and diſpoſitions of his diſciples ought to be, and how dear to him perſons of ſuch diſpoſitions are, though otherwiſe weak and infirm. Some are of opinion, that the child here mentioned was the celebrated St. Ignatius, who ſuffered martyrdom under the reign and by the command of Trajan. The method of inſtruction here uſed was agreeable to the manner of the eaſtern doctors and prophets, who, in teaching, impreſſed the minds of their diſciples by ſymbolical actions, as well as by words. Thus John xx. 22. Jeſus, by breathing on his Apoſtles, ſignified, that through the inviſible energy of his power he conferred on them the gifts of his Spirit. Thus, alſo, John xxi. 19. he bade Peter follow him, to ſhew that he was to be his follower in afflictions. And in Rev. xviii. 21. an angel caſts a great ſtone into the ſea, to ſignify the utter deſtruction of Babylon. For more examples, ſee John xiii. 4, 5, 14. Acts xxi. 11. and Macknight.

Ver. 3, 4. And ſaid, Verily, &c.] "So far ſhall ye be from becoming the greateſt in my kingdom, that ye ſhall not ſo much as enter into it, unleſs ye be, like little children, free from pride, covetouſneſs, and ambition, and reſemble them in humility, ſincerity, docility, and in diſengagement of affection from the things of the preſent life, which fire the ambition of grown men." Whoſoever therefore (ver. 4.) reſts ſatisfied with the province which God has aſſigned him, whatever it may be, and meekly receives all the divine inſtructions, though contrary to his own inclinations, and prefers others in honour to himſelf, ſuch a perſon is really the greateſt in my kingdom. The firſt ſtep towards entering into the kingdom of grace, is to become as little children, lovely in heart, knowing ourſelves utterly ignorant and helpleſs, and depending wholly on our Father who is in heaven for a ſupply of all our wants. Except we be turned from darkneſs to light, and be renewed in the image of God here, we can never enter into the kingdom of glory.

Ver. 5, 6. And whoſo ſhall receive, &c.] "All who in the ſenſe above explained are little children, are unſpeakably dear to me, therefore help them all you can, as if it were myſelf in perſon, and ſee that ye offend them not; i. e. that ye neither turn them out of the right way, nor hinder them in it." Dr. Clarke thinks, that little ones mean plain and ſincere Chriſtians, before compared, for their ſimplicity and ſincerity, to little children; and that to offend them ſignifies to caſt a ſtumbling-block before them, to cauſe them to ſin, to diſcourage them in their duty, or tempt them to offend. So that whoever, by a ſcandalous life, ſhould lead others to think ill of the Chriſtian profeſſion in general, or ſhould by perſecution diſcourage the weak, or by ſophiſtry, bad example, or otherwiſe pervert them from the way of truth and goodneſs, would fall under the weight of the terrible ſentence here denounced. Caſaubon, Elſner, and others, have ſhewn at large, that drowning in the ſea was a puniſhment frequently uſed amongſt the Syrians, Greeks, and Romans; and that the perſons condemned had ſometimes heavy ſtones tied about their necks, or were rolled up in ſheets of lead, καταποντιζεσθαι, to ſink them with the weight. It ſeem to have grown into a proverb for dreadful and inevitable ruin. See on ch. xiv. 28. and Mintert on the word καταποντιζω. Μύλος ὀνικος properly ſignifies a mill-ſtone too large to be turned, as ſome were, by the hand; and requiring the force of aſſes to move it, as it ſeems thoſe animals were generally uſed by the Jews on this occaſion. See Raphelius, Kiping. Antiq. Rom. l. ii. c. 7. and Lightfoot.

Ver. 7. For it muſt needs be that offences come] See Luke xvii. 1. where our Lord expreſſes this more fully; It is impoſſible but that offences will come; impoſſible, through the weakneſs, folly, and wickedneſs of mankind. But woe unto the man by whom, i. e. by whoſe fault theſe offences, or ſcandals, come!

Ver. 8. Wherefore, if thy hand or foot offend thee] Make thee to offend. Wat. and MS. and ſo ver. 9. Our Lord here renews the exhortation which he formerly gave, ch. v. 30. rather to ſubmit to the ſevereſt mortifications, than to indulge our ſinful inclinations, to the ſcandal of others, and to our own ruin. We may obſerve that St. Matthew, who hath ſo largely recorded the ſermon on the mount, gives us again this paſſage of it on the preſent occaſion; which is one proof among others, that he did not think it improper or unneceſſary ſometimes to repeat what he had then ſaid; and conſidering the importance of theſe maxims, and how little many of his hearers were diſpoſed to receive and retain them, it was a valuable inſtance of his compaſſion and wiſdom. See Doddridge.

Ver, 10, 11. Take heed that ye deſpiſe not, &c.] Becauſe pride, or an high opinion of oneſelf, with a contempt of others, is often the parent of offences, our Lord ſolemnly cautioned his diſciples againſt that evil, and ſhewed them the reaſonableneſs of it by this delightful argument, theſe little ones; for I ſay unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven.

11 For the Son of man is come to ſave that which was loſt.

12 How think ye? if a man have an hundred ſheep, and one of them be gone aſtray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountains, and ſeeketh that which is gone aſtray?

13 And if ſo be that he find it, verily I ſay unto you, he rejoiceth more of that ſheep, than of the ninety and nine which went not aſtray.

14 Even ſo, it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of theſe little ones ſhould periſh.

15 Moreover, if thy brother ſhall treſpaſs againſt thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he ſhall hear thee, thou haſt gained thy brother.

16 But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witneſſes every word may be eſtabliſhed.

17 And if he ſhall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican.

18 Verily I ſay unto you, Whatſoever ye ſhall bind on earth, ſhall be bound in heaven: and whatſoever ye ſhall looſe on earth, ſhall be looſed in heaven.

19 Again I ſay unto you, That if two of you ſhall agree on earth, as touching any thing that they ſhall aſk, it ſhall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven.

20 For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midſt of them.

argument,—that the meaneſt Chriſtian is an object of the care of Providence. That heed that ye deſpiſe not one of theſe little ones; one who is converted, and become as a little child; one of my real diſciples, of whom I have been ſpeaking to you; for I ſay unto you, that in heaven, &c. which Dr. Clarke interprets, "they are the care of angels, and under the protection of God." Our Lord, ſays Macknight, does not ſeem to mean, that every particular ſaint has a guardian angel aſſigned him; but as all the angels are ſent forth, miniſtring ſpirits to the heirs of ſalvation, they may in general be called their angels. The expreſſion, behold the face of my Father, alludes to the cuſtom of earthly courts, where the great men, thoſe who are higheſt in office and favour, are moſt frequently in the prince's palace and preſence. Wherefore, when we are told that the angels of the leaſt of Chriſt's diſciples behold the face of God, the meaning is, that the chief angels are employed in taking care of ſuch; and our Lord's reaſoning is both ſtrong and beautiful, when on this account he cautions us againſt deſpiſing them. To conclude, by telling them that the Son of man was come to ſeek and ſave that which was loſt; and by delivering the parable of the loſt ſheep, which its owner found after much painful ſearching, he hath eminently diſplayed the immenſe care which the Father Almighty takes of men, and hath given us a juſt notion of the value which he puts on the leaſt of his reaſonable creatures. He gives his higheſt angels charge concerning them, he has ſent his only begotten Son to ſave them, and condeſcends to ſhare in the joy which the heavenly beings are filled with upon their recovery. The particle γαρ, rendered for in ver. 11. introduces another reaſon to inforce the caution not to deſpiſe theſe little ones; and therefore would be rendered more properly, moreover, or further. "Not only the angels miniſter to their ſalvation, but I, the Lord of men and angels, am come down from heaven for their ſakes." See Macknight, Grotius, and Suicer's Theſaurus, vol. i. p. 43.

Ver. 12. Doth he not leave the ninety and nine] This might be rendered, Would he not leave the ninety and nine on the mountains (in their paſture, or fold) and go out to ſeek, &c.? See this parable in Luke xv.

Ver. 14. Even ſo, &c.] That is, "God greatly delights in the converſion and ſalvation of men, and is at as much pains to reclaim them, as a ſhepherd is to bring back a ſheep which hath ſtrayed from the fold." We may obſerve the gradation in theſe verſes: firſt, the angels do not deſpiſe theſe little ones;—neither the Son,—nor the Father.

Ver. 15—17. Moreover, if thy brother ſhall treſpaſs, &c.] Our Lord having thus ſpoken to the perſons offending, now addreſſes his diſcourſe to the perſons offended; ſhewing them in what manner they ought to behave towards an offending brother; and whoſoever ſhall cloſely obſerve this three-fold rule, will ſeldom offend others, and never be offended himſelf. "If any, more eſpecially one who is a member of the ſame religious community, do any thing amiſs, of which thou art an eye or ear-witneſs, firſt go and tell him alone: if it may be, in perſon; if that cannot ſo well be done, by thy meſſenger, or in writing: If this ſucceed, thou haſt gained thy brother; haſt recovered him to God, who rejoices at the repentance of a ſinner; and to thyſelf, with whom he was at enmity; and ſo haſt ſaved him from periſhing." See Prov. xxviii. 23. Obſerve, our Lord gives no liberty to omit this, or to exchange it for either of the following ſteps: "If this gentle method does not ſucceed, ſecondly, Take with thee one or two more men, whom he eſteems and loves, who may then confirm and enforce what thou ſayeſt, and afterwards, if need require, bear witneſs of what was ſpoken. (See Deut. xix. 15.) If even this doth not ſucceed, then, and not before, tell it to the church, or to that particular congregation of the faithful to which he belongs; whoſe ſentence being declared, will ſhew him, that in the judgement of all good men, thou haſt done thy duty, and he is to blame. If all this avails not, you will do well to enter into a proteſt againſt him, by forbearing any intimate friendſhip with ſuch a perſon; and let him therefore, in this caſe, be to thee as an heathen and a publican, or other moſt notorious ſinner, to whom you would perform only the common offices of humanity, but would avoid his intimate ſociety, as ſcandalous; and to whom you are not under thoſe peculiar obligations, whereby Chriſtian brethren are bound to each other." Can any thing be plainer than this?—Chriſt here as expreſly commands all Chriſtians who ſee a brother do evil, to follow this method, not another, and to take theſe ſteps in this order,—as he does, to honour our father and mother.—But if ſo, in what land do the Chriſtians live? See Doddridge, and Bengelius.

Ver. 18. Whatſoever ye ſhall bind on earth, &c.] Our Saviour here confers on his diſciples in general the power of binding and looſing, which he had formerly conferred on Peter ſingly; but the preſent grant, from the connection in which it ſtands, appears manifeſtly to refer to ſomething further than the former, which had reſpect to nothing but doctrine. Whatever Peter declared lawful and unlawful ſhould be held ſo by heaven; whereas here it relates not only to doctrine, but to diſcipline. If by their admonitions, whether public or private, the Apoſtles brought their brethren to repentance, they looſed the guilt of their ſins, the fetters by which the divine juſtice detains men its priſoners; or, as it is expreſſed above, they gain their brethren. On the other hand, if the offending brother continued impenitent, after the methods preſcribed were all tried, they bound his guilt the faſter upon him; becauſe, according to the laws of heaven,—the terms of ſalvation which they were to preach by inſpiration, none but penitents ſhall obtain pardon. Wetſtein gives the following explanation of this verſe: "If any one ſhall deſpiſe your ſentence paſſed upon him, according to your appointed rules, he will do it to his own extreme hazard; for, refuſing to return into favour with you, he will be eſteemed guilty before God. On the contrary, if he ſhall reconcile himſelf to you, he ſhall alſo obtain from God pardon for the ſin committed againſt you." See Macknight, Grotius, and ch. xvi. 19.

Ver. 19, 20. Again, I ſay unto you] Further to encourage good men to be very earneſt in their endeavours to bring ſinners to repentance, he aſſured them, that if they prayed to God for it, he would hear them, provided it was agreeable to the wiſe ends of his providence. That this refers to a miraculous anſwer of prayer may appear from comparing ch. xxi. 21, 22. Mark xi. 23, 24. John xiv. 13, 14. 1 John iii. 22, &c. Perhaps here is an alluſion to a notion of the Jews, that it was neceſſary, at leaſt, that ten ſhould concur in ſocial prayer, if any extraordinary ſucceſs was expected. I am in the midſt of them, ver. 20. means, "by my eſpecial favour and preſence; for, obſerving that in thoſe religious aſſemblies they act as the duty which they owe to me directs, I will intercede with my Father for them, and procure them from him a gracious anſwer to their prayers." The Hebrew doctors have a ſaying, that "where two perſons ſit together converſing about the law, there the Shechinah is amongſt them." Dr. Clarke paraphraſes the 20th verſe thus: "In whatever place the true doctrine of Chriſt is profeſſed and practiſed, whether by many or few, there is the true church of Chriſt." See ſermon 18. vol. 10. Wetſtein, and Tillotſon's works, vol. iii. p. 307.

21 Then came Peter to him, and ſaid, Lord, how oft ſhall my brother ſin againſt me, and I forgive him? till ſeven times?

22 Jeſus ſaith unto him, I ſay not unto thee, Until ſeven times: but, Until ſeventy times ſeven.

23 Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his ſervants.

24 And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him which owed him ten thouſand talents.

25 But foraſmuch as he had not to pay, his lord commanded him to be ſold, and his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made.

26 The ſervant therefore fell down, and worſhipped him, ſaying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

27 Then the lord of that ſervant was moved with compaſſion, and looſed him, and forgave him the debt.

28 But the ſame ſervant went out, and found one of his fellow-ſervants, which owed him an hundred pence: and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, ſaying, Pay me that thou oweſt.

29 And his fellow-ſervant fell down at his feet, and beſought him, ſaying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

30 And he would not: but went and caſt him into priſon, till he ſhould pay the debt.

31 So when his fellow-ſervants ſaw what was done, they were very ſorry, and came and told unto their lord all that was done.

32 Then his lord, after that he had called him, ſaid unto him, O thou wicked ſervant! I forgave thee all that debt, becauſe thou deſiredſt me:

33 Shouldeſt not thou alſo have had compaſſion on thy fellow-ſervant, even as I had pity on thee?

34 And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he ſhould pay all that was due unto him.

Or, beſought him.—V. 28. The Roman penny is the eighth part of an ounce, which, after five ſhillings the ounce, is ſeven pence halfpenny.

Ver. 21, 22. Then—came Peter—and ſaid, Lord, how oft, &c.] How oft may, &c. and muſt I forgive him? MS. When our Saviour had given his advice for the accommodation of differences among his diſciples, Peter, imagining it might be abuſed by ill-diſpoſed perſons, as an encouragement to offer injuries to others, aſks his Lord, How often his brother might offend, and ſtill claim forgiveneſs? See Luke xvii. 4. where it is ſeven times in a day, which implies very often. Here it is ſeven times only, a mode of expreſſion which ſome imagine to have been borrowed from a Jewiſh tradition, by which the neceſſity of pardoning in lighter matters, is limited to ſeven times and no more. In oppoſition to this tradition, our Lord may be underſtood as extending the terms of forgiveneſs, and ordering that pardon ſhould be repeated as often as the injury;—till ſeventy times ſeven, —as often as there is occaſion; a certain number for an uncertain. See Grotius, and Wetſtein.

Ver. 23. Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened, &c.] "For this reaſon, or, with reſpect to this matter, I may properly ſay that the kingdom of heaven, in its conſtitution and final proceſs, may be likened to, or illuſtrated by the inſtance of a certain king, who ruled over a large country, and who, as he had a great number of officers under him, was determined at length to ſettle accounts with his ſervants." Thus our Lord illuſtrates the excellent morality in the preceding verſe, by a lively parable; in which is ſhewn the neceſſity of forgiving the greateſt injuries in every caſe, where the offending party is ſenſible of his fault, and promiſes amendment; a neceſſity of the ſtrongeſt kind, ariſing from this law of the divine government, that it is the condition upon which God forgives our offences againſt him. See ch. vi. 12.

Ver. 24. One was brought unto him, &c.] When the king began to inſpect the accounts of his ſervants, one was brought unto him,—probably his ſteward or treaſurer,—who had ſo abuſed the eminent ſtation in which he had been placed, and the high confidence which his prince had repoſed in him, that he owed him a moſt immenſe ſum, and ſtood accountable for ten thouſand talents; i. e. upwards of 1,870,000*l.* ſterling. The Pruſſian editors ſay, that the ten thouſand talents are here put for an immenſe ſum. Our Lord ſeems to mention ſo large a ſum with a deſign to intimate the number and weight of our offences againſt God, and our utter incapacity of making him any ſatisfaction. See Prideaux's Connection, vol. i. preface, p. xx. and vol. ii. p. 138.

Ver. 25. But foraſmuch as he had not to pay] As it plainly appeared by this ſervant's having run through ſuch vaſt ſums, that he had been both negligent and extravagant, his lord, according to frequent cuſtom in ſuch caſes, ordered him, &c. to be ſold. See Exod. xxii. 3. Lev. xxv. 39. 2 Kings iv. 1. Neh. v. 5. Iſai. l. 1. Not that the value of him, his family and effects, was any way equal to the debt, but as a puniſhment for his wickedneſs; for on any other ſuppoſition, it is hard to conceive how his lord, whoſe humanity and goodneſs was ſo great, came to take ſo rigorous a meaſure, eſpecially as the advantage accruing to himſelf therefrom muſt have been but a trifle, in compariſon of his loſs. See Macknight, and Olearius.

Ver. 27. Then the Lord—was moved with compaſſion] See ch. xv. 32. It is plain that the Lord forgave the ſervant his debt conditionally, as is ſtrongly implied by the revocation of the pardon afterwards, ver. 34.

Ver. 28. Which owed him an hundred pence] The Roman penny or denarius here ſpoken of, being in value about ſeven pence halfpenny of our money, the whole ſum which was due to him did not much exceed three pounds ſterling; therefore the ſervant's demanding this trifle in ſo rough a manner from his fellow-ſervant, immediately on his coming out from the palace, where ſo much lenity had been ſhewed to him in a matter of far greater importance, manifeſted the very baſeſt diſpoſition in the man. The word ἔπνιγε, which we render took him by the throat, imports the doing ſo in the moſt furious manner, ſo as almoſt to ſtrangle him; and yet more ſtrongly expreſſes the man's cruelty.

Ver. 31. His fellow-ſervants—told unto their Lord, &c.] Διεσάφησαν, "They gave their Lord an exact and faithful account," which is the full meaning of the word. See Albert. and the Reflections at the end.

Ver. 32. O thou wicked ſervant!] Slave. Doddridge; who obſerves that the word Δοῦλε is not always a term of reproach, nor does it neceſſarily imply more than ſervant; yet in this connection the word ſlave ſeems beſt to expreſs the indignation with which his lord is ſuppoſed to ſpeak. The verb παρεκάλεσας rendered deſiredſt, implies ſomething more ſtrong; becauſe thou didſt earneſtly requeſt and intreat me.

Ver. 34. Delivered him to the tormentors] Βασανιςαῖς, the executioners of juſtice. Heylin. The word doth not only ſignify executioners, or perſons who put criminals to the torture, but alſo gaolers, who had the charge of priſoners and examined them. Impriſonment is a much ſeverer puniſhment in the eaſtern parts of the world than here: ſtate priſoners eſpecially, when condemned to it, are not only forced to ſubmit to a very mean and ſcanty allowance, but are frequently loaded with clogs, or yokes of heavy wood, in which they cannot either lie or ſit at eaſe; and by frequent ſcourgings, and ſometimes by racking, are quickly brought to an untimely end: There is probably a reference to this in the preſent paſſage. It may perhaps ſeem at firſt a very improper method purſued by the lord of obtaining payment in theſe circumſtances; yet when it is conſidered that the man's behaviour to his fellow-ſervant ſhewed him to be a wretch not only of the moſt barbarous diſpoſition, but extremely covetous; his lord had reaſon to ſuſpect that he had ſecreted his money and goods, eſpecially as nothing appeared in his poſſeſſion; wherefore he wiſely ordered him to be tortured on the rack, till he ſhould diſcover with whom they were lodged, and make complete payment.—Beſides, it may be conſidered in the light of a puniſhment incomparably heavier than that which was to have been inflicted on him purely for his inſolence: for though the debt was immenſe, yet whilſt it appeared to have been contracted not by fraud, but by extravagance and bad management, he was only to be ſold with his family, for a certain term of years, that payment might be made as far as their price would go; but now that he added to his former miſbehaviour, covetouſneſs, and unmercifulneſs in the exaction of a trifling debt from a fellow-ſervant, to whom he ought to have been more indulgent for the ſake of their common lord, who had been ſo kind to him; there was all 35 So likewiſe ſhall my heavenly Father do alſo unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their treſpaſſes.

CHAP. XIX.

Chriſt healeth the ſick; anſwereth the Phariſees concerning divorcement: ſheweth when marriage is neceſſary: receiveth little children: inſtructeth the young man how to attain eternal life, and how to be perfect: telleth his diſciples how hard it is for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God: and promiſeth reward to thoſe that forſake any thing to follow him.

Ver. 35. Ch. vi. 14. Mark xi. 26. James ii. 13.

the reaſon in the world to ſuſpect, that in his lord's affairs he was more fraudulent than negligent; for which cauſe he was delivered to the tormentors, to be puniſhed in the manner his crimes deſerved: than which a ſtronger repreſentation of God's diſpleaſure againſt men of unmerciful, unforgiving, and revengeful diſpoſitions cannot be ſet forth, or even conceived, by the utmoſt force of human imagination. May it not be proper to put it here to the conſciences of ſome, and to aſk, whether rigour in exacting temporal debts, in treating without mercy ſuch as are unable to ſatisfy them, and confining them in a miſerable priſon, where they are totally incapacitated from any probability of ſatisfying them;—whether this can be allowed to a Chriſtian, who is bound to imitate his God and Father?—to a debtor, who can expect forgiveneſs only on the condition of forgiving others?—to a ſervant, who ſhould obey his maſter?—and to a criminal, who is in daily expectation of his judge and final ſentence? See Macknight, Heſychius, and Samedo's China. p. 225.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XVIII.

How great and common a misfortune is it for men to think of nothing but their own greatneſs, and how to raiſe themſelves above others! If the Apoſtles, who had forſaken all, and who had ſo long enjoyed the daily inſtructions and edifying example of Chriſt, were not void of this paſſion, who ought not to be afraid?

Either Chriſt is not truth itſelf, or without a true converſion and humility (ver. 3.) there is not the leaſt hope of any place in heaven. What is it to be an evangelical child, but to be pure in mind and body? to wiſh ill to none, to be ready to do good to all, and to have no projects for advancement, riches, honours, fortunes, &c.? This Chriſtian childhood will make us great in the kingdom of heaven. But alas! how low do we debaſe ourſelves, in order to be great on earth! To be great in heaven, how little do we do it! The humility which pleaſes God, is that of choice, or of acceptance, not a natural meanneſs of heart and ſpirit; and the firſt place is promiſed to this virtue, which ſeems the moſt eaſy, and to the exerciſe of which external things are leaſt needful; on which account we are certainly the leſs to be excuſed, if we are found deficient in it.

It is melancholy to think, that many who have by their office been employed to read and explain this leſſon to others, and who have not been children in underſtanding, ſeem to have learned ſo little of it themſelves, as if it had never been at all intended for that order of men to whom however it was immediately addreſſed! If there be any ſuch yet remaining in the Chriſtian miniſtry, let them ſeriouſly weigh the woe denounced on that man by whom the offence cometh. ver. 7. We can never too earneſtly pray that the mercies of God may be extended to all profeſſing Chriſtians, who wholly give themſelves up to worldly purſuits and projects; but eſpecially to thoſe who make the church of Chriſt only a kind of porch to the temple of Mammon. May the divine grace deliver us from ſuch fatal ſnares, and form us to that ſelf-denial and mortification, without which we cannot be the true diſciples of Chriſt. But, after having pierced ourſelves through with many unneceſſary ſorrows here, ſhall plunge ourſelves deep into eternal perdition.

How happy are the meaneſt ſervants of Chriſt, in the care and favour of their bleſſed Maſter, and in the angelic guard (ver. 10.) which by his high command are continually attending even the lambs of his flock! So condeſcending are the bleſſed ſpirits above, that even the greateſt of them do not diſdain to miniſter unto the heirs of ſalvation; how then ſhall the wiſeſt and greateſt of men dare to deſpiſe thoſe, whom angels honour with their guardianſhip and care; eſpecially, ſince God hath loved them ſo exceedingly, as to give even his own Son for them! ver. 11. Who can either doubt or wonder as to God's ſending his angels for the ſervice of ſouls, after he has ſent his own Son to ſerve them even with his blood! They do what they can to deſtroy the workmanſhip of Chriſt, who, by means of ſcandal and offence, cauſe thoſe to relapſe into ſin, whom he by his labours and ſufferings has reſcued and cleanſed from it.

It is a rule to be obſerved by paſtors, to apply themſelves moſt to thoſe ſouls whoſe wants are greateſt. The good ſhepherd left the ninety and nine, to ſeek the ſheep that was loſt. In order to comprehend our good ſhepherd's joy on the recovery and converſion of a ſinner, it is neceſſary to comprehend his love towards ſouls. But who is able to do this? If we would have ſome idea of it which comes near the truth, let us judge of it by his deſcent from heaven to be incarnate, by the labours of his life, and by the pain and ignominy of his death.

What could have been happier for the church of Chriſt than the obſervation of that plain and eaſy rule which he hath given for ending diſputes among his followers? ver. 15, 16. and yet, who that ſees the conduct of the generality of Chriſtians, would imagine they had ever heard of ſuch a rule?—Inſtead of this private expoſtulation, which might often bring a debate to a ſpeedy and amicable conclusion, what public charges! what paſſionate complaints! what frequent and laboured attempts to take, if the leaſt ſcandalous, yet not the leaſt pernicious kind of revenge, by wounding the characters of thoſe whom we imagine to have injured us! Alas! what is there of the ſpirit of Chriſtianity in all this? If from the private carriage of man to man, we carry our reflections to proceedings of a more public nature, in what Chriſtian nation are church cenſures conformed to this rule? Is this the form in which eccleſiaſtical judgements appear, in the Popiſh or even in the Proteſtant world? Are theſe the methods uſed even by thoſe who boaſt the moſt loudly of the authority of Chriſt to confirm their ſentence? Let us earneſtly pray, that this diſhonour to the Chriſtian name may be wiped away, and that true religion and even common humanity may not with ſuch ſolemn mockery be deſtroyed, in the name of the Lord.

God is found in union and agreement: nothing is more efficacious than prayer, (ver. 19.) when we are united to Jeſus Chriſt, and offer up our prayers through his mediation. It is He himſelf who prays, His merits which aſk, His love which intreats, His heart which groans, His blood which intercedes; and it is the Son who obtains all from his Father. This ſhews the advantages of prayer made in common of Chriſtian ſocieties, where God is ſerved as it were with one heart, and one ſoul; but above all, of the great ſociety of the church, where we are united in the body, and by the Spirit of Jeſus Chriſt.

Where love is, there is Chriſt; where diviſion is, there is the evil ſpirit. A Chriſtian family, which, like that of Tobias in chooſing the ſtate of marriage, ſeeks God alone, which brings up Children only for him, and which does all the good which lies within its ſphere, may be aſſured, by virtue of this promiſe, that Chriſt is preſent in the midſt of them in a very particular manner. None but an omnipreſent, and conſequently a divine perſon could ſay, where-ever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midſt of them: His power and his goodneſs can never be impaired: Be it therefore our encouragement to ſocial prayer, and let the remembrance of our Redeemer's continual preſence and inſpection engage us to behave ourſelves agreeably to the relation which we claim to him, and to thoſe expectations from him which we profeſs. How unreaſonable and how odious does a ſevere and uncharitable temper appear, when we view it in the light of this juſt and convincing parable! ver. 23, &c. which may be conſidered as our Lord's explication of the fifth petition of his own prayer. There are three things in it oppoſed to each other; the lord to his ſervant,—an immenſe ſum to a trifle,—and the moſt extraordinary clemency to the greateſt cruelty. The application of the parable therefore is eaſy, and ſufficient to overturn all the arguments whereby evil minds would juſtify revenge; particularly thoſe taken from the nature and number of the offences committed, or from the dignity of the perſon againſt whom they are committed, or from the benefits conferred on the perſons who commit them. For, in the firſt place, what are men compared with God? In the ſecond place, how immenſe a debt doth each of us owe to him? A debt, which from infancy we begin to contract, and are daily increaſing in our ripening years. And in the third place, how trifling are the offences which our brethren commit againſt us, perhaps through inadvertency, or in conſequence of ſome provocation received from us! Moſt unworthy therefore of the divine mercy are weak mortals, whonot, withſtanding they are themſelves weighed down with an infinite load of guilt, are implacable towards their fellow-creatures, and will not forgive them the ſmalleſt offence, although they have a due ſenſe of them, and expreſs their ſorrow for them.

Perſons of this monſtrous diſpoſition ſhould ſeriouſly conſider the concluſion and application of the parable before us: So likewiſe ſhall my heavenly Father do alſo unto you, if you from your hearts, i. e. really, inwardly, and not in word or tongue only, forgive not every one, however great, or rich, or powerful you may be, his brother their treſpaſſes. A moſt aweful denunciation! which ought, and ſurely muſt ſtrike terror into men of fierce and implaeable minds: for, whatever they may think, it will in its utmoſt extent be executed upon all, who will not be perſuaded by the conſideration of the divine mercy fully to forgive, not their fellow-ſervants merely, but their own brethren, and God's children, ſuch petty treſpaſſes as they may happen to commit againſt them, but of which they afterwards are ſenſible, make reparation, and promiſe amendment. O let us think ſeriouſly on that aweful moment, wherein we ſhall fall down at the feet of our judge, there to receive the ſentence of our eternal fate,—inſolvent debtors as we are, but through the infinite merits of the adorable Jeſus; and then we ſhall have but little inclination to inſult thoſe whom we ſee proſtrate before us; we ſhall diſcharge our hearts of every ſentiment of rancour and revenge, nor ever allow a word, or even a wiſh that favours of it: And to this end give us, Lord of love, that Chriſtian heart, whoſe bottom is all charity and mercy, whoſe works are all mildneſs and indulgence!

AND it came to paſs, that when Jeſus had finiſhed theſe ſayings, he departed from Galilee, and came into the coaſts of Judea, beyond Jordan;

2 And great multitudes followed him; and he healed them there.

3 The Phariſees alſo came unto him, tempting him, and ſaying unto him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cauſe?

4 And he anſwered and ſaid unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female?

5 And ſaid, For this cauſe ſhall a man leave father and mother, and ſhall cleave to his wife: and they twain ſhall be one fleſh.

6 Wherefore they are no more twain, but one fleſh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put aſunder.

7 They ſay unto him, Why did Moſes then command to give a writing of divorcement, and to put her away?

8 He ſaith unto them, Moſes, becauſe of the hardneſs of your hearts, ſuffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not ſo.

9 And I ſay unto you, Whoſoever ſhall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and ſhall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoſo marrieth her which is put away, doth commit adultery.

Chap. XIX. Ver. 1, 2. The coaſts of Judea, beyond Jordan] Properly ſpeaking, no part of Judea was on the further ſide of Jordan; for though after the Jews returned from the captivity, the whole of their land was called Judea, eſpecially by foreigners who happened to mention their affairs, it is certain, that in the Goſpels Judea is always ſpoken of as a particular diviſion of the country: We may therefore reaſonably ſuppoſe that St. Matthew's expreſſion is elliptical, and may ſupply it from St. Mark x. 1. thus: And came into the coaſts of Judea, διὰ τοῦ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου,—through the country beyond Jordan. See John x. 40. In this journey our Lord paſſed through the country beyond Jordan, that the Jews living there might enjoy the benefit of his doctrine and miracles; and great multiudes followed him, namely, from Galilee into Perea. Our Saviour's fame was become exceeding great, inſomuch that every where he was reſorted to and followed;—by the ſick, who wiſhed to be healed; by their friends, who attended them; by thoſe whoſe curioſity prompted them to ſee and examine things ſo wonderful; by well-diſpoſed perſons, who found themſelves greatly profited and pleaſed with his ſermons; by enemies, who watched all his words and actions, with a deſign to expoſe him as a deceiver; and laſtly, by thoſe who expected that he would ſet up the kingdom immediately. Beſides, at this time the multitude might have been greater than ordinary, becauſe, as the paſſover was at hand, many going thither might have choſen to travel in our Lord's train, expecting to ſee new miracles. See Macknight and Lamy. The verſion of 1729 renders the latter part of the 21ſt verſe, And came into the confines of Judea, on the other ſide Jordan.

Ver. 3. The Phariſees alſo came, &c. for every cauſe] For every fault. MS. At diſcretion. Verſion of 1729. Our Lord had delivered his ſentiments on this ſubject twice; once in Galilee, ch. v. 31. and again in Perea, Luke xvi. 18. It is probable, therefore, that they knew his opinion, and ſollicited him to declare it, hoping it would incenſe the people, who reckoned the liberty which the law gave them of divorcing their wives, one of their chief privileges. Or, if, ſtanding in awe of the people, he ſhould deliver a doctrine different from what he had taught on former occaſions, they thought it would be a fit ground for accuſing him of diſſimulation. But they miſſed their aim entirely; for Jeſus, always conſiſtent with himſelf, boldly declared the third time againſt arbitrary divorces, not in the leaſt fearing the popular reſentment. See Macknight, and the note on ch. v. 31, 32. and Deut. xxiv. 1.

Ver. 4—7. And he anſwered, &c.] The accounts which St. Matthew and St. Mark have given of this matter, though they ſeem to claſh upon the firſt view, are in reality perfectly conſiſtent. The two hiſtorians, indeed, take notice of different particulars, but theſe, when joined together, mutually throw a light on each other. According to both Evangeliſts, the Phariſees came with an inſiduous intention, and aſked our Lord's opinion concerning divorce: But the anſwer returned to their queſtion is differently repreſented by the hiſtorians. Matthew ſays, that our Lord deſired the Phariſees to conſider the original inſtitution of marriage in Paradiſe, where God created the human kind of different ſexes, and implanted in their breaſts ſuch a mutual inclination towards each other, as in warmth and ſtrength ſurpaſſes all the other affections wherewith he hath endowed them; and becauſe they have ſuch a ſtrong love to each other he declared, that in all ages they ſhould neglect every other tie, and among the reſt that which binds them to their parents, and unites them together by marriage; and that male and female, thus joined together in marriage, are by the ſtrength of their mutual affection no more twain, but one fleſh; i. e. conſtitute only one perſon in reſpect of the unity of their inclinations and intereſts, and of the mutual power which they have over each other's body, (1 Cor. vi. 16. vii. 4.) and that as long as they continued faithful to this law, they muſt remain undivided till death ſeparates them. From the original inſtitution of marriage in Paradiſe, and from the great law thereof declared by God himſelf upon that occaſion, it evidently appears, that it is the ſtrongeſt and tendereſt of all friendſhips; a friendſhip ſupported by the authority of the divine ſanction and approbation; a friendſhip therefore which ought to be indiſſoluble till death: What therefore God hath joined together, let no man put aſunder, by unſeaſonable divorces. Thus, according to St. Matthew, our Lord anſwered the Phariſees' queſtion concerning divorce, by referring to the original inſtitution of marriage in Paradiſe; but St. Mark ſays, ch. x. 3. that he anſwered it by referring them to the Moſaical precept, he anſwered, What did Moſes command you? The Evangeliſts, however, may be eaſily freed from the imputation of inconſiſtency, by ſuppoſing, that the anſwer in St. Mark was given after the Phariſees had, as St. Matthew informs us, ver. 7. objected the precept in the law to the argument againſt divorce drawn from the original inſtitution. Why then did Moſes, &c.? "If divorce be contrary to the original inſtitution of marriage, as you affirm, how came it that Moſes has commanded us to give a bill of divorce, and to put her away?" The Phariſee, by calling the law concerning divorce a command, inſinuated, that Moſes had been ſo tender of their happineſs, that he would not ſuffer them to live with bad wives, though they themſelves had been willing; but peremptorily enjoined them, that ſuch ſhould be put away: To this our Lord anſwers, Mark x. 3. What did Moſes command you, &c.? and his queſtion being placed in this order, implies, that he wondered how they came to conſider Moſes' permiſſion in the light of an abſolute command, ſince it was granted merely on account of the hardneſs of their hearts. See Macknight, Doddridge, and the other harmoniſts, and the following note. Dr. Heylin, inſtead of He which made them, in the fourth verſe, ὁ ποιήσας, reads the Creator; and inſtead of ſaid, ver. 5. he reads, it was ſaid; for I take εἶπεν here, ſays he, for an imperſonal verb. It was Adam who ſaid ſo, and not God. The Pruſſian editors read, ſays the Scripture. But on this ſubject, ſee the note on Gen. ii. 24.

Ver. 8. Becauſe of the hardneſs of your hearts] He meant their paſſionate, ſtubborn, perverſe temper, which was ſuch, that had they not been permitted to divorce their wives, ſome would not have ſcrupled to murder them; others would have got rid of them by ſuborning witneſſes, to prove the crime of adultery againſt them. Others would have reckoned it great mildneſs, if they had contented themſelves with ſeparating from their wives, and living unmarried; and thus God's deſign of multiplying his people exceedingly, muſt have been fruſtrated, as the hated wives would either have been murdered, or denied the liberty of propagating by other huſbands; a privilege which was ſecured to them by divorce. Moſes therefore acted as a prudent lawgiver, in allowing other cauſes of divorce beſides whoredom, becauſe by admitting the leſs, he avoided the greater evil. At the ſame time the Jews, whoſe hardneſs of heart rendered this expedient neceſſary, were chargeable with all the evils which followed it; for which reaſon, as often as they divorced their wives, unleſs in the caſe of adultery, they ſinned againſt the original law of marriage, and were criminal in the ſight of God, notwithſtanding their law allowed ſuch divorces. Our Lord, as Grotius well obſerves, ſtrongly intimates, that a more tender diſpoſition than that which characterized the Jews under the Moſaic diſpenſation, might juſtly be expected from His diſciples.

Ver. 9. Whoever ſhall put away his wife, &c.] From our Lord's anſwer it appears, that the ſchool of Sammai taught the beſt morality on the ſubject of divorce, but that the opinion of the ſchool of Hillel was more agreeable to the law of Moſes on that point. See on ch. v. 31. The exact meaning of the word πορνεία, here rendered fornication, ſeems to be proſtitution of the body, whether for luſt or gain; and ſo it may ſignify, according to the context, either fornication, adultery, or whoredom of any kind. The preſent verſe ſeems to be parallel to Mark x. 11. having been ſpoken to the diſciples in the houſe, as is probable from the unuſual change of perſons obſervable in this part of the diſcourſe. The practice of unlimited divorces which prevailed among the Jews, gave great encouragement to family quarrels, was very deſtructive of charity, and hindered 10 His diſciples ſay unto him, If the caſe of the man be ſo with his wife, it is not good to marry.

11 But he ſaid unto them, All men cannot receive this ſaying, ſave they to whom it is given.

12 For there are ſome eunuchs, which were ſo born from their mother's womb: and there are ſome eunuchs, which were made eunuchs of men: and there be eunuchs, which have made themſelves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's ſake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it.

13 Then were there brought unto him little children, that he ſhould put his hands on them, and pray: and the diſciples rebuked them.

14 But Jeſus ſaid, Suffer little children, and forbid them not to come unto me: for of ſuch is the kingdom of heaven.

15 And he laid his hands on them, and departed thence.

16 And behold, one came and ſaid unto him, Good Maſter, what good thing ſhall I do that I may have eternal life?

17 And he ſaid unto him, Why calleſt thou me good? there is none good but one, that is God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.

Ver. 11. 1 Cor. vii. 2, 7, 9, 17.—V. 12. 1 Cor. vii. 32, 34. ix. 5, 15.—V. 13. Mark x. 13. Luke xviii. 15.—V. 14. Ch. xviii. 3. V. 16. Mark x. 17. Luke xviii. 18. Luke x. 25.

hindered the good education of their common offſpring: Beſides, it tended not a little to make their children loſe that reverence for them, which is due to parents, as it was ſcarcely poſſible for the children to avoid engaging in the quarrel. Our Lord's prohibition, therefore, of theſe divorces, is founded on the ſtrongeſt reaſon, and tends highly to the peace and welfare of ſociety. See Macknight, and Mintert on the word πορνεια.

Ver. 10. If the caſe of a man be ſo, &c.] The diſciples obſerved to their Lord, that ſince the law of marriage is ſo rigid, that unleſs the woman breaks the bond by going aſtray, her huſband cannot diſmiſs her, but muſt bear with her, whatever are her other vices, deformities, or defects,—a man had better not marry at all. To this our Lord replies, that certainly it is not in every one's power to live continently; yet if any man has the gift, whether by natural conſtitution, or by the injury of human force uſed upon him, which has rendered him incapable of the matrimonial union,—according to that infamous traffick which the luxury and effeminacy of the eaſtern world rendered ſo common; or by an ardent deſire of promoting the intereſts of religion, animating him to ſubdue his natural appetite, and enabling him to live in voluntary chaſtity, unincumbered with the cares of the world; ſuch a perſon will not ſin, though he leads a ſingle life. That the amputation of deſire only is meant by the phraſe, who have made themſelves eunuchs, may be gathered from the other clauſes of the paſſage, for there is mention made firſt of eunuchs, who were ſo born from their mother's womb; plainly importing that ſome are continent by natural conſtitution. Next we are told of eunuchs who have been made ſo by men; and laſt of all, there be, who have made themſelves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's ſake; not by doing violence to themſelves, but by a ſtrong reſolution of living continently in a ſtate of celibacy, for the ſake of promoting more effectually the intereſts of religion. See 1 Cor. vii. 7, 37. Our Lord adds, He that is able to receive it, let him receive it; which words muſt not be referred to the clauſes immediately preceding them, as if our Lord meant to ſay, "He who is able to become an eunuch, by any of the ways I have mentioned, let him become one:" for the ſecond way is without all queſtion unlawful: But they muſt refer to ver. 11. as is plain from the words themſelves, In that verſe Jeſus had ſaid, All men cannot receive this ſaying, &c. "They cannot live without marriage chaſtely, unleſs they have the gift of continency." In the 12th verſe he ſhews how that gift is obtained, mentioning three ways of it; and then adds, he that is able to receive it, let him receive it. "He who by any of the methods I have mentioned is in a capacity of living chaſtely, may continue unmarried without ſinning." We may juſt obſerve, that what is here ſaid of a ſingle life, is entirely perverted by the Roman catholicks, when they produce it to diſcredit matrimony, and exalt celibacy as the moſt perfect ſtate; for on this very occaſion marriage is declared to be an inſtitution of God; and leſt any one might have replied, that it was a remedy contrived purely for the weakneſs of our fallen ſtate, it is particularly obſerved that it was inſtituted in the time of man's innocence. Wherefore as the Apoſtle tells us, Marriage is honourable in all ranks and conditions of perſons, provided the duties thereof are inviolably maintained. Beſides, it is falſe to affirm that our Lord recommends celibacy; he only gives permiſſion for it, as a thing not unlawful; telling them, that if they were able to live continently, they would not ſin, though they did not marry; eſpecially as the times they lived in were times of perſecution. In this light alſo the judgement of the Apoſtle St. Paul is to be conſidered, 1 Cor. vii. 26. See Macknight, Wetſtein, and Chemnitz.

Ver. 13. Then were there brought unto him little children] Grotius obſerves, that it was a cuſtom with the Jews to bring their children to perſons of remarkable ſanctity, to receive their bleſſing, and to enjoy the benefit of their prayers; a cuſtom which is preſerved amongſt them to this day. The impoſition of hands was a ceremony with which the ancient prophets always accompanied their prayers in behalf of others. This action of our Saviour might be performed only in compliance with the above-mentioned cuſtom; yet there are others who imagine that theſe children were brought by certain perſons, who ſeeing the many wonders performed by Chriſt, thought perhaps that his power would be as effectual in preventing, as in removing diſtempers; and therefore propoſed to get their little ones ſecured by his prayers from all harms. Whatever was their deſign, the diſciples rebuked them; apprehending them too troubleſome, and thinking it beneath the dignity of ſo great a prophet, to concern himſelf about ſuch little creatures, who were incapable of receiving any inſtruction from him. Wetſtein thinks, that being deeply engaged in the diſcourſe concerning matrimony, and having many curious queſtions to propoſe to their maſter, they were diſpleaſed to be thus unſeaſonably interrupted.

Ver. 14. Suffer little children, &c.] Let the little children alone, and do not hinder them from coming to me. See Dr. Scott, Doddridge, &c. Chriſt's ſhewing his regard in ſuch a manner to theſe children, muſt not only have been exceedingly pleaſing to the parents, but the memory of this condeſcenſion might make tender and laſting impreſſions on the children themſelves; and the ſight muſt have been very edifying and encouraging to other young perſons, who might happen to be preſent; not to ſay how inſtructive this gentleneſs to children may be to miniſters, and how much their uſefulneſs may be promoted by a regard to it. Our Lord might reaſonably be the more diſpleaſed with his diſciples for endeavouring to prevent their being brought, as he had ſo lately ſet a child among them, and inſiſted on the neceſſity of their being made conformable to it. See ch. xviii. 2, 3. And perhaps, as the diſciples expreſſed ſome diſſatisfaction at his doctrine concerning divorce, ver. 10. Jeſus took this opportunity to inform them again, that unleſs they poſſeſſed the humility, meekneſs, and docility of children, they ſhould not enter into the kingdom of God; for of ſuch is the kingdom of heaven; i. e. as Dr. Doddridge paraphraſes it, "Perſons of ſuch a character are the true ſubjects of my kingdom, and heirs of eternal glory, to which many little children are received; and in token of it, the children of believing parents are to be admitted into my church by baptiſm." See Mark x. 15. Luke xviii. 7. "I acknowledge, ſays this candid and ſenſible writer, that theſe words will not of themſelves prove infant baptiſm to be an inſtitution of Chriſt; but if that appears from other Scriptures to be the caſe, there will be proportionable reaſon to believe, that our Lord might here intend ſome reference to it."

Ver. 15. And he laid his hands on them, &c.] Though the little ones could not profit by our Savour's inſtruction, yet being capable of his good wiſhes, St. Mark tells us, ch. x. 16. He took them up in his arms, and, with his uſual benevolence, bleſſed them. The impoſition of hands being always accompanied with prayer, as we obſerved, St. Matthew, who, in the beginning of his account, had joined theſe two together, ſays ſimply at the concluſion, that He laid his hands on them, and departed. It is probable therefore that Jeſus both recommended the young ones to God in prayer, and bleſſed them himſelf.

Ver. 16. Behold, one came, and ſaid] For the explanation of this event, ſee the notes on Mark x. 17, &c. where it is more circumſtantially related.

Ver. 17. There is none good but one, that is God] This paſſage has been produced and ſtrongly urged by the Arians in favour of their ſyſtem. They found their argument upon the Greek, which runs thus: Ουδεις εστιν αγαθος, ει μη εις, ὁ Θεος. There is none good, but εις, one; and that (one) is, ὁ Θεος, God. Whence it is urged, that the adjective εις being in the maſculine gender, cannot be interpreted to ſignify one being, or nature (for then it ſhould have been εν in the neuter) but one perſon; ſo that by confining the attribute of goodneſs to the ſingle perſon of the Father, it muſt of courſe exclude the perſons of the Son and Holy Ghoſt from the unity of the Godhead. This it muſt be owned is a plauſible objection; for, ſuppoſing the word εις to ſignify one perſon (and in that lies the whole force of the argument) then, if one perſon only is good, and that perſon is God, it muſt alſo follow, that there is but one perſon who is God; the name of God being as much confined hereby to a ſingle perſon, as the attribute of goodneſs. But this isutterly falſe; the names of God, Lord, Lord of hoſts, the Almighty, Moſt High, Eternal, God of Iſrael, &c. being 18 He ſaith unto him, Which? Jeſus ſaid, Thou ſhalt do no murder, Thou ſhalt not commit adultery, Thou ſhalt not ſteal, Thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſs, 19 Honour thy father and thy mother: and, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf.

20 The young man ſaith unto him, All theſe things have I kept from my youth up: what lack I yet?

21 Jeſus ſaid unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and ſell that thou haſt, and give to the poor, and thou ſhalt have treaſure in heaven: and come and follow me.

22 But when the young man heard that ſaying, he went away ſorrowful: for he had great poſſeſſions.

23 Then ſaid Jeſus unto his diſciples, Verily I ſay unto you, That a rich man ſhall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.

24 And again I ſay unto you, It is eaſier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

25 When his diſciples heard it, they were exceedingly amazed, ſaying, Who then can be ſaved?

26 But Jeſus beheld them, and ſaid unto them, With men this is impoſſible; but with God all things are poſſible.

27 Then anſwered Peter, and ſaid unto him, Behold, we have forſaken all, and followed thee; what ſhall we have therefore?

28 And Jeſus ſaid unto them, Verily I ſay unto you, That ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man ſhall ſit in the throne of his glory, ye alſo ſhall ſit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael.

alſo aſcribed to the ſecond and third perſons of the bleſſed Trinity. Take it in this way, therefore, and the objection by proving too much, confutes itſelf, and proves nothing. The truth is, this criticiſm, upon the ſtrength of which ſome have dared to un-deify the Saviour, has no foundation in the original. The word εις is ſo far from requiring the ſubſtantive perſon to be underſtood with it, that it is put in the maſculine gender, to agree with its ſubſtantive Θεος, and is beſt conſtrued by an adverb. If you follow the Greek by a literal tranſlation, it will be thus, There is none good,—ει μη εις ὁ Θεος,—but the one God; that is, in common Engliſh, but God only. And it happens, that the ſame Greek, word for word, occurs in Mark ii. 7. Who can forgive ſins,—ει μη εις ὁ Θεος, but God only? So it is rendered by our tranſlators; and we have a plain matter of fact, that εις in this place cannot poſſibly admit the ſenſe of one perſon, becauſe Chriſt, who is another perſon, took upon him to forgive ſins. In the parallel place of St. Luke's Goſpel (ch. v. 21.) the expreſſion is varied, ſo as to make it ſtill clearer,—ει μη μονος ὁ Θεος,—not εις, but μονος, another adjective of the maſculine gender, which, though it agree with its ſubſtantive Θεος, is rightly conſtrued with an adverb,—either the alone God, or God only: and the Greek itſelf uſes one for the other indifferently, as επ᾽ αρτῳ μονῳ, by bread only, Matth. iv. 4. εν λογῳ μονον, in word only. 1 Theſſ. i. 5. The utmoſt that can be gathered therefore from theſe words, is no more than this, that there is one God (in which we are all agreed) and that there is none good beſide him, which nobody will diſpute. Whether in this God there be one perſon or three, remains yet to be conſidered; and the Scripture is ſo expreſs in other places, as to ſettle it beyond all diſpute. If it ſhould here be aſked, for what reaſon Chriſt put the queſtion before us, Why calleſt thou me good? I anſwer, For the ſame reaſon that he aſked the Phariſees, Why David in Spirit called him LORD. ch. xxii. 43. and that was, to try if they were able to account for it. This young man, by addreſſing our Saviour under the name of good maſter, when the Pſalmiſt had affirmed long before, that there is none that doeth GOOD, no NOT ONE, (Pſ. xiv. 3) did in effect allow him to be God; no mere man ſince the fall of Adam, having any claim to that character; and when he was called upon to explain his meaning, for that God only was good, he ſhould have replied in the words of St. Thomas, My Lord, and my God! which would have been a noble inſtance of faith, and have cleared up the whole difficulty. See Jones's "Catholic Doctrine of a Trinity." p. 13.

Ver. 21. If thou wilt be perfect, &c.] That is, "If thou wilt prove thyſelf a true diſciple of mine; if thou wilt enter perfectly and unfeignedly under my banner, and enliſt in my cauſe." It may not be improper to obſerve, that the terms of ſalvation here ſettled are not different from thoſe mentioned elſewhere in Scripture: for though faith is declared by our Lord himſelf to be the condition of ſalvation, it is ſuch a faith, as either proceeds from or influences to the univerſal righteouſneſs here deſcribed;—If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. Moreover, the Chriſtian religion being from God, is eſtabliſhed upon ſuch ſolid evidences, that every virtuous perſon to whom it is offered will receive it with pleaſure; and if any man refuſe it, his infidelity can be owing to no other cauſe than this, that his deeds are evil. So our Lord himſelf ſays expreſly, John iii. 19. and therefore, in returning a general anſwer concerning the terms of ſalvation, Jeſus fitly directed this young man firſt of all to a ſincere, conſtant, and univerſal obedience; and when he replied that he had arrived at that already, and deſired to know if he lacked any thing more,—namely, to render him perfectly good, Our Lord, who knew that he was not thoroughly tinctured with the principles of virtue, required him to become his diſciple; which, as he had acknowledged his divine miſſion, he could not refuſe to do, if he was the man he pretended to be. At the ſame time he let him know, that he could not be perfect, or his diſciple, and much leſs a preacher of the Goſpel, without renouncing worldly poſſeſſions; becauſe, as matters then ſtood, the very profeſſion of his religion, and much more the preaching of it, would infallibly expoſe him to the loſs of his eſtate. Here therefore our Lord has declared, that all men to whom the Goſpel is offered, muſt believe it, and make profeſſion of it, elſe they cannot be ſaved; and that true virtue, wherever it ſubſiſts, neceſſary leads men to this belief and profeſſion: but he by no means ſays, that it is abſolutely neceſſary. for all Chriſtians to ſell their goods, and give them to the poor. An intire renunciaton of the world indeed was neceſſary in the firſt ages, when the profeſſion of Chriſtianity, but eſpecially the preaching of it, expoſed men to perſecution and death; which was the reaſon that Jeſus mentioned it to the young man as his indiſpenſible duty, eſpecially as he aimed at the higheſt degree of goodneſs: But now that the Chriſtian religion is eſtabliſhed by law in many countries, all that our maſter requires of us is, that we be in conſtant and habitual readineſs to part with the world; and that we actually do ſo with perfect acquieſcence in God's good pleaſure, when he in his Providence calls thereto. See on Luke xiv. 33. Macknight, and Law's Chriſtian Perfection, ch. 3.

Ver. 23. Shall hardly] Will hardly. MS.

Ver. 24. It is eaſier for a camel, &c.] A cable. Wat. See Boch. tom. i. p. 92. Vorſt. Adag. p. 14. There is certainly much more propriety in the metaphor, rendered agreeably to Dr. Waterland's interpretation; but, as there is nothing in the proverbial expreſſion, as it ſtands in the common verſions, but what is very agreeable to the eaſtern taſte, and may be paralleled in other Jewiſh writings, there ſeems no great reaſon to depart from it. The Jews generally made uſe of the phraſe, An elephant cannot paſs through the eye of a needle; which our Saviour changes for a camel, an animal very common in Syria, and whoſe bunch on its back is apt to hinder its paſſage through any low entrance. In our Saviour's time too the word camel was proverbially uſed to expreſs any vaſt object, that being the largeſt animal in Paleſtine. Thus we read ch. xxiii. 24. Strain out a gnat, and ſwallow a camel. We may juſt obſerve, that theſe ſtrong expreſſions muſt be underſtood in their ſtricteſt ſenſe of the ſtate of things at that time ſubſiſting; yet in ſome degree they are applicable to rich men in all ages: The reaſon is, riches have a woeful effect upon piety in two reſpects: firſt, in the acquiſition; for, not to mention the many frauds and other ſins which men commit to obtain riches,—they occaſion an endleſs variety of cares and axieties, which draw the affections away from God. Secondly, They are offenſive to piety in the poſſeſſion, becauſe if they are hoarded, they never fail to beget covetouſneſs, which is the root of all evil; and if they are enjoyed, they become ſtrong temptations to luxury and drunkenneſs, to luſt, pride, and idleneſs. See Heylin and Mintert on the word Καμηλος.

Ver. 28. Ye which have followed, &c.] Ye who have followed me, ſhall, in the regeneration, when the Son of man ſhall ſit upon, &c.—ſit even ye alſo upon, &c. Wat. with whom Dr. Doddridge, and the verſion of 1729 agree. The latter has the paſſage thus: In the new age, when the Son of man ſhall ſit in the throne of his glory, ye that have followed me ſhall likewiſe ſit upon twelve throne, &c. See Rev. xxi. 5. This appears to be a very natural ſenſe of this difficult paſſage: many commentators, however, underſtand it differently, and agreeably to our tranſlation. "Jeſus replied (ſays Macknight) to the inquiry of Peter, that he and the reſt of the Apoſtles ſhould certainly have a peculiar reward even in this life; becauſe, immediately after his reſurrection, when he aſcended the throne of his mediatorial kingdom, he would advance them to the high honour of judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael; i. e. of ruling his church and people, of which the twelve tribes were a type. You who have followed me in the regeneration, [παλιγγενεσίᾳ,] you who have left all and followed me, in order to aſſiſt me in accompliſhing the creation of the new heavens and the new earth, predicted Iſai. lxv. 17.—when the ſon of man ſhall ſit, &c. you alſo ſhall ſit, &c. In the 7th chapter of Daniel, the prophet, ſpeaking of the Meſſiah's kingdom, ſays, ver. 9. I beheld till the thrones were ſet (not caſt down, as it is in our tranſlation,) and the Ancient of Days did ſit, namely, on one of thoſe thrones; and behold, one like the Son of man came to the Ancient of Days, while he ſat on his throne, and they brought him near before him; and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom. By the kingdom which was given to the Son of man, the prophet meant his mediatorial kingdom; and by the glory, his being ſeated beſide the Ancient of Days on one of the thrones, in teſtimony of his exaltation to that kingdom. The throne of his glory therefore, which our Lord ſpeaks of in the text, is the throne of his mediatorial kingdom, called the throne of his glory, in alluſion to the repreſentation which Daniel had given of it. In this kingdom the Apoſtles likewiſe were to be ſeated on thrones, and to judge the tribes; i. e. were to be next to the Meſſiah in dignity and office; his miniſters, by whom he was to ſubdue and govern his church. In Luke xxii. 28. we find this promiſe repeated to the diſciples in words more fully to the ſame purpoſe. See the note on that place. Our Lord adds, judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael. Now, according to the common interpretation of theſe words, they relate intirely to the other line; implying, that at the general judgement the Apoſtles ſhall aſſiſt Chriſt in paſſing ſentence upon the Iſraelites; yet this explication may juſtly be diſputed, becauſe the promiſe thus underſtood would make the Apoſtles very much inferior to all other ſaints, of whom it is ſaid that they ſhall judge the world, and not the world only, but the angels alſo. 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3. Beſides, the promiſe, in the ordinary ſenſe of it, is not applicable to Judas at all, who having proved ſo bad a man, cannot be ſuppoſed capable of the dignity of Chriſt's aſſeſſor at the general judgement. Our Lord certainly well knew that Judas would fall from his office and dignity; but as Matthias filled his place, and ſo ſtood intitled to the promiſe, he did not think fit to enter into any particular diſtinction, but ſpeaks to the whole body of the Apoſtles in words which he knew would be accompliſhed to the far greater part of thoſe to whom they were addreſſed. In the Hebrew language, to judge ſignifies to rule or govern. See Judg. xii. 7. 1 Sam. viii. 5. wherefore, by the Apoſtles ſitting on the thrones, judging the tribes, may be underſtood their ruling the Chriſtian church, of which the Jewiſh was a type, by the laws of the Goſpel, which their maſter inſpired them to preach, and by the infallible deciſions relative to faith and manners which he enabled them to give in all difficult caſes. Such ſeems to have been the true nature of the dignity which Jeſus now promiſed to his Apoſtles: However, as they had always been accuſtomed to look on the Meſſiah's kingdom as a ſecular empire, they would naturally interpret their ſitting on thrones, and judging the tribes, of their being made chief magiſtrates in Judea under their maſter; and would from thence take courage again, after having been greatly diſpirited by the declaration which Jeſus had made concerning the impoſſibility of rich mens entering into his kingdom. See Macknight, Fleming's Chriſtology, vol. i. p. 28. Grotius, Wetſtein, and Bp. Bull's works, vol. i. p. 281.

Ver. 29. And every one that hath forſaken, &c.] Our Saviour ſpeaks next of the rewards which his other diſciples ſhould receive, both in this life, and in that which is to come. See Mark x. 30. where the promiſe is more fully expreſſed. Wetſtein obſerves, that the event confirmed the prediction. For one houſe, the firſt preachers of the Goſpel found an hoſpitable reception in almoſt every part of the earth;—for a few brethren and ſiſters, an innumerable multitude of true believers; for children, all thoſe whom they had converted to the Chriſtian faith; for lands, all the goods of the Chriſtians, which were in common; and in fine, for this life, life eternal. They ſhall receive an hundred fold, ἑκατονταπλασίονα: That is, ſays one, "They ſhall have abundantly more and greater bleſſings than they part with;—a full content of mind, the comforts of an upright conſcience, the joys of the Holy Ghoſt, increaſe of grace, hopes of Glory; they ſhall have God for their father, Chriſt for their ſpouſe, and all good Chriſtians for their brethren."

Ver. 30. But many that are firſt, &c.] "Many, who in the eyes of their fellow-creatures are leaſt in this life, by reaſon of their affliction, mortification, and ſelf-denial, are really firſt, not only in point of future reward, but even in reſpect of preſent ſatisfaction." Theſe words were ſpoken alſo with a view to keep the diſciples humble, after their imaginations had been warmed with the proſpect of their reward; for in all probability they interpreted the promiſe of the thrones ſo, as to make it refer to the higheſt offices in the temporal kingdom,—the offices of greateſt power, honour, and profit in Judea; and ſuppoſed that the other poſts, which were to be occupied at a diſtance from the Meſſiah's perſon, ſuch as the government of provinces, the command of armies, &c. would all be filled by their brethren the Jews, to whom of right they judged them to belong, rather than to the Gentiles. Nay, it was a prevailing opinion at this time, that every particular Jew whatever, the pooreſt not excepted, would enjoy ſome office or other in the vaſt empire which the Meſſiah was to erect over all nations. In this light Chriſt's meaning was, "Though you may imagine that you and your brethren have a peculiar title to the great and ſubſtantial bleſſings of my kingdom, which I have been deſcribing, yet the Gentiles ſhall have equal opportunities and advantages for obtaining them; becauſe they ſhall be admitted to all the privileges of the Goſpel on the ſame footing with you Jews; nay, in point of time they ſhall be before you: for they ſhall univerſally embrace the Goſpel, before your nation is converted." See Rom. xi. 25, 26. Jeſus illuſtrated this doctrine by the parable of the houſholder, who hired labourers into his vineyard at different hours, and in the evening gave them all the ſame wages, beginning from the laſt to the firſt. See the firſt verſe of the next chapter, which the ſubject, as well as the connective particle for, ſhew to be very improperly divided from the preſent verſe and chapter.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XIX.

What our Saviour ſays at the beginning of this chapter, with reſpect to the divorces in uſe among the Jews, teaches us in general, that many things which had been tolerated till that time, on account of the hardneſs of this people's hearts, would not be allowed among Chriſtians: bleſſed with greater light, they are certainly called to a higher degree of holineſs.

The union which is formed between man and woman by marriage is more intimate and inſeparable than that betwixt parents and children. ver. 5. It is honoured by being made the figure and repreſentation of the union which ſubſiſts betwixt Chriſt and his church; it is a partnerſhip of ſoul and body, of life and fortune, of comfort and ſupport, and of deſigns and inclinations. What a wickedneſs then is it to ſow diviſions in a ſociety ſo holy and ſo dear to God? But how much greater is it ſtill to violate it by a criminal and adulterous commerce!

That which is eſtabliſhed by the wiſdom of the Creator is one thing; that which is extorted from his condeſcenſion by the hardneſs of mens hearts is another; ver. 8. The former has nothing but what is worthy of the perfection of the Creator, the latter is only a remedy for the imperfection of the creature. Conſidering the indiſſoluble bond by which God has joined them together, how much ſhould thoſe who are married make it their conſtant care to promote each other's comfort and happineſs! How cautiouſly ſhould they guard againſt every degree of contention, or even of diſtaſte, which might at length occaſion an alienation in their affections, and render ſo cloſe a bond proportionably grievous!

Before we enter into an engagement which nothing but death can intirely diſſolve, prudence certainly obliges us to conſider it on all ſides; nor ſhould we ever determine our choice by conſiderations of a low and tranſitory nature. There are inconveniencies in every ſtate; but thoſe of marriage are not ſufficient to keep ſuch perſons from it as God thinks fit to call thereto. They muſt conſult his will, and rely upon his grace, that divine grace which enables men to embrace with joy what otherwiſe is not to be endured without pain, where nature or the violence of men impoſes it. The ſtate of voluntary and perpetual continence, undertaken for God's ſake, is a gift of God himſelf, and the only kind of virginity which he hath engaged to reward. Let thoſe who prefer the freedom of a ſingle life to a ſtate, which, with its peculiar comforts, muſt neceſſarily have its peculiar cares and trials too, diligently improve that diſengagement as an obligation to ſeek the kingdom of God with greater ardour, and to purſue its intereſts with more active zeal and application; ver. 10—12.

How delightful and inſtructive is it to ſee the compaſſionate Shepherd of Iſrael thus gathering the lambs in his arms, and carrying them in his boſom, with all the tokens of tender regard; rebuking his diſciples who forbad their coming, and laying his gracious hands upon them to bleſs them! How condeſcending and engaging a behaviour! How encouraging and amiable an image!

Let his miniſters behold it, to teach them a becoming regard to the lambs of their flock, who ſhould early be take notice of and inſtructed, and for and with whom they ſhould frequently pray; remembering how often divine grace takes poſſeſſion of the heart in the years of infancy, and ſanctifies the children of God almoſt from the womb. Every firſt impreſſion made upon their tender minds ſhould be carefully cheriſhed; nor ſhould thoſe whom Chriſt himſelf is ready to receive, be diſregarded by his ſervants, who upon all occaſions are bound to be gentle unto all, and apt to teach.

Behold this ſight, ye parents, with pleaſure and thankfulneſs, and let it encourage you to bring your children to Chriſt by faith, and to commit them to him in baptiſm and by prayer. Should he, who has the keys of death and the unſeen world, ſee fit to remove thoſe

CHAP. XX.

Chriſt, by the ſimilitude of the labourers in the vineyard, ſheweth that God is debtor unto no man; foretelleth his paſſion; by anſwering the mother of Zebedee's children, teacheth his diſciples to be lowly; and giveth two blind men their ſight.

FOR the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an houſholder, which went out early in the morning to hire labourers into his vineyard.

2 And when he had agreed with the labourers for a penny a day, he ſent them into his vineyard.

3 And he went out about the third hour, and ſaw others ſtanding idle in the marketplace,

4 And ſaid unto them; Go ye alſo into the vineyard, and whatſoever is right, I will give you. And they went their way.

5 Again he went out about the ſixth and ninth hour, and did likewiſe.

6 And about the eleventh hour he went out, and found others ſtanding idle, and ſaith unto them, Why ſtand ye here all the day idle?

7 They ſay unto him, Becauſe no man hath hired us. He ſaith unto them, Go ye alſo into the vineyard; and whatſoever is right, that ſhall ye receive.

8 So when even was come, the lord of the vineyard ſaith unto his ſteward, Call the labourers, and give them their hire, beginning from the laſt unto the firſt.

9 And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny.

Ver. 2. The Roman penny is the eighth part of an ounce, which, after five ſhillings the ounce, is ſeven pence halfpenny.

objects of your tendereſt care in their early days, let the recollection of this ſtory comfort you, and teach you to hope, that he who ſo graciouſly received theſe children, has not forgotten yours; but that they are ſweetly fallen aſleep in him, and will be the everlaſting objects of his care and love: For of ſuch is the kingdom of God.

Ye children too, obſerve this ſight with gratitude and joy: The great and glorious Redeemer did not deſpiſe theſe little ones; nay, he was diſpleaſed with thoſe who would have prevented their being brought to him. As kindly would he, no doubt, have received you; as kindly will he ſtill receive you, if you go to him in the ſincerity of your hearts, and aſk his bleſſing in humble and earneſt prayer. Though you ſee not Chriſt, he ſees and hears you; he is ever preſent with you, to receive, to bleſs, and to ſave you. Happy the weakeſt of you, when lodged in the arms of Chriſt! nothing can pluck you from thence; nothing can ever harm you there.

Under this joyful perſuaſion, let us all commit ourſelves to him; ſtudious to become as little children, if we deſire to enter into his kingdom. Governed no more by the vain maxims of a corrupt degenerate world, our minds no longer poſſeſſed, tormented, enſlaved by pride, ambition, avarice, or luſt,—be it our care to put ourſelves, with the amiable ſimplicity of children, into the wiſe and kind hands of Jeſus as our guardian; chearfully referring ourſelves to his paſtoral and parental care, to be clothed and fed, to be guided and diſpoſed of, as he ſhall ſee fit: For this purpoſe lay on us, O Lord, the inviſible hand of thy divinity, that it may take poſſeſſion of our hearts and ſenſes; that it may repreſs in us whatever is contrary to thy will, and ſo make us the children of God now, that we may at length be the happy children of the reſurrection.

Reſpecting the Unhappy Youth falling ſhort of the kingdom of heaven through the love of this world, we will ſpeak on a future occaſion. But who can fail to receive inſtruction from his example, and to be upon their guard againſt that ſpecious harlot, the world, that moſt deluſive and dangerous enemy of man, who hath caſt down many wounded; yea, many ſtrong men have been ſlain by her. Dangerous as they are to our eternal ſalvation, (ver. 23.) yet how univerſally are riches deſired! how eagerly are they purſued by perſons in all ſtations, and of all profeſſions in life! But what do they generally prove?—Shining miſchief, and gilded ruin. God, who well knows this, therefore, in fatherly mercy keeps or makes ſo many of his children poor. In this view they ſhould be more than contented with their ſafer ſtate; while thoſe who are rich cannot too importunately intreat of God thoſe influences of his grace, which can effect ſuch things as are impoſſible with many. ver. 26.

Happy they, who truly following Chriſt, think not much of any thing which he demands; knowing that whatever they may loſe, or whatever they may reſign, they ſhall gain far more by his favour. How little faith have we, to be unwilling to forſake for a moment that, which ſhall be reſtored with ſo much intereſt in heaven! He who poſſeſſes God, regains every thing in him. This is that hundred fold, which ſurpaſſes all expectation, all idea.

Chap. XX. Ver. 1. For the kingdom of heaven, &c.] The true ſcope of this parable is to ſhew, that the Jewiſh nation, who of all people were firſt in external privileges, and particularly in reſpect of the offer of the Goſpel be laſt in accepting it; and that when they did receive it, they ſhould enjoy no higher privileges under that diſpenſation, than the Gentiles, who were called at the eleventh hour. The application of the parable ſuggeſts this interpretation, ver. 16. So the laſt ſhall be firſt, &c. The vineyard ſignifies the diſpenſations of religion in general, which God gave to mankind in the different parts of the world. The hiring of labourers early in the morning, repreſents that interpoſition of Providence by which the Jews then alive were born members of God's church, and laid under obligations to obey the law of Moſes; "for the kingdom of heaven (the maſter of the kingdom of heaven) is like unto a man, or may be fitly repreſented by the ſimilitude of a man, who is an houſholder, οικοδεσποτης, the maſter of a family." God's beſtowing the Goſpel diſpenſation upon mankind, and the preparations previous thereto, may be illuſtrated by a maſter of a family's ſending labourers at different hours of the day to work in his vineyard. See Macknight, Petavius, Dogmat. Theolog. vol. i. p. 305. and my ſermon on this parable.

Ver. 2. For a penny a day] A denarius, or Roman penny, in value about ſeven-pence halfpenny of our money,—which it ſeems from hence was the uſual price of a day's ſervice among the Jews, as Tacitus tells us it was among the Romans, Annal. i. 17. It is therefore juſtly mentioned, Rev. vi. 6. as a proof of the great ſcarcity of proviſions, when a meaſure, or choenix of wheat, which was the uſual allowance to one man for a day, and was about an Engliſh quart, was ſold at that price. See Doddridge.

Ver. 3—7. He went out about the third hour, &c.] The hiring of labourers at the ſubſequent third, ſixth, and ninth hours, ſignifies the various interpoſitions of Providence, by which many of the Gentiles in the different ages of the world were converted, either in whole or in part, to the knowledge and worſhip of the true God; becoming ſome proſelytes of righteouſneſs, others proſelytes of the gate. The invitation given at the eleventh hour ſignifies God's calling the Gentiles, in every country, by the light of nature, to live piouſly and wiſely. The houſholder did not, in the bargain which he made with thoſe whom he hired at the third, ſixth, ninth, and eleventh hours, fix any particular ſum as their wages; he only ſaid, he would give them what was right; i. e. give them in proportion to the hours which they ſhould work. Therefore his beſtowing on them an whole day's wages, was an act of generoſity, eſpecially to thoſe who came at the eleventh hour. The labouring of thoſe who began early in the morning ſignifies, their performing the various duties impoſed by the law of Moſes,—the diſpenſation they were under; which being a grievous yoke, obedience to its precepts was fitly expreſſed by bearing the heat and burden of the day. The labouring of ſuch as were called at the ſubſequent hours, ſignifies the obedience which the proſelyted Gentiles yielded to ſuch precepts of the law, as were obligatory on them. The labouring of thoſe who were called at the eleventh hour ſignifies, the works of piety, juſtice, temperance, and charity, impoſed upon the heathens by the law of nature, the diſpenſation under which they lived; beautifully ſet forth by their labouring only one hour in the cool of the evening;—their duty being light in compariſon of what was required of the Jews. The hours are mentioned according to the ordinary diviſion of the day amongſt the Jews, the third hour being nine in the morning, and ſo on. The word δικαιον, ver. 4. rendered right, ſignifies not only what a perſon may legally claim, but what he might equitably expect from a perſon of honour and humanity; whatſoever is reaſonable. See Macknight, and Doddridge. The word αεργους, rendered idle, ver. 6. ſhould rather be rendered unemployed; for they were willing to work.

Ver. 8, 9. Call the labourers, &c.] The equal reward beſtowed on all,—the penny given to each labourer as his wages, ſignifies the Goſpel, with its privileges and advantages, which they all enjoyed on an equal footing. The ſteward who called the labourers to receive this reward, repreſents the Apoſtles and firſt preachers, by whom the Goſpel was offered both to Jews and Gentiles; and the rewards being firſt beſtowed on the labourers who came at the eleventh hour, ſignifies, that the idolatrous Gentiles and proſelytes ſhould all enjoy the Goſpel, with its privileges, before the Jewiſh nation was converted; the condition not of a few individuals, but of great bodies of men being repreſented in the parable.

10 But when the firſt came, they ſuppoſed that they ſhould have received more; and they likewiſe received every man a penny.

11 And when they had received it, they murmured againſt the good-man of the houſe,

12 Saying, Theſe laſt have wrought but one hour, and thou haſt made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden and heat of the day.

13 But he anſwered one of them, and ſaid, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didſt not thou agree with me for a penny?

14 Take that thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this laſt even as unto thee.

15 Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? is thine eye evil becauſe I am good?

16 So the laſt ſhall be firſt, and the firſt laſt: for many be called, but few choſen.

17 And Jeſus going up to Jeruſalem, took the twelve diſciples apart in the way,
and ſaid unto them,

18 Behold, we go up to Jeruſalem; and the Son of man ſhall be betrayed unto the chief prieſts, and unto the ſcribes, and they ſhall condemn him to death,

19 And ſhall deliver him to the Gentiles, to mock and to ſcourge and to crucify him:
and the third day he ſhall riſe again.

20 Then came to him the mother of Zebedee's children, with her ſons, worſhipping him, and deſiring a certain thing of him.

21 And he ſaid unto her, What wilt thou?
She ſaith unto him, Grant that theſe my two ſons may ſit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left, in thy kingdom.

22 But Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, Ye know not what ye aſk. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I ſhall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptiſm that I am baptized with? They ſay unto him, We are able.

Ver. 12. Or, have continued one hour only.—V. 15. Rom. ix. 21. Deut. xv. 9. Prov. xxiii. 6. Ch. vi. 23.—V. 16. Ch. xix. 30. Ch. xxii. 14.—V. 17. Mark x. 32. Luke xviii. 31. John xii. 12.—V. 18. Ch. xvi. 21.—V. 19. Ch. xxvii. 2. Luke xxiii. 1. John xviii. 28, &c. Acts iii. 13.—V. 20. Mark x. 35. Ch. iv. 21.—V. 21. Ch. xix. 28.—V. 22. Ch. xxvi. 39, 42. John xviii. 11. Luke xii. 50.

Ver. 11. They murmured againſt the good man, &c.] The οικοδεσποτης, or maſter of the family. That this was the caſe with the Jews, upon a general notion of the Gentiles being, according to the Chriſtian ſcheme, intended to be partakers with them in the ſame church privileges, is plain from a variety of Scriptures; particularly Acts xi. 2, 3. xiii. 45, 50. xvii. 5, 13, &c. Rom. xi. 28. 1 Theſſ. ii. 16. Since no murmurings can happen among the bleſſed, this muſt refer to the unbelieving Jews; but as it is certain they will have no place in the kingdom of heaven, we plainly ſee that it would be very abſurd to pretend to draw doctrinal conſequences from every incidental circumſtance of the parable.

Ver. 13—15. Friend, I do thee no wrong] "Seeing I have given thee the hire which I promiſed thee, thou haſt no reaſon of complaint; and if I chooſe to give unto thoſe who came laſt into the vineyard as much hire as I have given to thee, who can find fault with it? I own it is an act of generoſity; but am I not free to beſtow what is mine own as I ſee proper? Is thine eye evil becauſe I am good? Becauſe I am liberal and bountiful, art thou envious and covetous?" A malignant aſpect is generally the attendant of a ſelfiſh envious temper, which was very characteriſtic of the Jews; this part of the parable, therefore, is a ſtriking repreſentation of God's goodneſs, in beſtowing upon the Gentiles the Goſpel diſpenſation in preference to the Jews themſelves, and without ſubjecting them to the grievous burden of the Moſaic yoke. In ver. 14. Αρον το σον, might be rendered, take up that is thine; and implies that they not only murmured, but in their paſſion threw down upon the ground the money they had received.

Ver. 16. For many are called, &c.] A proverbial expreſſion, which, as it is here implied, imports that the Jews ſhould all be called by the Apoſtles and firſt preachers to receive the Goſpel;—"They ſhall have the Goſpel preached to them;" but that few of them, in compariſon, would obey the call, or become choſen ſervants, the generality of the nation remaining in infidelity and wickedneſs: wherefore, this branch of the parable very fitly repreſents the pride of the Jews, in rejecting the Goſpel, when they found the Gentiles admitted to its privileges without becoming ſubject to the inſtitutions of Moſes. In the mean time, we muſt not urge the circumſtance of the reward ſo, as to fancy that either Jews or Gentiles merited the bleſſings of the Goſpel by their having laboured faithfully in the vineyard, or having behaved well under their ſeveral diſpenſations. The Goſpel, with its bleſſings, was beſtowed entirely of God's free grace, and without any thing in men meriting it; beſides, it was offered promiſcuouſly to all, whether good or bad, and was embraced by perſons of all characters; only, as the law of Moſes was a ſchoolmaſter to bring the Jews to Chriſt, ſo the right improvement of the light of nature prepared the Gentiles for the reception of the Goſpel. See Macknight, Wetſtein, and the Reflections.

Ver. 17. And Jeſus going up to Jeruſalem] See the note on Mark x. 32.

Ver. 18. Shall be betrayed unto the chief prieſts] The word παραδοθησεται, is the ſame both here and in St. Mark x. 33. and plainly includes both our Saviour's being treacherouſly diſcovered by Judas, and given up into the hands of his enemies. He foretels that they ſhould mock him, as if he was a fool; ſcourge him, as if he were a knave; ſpit upon him, (Mark x. 34.) to expreſs their abhorrence of him, as a blaſphemer; and crucify him, as a criminal ſlave. This prediction being built upon the ancient prophecies concerning the Meſſiah, certainly contained matter of great encouragement to the diſciples, had they underſtood and applied it in a proper manner; and it is a remarkable proof of the prophetic ſpirit which dwelt in Chriſt; for, humanly ſpeaking, it was much more probable that he ſhould have been privately aſſaſſinated, or ſtoned, as was once attempted, by ſome zealous tranſport of popular fury, than that he ſhould have been thus ſolemnly condemned, and delivered up to crucifixion; a Roman puniſhment, with which we do not find he had ever been threatened. Indeed, when the Jews condemned him for blaſphemy, for which the puniſhment appointed in the law was ſtoning, and Pilate at laſt gave them a general permiſſion to take him, and judge him according to their own law, (Matth. xxvi. 65, 66. John xviii. 31. xix. 7.) it is wonderful they did not chooſe to ſtone him. But all this was done, that the Scriptures might be fulfilled. Compare Matth. xxvi. 56. and John xix. 36.

Ver. 20, 21. Then came to him, &c.] Our Saviour's predictions reſpecting his ſufferings were either not underſtood by his diſciples, or at leaſt they apprehended that whatever difficulties lay in the way, thoſe ſufferings would certainly end in his triumph and glory. Upon this preſumption, the mother of Zebedee's children, with her ſons James and John, and at their inſtigation, came to Jeſus with a peculiar requeſt, which diſcovered in the cleareſt manner the temper of mind they were in, and the motives upon which they followed their maſter: See Mark x. 35. It ſeems Salome, for that was her name, (comp. ch. xxvii. 56. with Mark xv. 40.) was now in our Lord's train, having followed him from Galilee with other pious women, who attended him in his journey, and miniſtered unto him; that is, ſupplied him with money, and took care to have him accommodated with lodging and other neceſſaries. Salome could the more eaſily give this attendance, as her huſband ſeems now to have been dead, and to have left her in good circumſtances, according to his ſtation; for we learn from the Goſpels that he had a veſſel of his own, and hired ſervants. Salome, therefore, being particularly acquainted with our Lord, and having always ſhewn him great reſpect, thought herſelf entitled to diſtinguiſhed favour, and on that account readily undertook, at the deſire of her ſons, to intercede with him in their behalf. Ever ſince Chriſt's transfiguration the two brothers had conceived very high notions of the glory of his kingdom, and, it may be, of their own merit alſo, becauſe they had been admitted to behold that miracle. They formed the project, therefore, of ſecuring to themſelves the chief places by his particular promiſe, and embraced this as a fit opportunity of accompliſhing their purpoſe. There is probably an alluſion in the words of their requeſt to a circumſtance which the Talmudical writers relate, concerning the Sanhedrim,—that there were two officers of peculiar diſtinction, who ſat on each ſide of the Naſi, or preſident of the court;—the one called Ab-beth-din, or, "the father of the juſticiary," who ſat on the right hand of the preſident; the other Chacham, or the ſage, who ſat on the left. See Witſius. Miſcel. Sacra, vol. i. lib. ii. diſſ. 3. and Bp. Bull's works, vol. i. p. 286.

Ver. 22. Ye know not what ye aſk] "You are ignorant of the nature of the honour you are aſking: However, ſince you deſire to partake with me in my glory, I would know if you be willing to ſhare with me in my ſufferings, for the ſake of the Goſpel:" Inſinuating that the road to greatneſs in his kingdom lies through the depth of affliction and perſecution on account of truth. It was cuſtomary

23 And he ſaith unto them, Ye ſhall drink indeed of my cup, and be baptized with the baptiſm that I am baptized with: but to ſit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it ſhall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father.

24 And when the ten heard it, they were moved with indignation againſt the two brethren.

25 But Jeſus called them unto him, and ſaid, Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exerciſe dominion over them, and they that are great, exerciſe authority upon them.

26 But it ſhall not be ſo among you; but whoſoever will be great among you, let him be your miniſter;

27 And whoſoever will be chief among you, let him be your ſervant:

28 Even as the Son of man came not to be miniſtered unto, but to miniſter, and to give his life a ranſom for many.

29 And as they departed from Jericho, a great multitude followed him.

among the ancients to aſſign to each gueſt at a feaſt a particular cup, as well as diſh; and by the kind and quantity of the liquor contained in it, the reſpect of the entertainer was expreſſed. Hence cup came in general to ſignify a portion aſſigned, whether of pleaſure or ſorrow; and many inſtances occur in which it refers to the latter. See ch. xxvi. 39, 42.

Ver. 23. And be baptized with the baptiſm] That is, "Shall partake of my afflictions." This metaphorical ſenſe of the word baptiſm, is derived from the figurative expreſſions of the Old Teſtament, in which afflictions are repreſented under the notion of great waters paſſing over, and being ready to overwhelm a perſon. In this view of the matter James and John were baptized with Chriſt's baptiſm; for James was put to death by Herod, Acts xii. 2. being the firſt of all the Apoſtles who ſuffered martyrdom for Chriſt; and though the account which ſome give of John's being caſt into a cauldron of boiling oil at Rome has been called in queſtion by many, it is not to be doubted that he had his ſhare in the perſecutions, from which none of Chriſt's Apoſtles were exempted. He was impriſoned and ſcourged by order of the council at Jeruſalem, Acts v. 18, 40. and baniſhed to the iſle of Patmos for the word of God, and for the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt, Rev. i. 9. The laſt clauſe of this verſe, is not mine to give, &c. ſhould be tranſlated, is not mine to give, unleſs to them for whom it is prepared, &c. Αλλα being put here for ει μη, as it is Mark ix. 8. ſee alſo ch. xvii. 8. Our Saviour meant that it was not in his power to give the chief places to any, but to thoſe who were moſt eminent for their graces, particularly for their faith and fortitude; ſuch only having a right to the chief places in the kingdom of heaven, according to the unalterable laws of the divine adminiſtration. "I can give the chief places in my kingdom to none, but to thoſe, who, according to the immutable laws of my Father, are capable of enjoying them:" And in this view of the text, how poor a ſupport does it afford to the Arian or Socinian cauſe!

Ver. 25. The princes of the Gentiles] Of the nations around: For God had preſcribed the children of Iſrael a juſt and equitable form of government. See Deut. xvii. 14. to the end. The word rendered have dominion over them, Κατακυριεύουσιν, ſignifies ſometimes to uſe an immoderate and arbitrary power. See Mark x. 42. It imports the abuſe of the royal authority preſcribed 1 Sam. viii. 11, 13. which God ſometimes is pleaſed to permit for the puniſhment of men's iniquities. Jeſus, ſollicitous to cure that pride, which made ſome of his diſciples ambitious, and others jealous, called them unto him, and told them that his kingdom was not, as they imagined, of the ſame nature with the kingdoms of the world; and that the greatneſs of his diſciples, was not the greatneſs of ſecular princes, which conſiſts in reigning over others with abſolute and deſpotic ſway. See Grotius, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 27. Let him be your ſervant] There is a gradation here not commonly obſerved: The word διακονος in the former verſe, which for want of a better word, we rendered miniſter, is a name which might be given any who occaſionally attended others, or were ſtatedly employed to render them any particular kind of ſervice;—but δουλος, ſervant, ſignifies one, whoſe whole buſineſs it is to ſerve, and who is indeed the property of another. Our Lord appears to mean, that he who preſides over others, ought to conſider his ſtation, not ſo much a noble and high poſt, as a charge and office, which indiſpenſably obliges him to be always ready to defend and aſſiſt his ſubjects. This may be an alluſion to what is ſaid Deut xvii. 20. that the heart of the king of Iſrael ought not to be lifted up above his brethren; and generally indeed true greatneſs conſiſts in a man's humbling himſelf, and condeſcending to the meaneſt and loweſt offices, if hereby he can at all advance the true happineſs of his fellow-creatures.

Ver. 28. Even as the Son of man] "The greatneſs of my diſciples conſiſts in doing men all the good they poſſibly can, by a continual courſe of humble laborious ſervices, in imitation of me your maſter, whoſe greatneſs conſiſts not in being miniſtered to by men, but in miniſtering to them as a ſervant; by healing the ſick, feeding the hungry, inſtructing the ignorant, and laying down my life a ranſom for the ſins of many." This being the higheſt dignity in Chriſt's kingdom, he might well tell the two brothers, that they did not know what they were aſking, when they begged the honour of filling the higheſt ſtations in it. Inſtead of not to be miniſtered unto, but to miniſter, Dr. Heylin reads, not to be ſerved, but to ſerve; and inſtead of let him be your ſervant, ver. 27. let him perform the meaneſt offices. It does not follow, that becauſe it is ſaid Chriſt gave his life a ranſom for many, that Chriſt died not for all. The word πολλοι being uſed in other places, where it certainly ſignifies all. See Dan. xii. 2. compared with John v. 28, 29. Rom. v. 15. compared with 1 Cor. xv. 22.

Ver. 29. And as they departed, &c.] And as they went out of Jericho. Wat. and MS. St. Luke ſays, that the blind man was cured as our Lord drew nigh to Jericho, ch. xviii. 35. and before he paſſed through the town, ch. xix. 1. The other Evangeliſts ſay, the miracle was performed as he departed from Jericho. But their accounts may be reconciled three different ways: Firſt, Jeſus arriving about midday, entered Jericho, and having viſited his acquaintance, or done any thing elſe he had to do, returned in the evening by the gate through which he had gone in. As he was coming out, he paſſed by the beggars, and cured them. The next day he entered into and paſſed through Jericho, in his way to Jeruſalem. There is nothing improbable in this ſolution; for if our Lord was a night in that part of the country, he might ſpend it in ſome of the neighbouring villages, rather than in the city, where he had many enemies.—It may be objected, that St. Luke ſeems to ſay the miracle was performed as Jeſus went toward Jericho, not as he was coming away, εγενετο δε εν τω εγγιζειν αυτον εις Ιεριχω; but if the opinion of Grotius, Le Clerc, and others may be relied upon, the phraſe εν τω εγγιζειν ſtands here for εν τω εγγυς ειναι, while he was near Jericho. The ſecond ſolution is as follows: The blind man, of whom St. Luke ſpeaks, may have cried for a cure as Jeſus went into Jericho about noon, tho' he did not obtain it then. The multitude rebuked him, and Jeſus paſſed without giving him any anſwer, intending to make the miracle more illuſtrious. Towards evening, therefore, as he was returning, the blind beggar, who had cried after him in the morning, being joined by a companion in the ſame unhappy condition with himſelf, renewed his ſuit, beſeeching the Son of David to have mercy on them. The multitude, as before, rebuked them for making ſuch a noiſe; but the ſeaſon of the miracle being come, Jeſus ſtood ſtill, called them to him, and cured them. It may be objected, that St. Luke makes no diſtinction between the beggar's calling to Chriſt in the morning, and the cure performed in the evening as he came out, but connects the two events, as if they had happened in immediate ſucceſſion.—The anſwer is, there are ſeveral undeniable examples of this kind of connection to be found in the Sacred Hiſtory, particularly in St. Luke's Goſpel. ch. xxiii. 25, 26. xxiv. 4, &c. The third ſolution of the difficulty is this: Jericho having been a flouriſhing city before the Iſraelites entered Canaan, muſt, in the courſe of ſo many ages, have undergone various changes, from war and other accidents; we may therefore ſuppoſe that it conſiſted of an old and a new town, ſituated at a little diſtance from each other. On this ſuppoſition, the beggars ſitting on the road between the two towns, might be ſaid to have gained their cure either as Jeſus departed from the one, or drew nigh to the other, according to the pleaſure of the hiſtorians. The reader, however, muſt not look upon this as a mere ſuppoſition; for, on examination, he will find clear proof of it in the Sacred Hiſtory. We are told (Joſh. vi. 24, 26.) that after the Iſraelites had burned Jericho, Joſhua, their general, interdicted by a curſe the rebuilding of it. His curſe ſtruck ſuch terror into the Iſraelites, that for the ſpace of five hundred years no man attempted to rebuild Jericho, till Hiel the Beth-elite, in the days of Ahab, brought it upon himſelf, by venturing to raiſe the old city out of her aſhes; 1 Kings xv. 34. But though the old city thus continued in ruins for many ages, there was a town very ſoon built not far from it, to which they gave its name: for ſo early as Eglon's time we read of the city of Palm-trees, Judg. iii. 13. a name peculiar to Jericho on account of the fine palm-trees with which it was environed. Deut. xxxiv. 3. 2 Chron. xxviii. 15. Beſides, we find Jericho, ſome time after this, expreſly mentioned by name, it being the town where David ordered his meſſengers to tarry till their beards, which Hanun king of Moab cauſed to be ſhaved, were grown. Wherefore, as there was a Jericho before Hiel rebuilt the ancient town, which Joſhua deſtroyed, it cannot, I think, be doubted, that from Hiel's days there were two cities of this name, at no great diſtance from each other; perhaps a mile or ſo. Beſides, Joſephus in ſinuat

30 And behold, two blind men, ſitting by the way-ſide, when they heard that Jeſus paſſed by, cried out, ſaying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David!

31 And the multitude rebuked them, becauſe they ſhould hold their peace: but they cried the more, ſaying, Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David!

32 And Jeſus ſtood ſtill, and called them, and ſaid, What will ye that I ſhall do unto you?

33 They ſay unto him, Lord, that our eyes may be opened.

34 So Jeſus had compaſſion on them, and touched their eyes: and immediately their eyes received ſight, and they followed him.

ſinuates, that both of them ſubſiſted in his time; expreſly declaring, "that the ſpring which watered the territory of Jericho aroſe near the old town." See Bell. Jud. v. 4. Thus therefore we have an eaſy and perfect reconciliation of the ſeemingly contradictory accounts which the Evangeliſts have given of our Lord's miracle on the blind men in this part of the country. But although there had been no hint in antiquity, directing us to believe that there were two cities of the name of Jericho, not far from each other, every reader muſt acknowledge, that to have ſuppoſed this, would have been ſufficient to our purpoſe of reconciling the Evangeliſts, becauſe there are ſuch towns to be met with in every country; a thing which of itſelf muſt have rendered the ſuppoſition not only poſſible, but probable; and I may venture to ſay, that had two profane hiſtorians related any fact with the diſagreeing circumſtances found in the Evangeliſts, the critics would have thought them good reaſons for ſuch a ſuppoſition, eſpecially if the hiſtorians were writers of character, and had been either eye-witneſſes of the things which they related, or informed by the eye-witneſſes of them. To conclude, this inſtance may teach us never to deſpair of finding a proper and full ſolution of any imagined inconſiſtency that is to be met with in the Sacred Hiſtory. The city of Jericho, for greatneſs and opulence, was inferior to none in Paleſtine; Jeruſalem excepted. It was beautified with a palace for the reception of the governor, if he choſe to go thither, with an amphitheatre for public ſhews, and an hippodrome for horſe-races. The city was pleaſantly ſituated, at the foot of that range of hills which bounded the Campus Magnus to the weſt. See Luke iii. 3. The country round was the moſt fertile ſpot in Canaan; yielding, beſides the neceſſaries of life in great abundance, the beſt palms, alſo excellent honey, and the famed balſam-tree, the moſt precious production of the earth. The fruitfulneſs of this region was owing to various cauſes, and among the reſt to a fine ſpring with which it was watered, and which anciently was ſweetened by the prophet Eliſha, who bleſſed the land likewiſe, by God's command, with perpetual and extraordinary fruitfulneſs. 2 Kings ii. 18. The air was exceedingly mild; for when it ſnowed in the other provinces of Paleſtine, and was ſo cold that they were obliged to make uſe of the warmeſt cloathing, the inhabitants of this place went about clad in linen only. Hence, as Joſephus tell us, the territory of Jericho was called θειον χωριον, a heavenly country, reſembling paradiſe for beauty of proſpect, fertility of ſoil, and felicity of climate. The fountain which enriched this delightful ſpot was ſo large, as to deſerve the name of a water or river, (Joſh. xvi. 1.) and refreſhed a plain of ſeventy ſtadia long, and twenty broad; but the excellency of its quality was viſible in its effects: for it gladdened the whole tract through which it glided, and made it look like a garden, affording a proſpect more agreeable, as the neighbouring country was bleak and inhoſpitable. Jericho was an hundred and twenty ſtadia, that is, fifteen miles from Jeruſalem, almoſt due eaſt, the country being mountainous; but from thence to the Jordan, which was at the diſtance of twenty ſtadia, or two miles and an half, and towards the Aſphaltic lake, the land was flat and barren. See Macknight, and Reland's Palæſt.

Ver. 30. And behold, two blind men] St. Mark and St. Luke ſpeak only of one blind man who was cured near Jericho. St. Auguſtin is of opinion, that one of theſe was more remarkable than the other, being the ſon of Timeus, who ſeems to have been a perſon of ſome diſtinction, and that having fallen into poverty and blindneſs, he was forced to beg for his bread. He thinks this a good reaſon for his being mentioned particularly by one of the Evangeliſts. It may be added, that he might himſelf be remarkable by the extraordinary earneſtneſs with which he cried. See Aug. de Conſen. Evang. l. 2. the note on ch. viii. 28. and ſermon ix. vol. i. of my diſcourſes on the miracles.

Ver. 31. Becauſe they ſhould hold their peace] That they might, &c. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 32. Jeſus—ſaid, what will ye, &c.] It is obſervable that we never find Jeſus beſtowing an alms of money on any poor perſon falling n his way; yet this is no objection againſt his charity: for if the erſon who addreſſed him was incapable of working for his own ubſiſtence by reaſon of bodily infirmity, it was much more noble, nd much more becoming the dignity of the Son of God to remove he infirmity, and put the beggar in a condition of ſupporting himelf, than by the gift of a ſmall ſum to relieve only a preſent want, which would ſoon return; ſuch an alms being at beſt but a trifling nd indirect method of helping them. On the other hand, if the eggars who applied to him were not in real diſtreſs through want r diſeaſe, but under the pretence of infirmity or poverty followed egging, as they deſerved no encouragement, ſo they met with none rom Jeſus, who knew perfectly the circumſtances of every particur perſon with whom he converſed. Beſides, to have beſtowed moey on the poor was not only beneath Chriſt's dignity, but having ccaſion to perform great cures on ſeveral beggars, it might have afforded his enemies a plauſible pretence for affirming, that he bribed ſuch as feigned diſeaſes, to feign cures likewiſe, of which they gave him the honour. See Macknight.

Ver. 34. And they followed him] The blind men travelled along with Jeſus, perhaps all the way to Jeruſalem, being deeply affected with a ſenſe of his power and goodneſs, and earneſtly deſirous to ſhew their gratitude, by declaring openly to all the perſons they met, what a great miracle Jeſus had performed upon them. Beſides, by following him in the road without any guide, they put the truth of the miracle beyond all ſuſpicion. Accordingly St. Luke tells us, ch. xviii. 43. that the people, when they ſaw what was done, were thankful to God for the mercy of the cure, and acknowledged the divine miſſion of the prophet who had performed it, and who, before the cure, had been addreſſed by the blind men as the Son of David, or the Meſſiah. The allegorical reflection which Eraſmusmakes on this circumſtance is beautiful: "Thus Jeſus by his touch cures the mind, which is blinded by worldly luſts; and gives light for this end, that we may follow his footſteps." But ſee this ſentiment largely expatiated upon in the diſcourſe referred to on ver. 30.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XX.

Of what vaſt meaning and high importance are the concluding words of our Lord's awakening parable in this chapter! Many are called, but few are choſen. We ought often to meditate upon them, that we may not content ourſelves with having the offers of the Goſpel made to us, or even with being admitted into the viſible church of God, but may give all diligence to make our calling and election ſure.

We are ſummoned to a courſe of holy labour, even to work in our Lord's vineyard; or in every ſtation, whether public or private, to do our utmoſt to promote the glory of God, and the happineſs of mankind. With ſo many calls, and ſo many advantages, ſhall we ſtand all the day idle?—No; rather let us be active and patient, and chearfully willing to bear all the burden and heat of the day in ſo good a cauſe; knowing that ere long the evening will come, and that he who employs us, ſaith, Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work ſhall be.

It is indeed an encouraging thought to thoſe who have long neglected the great buſineſs of life, that ſome were called at the eleventh hour; but it will be dangerous indeed for any to preſume on their having ſuch a call. It will be deluſive and erroneous to ſtrain the parable ſo far, as to imagine that an equal reward awaits all, without any regard to their characters or improvements; for this is moſt contrary to the reaſon of things, to the word of God, and to the great intent of that day, which is to render to every man according to his works. The Gentiles are indeed now called to equal privileges with the Jews, to which this circumſtance of the parable refers; and we all ſee how odious a temper it was in that favourite nation to be offended with the Goſpel on that account, which ſhould rather have recommended it to their moſt joyful acceptance. It ſhould be our care to avoid every degree of envy, whoever may be put on a level with, or preferred to us; acknowledging the ſovereign right of God to do what he will with his own, nor ſuffering our eye to be evil and malicious, becauſe he is bountiful and good. To prevent this, we ſhould labour after that unfeigned love to the brethren, which will never allow us to repine at their advancement, but will engage us to rejoice in their honour and happineſs; ſo ſhall we exchange the baſeſt and moſt uneaſy paſſion of human nature, for that which is of all others the nobleſt and the moſt delightful.

He, who had his own time and ours in his hand, foreknew and foretold the approach of his diſſolution, ver. 17—19. When men are near their end, and ready to make their will, then is it reaſonable to ſue for legacies. Thus did the mother of Zebedee's children. It is an uncommon ſtile which is given to this woman. It had been as eaſy to have ſaid the wife of Zebedee, or the ſiſter of Mary, or of Joſeph, or plain Salome; but now, by an unuſual deſcription, ſhe is ſtiled the mother of Zebedee's children. Zebedee was an obſcure man; ſhe, as his wife, was no better: The greateſt honour ſhe ever had, or could have, was to have two ſuch ſons as James and John; thoſe give a title to both their parents. Honour aſcends as well as deſcends; holy children dignify the loins from whence they proceed, no leſs than they derive honour from their parents. Salome might be a good wife, a good woman, a good neighbour; but all theſe cannot ennoble her ſo much as being the mother of Zebedee's children.

The ſuit was the ſons; but by the mouth of their mother. It is not diſcommendable in parents to ſeek the preferment of their children; why may not Abraham ſue for an Iſhmael? So it be by lawful means, in a moderate meaſure, and in due order, this endeavour cannot be amiſs. Who can wonder to ſee ſome ſparks of weak and

CHAP. XXI.

Chriſt rideth into Jeruſalem upon an aſs; driveth the buyers and ſellers out of the temple, curſeth the fig-tree, putteth to ſilence the prieſts and elders, and rebuketh them by the ſimilitude of the two ſons, and the huſbandmen who ſlew ſuch as were ſent unto them.

AND when they drew nigh unto Jeruſalem, and were come to Beth-phagé, unto the mount of Olives, then ſent Jeſus two diſciples,

2 Saying unto them, Go into the village over againſt you, and ſtraightway ye ſhall find an aſs tied, and a colt with her: looſe them, and bring them unto me.

3 And if any man ſay aught unto you, ye ſhall ſay, The Lord hath need of them; and ſtraightway he will ſend them.

4 All this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by the prophet, ſaying,

5 Tell ye the daughter of Sion, Behold,

Ver. 1. Mark xi. 1. Luke xix. 29. Zech. xiv. 4.—V. 5. Iſai. lxii. 11. Zech. ix. 9. John xii. 15.

worldly deſires in their holieſt teachers, when the bleſſed Apoſtles were not free from ſome ambitious thoughts, whilſt they ſat at the feet even of their Saviour?

He, who knew all their thoughts afar off; yet, as if he had been a ſtranger to their purpoſes, aſks, What wouldeſt thou? Our infirmities do then beſt ſhame us, when they are drawn out of our own mouths; like as our prayers alſo ſerve not to acquaint God with our wants, but to make us the more capable of his mercies.

Our Saviour had ſaid, that his twelve followers ſhould ſit upon twelve thrones, and judge the twelves tribes of Iſrael. This good woman would have her two ſons next his perſon, the prime peers of his kingdom. Every one is apt to wiſh the beſt to his own: worldly honour is neither worth our ſuit, nor unworthy our acceptance: Yea, Salome, had thy mind been in heaven; hadſt thou intended this deſired pre-eminence in that celeſtial ſtate of glory, yet I know not how to juſtify thine ambition. Wouldeſt thou have thy ſons preferred to the father of the faithful, to the bleſſed mother of thy Saviour?—That very wiſh were preſumptuous. For me, O God, my ambition ſhall go ſo high as to be a ſaint in heaven, and to live as holily on earth as the beſt; but for precedency of heavenly honour, I do not, I dare not affect it. It is enough for me, if I may but lift up my head amongſt thy bleſſed ones; to be a door-keeper in thy houſe will be happineſs abundant.

The mother aſks, the ſons have the anſwer. To convince them of their unfitneſs for glory,—they are ſent to their impotency in ſuffering, Are ye able, &c.? ver. 22. O Saviour! even thou, who art one with thy Father, hadſt a cup of thine own; never potion was ſo bitter as that which was mixed for thee; yea, even thy draught is ſtinted; it is not enough for thee to ſip of this cup, thou muſt drink it up to the very dregs. When the vinegar and gall were tendered to thee by men, thou didſt but kiſs the cup; but when thy Father gave into thine hands a potion infinitely more diſtaſteful; thou for our health didſt drink deep of it, even to the bottom, and ſaidſt, It is finiſhed. And can we repine at thoſe unpleaſing draughts of affliction which are tempered for us ſinful men, when we ſee thee, the Son of thy Father's love, thus dieted? We pledge thee, O bleſſed Saviour! we pledge thee according to our weakneſs, who haſt begun to us in thy powerful ſufferings; only do thou enable us, after the natural ſtruggles of reluctant nature are over, yet at laſt willingly to pledge thee in our conſtant ſufferings for thee; for if thou haſt not grudged thy precious blood to us, well mayeſt thou challenge ſome worthleſs drops from us; through many tribulations muſt we enter into the kingdom of heaven. Let who will hope to walk upon roſes and violets thither, I will trace thee, O Saviour! by the track of thy blood, and by thy red ſteps follow thee to thine eternal reſt.

The motion of the two diſciples was not more full of infirmity than their anſwer:—We are able; out of an eager deſire of the honour, they are apt to undertake the condition. The beſt men may be miſtaken in their own powers; alas, how ſtriking an inſtance have we in the caſe of our Lord's followers! when it came to the iſſue, They all forſook him, and fled. It is one thing to ſuffer in ſpeculation, another in practice. There cannot be a worſe ſign than for a man in a carnal preſumption to vaunt of his own abilities; how juſtly doth God ſuffer that man to be foiled purpoſely, that he may be aſhamed of his own vain ſelf-confidence? O God, let me ever be humbly dejected in the ſenſe of mine own inſufficiency; let me give all the glory to thee, and take nothing to myſelf but my infirmities.

Oh the wonderful mildneſs of the Son of God! He doth not chide the two diſciples, either for their ambition in ſuing, or preſumption in undertaking; but leaving the worſt, he takes the beſt of their anſwer; and omitting their errors, encourages their good intentions. Ye ſhall drink indeed, &c. ver. 23. I know not whether there be more mercy in the conceſſion, or ſatisfaction in the denial; were it not an high honour to drink of thy cup, O Saviour, thou hadſt not forepromiſed it as a favour: I am deceived, if what thou granteſt was much leſs than that which thou denieſt. To pledge thee in thine own cup, is not much leſs dignity and familiarity than to ſit by thee; If we ſuffer with thee, we ſhall alſo reign together with thee: What greater promotion can fleſh and blood be capable of, than a conformity to the Lord of Glory?—Enable thou me to drink of thy cup, and then ſeat me where thou wilt. See Bp. Hall.

Chap. XXI. Ver. 1. And when they drew nigh unto Jeruſalem] The multitude which attended our Lord in this journey, ch. xx. 29. having increaſed prodigiouſly as he advanced towards Jeruſalem, He did not now ſhun them, and enter the city privately, as he had always done on former occaſions. The people were to honour him with the title of the Meſſiah publickly, that he might have an opportunity of accepting that auguſt name in the moſt avowed manner, before he aſcended into heaven. Moreover, the prieſts who had iſſued out a proclamation againſt him, John xi. 57. were to be awed, at leaſt for a while, and reſtrained from offering him violence; for, as he had doctrines to teach, rebukes to give, and other things to do, which could not fail to incenſe thoſe proud rulers; without doubt they would have put him to death prematurely, had not the people appeared on his ſide. Accordingly, after the parable of the huſbandman was ſpoken, ver. 45. the prieſts ſought to lay hands on him, but feared the multitude, becauſe they took him for a prophet. Nay, the whole council was intimidated by them; for in their deliberation about putting Jeſus to death, they ſaid one to another, (ch. xxvi. 5.) Not on the feaſt-day, leſt there be an uproar among the people. Our Lord's driving the buyers and ſellers out of the temple, his parables of the huſbandmen and marriage ſupper, repreſenting the rejection of the Jewiſh nation, and the downfall of the ſtate, with the woes denounced againſt the Phariſees in their own hearing, made part of the work he had to do before he aſcended; which would have brought inſtant deſtruction upon him, had not the great mens' rage been reſtrained by the uncommon reſpect which the people generally ſhewed him: Wherefore, the multitude being now very great, and Jeſus having ſuch good reaſons not to ſhun them as formerly, he ſent two of his diſciples for an aſs which never had been rode upon, but which by his ſimple volition he could tame; propoſing, according to the prophecy, Zech. ix. 9. to ride into the city amidſt the ſurrounding throng. Probably there were ſtrait paſſes in the mount of Olives, through which the road lay, Luke xix. 37. and, no doubt, narrow ſtreets in the city alſo, by which he was to go to the temple. In theſe narrow paſſes and lanes Jeſus might have been incommoded by the preſs, had he walked on foot; beſides, the ſtrangers who were now at Jeruſalem, would increaſe the crowd. It ſeems they knew of his coming, John xii. 12. and perhaps expected that he was bringing Lazurus along with him, to ſhew him in public, as a trophy of his power. (Comp. John xii. 12. with ver. 18.) For the ſight of Lazarus in Bethany having already induced many to believe, they might naturally ſuppoſe that his appearing openly would produce the ſame effect in Jeruſalem; and as they were in full hopes that the Meſſiah's kingdom was to be erected at this paſſover, they could not but think it neceſſary, that all oppoſers ſhould inſtantly be convinced, and obliged to acknowledge the Meſſiah's title to the throne of his illuſtrious anceſtors.

St. Mark and St. Luke mentioned Bethphagé and Bethany; from whence it ſeems to follow, that travellers, in their way to Jeruſalem from Jericho, arrived at Bethphagé before they came to Bethany. Theſe two villages were ſituated at the foot of the mount of Olives, and the road to the city lay between them, only it was nearer to Bethphagé than to Bethany; therefore, when Jeſus, in travelling from Jericho, came to the foot of the mountain, he was but a little way from Bethphagé, nevertheleſs, intending to lodge in Bethany with Lazarus, he went thither. Next day, returning to the road from Jericho, he ſent the two diſciples to Bethphagé, with orders to bring the aſs, ver. 2. If the reader will view the ſeveral expreſſions uſed by the Evangeliſts in the light of this deſcription, he will ſee the exact propriety of each of them. Jeſus ſent the diſciples away when he was come nigh to Bethphagé and Bethany, at the mount of Olives, as St. Luke tells us; or, as St. Mark expreſſes it, when they came nigh to Jeruſalem, unto Bethphagé and Bethany; a phraſe, which not only determines the place from whence the diſciples were ſent away, but ſhews on what quarter Jeſus and his train were approaching the town. Both the villages being ſituated at the foot of the mountain, and Jeſus being between them, on the road from Jericho to Jeruſalem, he might very properly be ſaid to have been nigh to both, and nigh to Jeruſalem, which was at the diſtance of about two miles only. Alſo he was come to Bethphagé, unto the mount of Olives, as St. Matthew expreſſes it, becauſe, as we before obſerved, the road was nearer Bethphagé than Bethany. And as Jeſus was coming from Bethany, when he ſent the diſciples away, Bethphagé, whither he ſent them, muſt have been directly oppoſite to them; hence it is termed the village over-againſt them;—απεναντι, κατεναντι,—being a little off from the road to the city. thy king cometh unto thee, meek, and ſitting upon an aſs, and a colt the fole of an aſs.

6 And the diſciples went, and did as Jeſus commanded them,

7 And brought the aſs, and the colt, and put on them their clothes, and they ſet him thereon.

8 And a very great multitude ſpread their garments in the way; others cut down branches from the trees, and ſtrewed them in the way.

9 And the multitude that went before, and that followed, cried, ſaying, Hoſanna to the ſon of David! Bleſſed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, Hoſanna in the higheſt!

10 And when he was come into Jeruſalem, all the city was moved, ſaying, Who is this?

11 And the multitude ſaid, This is Jeſus the prophet of Nazareth of Galilee.

12 And Jeſus went into the temple of God, and caſt out all them that ſold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the ſeats of them that ſold doves, 14 And the blind and the lame came to him in the temple; and he healed them.

Ver. 7. And brought the aſs] The exact knowledge which our Lord ſhewed of ſo many minute and moſt fortuitous particulars, muſt ſurely impreſs the minds of theſe meſſengers greatly, and eſtabliſh the faith of his followers. It is obſervable that many ſuch things occurred a little before his death, which, conſidered in this view, have a peculiar beauty. Comp. Matth. xxvi. 31—35. Mark xiv. 15, 16. and Luke xxii. 10—13. The and [και], like the particle ו vau in the Hebrew, is here, as frequently, uſed to ſignify even, or that is;—upon an aſs, even a colt, &c. They ſet him thereon, means on their clothes, which they had placed upon the aſs. All the Evangeliſts, except St. Matthew, ſpeak expreſly of his riding on the colt.

Ver. 8, 9. And a very great multitude ſpread their garments] When the multitudes ſaw Jeſus mounted, they immediately bethought themſelves of ſhewing him the honours which kings and conquerors obtained in their triumphal entries; for, as they all firmly believed that he would take the reins of government into his own hands at this paſſover, they had a mind to make his entry into Jeruſalem have the air of a triumph. Accordingly, ſome ſpread their garments in the way, (ſee 2 Kings ix. 13.) others cut down branches of the trees, and ſtrewed them in the way, carrying a larger ſort on high, in proceſſion before the Meſſiah, as demonſtrations of their joy. See Levit. xxiii. 40. 2 Macc. x. 7. This ſeems to have reference to the feaſt of tabernacles, which was celebrated in joyful expectation of the Meſſiah's coming and tabernacling in human fleſh; and theſe Jews teſtified hereby their belief in Jeſus as that Meſſiah. Their acclamations too teſtified the ſame thing. Hoſannah ſignifies, ſave, we beſeech thee! and applied to Jeſus on this occaſion, it was of the ſame import with our acclamation, God ſave the king! and in our language would have been expreſſed thus: God ſave the King Meſſiah! The next clauſe, Bleſſed is he that cometh, &c. contains nearly the words of Pſ. cxviii. 26. St. Mark ſays they cried likewiſe, Bleſſed be the kingdom of our father David, which cometh, or which is to be erected now, in the name of the Lord,—the Meſſiah. Hoſannah in, or rather among the higheſt, means, "Let the higheſt orders of angels join us, in praying for the proſperity of the King Meſſiah." We need not obſerve how ſimilar the words in St. Luke, Peace in heaven, and glory in the higheſt, ch. xix. 38. are to thoſe of the angels on the birth of Chriſt, ch. ii. 14. Some would render the clauſe, Bleſſed is he that cometh, &c.—Bleſſed in the name of the Lord is he that cometh. See the "Obſervations on paſſages of Scripture," p. 281.

Ver. 11. And the multitude ſaid, This is Jeſus, &c.] The multitude is the appellation which the ſacred hiſtorians commonly give to Chriſt's friends; wherefore, as they are here ſaid to have called him the prophet of Nazareth of Galilee, we may ſuppoſe they did it with a view to mortify his enemies; as if they had ſaid, "You have always affirmed that no prophet, no Meſſiah, can ariſe out of Galilee: What is your opinion now?"—Jeſus rode directly to the temple, but did not drive the buyers and ſellers out this firſt day; for St. Mark expreſly tells us, ch. xi. 11. that it was evening by the time he got thither, and had looked round on all things: From whence we learn, that the market in the temple, which he intended to prohibit, was over. It ſeems he ſtayed in Jeruſalem but a little while. Having made his public appearance in the metropolis, received the title of Meſſiah openly from the multitude, and ſurveyed the temple, he left the city without doing any thing, to the great diſcouragement of the throng who had come in with him, expecting that he was immediately to have laid hold on the reins of government. See Luke xxi. 37.

Ver. 12. And Jeſus went into the temple] See the notes on John ii. 14, &c.

Ver. 13. But ye have made it a den of thieves] The Jews, reckoning the lower and outer court of the temple as a place of no ſanctity, becauſe it was deſigned for accommodating the Gentile proſelytes in their worſhip, not only kept the daily market there, of ſuch things as were neceſſary in offering ſacrifices, but ſuffered the common porters, in going from one part of the city to another, to paſs through it with their burdens, for the ſake of ſhortening their way: But as theſe abuſes occaſioned great diſturbance to the proſelytes, Jeſus reformed them a ſecond time, ſee John ii. 14. telling the people around him that the Gentiles worſhipped there by divine appointment, as well as the Jews; the temple being ordained of God to be the houſe of prayer for all nations, Mark xi. 17. and to prove this, he cited Iſai. lvi. 7. from which the inference was plain, that they were guilty of a groſs profanation of the temple, who carried on any traffick even in the courts of the Gentiles; much more they, who, to make gain, committed frauds and extortions in the proſecution of their traffick; becauſe thus they turned God's houſe of prayer into a den of thieves. The expreſſion of a den of thieves may allude to thoſe gangs of robbers, which at that time infeſted Judea, and uſed to hide themſelves in the holes or dens of the mountains, as appears from ſeveral paſſages in Joſephus's hiſtory; not but that our bleſſed Saviour here plainly refers to Jeremiah vii. 11. St. Jerome, who very juſtly thinks this one of our Lord's greateſt miracles, in his commentary on the place, gives a lively deſcription of the ſeveral artifices whereby the avaricious prieſts endeavoured to extort money. "In the temple of Jeruſalem, ſays he, the fineſt and moſt ſpacious of any in the world, where the Jews from almoſt all the countries of the earth aſſembled, ſacrifices of different kinds, ſome for the rich, and others for the poorer ſort, were offered according to the law; but, becauſe thoſe who came from diſtant countries, often wanted ſuch ſacrifices, the prieſts took the advantage of buying up all the beaſts appointed for that purpoſe, ſold them to thoſe who wanted them, and received them again at their hands; and becauſe ſome who came to worſhip were ſo very poor that they could not even purchaſe the leſſer ſacrifices, namely, birds, the prieſts placed bankers in the courts of the temple, to lend money upon ſecurity; but finding that they could not do this without tranſgreſſing the law, they had recourſe to another device, namely, to appoint a kind of pawn-brokers, inſtead of bankers; i. e. men, who for the advancing a ſmall ſum, took fruits, herbs, and other commodities, inſtead of intereſt-money. Our Lord, therefore, having obſerved this method of traffick carried on by the prieſts in his Father's houſe, not only expelled their agents, but arraigned them alſo as a band of thieves; for He is really a robber who makes lucre of religion, and whoſe worſhip is not ſo much for the veneration he has for God, as the opportunity of making his own intereſt and advantage." See Jerome on the place, Bp. Smallbrooke's Vindication of our Saviour's miracles, vol. i. ch. iv. p. 130. and the 17th ſermon, vol. ii. of my diſcourſes on the miracles.

Ver. 14—16. And the blind and the lame came to him, &c.] The opinion that Jeſus was the Meſſiah now prevailed generally; for, while he was in the temple, the blind and the lame, and other diſeaſed perſons, were brought to him in great numbers from all quarters, to be healed; many ſuch, no doubt, would be waiting in the ſeveral avenues of the temple to aſk alms, at a time when there was ſo vaſt a concourſe of people; and there ſeems a peculiar propriety in our 18 Now in the morning as he returned into the city, he hungered.

19 And when he ſaw a fig-tree in the way, he came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and ſaid unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And preſently the fig-tree withered away.

20 And when the diſciples ſaw it, they marvelled, ſaying, How ſoon is the fig-tree withered away!

21 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, Verily I ſay unto you, If ye have faith, and doubt not, ye ſhall not only do this which is done to the fig-tree, but alſo if ye ſhall ſay unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou caſt into the ſea; it ſhall be done.

22 And all things whatſoever ye ſhall aſk in prayer, believing, ye ſhall receive.

23 And when he was come into the temple, the chief prieſts and the elders of the people came unto him as he was teaching, and ſaid, By what authority doeſt thou theſe things? and who gave thee this authority?

24 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, I alſo will aſk you one thing, which if ye tell me, I in like wiſe will tell you by what authority I do theſe things.

25 The baptiſm of John, whence was it? from heaven, or of men? And they reaſoned with themſelves, ſaying, If we ſhall ſay, From heaven; he will ſay unto us, Why did ye not then believe him?

26 But if we ſhall ſay, Of men; we fear the people; for all hold John as a prophet.

Lord's multiplying theſe aſtoniſhing miracles, both to vindicate the extraordinary act of authority which he had juſt been performing, and to make this his laſt viſit to Jeruſalem as convincing as poſſible, that thoſe who would not ſubmit to him, might be left ſo much the more inexcuſable. Upon this occaſion the very children, when they ſaw the cures which he performed, proclaimed him the Son of David; ſo wonderfully were they ſtruck with his miracles. Indeed, the chief prieſts and doctors, finding him thus univerſally acknowledged, were highly diſpleaſed; yet they durſt not do any thing to put a ſtop to it, as ſtanding in awe of the multitude. They only aſked him if he heard what the children ſaid, ver. 16. inſinuating, that it was his duty to ſtop their mouths, by refuſing the praiſes which they offered without underſtanding what they ſaid. Jeſus anſwered them out of the 8th Pſalm, where David obſerves, that though all ſhould be ſilent, God has no need of other heralds to proclaim his praiſe, than infants who hang at their mother's breaſts; becauſe though they be dumb, the admirable providence of God conſpicuous in their preſervation, is equal to the loudeſt and ſublimeſt eloquence. To ordain ſtrength, which is the phraſe uſed by the Pſalmiſt in the paſſage here referred to, was in effect to perfect praiſe, as the LXX render it; ſo that there is no need to be ſolicitous about that little variance in the quotation. This general obſervation of David was greatly illuſtrated by the hoſannahs of the children, and yet much more by the triumph of the Apoſtles,—weak as they were in many reſpects,—over all the oppoſitions of Jews and Gentiles. But ſee the note on Pſ. viii. 2.

Ver. 17. Into Bethany] Unto. Wat. and MS. See the note on John xi. 1.

Ver. 18—22. Now in the morning, &c.] I ſhall poſtpone the remarks on this miracle to Mark xi. as it is there related with ſome circumſtances which require particular notice; obſerving only that our Lord curſed the fig-tree in the morning of the day on which he caſt the buyers and ſellers out of the temple: and though the tree began at that inſtant to wither, the diſciples did not take notice of its withering, becauſe they left the ſpot juſt as Jeſus was pronouncing the curſe; neither did they obſerve it in the evening, as they returned to Bethany, probably becauſe it was dark when they paſſed by, and the tree was at a little diſtance from the road. They obſerved it only as they were going into the town next morning, when it gave occaſion to the converſation concerning the efficacy of faith; but the withering of the fig-tree, and the converſation occaſioned thereby, having a connection, might either be related among the tranſactions of the day wherein the converſation occaſioned by its withering happened, or they might be related ſeparately, each in its own day. This ſuggeſts an eaſy reconciliation of the ſeemingly different times which are aſſigned to this miracle by Matthew and Mark. Matthew, in the beginning of his account, is ſtill deſcribing the tranſactions of the day on which Jeſus curſed the fig-tree as he went to purge the temple; But in the morning, viz. of the day, the tranſactions of which the Evangeliſt had been relating, not the morning of the day following, as is commonly ſuppoſed: In the morning, as he returned into the city, he had hungered (επεινασε, Aoriſt.) ver. 19. and ſeeing a ſingle fig-tree (συκην μιαν) in the way, he came to it, and found nothing thereon but leaves only, and ſaid unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever; and (εξηρανθη παραχρημα—Exaruit illico, Beza,) it withered forthwith; that is, began to wither from that time forth, though the diſciples did not then obſerve it, becauſe they paſſed by while Jeſus was pronouncing the curſe; neither did they obſerve it as they came out in the evening, becauſe in all probability it was dark,—ver. 20. And when the diſciples ſaw it,—ſaw the fig-tree withered from the roots, i. e. next morning, as they were returning to the city from Bethany;—for ſo we are expreſly told in the more particular account which Mark has given of this miracle;—They marvelled, ſaying, how ſoon is the fig-tree withered away! The ſolution ariſing from the tranſlation of the paſſage here offered, ſeems the moſt natural that can be given. For, as Matthew choſe to relate the curſing of the fig-tree, and the effect of the curſe togetoer, it was proper to ſpeak of the curſe, after relating the other tranſactions of the day whereon it happened, though it was pronounced in the morning. The reaſon was, by narrating it laſt, he of courſe connected it with its effect, which was the firſt tranſaction of the next day to be mentioned in the hiſtory. The ſacred volume furniſhes ſeveral examples of incidental hiſtories introduced in this manner. For inſtance; the hiſtory of John the Baptiſt's death, ch. xiv. 3. See alſo Mark xvi. 7. and Luke ix. 46. where it is ſaid, Now there had ariſen a diſpute among them, viz. on the road to Capernaum; for St. Mark ſays expreſly that the diſpute happened there.

Ver. 23—26. And when he was come, &c.] The rulers, much alarmed at the proceedings of Jeſus, were very deſirous of putting him to death; but they wiſhed to do it under the pretext of law. See ver. 46. and Mark xi. 18. In conſequence of their intentions to do ſo, the chief prieſts, ſcribes, and elders, i. e. ſome of the firſt men of the nation, came by appointment of the Sanhedrim to Jeſus, as he was teaching in the temple, and before all the people put two queſtions to him. The firſt was, concerning the nature of the authority by which he acted, whether as a prophet, a prieſt, or a king, no other perſon having a right to make any reformation in church or ſtate. The ſecond queſtion was, that if he claimed the authority of any, or all of thoſe characters, they deſired to know from whom he derived it, ver. 23. Jeſus, that he might at once reprove the impropriety of the queſtion in thoſe circumſtances, and, in fact, return an unexceptionable, though oblique anſwer to it, ſaid to them in reply, I alſo will aſk, &c. ver. 24, 25. This queſtion reduced the prieſts to an inextricable dilemma. They conſidered, on the one hand, that if they ſhould acknowledge John's miſſion to be from God, it would oblige them to acknowledge Chriſt's authority; John having more than once borne teſtimony to him as the Meſſiah. On the other hand, if they denied John's authority, they did not know but the people who ſtood round them liſtening to Jeſus might ſtone them, for they generally believed John to have been a prophet: many of them had ſubmitted to his baptiſm, and his reputation by no means ended with his life; not a few then holding him in high eſteem, both on Chriſt's account and his own. See Luke xx. 6. and the note on ch. xiv. 10. Wherefore, as matters ſtood, they judged it ſafeſt to anſwer, that they could not tell whence John's baptiſm was. By returning this anſwer, the prieſts left Jeſus at liberty to decline giving the Sanhedrim that ſatisfaction which they were demanding. That court, whoſe prerogative it was to judge of prophets, required our Lord to make good his pretenſions to the character he aſſumed; but by the queſtion which he put to them, he obliged them to confeſs, that they had not been able to paſs any judgement upon John Baptiſt, notwithſtanding he claimed the character of a meſſenger from God, and they had ſent to examine his pretenſions: This, in effect, was to acknowledge themſelves incapable of judging of any prophet whatſoever. "Ye are come, ſaid he, to enquire into the proofs of my miſſion. I agree to ſubmit myſelf to your examination, on condition that you will tell me what you determination was concerning John. Was he a true, or a falſe prophet? You ſay, you cannot tell. If then you are not able to form a judgement concerning John, how can you take upon you to judge of me?" In this light our Lord's queſtion in anſwer to theirs appears to have been formed with the greateſt wiſdom and addreſs; becauſe, whether the prieſts replied in the affirmative or negative, or gave no reply at all, they abſolutely condemned themſelves. See Macknight, Grotius, Calmet.

27 And they anſwered Jeſus, and ſaid, We cannot tell. And he ſaid unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do theſe things.

28 But what think ye? A certain man had two ſons; and he came to the firſt, and ſaid, Son, go work to-day in my vineyard.

29 He anſwered and ſaid, I will not; but afterward he repented, and went.

30 And he came to the ſecond, and ſaid likewiſe. And he anſwered and ſaid, I go, ſir; and went not.

31 Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They ſay unto him, The firſt. Jeſus ſaith unto them, Verily I ſay unto you, That the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you.

32 For John came unto you in the way of righteouſneſs, and ye believed him not: but the publicans and the harlots believed him. And ye, when ye had ſeen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him.

33 Hear another parable: There was a certain houſholder which planted a vineyard, and hedged it round about, and digged a wine-preſs in it, and built a tower, and let it out to huſbandmen, and went into a far country:

34 And when the time of the fruit drew near, he ſent his ſervants to the huſbandmen, that they might receive the fruits of it.

35 And the huſbandmen took his ſervants, and beat one, and killed another, and ſtoned another.

36 Again, he ſent other ſervants, more than the firſt: and they did unto them likewiſe.

37 But laſt of all, he ſent unto them his ſon, ſaying, They will reverence my ſon.

38 But when the huſbandmen ſaw the ſon, they ſaid among themſelves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us ſeize on his inheritance.

Ver. 27. Neither tell I you] "I do not think it at all neceſſary to tell you by what authority I do theſe things; for the other queſtion concerning John, naturally requires to be determined firſt; and when you think proper to decide that, you may eaſily perceive that the ſame anſwer will ſerve for both." Which was plainly the caſe; for, as on the one hand, the expreſs teſtimony which John bore to Chriſt muſt be a ſufficient proof of his divine miſſion, if that of John was allowed, (ſince according to a Jewiſh maxim, the teſtimony of one prophet was ſufficient to confirm the authority of another); ſo Chriſt had ſpoken in ſuch an honourable manner of John, that to condemn John as an impoſtor, would imply a like cenſure on the character of Jeſus.

Ver. 28—30. But what think you? a certain man, &c.] Becauſe the chief prieſts and elders had ſaid that they did not know from whence John's baptiſm was, Jeſus ſharply rebuked them for diſbelieving him: He conveyed his reproof under the parable of two ſons, who were commanded to work in their father's vineyard; and by aſking their opinion of the behaviour of theſe ſons, he made them condemn themſelves. See on ch. xiii. 3. The temper and behaviour of the ſecond ſon, was an exact picture of the temper and behaviour of the Phariſees; for, in their prayers and praiſes, they gave God the moſt honourable titles, and profeſſed the utmoſt zeal to ſerve him; but at the ſame time would do no part of the work which he enjoined them, and particularly would not hearken to the Baptiſt's exhortations. In the character of the other ſon, the diſpoſition of the tax-gatherers and harlots is well deſcribed. They neither profeſſed nor promiſed to do the will of God; yet, when they came to think ſeriouſly, they ſubmitted themſelves firſt to John, then to Chriſt, and in conſequence of their faith amended their lives. See Macknight, Chemnitz, and my ſermon on this ſubject in the diſcourſes on the parables. Inſtead of 'Εγώ, ver. 30. I, an anonymous author in Wolfius, Curæ Philol. propoſes to read Αγώ, I go, as ch. xxvi. 46. and John vi. 7.

Ver. 31, 32. They ſay unto him, the firſt] It ſeems that the Phariſees did not perceive that by this anſwer they condemned themſelves, till Jeſus made a direct application of the parable in that ſharp, but juſt reproof, Verily, I ſay unto you, that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For, ver. 32. though you pretend that you do not know from whence John's baptiſm was, John came unto you in the way of righteouſneſs; he clearly proved his miſſion from God, and ye believed him not,—gave no credit to the teſtimony which he bare to me; and conſequently would not go into the vineyard; but the publicans and the harlots believed him; they received his teſtimony, and obeyed the Goſpel; and ye when ye had ſeen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him; when you had perſons of the moſt abandoned characters reformed by his ſermons, (which doubtleſs was a ſtrong proof of his miſſion from God) you did not repent of your oppoſition to that holy man; nor of your diſobedience to his inſtructions; at leaſt, your remorſe was not of ſuch a kind as to make you afterwards believe him." Dr. Heylin renders the laſt clauſe, And though you ſaw that, yet you did not repent, ſo as to believe him.

The moral reflection ſuggeſted by this paſſage of the hiſtory is, that the openly profane are more apt to repent than hypocrites; which experience alſo ſhews to be true. The reaſon is, perſons openly profane have nothing by which they can defend themſelves againſt the terrors of God, when once they begin to faſten upon their conſciences. Whereas hypocrites, having a form of godlineſs, ſcreen themſelves therewith from all the attacks that can be made upon them by the ſtrongeſt arguments, drawn whether from reaſon, or from the word of God. See as above.

Ver. 33. Hear another parable] Not ſatisfied with ſhewing the rulers the heinouſneſs of their ſin, in rejecting the Baptiſt, Jeſus judged it proper likewiſe publickly to repreſent the crime of the nation, in rejecting all the meſſengers of God, from firſt to laſt; and among the reſt, his only-begotten Son; and diſapproving the Moſaical diſpenſation under which they lived: At the ſame time he warned them plainly of their danger, by reaſon of the puniſhment which they incurred on account of ſuch a continued courſe of rebellion. The outward œconomy of religion, in which they gloried, was to be taken from them; their relation to God, as his people, cancelled; and their national conſtitution deſtroyed: But, becauſe theſe were topicks extremely diſagreeable, he couched them under the veil of a parable, which he formed upon one made uſe of long before by the prophet Iſaiah, ch. v. 1. where ſee the notes. This vineyard, with its appurtenances, repreſents the Moſaical diſpenſation; a diſpenſation attended with great preſent advantages, and many promiſes of future bleſſings: The other circumſtances of the parable are extremely clear; but thoſe deſirous of an exact and minute interpretation of them, will find it in my ſermon on the ſubject. St. Matthew uſes the word ληνὸν for a wine preſs, and St. Mark ὑπολήνιον; the former ſignifies the wine preſs, the other the cavity under it, wherein the veſſel was fixed which received the liquor preſſed from the grapes. The one of theſe naturally implies the other; but our Lord might, without any impropriety, mention both.

Ver. 37. Laſt of all, he ſent unto them his ſon] That no means might be left untried, God ſent unto them his own Son; whoſe authority, clearly eſtabliſhed by undeniable miracles, ought to have been acknowledged with chearfulneſs by theſe wicked men. The queſtion is not here, how prudent it would have been in an human father to venture his ſon in ſuch a caſe as this; for the power which God had of raiſing Chriſt from the dead, and making all his ſufferings redound to his glory and happineſs, quite alters the caſe. The deſign is, to ſhew the patience of God, and the wickedneſs of the Jews by this emblem, than which nothing can be more expreſſive. See the note on Luke xx. 13.

Ver. 38, 39. When the huſbandmen ſaw the ſon] It would ſeem from hence, that the Jews knew Jeſus to be the Son of God. Yet Peter ſays both of the rulers and the people, that they crucified the Lord ignorantly, Acts iii. 17. and our Lord himſelf prays for them as not knowing what they did. It is evident indeed that the rulers, for very malice, cauſed him to be crucified, yet it is not at all improbable, that though they could not but confeſs him to be ſome great perſon or prophet, yet they might be far from being convinced that he was the Meſſiah. The Apoſtles themſelves, notwithſtanding they had been eye-witneſſes of all his miracles, and had the advantage of hearing all his diſcourſes, doubted whether he was the Meſſiah while he lay in the grave: There can therefore be no impropriety, in ſuppoſing that the unbelieving Jews were in the ſame ſtate of mind. And if ſo, where is the inconſiſtency in ſaying, that though they put him to death as a prophet, they did not crucify him as the Meſſiah? That this was really their opinion, is evident both from Sacred Hiſtory, and from the general ſentiments of their deſcendants, even 39 And they caught him, and caſt him out of the vineyard, and ſlew him.

40 When the lord therefore of the vineyard cometh, what will he do unto thoſe huſbandmen?

41 They ſay unto him, He will miſerably deſtroy thoſe wicked men, and will let out his vineyard unto other huſbandmen, which ſhall render him the fruits in their ſeaſons.

42 Jeſus ſaith unto them, Did ye never read in the ſcriptures, The ſtone which the builders rejected, the ſame is become the head of the corner: this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes?

43 Therefore ſay I unto you, The kingdom of God ſhall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof.

44 And whoſoever ſhall fall on this ſtone, ſhall be broken: but on whomſoever it ſhall fall, it will grind him to powder.

45 And when the chief prieſts and Phariſees had heard his parables, they perceived that he ſpake of them.

46 But when they ſought to lay hands on him, they feared the multitude, becauſe they took him for a prophet.

Ver. 41. See Luke xx. 16.—V. 42. Pſ. cxviii. 22. Acts iv. 11.—V. 43. Ch. viii. 12.—V. 44. Iſai. viii. 14, 15. Zech. xii. 3. Luke xx. 18. Rom. ix. 33. 1 Pet. ii. 7. Iſai. lx. 12. Dan. ii. 34.—V. 46. Luke vii. 16. John vii. 40.

to this day. Our Lord's words may bear another ſenſe, and imply, that though it be granted they acknowledged his being the Meſſiah, and thought that in putting him to death, they were anſwerable for the death of a mere mortal only, yet they were ignorant of his eſſential dignity, and the near relation in which he ſtood to his heavenly Father. Yet after all, this, like the other circumſtances of their ſeizing upon the inheritance, may be added to heighten and complete the parable, without being intended to convey any particular and independant truth. For it is the nature of a parable, as well as of a fable, or an hiſtorical picture, to convey ſome general truth to the mind, reſulting from the whole aſſemblage of circumſtances or figures taken collectively; but not to convey particular truths from any ſingle circumſtance or figure conſidered as ſeparate, detached from, or independant of the reſt. St. Matthew and St. Luke ſay, That the huſbandmen caſt the ſon out of the vineyard, and killed him, (ver. 39.) St. Mark ſays, They firſt killed him, and then caſt him out: But his meaning may have been this; they ſo beat and bruiſed him, before they caſt him out, that he could not live; and after having caſt him out, they completed the murder, killing him outright. The manner in which St. Mark has expreſſed it, inſinuates, that after they had killed him, they threw out his body, without burial, to the dogs; a circumſtance which does not ſeem to have any particular meaning, but is formed to ſhew the greatneſs of the rebellion of theſe huſbandmen. If ſuch a propoſal as that before us, come, let us kill him, &c. would have been the height of folly, as well as wickedneſs in theſe huſbandmen, it was ſo much the more proper to repreſent the part the Jewiſh rulers acted in the murder of Chriſt, which they were now projecting, and which they accompliſhed within three days. The admonition was moſt graciouſly given; but ſerved only, in an aſtoniſhing manner, to illuſtrate that degree of hardneſs to which a ſinful heart is capable of arriving. See Macknight, Doddridge, and Chemnitz.

Ver. 40—42. When the Lord therefore—cometh] According to St. Mark and St. Luke, Jeſus anſwered this queſtion himſelf; which, according to St. Matthew, the prieſts anſwered: This apparent inconſiſtency may be reconciled by ſuppoſing, that after they had ſaid to him, God forbid! as St. Luke tells us, they repeated his words ironically,—He will miſerably deſtroy thoſe wicked men, &c. ſpeaking with a tone of voice expreſſive of the diſpoſition of their mind; and then added contemptuouſly, "which will render him the fruits in their ſeaſons, which will behave better, no doubt, than we have done:" For they underſtood his parables, and deſigned to affront him by ridiculing what he ſaid. Beſides, unleſs we ſuppoſe that the prieſts ſpoke theſe words ironically, the anſwer which St. Matthew tells us Jeſus returned to them, will loſe much of its force, becauſe it implies that the prieſts had denied the vineyard was to be taken from them, and given to others. Jeſus ſaith, (ver. 42.) did ye never read, &c. "If the vineyard is not to be taken from you, and given to others, what is the meaning of Pſ. cxviii. 22.? Doth not that paſſage of Scripture plainly foretel, that the Meſſiah ſhall be rejected by the Jewiſh great men, and that though they crucify him, He ſhall become the head of the corner, or of the church? Now what elſe is this, but that he ſhall be believed on by the Gentiles, and unite them to the church of God, as an head corner-ſtone unites the two ſides of a building?" Accordingly St. Luke expreſſes the connection of our Lord's anſwer with their denial more clearly, ch. xx. 17. See the note on Pſ. cxviii. 16. Jeffery's Review, p. 119. and Macknight. Heinſius, Capellus, and others, remove the difficulty in another way. "Could the chief prieſts, ſay they, reply, He will miſerably deſtroy, &c. who in Luke xx. 16. anſwer, on the contrary, God forbid! Λεγουσιν αυτω, they ſay unto him, ſhould be left out; and ver. 43. ſhould follow the 41ſt verſe, all being the words of Chriſt; and then ſhould follow the 42d and 44th verſes; what will he do to thoſe huſbandmen? ver. 41. He will deſtroy thoſe wicked men, and let out his vineyard, ver. 43. Therefore I ſay unto you, the kingdom of God ſhall be taken from you, ver. 42. Did you never read—the ſtone, &c. ver. 44. Whoſoever ſhall fall on this ſtone, &c." See Bowyer's Greek Teſtament. Dr. Waterland reads ver. 42. The ſame is made the head of the corner? By the Lord was it made; and it is wonderful, &c.

Ver. 43, 44. Therefore ſay, &c.] "For the reaſon that God himſelf has expreſly foretold this judgement as to happen to you, and becauſe it is a moſt righteous and equitable judgement, I aſſure you it will fall upon you, however you may deſpiſe or diſbelieve. The theocracy,—the outward œconomy of religion, which you have long enjoyed very unprofitably, ſhall be taken from you, and given to the Gentiles; who, whatever you may think of them, will improve it far better than you have done." Theſe words ſeem to confirm the firſt method of ſolving the difficulties mentioned in the laſt note: For had the prieſts ſpoken ſeriouſly, our Lord need not have been at the pains to produce texts of Scripture to prove what they had ſo fully acknowledged. "Whoever, ſhall fall on this ſtone, continues our Lord, which the builders have rejected, but which God will make the head ſtone of the corner, ſhall be broken. See Rom. ix. 33. Whoſoever ignorantly oppoſes the Meſſiah, ſhall thereby receive great harm to himſelf,—in alluſion to one's ſtumbling at a ſtone thrown aſide as uſeleſs; But on whomſoever it ſhall fall, it will grind him to powder." Our Saviour ſeems to have had in view, Dan. ii. 34. where the deſtruction of all the oppoſers of the Meſſiah's kingdom is deſcribed thus: "Thou ſaweſt, till that a ſtone was cut without hands, which ſmote the image upon his feet, that were of iron and clay, and brake them in pieces; v. 35. then was the iron, the clay, the braſs, the ſilver, and the gold broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the ſummer threſhing-floor, and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them; and the ſtone that ſmote the image became a great mountain, and filled the earth. Our Lord's meaning is, that all the oppoſers of the Meſſiah's kingdom, called ver. 43. the kingdom of God, and by Daniel, the kingdom of the God of heaven, ch. ii. 44. ſhall be utterly deſtroyed, according to Daniel's viſion of the image. The firſt clauſe, whoſoever ſhall fall, &c. ſeems to deſcribe the ſin and puniſhment of the great men, who being chiefs in the rebellion, led the way to the reſt, and had an active hand in reſiſting the authority of the Meſſiah. See Macknight. Doddridge explains it, "Whoſoever ſhall ſtumble at me and my doctrine, while I am here on earth in this humble form, he ſhall be broken and damaged by it; but whoſoever ſhall oppoſe me after my exaltation to glory, and the pouring out of my Spirit for the full revelation of my Goſpel, and proof of my miſſion; he will bring upon himſelf aggravated guilt, and unavoidable deſtruction." See Wetſtein.

Ver. 24. They perceived that he ſpoke of them] One would think they could have been at no loſs for the interpretation of the parable, conſidering how nearly it reſembles that in Iſai. v. 1, &c. with which they were doubtleſs well acquainted: only it is to be obſerved, that there Iſrael is the vineyard; here the true religion is repreſented under that figure. Accordingly it is there threatened, that the vineyard ſhould be deſtroyed; but here, that it ſhould be let out to other huſbandmen, each event ſuiting its connection. See Doddridge and Calmet.

REFLECTIONS ON CHRIST'S PROCESSION TO THE TEMPLE.

Never did our Saviour take ſo much ſtate upon him as now that he was going to his paſſion. Other journies he meaſured on foot, without train or tumult; this with a princely equipage, and loud acclamations. Wherein yet, O Saviour, whether ſhall we moſt admire, thy majeſty, or thy humility?—That Divine Majeſty, which lay hid under ſo lowly an appearance, or that ſincere humility, which veiled ſo great a glory? Thou, O Lord, whoſe chariots are twenty thouſand, even thouſands of angels, wouldeſt chooſe one of the meaneſt of animals to carry thee in thy laſt, thy royal progreſs: How well is thy birth ſuited with thy triumphs! Even that very aſs whereon thou didſt ride was the ſubject of prophecy; neither couldeſt thou have completed thoſe vatical predictions without this conveyance. O glorious, and yet homely pomp!

Jeſus would not loſe aught of his right; He who was a king, would be ſo proclaimed: But, that it might appear his kingdom was not of this world, he who could have demanded all worldly magnificence, thought fit to relinquiſh it. Inſtead of the kings of the earth, who reigning by thee, thou King of kings, and Lord of lords, might have been employed in thine attendants;—the people

CHAP. XXII.

The parable of the marriage of the king's ſon. The vocation of the Gentiles. The puniſhment of him that wanted the wedding-garment. Tribute ought to be paid to Cæſar. Chriſt confuteth the Sadducees about the reſurrection, anſwereth the lawyer which is the firſt and great commandment, and embarraſſeth the Phariſees about the Meſſias.

AND Jeſus anſwered, and ſpake unto them again by parables, and ſaid,

2 The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his ſon;

3 And ſent forth his ſervants to call them

Ver. 1. Luke xiv. 16. Rev. xix. 7, 9.

are thine heralds, their homely garments thy carpets, their green boughs the ſtrewings of thy way. Thoſe palms, which were wont to be borne in the hands of them who triumph, are ſtrewed under the feet of thy beaſt: It was thy greatneſs and honour to contemn the glories which worldly hearts are apt ſo much to admire.

Juſtly did thy followers hold the beſt ornaments of the earth worthy of no better than thy treading upon: How happily did they think their backs, diſrobed for thy honour! How gladly did they employ their breath in hoſannahs to thee, the Son of David! Where now are the great maſters of the ſynagogue, who had enacted the ejection of whoſoever ſhould confeſs Jeſus to be the Chriſt? Lo here, bold and undaunted clients of the Meſſiah, who dare proclaim him in the public road, in the open ſtreets! In vain ſhall the impotent enemies of Chriſt hope to ſuppreſs his glory: as ſoon may they hide with the palm of their hand the face of the ſun, as with-hold the beams of his divine truth from the eyes of men by their envious oppoſition. In ſpite of all Jewiſh malignity, his kingdom is avowed, applauded, bleſſed.

O thou fairer than the children of men, in thy majeſty ride on proſperouſly, becauſe of truth, of meekneſs, and righteouſneſs; and thy right-hand ſhall teach thee terrible things!

In this princely, yet poor and deſpicable pomp, doth our Saviour enter into the famous city of Jeruſalem; Jeruſalem noted of old for the ſeat of kings, prieſts, and prophets. Thither would Jeſus come as a king, as a prieſt, as a prophet; acclaimed as a king; teaching the people, and foretelling the woeful devaſtation of the city, as a prophet; and as a prieſt, taking poſſeſſion of his temple, and vindicating it from the foul profanations of Jewiſh ſacrilege.

As all the world was bound to the Redeemer for his incarnation and reſidence upon earth, ſo eſpecially Judea, to whoſe limits he confined himſelf; and therein, above all the reſt, three cities, Nazareth, Capernaum, and Jeruſalem, on whom he beſtowed the moſt time, the greateſt labour of preaching, and the moſt miraculous works;—yet in all three he received not ſtrange entertainment only, but hoſtile. In Nazareth they would have caſt him down headlong from the mount; in Capernaum they would have bound him; in Jeruſalem they crucified him at laſt;—and now are amazed at his preſence. Thoſe places and perſons which have the greateſt helps and privileges afforded to them are not always the moſt anſwerable in the return of their thankfulneſs. Chriſt's being amongſt us doth not make us happy, but his welcome; every day we may hear him in our ſtreets, and yet be as much to ſeek concerning him as thoſe citizens of Jeruſalem,—Who is this?

The attending diſciples could not be at a loſs for an anſwer; which of the prophets have not put it into their mouths?—Who is this? Aſk Moſes, and he ſhall tell you; the ſeed of the woman, who ſhall bruiſe the ſerpent's head. Aſk your father Jacob, and he ſhall tell you,—the Shiloh, of the tribe of Judah. Aſk David, and he ſhall tell you,—the King of Glory. Aſk Iſaiah, and he ſhall tell you,—Emmanuel, wonderful, counſellor, the mighty God, the everlaſting Father, the Prince of Peace! Aſk Jeremiah, and he ſhall tell you,—the Righteous Branch. Aſk Daniel, he ſhall tell you,—the Meſſiah. Aſk John the Baptiſt, he ſhall tell you,—the LAMB OF GOD—If you aſk the GOD of the prophets, He hath told you,—This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed Yea, if all theſe be too good for you to conſult with, the very devils themſelves have been forced to confeſs, I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. On no ſide hath Chriſt left himſelf without a teſtimony; and accordingly the multitude have their anſwer ready, This is JESUS, the prophet of Nazareth in Galilee.

With this humble pomp and juſt acclamation, O Saviour, doſt thou paſs through the ſtreets of Jeruſalem to the temple, as a good ſon, when he comes from far, alights firſt at his father's houſe. Neither would he think it otherwiſe than prepoſterous to viſit ſtrangers before his friends, or friends before his father. Beſides, the temple had more need of thy preſence; there was the moſt diſorder, and from thence, as from a corrupt ſpring, it iſſued forth into all the channels of Jeruſalem. A wiſe phyſician inquires firſt into the ſtate of the chief and vital parts; ſurely all good or evil begins at the temple. If God have his due there; if men find there nothing but wholſome inſtruction and holy example, the commonwealth cannot want ſome happy tincture of piety, devotion, ſanctimony,—as that fragrant perfume from Aaron's head ſweetens the utmoſt ſkirts of his garments. On the contrary, the diſtempers of the temple cannot but affect the ſecular ſtate. As therefore the good huſbandman, when he ſees the leaves grow yellow, and the branches unthriving, looks preſently to the roots, ſo didſt thou, O holy Saviour, upon ſight of the diſorder ſpread over Jeruſalem, addreſs thyſelf to the rectifying the temple.

No ſooner is Chriſt alighted at the gate of the outer court of his Father's houſe, than he ſets about the great work of reformation, which was his errand into the world. With what fear and aſtoniſhment did the repining offenders look upon ſo unexpected a corrector? whilſt their conſcience laſhed them more than thoſe cords, and the terror of that meek chaſtiſer more affrighted them than his blows. Is this that mild and gentle Saviour, who came to take upon him our ſtripes, and to undergo the chaſtiſement of our peace? Is this that quiet lamb, which before his ſhearers openeth not his mouth? See now how his radiant eyes ſparkle with holy anger! and dart forth beams of indignation in the faces of theſe guilty money-changers! Yea thus, thus it became thee, O thou gracious Redeemer of men, to let the world ſee thou haſt not loſt thy juſtice in thy mercy; that there is not more lenity in thy forbearances, than rigour in thy juſt ſeverity; that thou canſt thunder as well as ſhine.

None but the hand of public authority muſt reform the abuſes of the temple: if all be out of courſe there, no man is prevented from ſorrow. The grief may reach to all; the power of reformation only to thoſe whom it concerns. It was but a juſt queſtion, though ill propounded, to Moſes, Who made thee a ruler, or a judge! We may all imitate the zeal of our Saviour, but not his correction. If we ſtrike uncalled, we are juſtly ſtricken for our arrogance, our preſumption. A tumultuary remedy may prove a medicine much worſe than the diſeaſe.

But what ſhall we ſay of ſo ſharp and imperious an act from ſo meek an agent? Why did not the prieſts and Levites, to whom the gain principally belonged, abett theſe money-changers, and make head againſt Chriſt? Why did not thoſe multitudes of men ſtand upon their defence, and wreſt the ſcourge out of the hand of a ſeemingly weak and unarmed prophet;—but, inſtead hereof, run away like ſheep from before him, not daring to abide his preſence, though his hand had been ſtill?—Surely had theſe men been ſo many armies, yea, ſo many legions of devils, when God will aſtoniſh and chaſe them, they cannot have the power to ſtand and reſiſt! How eaſy is it for him who made the heart, to put either terror or courage into it at pleaſure! It was none of thy leaſt miracles, Almighty Saviour, that thou didſt thus drive out a multitude of able offenders, in ſpite of their gains and reſentful reſolutions. Their very profit had no power to ſtay them againſt thy frowns. Who hath reſiſted, who can reſiſt thy will?—Mens hearts are not their own; they are, they muſt be ſuch as their maker will have them. Turn therefore, Lord, our hearts to thee, and by thy powerful grace make us ſuch as thou wouldeſt have us, and then we cannot fail both to pleaſe thee, and to be truly bleſſed.

Chap. XXII. Ver. 1, 2. And Jeſus anſwered, &c.] The rulers being afraid to apprehend Jeſus, he was at liberty to proceed in the duties of his miniſtry. Accordingly he delivered another parable, wherein he deſcribed, on one hand, the bad ſucceſs which the preaching of the Goſpel was to have among the Jews, who for that reaſon were to be deſtroyed; and on the other, the chearful reception it was to meet with among the Gentiles, who thereupon were to be admitted into the church of God. The kingdom of heaven may be compared to a king, who made a marriage feaſt for his ſon; for Γαμος ſignifies not only a marriage, but the feaſt at a marriage, or any great entertainment whatever: in which latter ſenſe it ſeems evidently to be uſed here. "God's gracious deſign in giving the Goſpel to men, and the ſucceſs with which the preaching of it will be attended, may be illuſtrated by the behaviour of a certain king, who, in honour of his ſon, made a great feaſt, to which he invited many gueſts." This marriage ſupper, or great feaſt, ſignifies the joys of heaven, (ſee Rev. xix. 9.) which are fitly compared to an elegant entertainment, on account of their exquiſiteneſs, fullneſs, and duration; and they are here ſaid to be prepared in honour of the Son of God, becauſe they are beſtowed on men as the reward of his obedience. Our Lord is frequently repreſented in Scripture under the character of a bridegroom. See ch. ix. 15. Luke v. 34. John iii. 29. the notes on Luke xiv. 16, &c. Macknight and Wolfius.

Ver. 3. And ſent forth his ſervants] It was ſometimes cuſtomary to ſend two meſſages, as in the caſe here ſuppoſed, which repreſented the condeſcenſion the greater, and ſuited the repeated invitations given to the Jews by Chriſt himſelf during his life, and by the Apoſtles after his death. The invitation which preceded the call at the hour of ſupper, may ſignify the vocation of the Jews, by which they became the people of God, and in conſequence whereof, they had the call given them at that hour; that is, when the fulneſs of time approached, they had the Goſpel, the call to the great feaſt of heaven, preached to them, firſt by John the Baptiſt, and next by Jeſus himſelf: But they would not come. Though preſſed and invited to enter into the kingdom of heaven, they would not obey, but rejected the Goſpel.

that were bidden to the wedding: and they would not come.

4 Again he ſent forth other ſervants, ſaying, Tell them which are bidden, Behold, I have prepared my dinner: my oxen and my fatlings are killed, and all things are ready: come unto the marriage.

5 But they made light of it, and went their ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandiſe:

6 And the remnant took his ſervants, and entreated them ſpitefully, and ſlew them.

7 But when the king heard thereof, he was wroth: and he ſent forth his armies, and deſtroyed thoſe murderers, and burned up their city.

8 Then ſaith he to his ſervants, The wedding is ready, but they which were bidden were not worthy.

9 Go ye therefore into the highways, and as many as ye ſhall find, bid to the marriage.

10 So thoſe ſervants went out into the high-ways, and gathered together all as many as they found, both bad and good: and the wedding was furniſhed with gueſts.

11 And when the king came in to ſee the gueſts, he ſaw there a man which had not on a wedding-garment:

12 And he ſaith unto him, Friend, how cameſt thou in hither, not having a wedding-garment? And he was ſpeechleſs.

Ver. 4. Again he ſent forth other ſervants] After Chriſt's reſurrection and aſcenſion, the Apoſtles were ſent to inform the Jews, that the Goſpel covenant was eſtabliſhed, manſions in heaven were prepared, and nothing was wanting, but that they ſhould chearfully accept of the honour deſigned them. It was agreeable to the ſimplicity of the ancient ages to mention oxen and fatlings as the chief parts of a royal entertainment. Thus, in Homer and other ancient writers, we ſee princes of the firſt rank and dignity feaſting each other with nothing but the fleſh of oxen, ſheep, and ſwine. Compare Iſai. xxv. 6. Inſtead of killed, Dr. Waterland reads ſacrificed.

Ver. 5, 6. But they made light of it, &c.] The men all undervaluing the favour offered them, mocked at the meſſage, and went about their ordinary buſineſs; only ſome of them, more rude than the reſt, inſulted, beat, and ſlew the ſervants who had come to call them. The ſucceſs of the call, and the treatment which the king's ſervants met with, was deſigned to repreſent the ill ſucceſs which the Goſpel and its miniſters might expect among the Jews, who being God's choſen people, were on that account to have the firſt offers of the Goſpel made to them. They would generally reject it, preferring the world and its purſuits to the practice of piety, the favour of God, and the enjoyment of heaven. Nay, to obſtinacy they would add inſults and cruelty, perſecuting unto death the miniſters who exhorted them to believe. See diſc. 18. vol. ii. of my ſermons on the Parables.

Ver. 7. When the king heard thereof, he was wroth] The invitation to the marriage ſupper of his ſon, ſent by this king to his ſuppoſed friends, was the higheſt expreſſion of his regard for them, and the greateſt honour which could be done for them; therefore, when they refuſed it for ſuch trifling reaſons, and were ſo ſavagely ungrateful as to beat, wound, and kill the ſervants who came with it, it was a moſt outrageous affront; an injury deſerving the ſevereſt puniſhment. Accordingly the king in great wroth ſent forth his armies, to deſtroy thoſe murderers, and burn their city. This branch of the parable plainly predicted the deſtruction of the Jews by the Roman armies, called God's armies, becauſe they were appointed by him to execute vengeance upon that once favourite, but now rebellious people. The preſent clauſe muſt be ſuppoſed to come in by way of prolepſis, or anticipation; for it is plain there could not be time before the feaſt already prepared was ſerved up, to attempt an execution of this kind. It is needleſs to object, "that the circumſtances of this parable are improbable, as it was never heard of in the world that ſubjects refuſed the invitation of the ſovereign to the marriage of his ſon;" for allowing this to be ſo, it only aggravates the crime of the Jews the more, with reſpect to whom it was literally true. The honour which God offered them in the Goſpel, and which they rejected, being far greater than the honour which is conferred on a ſubject by the invitation of his prince. Moreover, the joys of heaven to which they were called, and which they refuſed, do infinitely tranſcend the pleaſures of any royal banquet. And—to carry our reflections from them to ourſelves,—how much will this conſideration condemn thoſe, who, calling themſelves by the name of Chriſt, refuſe all the gracious offers and invitations of the King of glory to the heavenly feaſt; while quick to the call of earthly honour, they are forward and zealous to accept diſtinguiſhed invitations to temporary feaſts and pleaſures!

Ver. 8—10. The wedding is ready, &c.] The 8th verſe is well explained by Acts xiii. 46, 47. which was an accompliſhment of this part of the parable. In the next verſe, the calling of the Gentiles repreſented by the king's ſervants going forth, and compelling all they met to come in, (ſee Luke xiv. 23.) whether they were maimed or halt, worthy or unworthy, good or bad; for they were to make no diſtinction. The phraſe, διεξόδους τῶν ὁδῶν, ſignifies the ways moſt frequented, the places where ſeveral ſtreets and roads met. This intimates that the Gentiles had as little reaſon to expect the call of the Goſpel, as common paſſengers and travellers to expect an invitation to a royal banquet. Dr. Clarke paraphraſes the latter part of the 10th verſe thus: "By the continual preaching of the Goſpel, many are prevailed upon to make profeſſion of religion, and to ſeek after the happineſs of the life to come." See his Sermons, vol. vii. diſc. 2.

Ver. 11. He ſaw there a man, &c.] That is, ſays Dr. Clarke, in the ſermon above quoted, "one, who making profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion, practiſes not the virtues of a Chriſtian life." It may ſeem ſtrange, that in ſuch a number of men gathered to this feaſt, there was only one found who had not on a wedding garment, and that he ſhould be puniſhed with ſuch ſeverity for wanting what he could not be expected to have, while he was performing a journey perhaps, or ſitting begging under the hedges, as appears from Luke xiv. 23. Nevertheleſs the heinouſneſs of the offence, and the equity of the ſentence that was paſſed upon him, will fully appear, if we call to mind a circumſtance, which becauſe it was common at that time, is not mentioned in the parable. The eaſterns, among whom the faſhion of cloaths was not changeable as with us, reckoned it a principal part of their magnificence to have their wardrobes ſtored with rich habits. Thus Job, ſpeaking of the wicked (ch. xxvii. 16.) ſays, Though they heap up ſilver as the duſt, and prepare raiment as the clay. Accordingly, in Scripture, when the uncertainty of earthly treaſures is ſpoken of, they are repreſented as ſubject not only to ruſt, but to moths, Matth. vi. 19. James v. 3. The matter is evident likewiſe from Horace, who tells us, that when Lucullus, the Roman general, who had enriched himſelf with the ſpoils of the eaſt, was aſked, if he could furniſh a hundred habits for the theatre? He replied, he had five thouſand in his houſe, of which they were welcome take part, or all. See epode vi. b. 1. v. 40. We may therefore naturally enough ſuppoſe, that this king, having invited his gueſts to his feaſt from the highways and hedges, would order his ſervants to make each of them a preſent of ſplendid apparel, as a farther mark of his reſpect, and that they might be all cloathed in a manner becoming the magnificence of the ſolemnity. For it cannot otherwiſe be underſtood how, among ſuch a number collected in ſuch a manner, only one ſhould have been found wanting a wedding garment, eſpecially as we are told that they gathered together all, as many as they found, both good and bad. Beſides, that the great men in the eaſt were wont to make oſtentation of their grandeur, and to expreſs their reſpect for their favourites by gifts of this kind, is evident from the preſents which Joſeph beſtowed on his brethren in Egypt, Gen. xlv. 22. and from the agreement which Samſon entered into with the gueſts at his marriage feaſt, Judges xiv. 12, 13. To conclude, in the 4th Odyſſey, ver. 47—51. Homer tells us, that Telemachus and Piſiſtratus happening to arrive at Menelaus's houſe in Lacedæmon, while he was ſolemnizing the nuptials of his ſon and daughter, the maids of the houſe waſhed the ſtrangers, anointed them, dreſſed them, and ſet them down by their maſter at table. Without all doubt, therefore, the man that was ſentenced to be bound and caſt out of doors, had been offered a wedding garment, or ſumptuous apparel, along with the reſt, but would not receive it; and ſo haughtily came in, dirty and ragged as he was. The king looking on this as a great inſult, inflicted upon the perſon that was guilty of it a puniſhment ſuitable to the demerit of his offence. What Calvin ſays concerning the wedding-garment in the parable deſerves a place here. "It is uſeleſs to diſpute about the wedding-garment, whether it be faith or a pious holy life; for neither can faith be ſeparated from good works, nor can good works proceed, except from faith. Chriſt's meaning is only that we are called in order that we may be renewed in our minds after his image; and therefore that we may remain always in his houſe, the old man with his filthineſs muſt be put off, and a new life deſigned, that our life may be ſuch as is ſuitable to ſo honourable an invitation." Dr. Doddridge obſerves, that this circumſtance of the parable is admirably adapted to the method of God's dealing with us. For he requires repentance indeed and holineſs, in order to our partaking of the happineſs of heaven; but at the ſame time he graciouſly offers to work it in us by his Holy Spirit, and therefore may juſtly puniſh our neglect of ſo great a favour. See Macknight,

Ver. 12. And he was ſpeechleſs] And he was ſtruck ſpeechleſs, MS. This 13 Then ſaid the king to the ſervants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and caſt him into outer darkneſs: there ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth.

14 For many are called, but few are choſen.

15 Then went the Phariſees, and took counſel how they might entangle him in his talk.

16 And they ſent out unto him their diſciples, with the Herodians, ſaying, Maſter, we know that thou art true, and teacheſt the way of God in truth, neither careſt thou for any man; for thou regardeſt not the perſon of men.

17 Tell us therefore, What thinkeſt thou? Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæſar, or not?

18 But Jeſus perceived their wickedneſs, and ſaid, Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites?

19 Shew me the tribute-money. And they brought unto him a penny.

20 And he ſaith unto them, Whoſe is this image and ſuperſcription?

21 They ſay unto him, Cæſar's. Then ſaith he unto them, Render therefore unto Cæſar the things which are Cæſar's; and unto God the things that are God's.

22 When they had heard theſe words, they marvelled, and left him, and went their way.

23 The ſame day came to him the Sad-is the true import of the original word ἐφιμώθη, which is rendered very improperly in our tranſlation, he was ſpeechleſs; as from hence the Engliſh reader is led to conceive, that the man was dumb, and ſo could not ſpeak; whereas he was made dumb only by ſelf-condemnation and conviction, even as Chriſt made dumb—ἐφίμωσε,—put to ſilence the Sadducees, ver. 34. and as Peter would have us make ſpeechleſs,—put to ſilence, (φιμεν) the ignorance of fooliſh men. See Gerhard's Continuation of Chemnitz's Harmony on the place. This latter part of the parable repreſents the laſt judgement; teaching us, that though the Gentiles obeyed the call of the Goſpel with more alacrity than the Jews, they would not all be ſaved by it: Without holineſs no man ſhall ſee the Lord.

Ver. 14. For many are called, &c.] Theſe words are proverbial, and muſt be referred firſt to the Jews, who though they were called in great numbers by the preaching of the Goſpel, few were choſen; for they did not believe. See on ch. xx. 16. They muſt be referred alſo to the Gentiles, who though they embraced the Goſpel, many of them rejected the wedding-garment when it was offered to them, and refuſed the gracious aſſiſtance of God's good Spirit to perfect holineſs in the fear of the Lord. The parable is concluded in this manner, to ſhew us, that the profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion will not ſave a man, unleſs he lives in a manner worthy of that religion; that not they who ſay Lord, Lord! but they who do the will of that Lord, ſhall enter into the joys of his kingdom. See the Reflections.

Ver. 15. Entangle him] Enſnare him. Wat. MS. &c.

Ver. 16. With the Herodians] Theſe, in the Syriac verſion, are termed the domeſticks, or courtiers of Herod. "Origen and St. Jerome have, in my opinion, ſays L'Enfant, rightly ſuppoſed that they were men (probably of the ſect of the Sadducees) who ſided with Herod Antipas, who, to ingratiate himſelf with the emperor, was very buſy and earneſt in raiſing the taxes." They ſeem to have been men who diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their zeal for the family of Herod; and on that account, they would be naturally zealous for the authority of the Romans, by whoſe means Herod was made and continued king; and it is probable, as Dr. Prideaux conjectures, that they might incline to conform to them in ſome particulars, which the law would not allow of; and eſpecially in the admiſſion of images, tho' not in the religious, or rather idolatrous uſe of them. Herod's attempt to ſet up a golden eagle over the eaſtern gate of the temple is well known: Theſe complaiſant courtiers would, no doubt, defend it; and the ſame temper might diſcover itſelf in many other inſtances. On all theſe accounts, they were moſt diametrically oppoſite to the Phariſees; ſo that the conjunction of their counſels againſt Chriſt is a very memorable proof of the keenneſs of that malice, which could thus cauſe them to forget ſo deep a quarrel with each other. Thus united, they reſolved to ſend certain of their diſciples to enſnare Jeſus in his words; whom they directed to feign themſelves juſt men, Luke xx. 20. men who had a great veneration for the divine law, and a dread of doing any thing inconſiſtent therewith; and under that maſk, to beg him, for the eaſe of their conſciences, to give his opinion whether they might pay taxes to the Romans, conſiſtently with their regard for their religion. It ſeems this queſtion was much debated in our Lord's time. One Judas of Galilee having taught the unlawfulneſs of paying the taxes, and gathered a numerous faction, eſpecially among the common people. The prieſts, therefore, imagined, that it was not in our Lord's power to decide the point, without making himſelf obnoxious to ſome of the parties, who divided upon it. If he ſhould ſay it was lawful to pay the taxes, they believed that the people, in whoſe hearing the queſtion was propoſed, (ſee Luke xx. 26.) would be incenſed againſt him, not only as a baſe pretender, who, on being attacked publickly, renounced the character of the Meſſiah, which he had aſſumed among his friends, but as a flatterer of princes alſo, and a betrayer of the liberties of his country; one who taught doctrines inconſiſtent with the known privileges of the people of God. For, the notion which the generality of the Jews formed of the Meſſiah, was, that he would deliver them from foreign ſervitude: If therefore he who called himſelf the Meſſiah, recommended the paying of taxes to the Romans, they could not but think this inconſiſtent with his pretenſions, nay, and an entire renunciation of them. But, if he ſhould affirm that it was unlawful to pay, the Herodians reſolved to inform the governor of it, who they hoped would puniſh him as a fomentor of ſedition. Highly elated, therefore, with their project, they came and propoſed their queſtion, after having firſt paſſed an encomium on the truth of his miſſion, and upon his courage, integrity, and impartiality, with a deſign, no doubt, to make him believe that they were his friends, and that he ought boldly to declare what the will of God was in this matter. See L'Enfant, Prideaux, Macknight, and Calmet.

Ver. 18—21. Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites?] Our Saviour called them hypocrites, to ſignify, that though they made conſcience, and a regard to the divine will their pretence for aſking the queſtion, He ſaw through their deſign, and knew that they were come to enſnare him. The Jews were ſo tenacious of the cuſtoms of their country, and had ſo high an opinion of their own holineſs, that they would not make uſe of heathen money, as appears from the buſineſs of the money-changers mentioned in the Goſpels. Probably it was for this reaſon that the Romans inſiſted on having the taxes paid in their own coin, becauſe by making it current, they taught the Jews that they were their maſters. Hence the force of our Lord's argument appears: "Since this money bears Cæſar's image, it is his; and by making uſe of it, ye acknowledge his authority. If ſo, I leave it to yourſelves to judge, whether tribute ought to be paid toward the ſupport of that government which ye have acknowledged, which ye cannot ſhake off, and by which your tranquility is preſerved." That this was our Lord's meaning, appears from the illative particle therefore, by which his anſwer is connected with the Phariſees opinion; They ſay unto him, Cæſar's: Then ſaith he unto them, Render therefore unto Cæſar, &c. Having thus declared the lawfulneſs of paying taxes to the civil powers, he ordered them at the ſame time to be careful to pay to God what was his due, as their Maker and Preſerver: Render therefore to Cæſar—and unto God the things that are God's. "In diſcharging your duty to the civil magiſtrate, you ſhould never depart from the duty you owe to God; but ſhould remember, that as you bear the image of the great God omnipotent, you are his ſubjects, and ought to pay him the tribute of yourſelves; that is, ought to yield yourſelves to Him, ſoul and body, ſerving him with both to the utmoſt of your power. The Phariſees and their adherents, under pretence of religion, often juſtified ſedition; but the Herodians, in order to ingratiate themſelves with the reigning powers, made them a compliment of their conſciences, complying with whatever they enjoined, though directly contrary to the divine law. Our Lord, therefore, when he returned this anſwer, had both in his view; exhorting them in their regards to God and the magiſtrate, to give each his due; becauſe there is no inconſiſtency between their rights, when nothing but their rights are inſiſted on. Dr. Lightfoot tells us, that the Jews have a tradition among them, that to admit of the title of any prince on their current coin, was an acknowledgement of ſubjection to him. It is certain their not daring to refuſe this coin, when offered them in payment, was in effect a confeſſion that they were conquered by the Romans, and conſequently that the emperor had a right to their tribute.

Ver. 22. They marvelled, and left him] The unexpected and very wiſe anſwer of our Lord, in which he clearly confuted them on their own principles, and ſhewed that the rights of God and the magiſtrate do not interfere in the leaſt, becauſe magiſtrates are God's deputies, and rule by his authority, quite diſconcerted and ſilenced his crafty enemies. They were aſtoniſhed at his having perceived their deſign, as well as at the wiſdom by which he avoided the ſnare; and went off inwardly vexed and greatly aſhamed. Ἐθαύμασαν, they marvelled, might be rendered, they were ſtruck with admiration and ſurpriſe.

Ver. 23. The ſame day came to him the Sadducees] It is generally known that Sadoc, the maſter of this ſect, and from whom the Sadducees, which ſay that there is no reſurrection, and aſked him, 24 Saying, Maſter, Moſes ſaid, If a man die, having no children, his brother ſhall marry his wife, and raiſe up ſeed unto his brother.

25 Now there were with us ſeven brethren: and the firſt, when he had married a wife, deceaſed; and having no iſſue, left his wife unto his brother:

26 Likewiſe the ſecond alſo, and the third, unto the ſeventh.

27 And laſt of all the woman died alſo.

28 Therefore, in the reſurrection, whoſe wife ſhall ſhe be of the ſeven? for they all had her.

29 Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, Ye do err, not knowing the ſcriptures, nor the power of God.

30 For in the reſurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels of God in heaven.

31 But as touching the reſurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was ſpoken unto you by God, ſaying, 32 I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

33 And when the multitude heard this, they were aſtoniſhed at his doctrine.

34 But when the Phariſees had heard that he had put the Sadducees to ſilence, they were gathered together.

35 Then one of them which was a lawyer, aſked him a queſtion, tempting him, and ſaying, 36 Maſter, which is the great commandment in the law?

37 Jeſus ſaid unto him, Thou ſhalt love

ducees took their name, thought that God was not to be ſerved from mercenary principles; i. e. as he crudely explained it, from the hope of reward, or fear of puniſhment. His followers interpreted this as an implicit denial of a future ſtate, and ſo imbibed that pernicious notion of the utter deſtruction of the ſoul at death;—equally uncomfortable and abſurd. The ſtory which they mention here ſeems to have been a kind of common-place objection, as we meet with it in the old Jewiſh writers. Some are of opinion, that by the reſurrection which the Sadducees denied, is to be underſtood the reſurrection of the body; others contend, that it ſignifies ſimply the exiſtence of men in a future ſtate: Properly ſpeaking, however, the two notions coincide, for as the Sadducees denied the immateriality of the ſoul, a future ſtate, according to their conceptions of it, could mean nothing elſe but the reſurrection of the body; and their denying the reſurrection of the body, was the ſame thing with their denying a future ſtate. Further, as they had no idea of ſpirit, they were obliged to make uſe of terms relative to the body, when they ſpoke of a future life. Hence came the familiar uſe of the word reſurrection in their diſputes, to denote a future ſtate ſimply; and this ſenſe of it is not more unuſual than the meaning which they affixed to the word dead, when they made it to ſignify perſons annihilated, or who have no exiſtence at all. See Luke xx. 38. Our Lord's reaſoning in behalf of a future ſtate, placed in this view, is clear and concluſive; but the reſurrection of the body, in the literal ſenſe, does not ſo plainly follow from it. See Druſius, and Lightfoot on the place.

Ver. 24—28. Maſter, Moſes ſaid, &c.] The argument by which the Sadducees endeavoured to confute the notion of a future ſtate, was taken from the Jewiſh law of marriage; which, to give their objection the better colour, they obſerved was God's law delivered by Moſes. As they believed the ſoul to be nothing but a more refined kind of matter, they thought if there was any future ſtate it muſt reſemble the preſent, and that men being in that ſtate material and mortal, the human race could not be continued, nor the individuals made happy, without the pleaſures and conveniencies of marriage. Hence they affirmed it to be a neceſſary conſequence of the doctrine of the reſurrection or future ſtate, that every man's wife ſhould be reſtored to him. See the next note.

Ver. 29, 30. Jeſus anſwered and ſaid] Jeſus confuted their argument, by telling the Sadducees that they were ignorant of the power of God, who has created ſpirit as well as matter, and who can make man compleatly happy in the enjoyment of himſelf. He obſerved further, that the nature of the life obtained in the future ſtate, makes marriage altogether ſuperfluous; becauſe in the world to come, men being ſpiritual and immortal like the angels, ἰσάγγελοι, there is no need of procreation to propagate or continue the kind. See on Luke xx. 36.

Ver. 31, 32. But as touching, &c.] Our Lord having demonſtrated that the Sadducees were ignorant of the power of God, proceeded to ſhew that they were ignorant of the Scriptures likewiſe; and particularly of the writings of Moſes, from whence they had drawn their objection: For out of the law itſelf he demonſtrated the certainty of a reſurrection, at leaſt of juſt men, and thereby quite overturned the opinion of the Sadducees, who, believing the materiality of the ſoul, affirmed that men were annihilated at death, and that the writings of Moſes ſupported their opinion. His argument was this: "As a man cannot properly be a father without children, nor a king without ſubjects, ſo God cannot properly be called God, unleſs he has his people, and be Lord of the living. Since, therefore, in the law he calls himſelf the God of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, long after theſe patriarchs were dead, the relation denoted by the word God ſtill ſubſiſted between them; for which reaſon they were not annihilated, as the Sadducees pretended, when they affirmed they were dead, but were ſtill in being, God's ſubjects, and covenanted people." Others chooſe to explain the argument thus: To be the God of any perſon is to be his exceeding great reward. See Gen. xv. 1. Wherefore, as the patriarchs died without having obtained the promiſes, Hebr. xi. 39. they muſt exiſt in another ſtate to enjoy them, that the veracity of God may remain ſure. Beſides, the Apoſtle tells us, that God is not aſhamed to be called their God, becauſe he has prepared for them a city: Heb. xi. 16. which implies, that he would have reckoned it infinitely beneath him, to own his relation as God to any one, for whom he had not provided a ſtate of permanent happineſs. The argument taken either way is concluſive; for which cauſe we may ſuppoſe, that both the ſenſes were intended, to render it full of demonſtration: Accordingly, the people were moſt agreeably ſurpriſed, when they heard ſuch a clear and ſolid confutation of the ſect which they abominated, and that too in an argument where they had always thought themſelves impregnable. See the next verſe, Macknight, and Doddridge. Bp. Sherlock obſerves, that it appears from hence that our Saviour thought the law of Moſes afforded good proof of a future ſtate; which is inconſiſtent with the ſuppoſition that there was no evidence for life and immortality till the publication of the Goſpel. See his Diſcourſes, vol. i. ſermon 6. M. L'Enfant obſerves very well upon this ſubject, that "as the calamities and misfortunes which Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob underwent in this life, could not well be reconciled with the extraordinary favours that are included in the expreſſion, Pſ. xxxiii. 12. I will be thy God: It thence follows, that when God declared himſelf to be their God, he conſequently bound himſelf to reward and make them happy after this life, as is obſerved by the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, ch. xi. 16. This argument was then already very concluſive againſt the Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the ſoul, and the reſurrection of the body: But it proves at the ſame time the reſurrection, becauſe the ſoul of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, not being Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob themſelves, it follows from thence, that God could not properly be ſtiled their God, unleſs they were to riſe again from the dead. There are in the Jewiſh writings ſome arguments, much like this, uſed to prove the reſurrection. See alſo Grotius, and Archbp. Tillotſon.

Ver. 35. Then—a lawyer aſked, &c.] A Scribe, or public teacher. See on Luke xi. 44. Tempting or trying him, here does not mean that he did this with an inſidious deſign; and indeed St. Mark's account, ch. xii. 28. forbids ſuch an interpretation; but they propoſed the queſtion with a view to make a farther trial of our Lord's ſkill in the ſacred volume. Some of the doctors declared, that the law of ſacrifices was the great commandment, becauſe ſacrifices are both the expiations of ſin, and thankſgivings for mercies. Others beſtowed this honour on the law of circumciſion, becauſe it was the ſign of the covenant eſtabliſhed between God and the nation. A third part yielded it to the law of the ſabbath, becauſe by that appointment both the knowledge and the practice of the inſtitutions of Moſes were preſerved; and, to name no more, there were ſome who affirmed the law of meats and waſhings to be of the greateſt importance, becauſe thereby the people of God were effectually ſeparated from the company and converſation of the heathens. But Jeſus, with better reaſon, decided in favour of the beauties of piety and morality; mentioning particularly that comprehenſive ſummary of both found in Deut. vi. 4. and which was one of the ſentences written on their phylacteries. See Lightfoot's Hor. Heb. on Mark xii. 28.

Ver. 39. Lev. xix. 18. Mark. xii. 31. Rom. xiii. 9. Gal. v. 14. James ii. 8.—V. 40. Ch. vii. 12.—V. 41. Mark xii. 35. Luke x. 41.—V. 43. Ecclus li. 10.—V. 44. Pſ. cx. 1. Acts ii. 34. 1 Cor. xv. 25. Hebr. i. 13. x. 12. 13.

ſeem intended to expreſs, after a more diſtinct manner, the requiſite circumſtances of that obedience which is the proper evidence of our love towards God. The words with all thy heart imply, that our love and obedience ſhould be ſincere, conſiſting not in the external act only, but likewiſe in the inward affections of the mind. The words with all thy ſoul ſhew, that our obedience muſt be univerſal; for he does not love God in the Scripture ſenſe, who obeys him in ſome inſtances only, and not in all. Laſtly, the words with all thy mind teach, that our obedience to God ought to be willing and chearful. See Dr. Clarke's Sermons, vol. 2.

Ver. 38, 39. This is the firſt and great commandment] From this head are to be deduced all the ſervice, worſhip, and honour which we owe and pay to our Creator. Of the love of God, our Saviour ſays, that it is the firſt and great commandment; and the love of our neighbour he ſtiles the ſecond, like unto it. Now from hence perhaps it may be inferred, that the love of God, which is the firſt and great commandment, is a law of ſuperior obligation to that which is only the ſecond, and may therefore, in ſome inſtances, controul and over-rule it. From whence it ſhould follow, that we might lawfully overlook the love of our neighbour, in obedience to the ſuperior obligation we are under to love God: But our Saviour's ſaying the love of God is the firſt commandment, is no manner of reaſon to think, that it ever is or can be inconſiſtent with the ſecond. The love of God is properly ſtiled the firſt commandment, in reſpect to God, who is the object of the love, and becauſe it is indeed the foundation of all religion, even of that commandment which is ſtiled the ſecond. But this is ſo far from ſhewing that the love of God may ever claſh with the love of our neighbour, that it proves the contrary; for if the love of our neighbour is deducible from the love of God, it muſt ever be conſiſtent with it. No man who thinks himſelf bound to love and obey God, can think himſelf at liberty to hurt or oppreſs thoſe whom God has taken under his protection. No man who believes it his intereſt as well as his duty to pleaſe God, but muſt likewiſe believe it his intereſt and duty to be kind and tender to thoſe who are the children of God, and in whoſe happineſs he is not an unconcerned Spectator. For this reaſon the love of God is called the firſt commandment, and for this reaſon it never can be inconſiſtent with the love of our neighbour, which is the ſecond. See Bp. Sherlock's Sermons, vol. i. diſc. 13. p. 355.

Ver. 40. On theſe two commandments, &c.] The meaning is, that the whole reaſon of religion (which in the Jewiſh diſpenſation, was included in the law and the prophets) lies in theſe two general commandments; that in theſe all particular precepts and duties are founded: That nothing can be of any obligation in religion, but as it relates either to the love we owe to God, or the love we owe to our neighbour. The relation between God and man being once known, the firſt concluſion is, that we ought to love the Lord our God with all, &c. that is, with all our power; and until this general principle be eſtabliſhed, the particular duties owing to God cannot fall under conſideration. There is no room to inquire after the proper inſtances of expreſſing our love to God, till the general obligation of loving God be known and admitted. The ſame reaſon holds likewiſe, as to the other general head of religion,—the love of our neighbour. But theſe general principles being once eſtabliſhed, the particular duties flow from them naturally. The love of God, and the love of our neighbour, if carefully attended to, will eaſily grow into a complete ſyſtem of religion. The duties of religion are all relative, regarding either God or man; and there is no relative duty that love does not readily transform itſelf into, upon the mere view of the different circumſtances of the perſon concerned. Love, with regard to a ſuperior, becomes honour and reſpect, and ſhews itſelf in a chearful obedience, and a willing ſubmiſſion. Love, with reſpect to equals, is friendſhip and benevolence; towards inferiors, it is courteſy and condeſcenſion: If it regards the happy and proſperous, it is joy and pleaſure; if it looks towards the miſerable, it is pity and compaſſion; it is a tenderneſs which will diſcover itſelf in all the acts of mercy and humanity. In negative duties this principle is no leſs effectual than in poſitive. Love will not permit us to injure, oppreſs, or offend our brother; it will not give us leave to neglect our betters, nor deſpiſe our inferiors; it will reſtrain every inordinate paſſion, and will not ſuffer us to gratify our envy at the expence of our neighbour's credit or reputation, but will preſerve us harmleſs and innocent. The ſame may be ſaid of our love to God; for the duties which we owe to God are founded in the relation between God and us. Were there no ſuch relation, the perfections of God might be matter of admiration, but could not be the ground of Duty and obedience. I have obſerved that love naturally transforms itſelf into all relative duties which ariſe from the circumſtances of the perſons related. Thus, in the preſent caſe, if we love God, and conſider him as the Lord and governor of the world, our love will ſoon become obedience; if we conſider him as wiſe, good, and gracious, our love will become honour and admiration; if we add to theſe our own weakneſs and infirmity, love will teach us dependance, and prompt us in all our wants to fly for refuge to our great protector; and thus in all other inſtances may the particular duties be drawn from this general principle. Prayer and praiſe, and other parts of divine worſhip, which are the acts of theſe duties, are ſo clearly connected to them, that there is no need of ſhewing diſtinctly cocnerning them, how they flow from this general commandment. See Bp. Sherlocke as above, p. 342, &c.

Ver. 42—45. What think ye of Chriſt?] The Phariſees having, in the courſe of our Lord's miniſtry, propoſed ſundry difficult queſtions to him, with a view to try his prophetical gifts; he, in his turn, now that a body of them was gathered together, thought fit to make trial of their ſkill in the ſacred writings. For this purpoſe, he publickly aſked their opinion of a difficulty concerning the Meſſiah's pedigree, ariſing from Pſ. cx. The doctors, it ſeems, did not look for any thing in their Meſſiah more excellent than the moſt exalted perfections of human nature; for though they called him the Son of God, they had no notion that he was God, and ſo could offer no ſolution of the difficulty. Yet the latter queſtion might have ſhewed them their error: for if Meſſiah was to be only a ſecular prince, as they ſuppoſed, ruling the men of his own time, he never could have been called Lord by perſons who died before he was born; far leſs would ſo mighty a king as David, who alſo was his progenitor, have called him Lord. Wherefore, ſince he rules over, not the vulgar dead only of former ages, but even over the kings from whom he was himſelf deſcended, and his kingdom comprehends the men of all countries and times, paſt, preſent, and to come, The doctors, if they had thought accurately upon the ſubject, ſhould have expected in their Meſſiah a king different from all other kings whatſoever. Beſides, he is to ſit at God's right-hand—till his enemies are made the footſtool of his feet; made thoroughly ſubject unto him. Numbers of Chriſt's enemies are ſubjected to him in this life, and they who will not bow to him willingly, ſhall, like the rebellious ſubjects of other kingdoms, be reduced by puniſhment. Being conſtituted univerſal judge, all, whether friends or enemies, ſhall appear before his tribunal, where, by the higheſt exerciſe of kingly power, he ſhall doom each to his unchangeable ſtate. See Macknight. We may obſerve, that our Lord always takes it for granted, in his arguments with the Jews, that the writers of the Old Teſtament were under ſuch an extraordinary guidance of the Holy Spirit, as to expreſs themſelves with the ſtricteſt propriety on all occaſions; How then doth David in Spirit, &c.? ver. 43. comp. John x. 35. And I look upon this, ſays Dr. Doddridge, as no contemptible argument for the inſpiration of the New Teſtament; for we can never think the Apoſtles of Chriſt to have been leſs aſſiſted by the Divine Spirit in their writings, when they were in other reſpects ſo much more powerfully endued with it.

Ver. 46. And no man was able to anſwer him a word] None of them could offer the leaſt ſhadow of a ſolution of the difficulty which he had propoſed. Neither durſt any man from that day forth, &c. The repeated proofs which they had received of the prodigious depth of his underſtanding, impreſſed them with ſuch an opinion of his wiſdom, that they judged it impoſſible to intangle him in his talk; for which reaſon they left off attempting it, and from that day forth troubled him no more with their captious and inſidious queſtions.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XXII.

How rich are the proviſions of the Goſpel! ver. 2. A feaſt indeed, becoming the duty and majeſty of the king of heaven, and proportionable even to the love which he bears to his own Son, in honour of whom it is made! How wonderful is the grace which calls

CHAP. XXIII.

Chriſt admoniſheth the people to follow the good doctrine, not the evil example, of the ſcribes and Phariſees: his diſciples muſt beware of calls us to the participation of thoſe proviſions! (ver. ix. 10.) Us, who were originally ſinners of the Gentiles, aliens from the commonwealth of Iſrael, and ſtrangers to the covenant of promiſe! Epheſ. ii. 12. Yet has he graciouſly ſent his meſſengers to us, and invited us to his houſe, and his table, with the additional hope of yet nobler entertainments in reſerve. May none of us reject ſo condeſcending a call;—leſt we turn his goodneſs into righteous indignation, and treaſure up to ourſelves wrath againſt the day of wrath!

It is not every one who profeſſes, to accept the entertainment; not every one who talks of Goſpel bleſſings, and ſeems to deſire a ſhare in them, that will be admitted to it. In order to our partaking of an inheritance among the ſaints in light, it is neceſſary that we be made meet for it, by the holineſs both of our hearts and lives. This is the wedding-garment (ver. 11.) wrought by the Spirit of God himſelf, and offered to us by the freedom of his grace. And it is ſo neceſſary, that without it we muſt be ſeparated from the number of his gueſts and friends, and even though we had eaten and drank in his preſence, muſt be caſt out into outer darkneſs.

How highly doth it behove us frequently to think of that aweful day, when the King will come in to ſee his gueſts; when God will take a moſt exact ſurvey of every ſoul under a Chriſtian profeſſion; to think of that ſpeechleſs confuſion which will ſeize ſuch as have not on the wedding-garment, and of that inexorable ſeverity with which they will be conſigned to weeping and gnaſhing of teeth! To have ſeen for a while the light of the Goſpel, and the fair beamings of an eternal hope, will but add deeper and more ſenſible horror to thoſe gloomy caverns. To have have heard thoſe glad tidings of great joy, and then to hear them as it were echoed back in accents of final deſpair, how will it wound the ear, and pierce the heart! May God prevent it, by fulfilling in us all the good pleaſure of his goodneſs, and the work of faith with power, that the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt may be glorified in us, and we in him; when the marriage-ſupper of the Lamb ſhall be celebrated, and all the harmony, pomp, and beauty of heaven ſhall aid its ſolemnity, its magnificence, and its joy!

Our Lord was indeed the perſon whom the artful hypocrites before him deſcribed, (ver. 16.); and was in that reſpect an excellent pattern to all his followers, and eſpecially to his miniſters. He knew no man in the diſcharge of his office; but, without ergarding the perſons of any, neither ſeeking their favour, nor fearing their reſentment, He taught the way of God in truth, and declared the whole of his counſel.

From our Lord's deciſion in the preſent caſe, we may learn with readineſs to render to all their dues, ver. 21. Our civil magiſtrates, by virtue of their office, juſtly claim our reverent regard; and tribute is moſt reaſonably due to thoſe who attend continually on the ſervice of the publick, and are, under God, the pillars of our common tranquility. Let that tribute therefore be duly rendered with honour and with chearfulneſs; for he, ſurely, is unworthy to ſhare in the benefits of government, who will not contribute his part towards its neceſſary expence. But let it alſo be remembered, that the Rights of GOD are ſacred and inviolable. He alone is the Lord of conſcience, and when that is invaded, it is eaſy to judge whether man or GOD is to be obeyed. Acts iv. 19. Let us be daily thankful, that in our own age and country theſe rights are ſo happily united and preſerved!

With what ſatisfaction ſhould we read our Lord's vindication of the reſurrection, that important article of our faith and hope! How eaſily was the boaſted argument of theſe Sadduces unravelled and expoſed, and all their pride of valuing themſelves ſo much on that imaginary penetration which laid men almoſt on a level with the brutes, covered with juſt confuſion! Indeed, objections much more plauſible than theirs againſt the reſurrection, may be anſwered in that one ſaying of our Lord's, Ye know not the Scriptures, nor the power of God. Were the Scripture doctrine of the reſurrection conſidered on the one hand, and the Omnipotence of the Creator on the other, it could not ſeem incredible to any that God ſhould raiſe the dead. Acts xxvi. 8.

How ſublime an idea does our Lord give us of the happineſs of thoſe who ſhall be thought worthy to attain it! They ſhall be equal to the angels! ver. 30. Adored be the riches of that grace which redeems us from this degenerate and miſerable ſtate, in which we had made ourſelves ſo much like the beaſts that periſh, to raiſe us to ſo high a dignity, and marſhal us with the armies of heaven.

Chriſt, we ſee, argues a very important point of doctrine from premiſes in which, perhaps, we might not have been able to have diſcovered it, without ſuch a hint. Let us learn to judge of Scripture arguments, not merely by the ſound, but by the ſenſe of the words. And as our Lord choſe a paſſage from the Pentateuch, See on Mark xii. 19. rather than from the prophets, for the conviction of the Sadducees, be it our Care to ſtudy the tempers, and even the prejudices of thoſe with whom we converſe; that ſo we may, if poſſible, let in the light of divine truth on their hearts, on that ſide by which they ſeem moſt capable of receiving it.

Whatever might be the deſign of the ſcribe in putting his queſtion to Chriſt, ver. 28. we have reaſon to rejoice in the important anſwer he received. O that it might be inſcribed on every heart as with the point of a diamond!

The firſt and great commandments are the entire love of God, and of our neighbour as ourſelves. But alas! what reaſon have we to complain of our own deficiency on both theſe heads! Can we ſay that the bleſſed GOD has the whole of our hearts? Is the utmoſt vigour of our faculties exerted in his ſervice? And do we make him the end of all our actions, of all our wiſhes, of all our purſuits?—Do we ſo equitably judge between ourſelves and others, as to ſeek our own particular intereſts no farther than they may be ſubſervient to, or conſiſtent with the good of the whole? And do we make all thoſe allowances for others, which we expect, or deſire they ſhould make for us? Surely we muſt own, that we are far from having yet attained this glorious mark of the prize of our calling.—But if this be not, in the main, the prevailing temper of our minds, in vain are our burnt-offerings and our ſacrifices; in vain are all the ſolemnities of public worſhip, or forms of ſecret devotion; and by all our moſt pathetic expreſſions of duty to GOD, and friendſhip to men, we do but add one degree of guilt to another.

The Goſpel of Chriſt hath given us a key to that queſtion of his, (ver. 41, &c.) with which the Phariſees were ſo perplexed. Well might David in ſpirit call him Lord, who, according to the fleſh, was to deſcend from his loins; inaſmuch as before David or Abraham was, He is.—Let us adore this myſterious union of the divine and human natures, in the perſon of our glorious Emmanuel; and be very careful that we do not oppoſe him, if we would not be found fighters againſt GOD.

It is remarkable, that our Lord's ſummary of piety (ver. 37—40. compare Mark xii. 29, &c.) begins with an emphatical, and ſtrong aſſertion of the unity of God. The reaſon is, it is neceſſary that men ſhould be deeply impreſſed with juſt notions of the objects of their worſhip—particularly, that he is the only true God, the Maker of heaven and earth, and the poſſeſſor of all perfection, to whom there is not any being equal, or like, or ſecond;—in order that they may apply themſelves, with the utmoſt diligence, to obey his precepts, the firſt and chief of which is, that they give him their heart.

The divine Being is ſo tranſcendantly amiable in himſelf, and by the benefits he hath conferred upon us hath ſuch a title to our utmoſt affection, that there is no obligation which bears any proportion to that of loving him. The honour aſſigned to this precept proves, that piety is the nobleſt act of the human mind, and that the chief ingredient in piety is love, founded on a clear extenſive view of the divine perfections, a permanent ſenſe of his benefits, and a deep conviction of his being the ſovereign good, our portion, our happineſs. But it is eſſential to love, that there be a delight in contemplating the beauty of the object beloved, whether that beauty be matter of ſenſation or reflection; that we frequently, and with pleaſure, reflect on the benefits which the object of our affection has conferred upon us; that we have a ſtrong deſire of pleaſing him, and a ſenſible joy in the thought of being beloved in return. Hence the duties of devotion, prayer, and praiſe, are the moſt natural and genuine exerciſes of the love of God. Moreover, this virtue is not ſo much any ſingle affection, as the continual bent of all the affections and powers of the ſoul. In which light to love God, is as much as poſſible to direct the whole ſoul towards God, and to exerciſe all its faculties on him as its chief object. Accordingly, the love of God is deſcribed in Scripture by the ſeveral operations of the mind, the knowledge of God, John xvii. 3. and a following hard after God, Pſ. lxiii. 8. namely, by intenſe contemplation;—a ſenſe of his perfections, gratitude for his benefits, truſt in his goodneſs, attachment to his ſervice, reſignation to his providence, the obeying of his commandments, admiration, hope, fear, joy, &c. Not becauſe it conſiſts in any one of theſe ſingly, but in all of them together. For to content ourſelves with partial regards to the Supreme Being, is not to be affected towards him in the manner we ought to be, and which the perfections of his nature claim. Hence the words of the precept are, Thou ſhalt love—with all thine heart, &c. i. e. with the joint force of all thy faculties; and therefore no idols whatſoever muſt partake of the love and worſhip that is due to God.

But the beauty and excellency of this ſtate of the mind is beſt ſeen in its effects; for the worſhip and obedience flowing from ſuch an univerſal bent of the ſoul towards God, is as much ſuperior to the worſhip and obedience ariſing from partial conſiderations, as the light of the ſun is to any picture of it that can be drawn. For example, if we look on God only as a ſtern law-giver, who can and will puniſh our rebellion, it may indeed force an awe and dread of him, and as much obedience to his laws as we think will ſatisfy him; but can never produce that conſtancy in our duty, that delight in it, and that earneſtneſs to do it in its utmoſt extent, which are produced and maintained in the mind by the ſacred fire of divine love, or by the bent of the whole ſoul turned towards God; a frame the moſt excellent that can be conceived, and the moſt to be deſired, becauſe it conſtitutes the higheſt perfection and happineſs of the creature.

The precept of enjoining the love of our neighbour, is ſimilar to that which enjoins the love of God, becauſe charity is the ſiſter of piety, equally the offspring of God, founded on the ſame authority, and produced by the influence of the ſame Spirit. Piety and charity conſiſt in the like motions and diſpoſitions of ſoul; and are kept alive by the ſame kind of nouriſhment.—They have the ſame happy tendency to make thoſe in whom they reſide like God, who is God by being good and doing good; like him alſo in his felicity, which ariſes not only from the poſſeſſion, but from the communication of his goodneſs. They are like to each other in their ſublime and and important nature, and of like uſe in the conduct of life; the one being the principle from which the whole duty we owe to God muſt ſpring, the other that from which the whole duty we owe to man muſt flow. To conclude, they have a like power on the minds of the beholders, raiſing eſteem and love wherever they appear in their genuine beauty. Theſe are the features by which piety and charity are ſtrongly marked, by which their affinity to each other is clearly proved, and by which they are rendered ſiſter graces, and inſeparable companions.

their ambition; he denounceth eight woes againſt their hypocriſy and blindneſs: and propheſieth the deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

THEN ſpake Jeſus to the multitude, and to his diſciples,

2 Saying, The ſcribes and the Phariſees ſit in Moſes' ſeat:

3 All therefore whatſoever they bid you obſerve, that obſerve and do; but do not ye after their works: for they ſay, and do not.

4 For they bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's ſhoulders; but they themſelves will not move them with one of their fingers.

5 But all their works they do, for to be ſeen of men: they make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments,

6 And love the uppermoſt rooms at feaſts, and the chief ſeats in the ſynagogues;

7 And greetings in the markets, and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi.

8 But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Maſter, even Chriſt; and all ye are brethren.

9 And call no man your father upon the earth: for one is your Father which is in heaven.

10 Neither be ye called maſters: for one is your Maſter, even Chriſt.

11 But he that is greateſt among you, ſhall be your ſervant.

Chap. XXIII. Ver. 1, 2. Then ſpake Jeſus, &c.] Becauſe our Saviour had mentioned the final conqueſt and deſtruction of his enemies, who were to be made his footſtool, He turned towards his diſciples, and in the hearing of all the people ſolemnly cautioned them to beware of the Scribes and Phariſees; by which he inſinuated, and that not obſcurely, who the enemies were, whoſe end he had hinted at. The name of Phariſees being the appellation of a ſect, it cannot be ſuppoſed that our Lord meant to ſay of all the party, that they ſat in Moſes' chair; ſuch a character was applicable to none but the doctors of the ſect; for which reaſon we may ſuppoſe that the phraſe Scribes and Phariſees, is an Hebraiſm for the Phariſean Scribes; ſome think there is an alluſion, ver. 2. to thoſe pulpits which Ezra made for the expounders of the law, Neh. viii. 4. and which were afterwards continued in the ſynagogue; from whence the rabbis delivered their diſcourſes ſitting. It is probably called Moſes' chair, becauſe it was that from whence the books of Moſes were read and explained; ſo that he ſeemed to dictate from thence. It is ſtrange that Lightfoot and others ſhould explain this of a legiſlative authority, ſince the Scribes and Phariſees, as ſuch, had no peculiar authority of that kind. See Doddridge, and Lightfoot.

Ver. 3. All therefore, &c.] The morality of the Phariſees, as appears from many examples mentioned in the Goſpel, was of a very looſe kind, and as for the tradition which they taught, they often made void the law of God altogether. It is not therefore to be thought that Jeſus would recommend the doctrines and precepts of the Phariſees without exception; and for this reaſon we muſt limit the general expreſſions here made uſe of, by what goes before in this diſcourſe; thus, "While theſe men ſit in Moſes ſeat, while they rightly explain the doctrines and precepts of the law, be ſure to obey them; but by no means imitate their practices."

Ver 4. For they bind heavy burdens] It is well known that the Phariſees gloried in the exactneſs with which they obeyed the ceremonial part of the law. Nay, they carried matters ſo high, that, not content with the commandments which God had enjoined, they took upon them to preſcribe a variety of traditionary precepts of their own invention. Therefore, if it was this kind of duties that our Lord meant, when he ſaid they bind heavy burdens, &c. their zeal muſt have ſhewed itſelf chiefly in public. Or, by the grievous burdens which the Phariſees bound up, may be underſtood the moral and ceremonial precepts of the law; the former of which are called grievous as well as the latter, not becauſe they were reckoned ſo by the Phariſees. This interpretation agrees well with the character given of the precepts in queſtion. They were delivered from Moſes' ſeat, i. e. were taken out of the book of Moſes; and the diſciples were to obſerve and do them, which our Lord would by no means have ordained, had he been ſpeaking of the traditionary precepts of the elders. Beſides, in this light the character given of the Scribes and Phariſees is palpably juſt, namely, that they bound up heavy burdens, &c. For while they themſelves neglected both the moral and ceremonial precepts of the divine law, as often as they could do it with ſecrecy, they wreathed them faſt about the necks of the people, and would not give them the ſmalleſt reſpite from its moſt burdenſome ceremonies on any occaſion whatſoever. The words of our Lord allude to the practice of thoſe who lade and drive beaſts of burden: They firſt make, or bind up their loads, then lay them on their backs, and in driving them through bad roads, ſupport the loads, and keep them ſteady by taking hold of them. Our Lord's meaning, therefore, was, "They will neither bear theſe loads themſelves, nor will they give the people the leaſt reſpite from them, even in caſes where it is due." See Macknight.

Ver. 5—7. All their works they do, &c.] "Any good action which they happen to perform is viciated by the principle from which it proceeds. They do it with a view to popular applauſe, and not from a regard to God, far leſs from a love of goodneſs. They are proud and arrogant, as is plain from their affected gravity of dreſs, from the anxiety which they diſcover to get the principal ſeats at feaſts, and all public meetings, as belonging to them on account of their ſuperior worth, and from their courting to be ſaluted in the ſtreets with particular marks of reſpect, and to be addreſſed to with pompous and high-ſounding titles of rabbi, father, and maſter, thinking ſuch public acklowledgement of their merit due from all who meet them. Concerning the Phylacteries, ſee the note on Deut. vi. 8. what the borders of their garments, or fringes (κρασπεδα) were, may be gathered from Deut. xxii. 22. From this uſe of the garment on which the fringes were to be put, it is ſuppoſed to have been the veil, which they then wore on their heads; and the fringes are thought to have been tufts of twined thread, faſtened to the four corners of it with a ribband, in ſuch a manner, that each tuft hung at a little diſtance from the corner of the veil to which it was faſtened. Hence we ſee the propriety of the expreſſion, they make the fringes of their garments great, or large; hence alſo we learn that theſe fringes were conſidered as badges of holineſs, and that the Phariſees wore a larger kind of them than ordinary, to give themſelves the appearance of uncommon gravity, piety, and wiſdom. The doctors had ſeats by themſelves, with their backs towards the pulpit in which the law was read, and their faces towards the people. Theſe were accounted the moſt honourable, and therefore theſe ambitious Scribes and Phariſees contended for them. The word rabbi properly ſignifies great, and was prefixed to the names of thoſe doctors who had rendered themſelves remarkable by the extent of their learning, or who were the authors of new ſchemes in divinity; heads of ſects, whoſe fame had gained them many followers. The Jewiſh doctors were particularly fond of this title, becauſe it was a high compliment paid to their underſtanding, gave them vaſt authority with their diſciples, and a very ſignificant appearance in the eyes of the world. See Macknight, L'Enfant, and Gale's ſermons, vol. i. p. 80.

Ver. 8—11. But be not ye called Rabbi] The Apoſtles of Chriſt were to be very different, both in temper and conduct, from the Jewiſh teachers. They were to decline being called Rabbi, becauſe the thing ſignified by it belonged ſolely to their maſter, in whom the whole treaſures of knowledge and wiſdom are hid; and who for that reaſon is the only infallible director of men's conſciences; alſo becauſe they owed none of their knowledge to themſelves, but derived it entirely from him; in which reſpect they were all brethren, and on a level. Further, the Jewiſh doctors were wont to inculcate on their diſciples, that exiſtence, except it was improved and ripened by knowledge, was in a manner no exiſtence at all; and boaſted that they who formed men's minds by erudition, gave them a real being; and for that reaſon were to be conſidered as their true parents. Hence they arrogantly aſſumed to themſelves the name of fathers, to intimate the peculiar obligations which their diſciples, but eſpecially the proſelytes from idolatry, were under to them for their exiſtence, and for the advantages which accompanied it: The title of father in this ſenſe our Lord abſolutely prohibited his Apoſtles either to take or give, becauſe it belongs only to God; for one is your Father who is in heaven. Life, with all its bleſſings, comes from God; and men wholly depend upon him: For which cauſe, all praiſe and thankſgiving ſhould ultimately be referred to him. So that if any one teaches rightly, not the teacher, but the wiſdom of God is to be praiſed, which exerts and communicates itſelf by him: And with reſpect to the title of maſter or leader, καθηγητης, which the Jewiſh doctors courted, the Apoſtles of Chriſt were not to accept, far leſs to ſolicit it; becauſe in point of commiſſion and inſpiration they were all upon an equality. Neither had they any title to rule the conſciences of men, except by virtue of the inſpiration which they received from their maſter, to whom alone the prerogative of infallibility originally belonged. Neverthelеſs, our Lord did not mean to ſay, that it is ſinful to name men by the ſtations they hold, or the relations they bear in the world. He only deſigned to reprove the ſimplicity of the common people, who offered high praiſes to their 12 And whoſoever ſhall exalt himſelf, ſhall be abaſed; and he that ſhall humble himſelf, ſhall be exalted.

13 But woe unto you, ſcribes and Phariſees, hypocrites! for ye ſhut up the kingdom of heaven againſt men: for ye neither go in yourſelves, neither ſuffer ye them that are entering, to go in.

14 Woe unto you, ſcribes and Phariſees, hypocrites! for ye devour widows houſes, and for a pretence make long prayer: therefore ye ſhall receive the greater damnation.

15 Woe unto you, ſcribes and Phariſees, hypocrites! for ye compaſs ſea and land to make one proſelyte, and when he is made, ye make him two-fold more the child of hell than yourſelves.

16 Woe unto you, ye blind guides, which ſay, Whoſoever ſhall ſwear by the temple, it is nothing; but whoſoever ſhall ſwear by the gold of the temple, he is a debtor!

17 Ye fools and blind: for whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that ſanctifieth the gold?

18 And whoſoever ſhall ſwear by the altar, it is nothing; but whoſoever ſweareth by the gift that is upon it, he is guilty.

19 Ye fools, and blind: for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that ſanctifieth the gift?

teachers, as if they owed all to them, and nothing to God; and to root out of the minds of the Apoſtles the Phariſaical vanity, which decked itſelf with honours, properly belonging to God, but eſpecially to keep them all on a level among themſelves, that the whole glory of the Chriſtian ſcheme might redound to Him whoſe right it was. Withal he ſhewed them what that greatneſs was, whereof they were capable, and after which only they ſhould aſpire: It was a greatneſs ariſing from charity and humility; a greatneſs diametrically oppoſite to that of the Scribes, ver. 11. He that is greateſt, or, deſires to be greateſt, μειζων, alludes to the ſignification of the word rabbi. See Macknight, L'Enfant, Heylin, and Wetſtein. Inſtead of, Call no man your Father, ver. 11. Dr. Waterland reads, Call no man among you father.

Ver. 12. Whoſoever ſhall exalt himſelf] Dr. Doddridge obſerves that our Saviour, by the frequent repetition of this maxim, ſeems to intimate, that he intended it not only for thoſe who were to be the teachers of others, but for all his diſciples without exception; and it is well worthy of our obſervation, that no one ſentence of our Lord's is ſo frequently repeated as this, which occurs at leaſt ten times in the Evangeliſts.

Ver. 13. But woe unto you, Scribes and Phariſees, hypocrites] The above diſcourſe againſt the Scribes and Phariſees was pronounced in the hearing of many of the order; they were therefore greatly incenſed, and watched for an opportunity to deſtroy Jeſus: but it was not a time for him now to be afraid of them, this being the laſt ſermon he was ever to preach in public. It was neceſſary to uſe violent remedies, eſpecially as gentle medicines had hitherto proved ineffectual; wherefore, with a kind of ſeverity he threatened them in the moſt aweful and ſolemn manner, denouncing dreadful woes againſt them, not on account of the perſonal injuries they had done him, although they were many, but on account of their exceſſive wickedneſs. They were publick teachers of religion, who abuſed every mark and character of goodneſs to all the purpoſes of villainy. Under the grimace of a ſevere and ſanctified air, they were malicious, implacable, lewd, covetous, and rapacious; in a word, inſtead of being reformers, they were corrupters of mankind; ſo that their wickedneſs being of the very worſt ſort, it deſerved the ſharpeſt rebuke that could be given. Our Lord pronounced eight bleſſings upon the mount; here he pronounced eight woes; not as imprecations, but ſolemn compaſſionate declarations of the miſery which theſe ſtubborn ſinners were bringing upon themſelves. The reaſons why theſe woes were denounced againſt the Scribes, are ſet forth in the ſubſequent verſes, 1. The firſt is, becauſe they ſhut up the kingdom of heaven from men, by taking away the key of knowledge, (Luke xi. 52.) or the right interpretation of the ancient prophecies concerning the Meſſiah, by their example and authority; for they both rejected Jeſus themſelves, and excommunicated thoſe who believed in him: in ſhort, by doing all they could to hinder the people from repenting of their ſins and believing of the Goſpel. Dr. Moore, with great propriety, obſerves, that the word hypocrites, ὑποκριται, in its moſt exact application, ſignifies players, who, according to the unnatural cuſtom of the ancients, acted a part under a maſk. See his Theological Works, p. 293. Vitringa's Obſerv. Sacr. and the note on ch. vi. 16.

Ver. 14. For ye devour widow's houſes] 2. This verſe contains the ſecond reaſon of the woes; becauſe they committed the groſſeſt iniquities, being covetous and rapacious under a cloke of religion; they devoured the widow's houſes, and at the ſame time made long prayers in order to hide their villainy. "This, ſays Calvin, was as if, pretending to kiſs the feet of Chriſt, one ſhould riſe up, and audaciouſly ſpit in his face." See Mark xii. 40.

Ver. 15. Ye compaſs ſea and land, &c.] 3. The third woe is denounced, becauſe they expreſſed the greateſt zeal imaginable in making proſelytes, compaſſing ſea and land; i. e. uſing the moſt indefatigable pains and ardour, and leaving no art unpractiſed for that end; while at the ſame time their intention in all this, was not that the Gentiles might become better men through the knowledge of true religion, but more friendly to them; yielding them the direction of their purſes, as well as of their conſciences. Accordingly, in the heathen countries theſe worldlings accommodated religion to the humours of men; placing it not in the eternal and immutable rules of righteouſneſs, but in ceremonial obſervances; the effect of which was, either that the proſelytes became more ſuperſtitious, more immoral, and more preſumptuous than their teachers; or that, taking them for impoſtors, they relapſed again into their old ſtate of heatheniſm; and in both caſes became two-fold more the children of hell than even the Phariſees themſelves; i. e. more openly and unlimitedly wicked than they. The zeal of the Jews in making proſelytes was ſo remarkable, that it was take notice of by the heathens, and turned into a proverb:

> ——— Ac veluti te
> Judæi, cogamus in hanc concedere turbam.
> Hor. Lib. i. Sat. 4.

> We'll force you, like the proſelyting Jews,
> To be like us. ———
> Francis.

Upon which St. Ambroſe obſerves, that "this pleaſantry of the poet ariſes from the proſelyting ſpirit of the Jews, who inſinuated themſelves into families, entered into the courts of juſtice, diſturbed the judges, and were always more ſucceſsful in proportion as they were more impudent." To the ſame purpoſe is what Juſtin Martyr ſaid to Trypho the Jew: "Your proſelytes not only diſbelieve Chriſt's doctrine, but blaſpheme his name as much again as yourſelves." Dr. Heylin remarks, that διπλοος, two-fold, falſe, ſeems to be here oppoſed to απλοος, ſimple, ſincere. Child of hell, and ſon of perdition were terms of reproach made uſe of amongſt the Jews.

Ver. 16. Ye blind guides] 4. The fourth woe is denounced for their falſe doctrine. Our Saviour had before ſtiled them hypocrites from their perſonal character, now he gives them another title, blind guides, reſpecting their influence upon others. Both theſe appellations are ſeverely put together in ver. 23—25. and this ſeverity riſes to the height in the 33d verſe. Our Saviour mentions particularly their doctrine concerning oaths, and declares, in contradiction to their execrable tenets, that every oath is obligatory, the matter of which is lawful; becauſe when men ſwear by the creature, if their oath has any meaning, it is an appeal to the Creator himſelf: In any other light, an oath by the creature is abſolutely ridiculous, becauſe the creature neither has knowledge with reſpect to the matter of the oath, nor power to puniſh the perjury. See on ch. v. 33. It is nothing, means, "it conſtitutes no obligation to tell the truth, or, to perform one's vow." He is a debtor, means, "he is bound to ſpeak the truth, or, to perform his vow." And in like manner he is guilty, ver. 18. means, he is bound by his oath. The Phariſees taught, that oaths by the creature might be uſed on trifling occaſions, and violated without any great guilt; but they excepted oaths by the corban, and by ſacrifices: in which it is plain, that without any regard to common ſenſe or decency, they were influenced merely by a view to their own intereſt, and therefore repreſented theſe to the people, as things of more eminent ſanctity than even the temple or altar itſelf. The gold of the temple means the treaſure kept in the temple, otherwiſe called corban. See ch. xxvii. 6.

Ver. 17—22. Ye fools and blind] The Apoſtle's words, Heb. vi. 16. are a proper comment on the 17th verſe, for men verily ſwear by the greater. Whoſo ſhall ſwear by the altar, ſays our Saviour (ver. 20.) ſweareth by it, and by all things thereon; conſequently the oath is an invocation of His wrath, to whom the altar, and the gifts on the altar, are ſacred, in caſe of falſhood or breach of vows. The particular ſpecies of wrath invoked in this oath, is God's rejecting the ſwearer's ſacrifice, and denying him the pardon of ſin.—He adds, ver. 21. Whoſo ſhall ſwear by the temple, ſweareth by it, and by him that dwelleth therein; conſequently the oath is a ſolemn wiſhing that he who dwelleth in the temple may hinder the perſon from ever worſhiping

20 Whoſo therefore ſhall ſwear by the altar, ſweareth by it, and by all things thereon.

21 And whoſo ſhall ſwear by the temple, ſweareth by it, and by him that dwelleth therein.

22 And he that ſhall ſwear by heaven, ſweareth by the throne of God, and by him that ſitteth thereon.

23 Woe unto you ſcribes and Phariſees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint, and aniſe, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgement, mercy, and faith: theſe ought ye to have done, and not to have left the other undone.

24 Ye blind guides, which ſtrain at a gnat, and ſwallow a camel.

25 Woe unto you, ſcribes and Phariſees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outſide of the cup, and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and exceſs.

26 Thou blind Phariſee, cleanſe firſt that which is within the cup and platter, that the outſide of them may be clean alſo.

27 Woe unto you, ſcribes and Phariſees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited ſepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead mens bones, and of all uncleanneſs.

28 Even ſo ye alſo outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocriſy and iniquity.

29 Woe unto you, ſcribes and Phariſees, hypocrites! becauſe ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garniſh the ſepulchres of the righteous.

30 And ſay, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets.

31 Wherefore ye be witneſſes unto yourſelves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets.

worſhiping there, if he is telling a falſhood, or neglects his vow. And laſtly, ver. 22. He that ſhall ſwear by heaven, ſweareth by the throne of God, &c. and therefore his oath is a ſolemn wiſhing, that God who dwells in heaven may exclude him from that bleſſed place for ever, if he falſifies his oath.

Ver. 23, 24. Ye pay tithe, &c.] 5. The fifth woe is denounced for their ſuperſtition. They obſerved the ceremonial precepts of the law with all poſſible exactneſs, while they utterly neglected the eternal, immutable, and indiſpenſible rules of righteouſneſs,—juſtice, mercy, or charity, and fidelity. Beſides the reproof of their ſuperſtition in the performance of poſitive duties, our Saviour condemned it alſo in the obedience which they gave to the negative precepts of the law; for there likewiſe this evil root ſhewed itſelf, ver. 24. Ye blind guides, which ſtrain at a gnat,—or rather, who ſtrain out a gnat, (namely, from your drink,) and ſwallow a camel. The expreſſion is proverbial, and was made uſe of by our Lord on this occaſion to ſignify, that the Phariſees pretended to be exceedingly afraid of the ſmalleſt faults, as if ſin had been bitter to them like death, while they indulged themſelves ſecretly in the unreſtrained commiſſion of the groſſeſt immoralities. Serrarius obſerves, that in thoſe hot countries gnats were apt to fall into wine, if it were not carefully covered; and paſſing the liquor through a ſtrainer, that no gnat or part of one might remain, grew into a proverb for exactneſs about little matters. See Wetſtein. "Could any authority be produced, in which Καμηλον, ſignifies a large inſect, I would with great pleaſure, ſays Dr. Doddridge, follow the tranſlation of 1729. in rendering the latter clauſe, ſwallow a beetle." See on chap. xix. 24.

Ver. 25, 26. You make clean the outſide, &c.] 6. The ſixth woe is denounced for their hypocriſy: They were at great pains to appear virtuous, and to have a decent external conduct, while they neglected to beautify their inward man with goodneſs, which, in the ſight of God is an ornament of great price, and renders men dear and valuable to all who know them. Within, they—means the cup and platter;—are full of extortion and exceſs; which you ſwallow down without the leaſt ſcruple: Inſtead of extortion and exceſs, ſome would read, rapine and intemperance, αρπαγης, και ακρασιας. The laſt word takes in not only all kinds of outward intemperance, particularly in eating and drinking, but all intemperate or immoderate deſires, whether of honour, gain, or ſenſual pleaſures. Dr. Heylin obſerves well, that the cenſure here is doubled, taking intemperance in the vulgar ſenſe. Theſe miſerable men, procured unjuſtly what they uſed intemperately: No wonder tables ſo furniſhed prove a ſnare, as many find by ſad experience. Luxury puniſhes fraud, and feeds diſeaſe with the fruits of injuſtice. Thou blind Phariſee, continues our Lord, ver. 26. Cleanſe firſt, &c. that is, "Take care that what is within the cup, and not ſo much expoſed to view, be clean; and then thou mayeſt with propriety beſtow pains in cleanſing the outſide of the cup." But though in this clauſe our Lord ſtill makes uſe the metaphor, he reaſons according to the thing intended by it, thus; "Cleanſe firſt thy mind, thy inward man from evil diſpoſitions and affections, and of courſe thy outward behaviour will be virtuous and good. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt clauſe of ver. 25. They are full of what was got by rapine and injuſtice; and ver. 26. Cleanſe firſt the inſide of the cup, &c.

Ver. 27, 28. Ye are like unto whited ſepulchres] 7. The ſeventh woe denounced for the exceſs of their hypocriſy. By their care of external appearances, the Phariſees and Scribes made a fair ſhew, and deceived the ſimple. Like fine whited ſepulchres, they looked beautiful without, but within were full of uncleanneſs, and defiled every one that touched them! This was a ſevere rebuke to men, who would not keep company with publicans and ſinners, for fear they ſhould have been polluted by them. The truth is, theſe hypocrites were publicly decent, but privately diſſolute: they put on a ſaint-like look, but in reality were the very worſt of men. Mr. L'Enfant obſerves, that the Jews uſed to paint or whiten their ſepulchres or tombs, at certain ſeaſons of the year; that people might diſcern they were polluted places: But ſee his introdnction, and more on this ſubject in the notes on Luke xi. 44.

Ver. 29—31. Ye build the tombs, &c.] 8. The eighth woe is denounced, becauſe by the pains they took in adorning the ſepulchres of the prophets, they pretended a great veneration for their memory; and as often as they happened to be mentioned, condemned their fathers, who had killed them; declaring, that if they had lived in the days of their fathers, they would have oppoſed their wickedneſs; while in the mean time they ſtill cheriſhed the ſpirit of their fathers, perſecuting the meſſengers of God, and particularly his divine Son, on whoſe deſtruction they were reſolutely bent. The meaning of the 31ſt verſe is, "By affirming, that if you had lived in the days of your fathers, you would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets, you acknowledge that you are the children of them who murdered the prophets;—their children, I muſt give you to know, in other reſpects, than by natural generation; for though you pretend to be more holy than they were, you are like them in all reſpects; particularly you poſſeſs their wicked perſecuting ſpirit, and teſtify it by all your actions." See on Luke xi. 48. and 1 Macc. xiii. 27, 29. What Vitringa tells us, (de Synagog. p. 221.) of the extraordinary honour paid to the ſepulchre of Mordecai, is an agreeable illuſtration of theſe words. Joſephus alſo, from Nicolaus Damaſcenus, mentions Herod's repairing in a very ſplendid manner the ſepulchre of David. See his Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 7. and comp. Acts ii. 29. From the 3d to the 30th verſe of this chapter is expoſed every thing that commonly paſſes in the world for religion; whereby the pretenders to it keep both themſelves and others from entering into the kingdom of God; from attaining, or even ſeeking after thoſe tempers, in which alone true Chriſtianity conſiſts; As firſt punctuality in attending on public and private prayers, ver. 4—14. Secondly, zeal to make proſelytes to our opinion or communion, though they have leſs of the ſpirit of religion than before; ver. 15. Thirdly, a ſuperſtitious reverence for conſecrated places or things, without any for him to whom they were conſecrated, ver. 16—22. Fourthly; a ſcrupulous exactneſs in little obſervances, though with the neglect of juſtice, mercy, and fidelity, ver. 23, 24. Fifthly, a cautiouſneſs to cleanſe the outward behaviour, without any regard to inward purity; ver. 25, 26. Sixthly, a ſpecious face of virtue and piety, covering the deepeſt hypocriſy and villainy; ver. 27, 28. Seventhly, a profeſſed veneration for all good men, except thoſe among whom they live; ver. 29, 30. See Bengelius. All, from ver. 29. to ver. 32, Grotius has very juſtly obſerved, ſhould make one ſentence; οτι, becauſe, referring to each member of it; and ver. 31. ſhould be in a parentheſis: Woe to you Scribes, becauſe you build—and ſay—and fill up, &c.

32 Fill ye up then the meaſure of your fathers.

33 Ye ſerpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye eſcape the damnation of hell?

34 Wherefore behold, I ſend unto you prophets, and wiſe-men, and ſcribes: and ſome of them ye ſhall kill and crucify; and ſome of them ye ſhall ſcourge in your ſynagogues, and perſecute them from city to city:

35 That upon you may come all the righteous blood ſhed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel, unto the blood of Zacharias, ſon of Barachias, whom ye ſlew between the temple and the altar.

36 Verily I ſay unto you, All theſe things ſhall come upon this generation.

37 O Jeruſalem, Jeruſalem, thou that killeſt the prophets, and ſtoneſt them which are ſent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!

38 Behold, your houſe is left unto you deſolate.

39 For I ſay unto you, Ye ſhall not ſee me henceforth, till ye ſhall ſay, Bleſſed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

Ver. 32. Fill ye up then the meaſure, &c.] That is, the meaſure of your father's ſin, (the meaſure fixed upon by God for puniſhment.) See John xiii. 27. This expreſſion implies, that there is a certain meaſure fixed for every nation to which its iniquity is allowed to riſe; and that before puniſhment is inflicted on nations, the meaſure of their iniquity determined by God muſt be filled up, by the ſucceeding generations adding to the iniquity of the preceding, till the meaſure is full; An idea, which receives great countenance from Gen. xv. 16. According to Glaſſius, and other critics, και πληρωσατε, is here the imperative for the future,—you will fill up; but it may be underſtood as a word of permiſſion, not of command. As if our Lord had ſaid, "I contend with you no longer; I leave you to yourſelves; you have conquered; you may now follow the devices of your own hearts."

Ver. 33. Ye ſerpents, &c.] See Luke iii. 7. Men of warm tempers are apt to miſtake this part of Chriſt's diſcourſe; they fancy that his giving the Phariſees names expreſſive of their characters, and his denouncing woes againſt them, juſtifies thoſe cenſorious judgements, which without reaſon, or, it may be, contrary to reaſon, they paſs on perſons who happen to be at variance with them. It is very true that Jeſus pronounced the Scribes and Phariſees hypocrites, blind guides, ſerpents, &c. and declared that they could not eſcape the damnation of hell; but it is equally true, that they were hypocrites and fools, as wicked as he has painted them, and that he knew them certainly to be ſuch. Wherefore, till we can make it evident that we have the faculty of knowing mens hearts, which Chriſt poſſeſſed, we have no pretenſions to imitate him in an action not deſigned for our imitation, being done by him as a prophet, and in virtue of his prophetical gifts, not as an ordinary man. Inſtead of making free with the characters of others, as too many do, it is far ſafer, and in every reſpect better, both for ourſelves and for ſociety, that we keep cloſe to the precept forbidding raſh judgements, evil ſurmiſings, and all backbitings. See ch. vii. 1—5. Αποφυγειν κριμα, which is the ſame in ſenſe with the original, rendered to eſcape the damnation, properly ſignifies, to evade conviction in a court of judicature; which is often done by the artifice of the criminal. See Raphælius and Macknight.

Ver. 34. Wherefore] Δια τουτο, "for this cauſe—that ye are ſerpents, and a brood of vipers, who will fill up the meaſure of your father's iniquity." Our Saviour's meaning was not, that he would ſend them prophets to be killed, that they might eſcape the damnation of hell; but that every poſſible method might be tried for their converſion, though he well knew that they would make light of all, and by ſo doing, pull down upon themſelves ſuch terrible vengeance, as ſhould be a ſtanding monument of the divine diſpleaſure againſt all the murders committed on the face of the earth from the beginning of time. For "even as Sodom and Gomorrah anciently, and the cities about them, giving themſelves over to fornication, and going after ſtrange fleſh, are ſet forth for an example, ſuffering the vengeance of eternal fire;" juſt ſo the Jewiſh nation was ſingled out, and that generation of the nation pitched upon to be the ſubjects of God's revenge againſt murder, and an example of puniſhment to all generations, as they were the moſt atrocious body of murderers that ever lived. The titles mentioned by our Lord in this verſe, prophets, wiſe men, ſcribes, correſpond with that diverſity of gifts mentioned in the firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians: They are ſtiled prophets, becauſe inſpired to foretel things to come; wiſe men, becauſe they were enlightened with the knowledge of heavenly myſteries; and ſcribes, from their ſuperior knowledge of the law. Amongſt the firſt martyrs whoſe death verified this prophecy were Stephen, who was ſtoned; Paul, who was ſcourged and killed; and Peter, who was crucified. See Macknight, Hammond, L'Enfant. Inſtead of ye ſhall kill,—ſhall ſcourge. Dr. Waterland and the MS. read ye will kill, &c.

Ver. 35. That upon you may come all the righteous blood] The meaning is, "As by your cruel and perſecuting temper you ſeem to approve of all the murders which have been committed ſince the beginning of the world, you ſhall be as ſeverely puniſhed as if you yourſelves had been the authors of them." This refers to temporal puniſhment, becauſe in the life to come men will not be puniſhed for the ſins of others to which they were not acceſſary. The Zechariah here ſpoken of, is thought by many learned commentators to be that Zechariah who is expreſly ſaid to have been ſlain in ſo remarkable a manner, between the temple and the altar. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21. Though we cannot abſolutely determine whether (as Chryſoſtom aſſerts) Jehoiada his father was alſo called Barachiah, which ſignifies one that bleſſes the Lord, as Jehoiada does one that confeſſes him; or whether the original reading was different from ours, as St. Jerome ſays he found in the Goſpel of the Nazarenes, or the Hebrew verſion of Matthew. It is by no means neceſſary to allow, with Capellus, that it was a ſlip in the Evangeliſt's memory; but much more decent to ſuppoſe it an officious addition of ſome early tranſcriber, who might confound this martyr with Zechariah, one of the twelve minor prophets, who was indeed the ſon of Barachiah, but who does not by any means appear to have been murdered; nor is there any reaſon to imagine, that the Jews, ſo ſoon after their return from captivity, would have attempted ſo flagitious an act. All the martyrs, from Abel to Zechariah, ſeems to have been a proverb; and it might naturally ariſe from obſerving, that Abel was the firſt, and Zechariah in the Chronicles the laſt eminently good man, of whoſe murder the Scripture ſpeaks. See Doddridge.

Ver. 36. This generation] This nation. MS.

Ver. 37, 38. O Jeruſalem, Jeruſalem!] Our Lord having laid before the Phariſees and the nation, their heinous guilt and grievous puniſhment, the thought of the calamities which were coming upon them moved him exceedingly: his bowels were turned within him, and his breaſt was filled with the gracious meltings of pity to ſuch a degree, that, unable to contain himſelf, he broke forth into tears; bewailing Jeruſalem particularly, on account of the peculiar ſeverity of its lot. For, as its inhabitants had their hands more deeply imbrued in the blood of the prophets, they were to drink more deeply of the puniſhment due to ſuch crimes. His lamentation for the city was moſt moving, O Jeruſalem, Jeruſalem! &c. Theſe tender exclamations, which can hardly be read without tears, convey a ſtrong idea of Chriſt's love to that ungrateful nation. The words, how often, mark his unwearied endeavours to cheriſh and protect them from the time they were firſt called to be his people; and the oppoſition which is ſtated between his will and theirs, How often would I—but ye would not, very emphatically ſhews their unconquerable obſtinacy in reſiſting the moſt winning and moſt ſubſtantial expreſſions of the divine love. The clauſe, Behold, &c. is a prediction of the puniſhment which was to be inflicted upon them for their ſin in rejecting Chriſt. Their houſe, (the temple of God, See 2 Kings v. 8.) was from that time to be deſolate. The glory of the Lord, which Haggai had foretold ſhould fill the ſecond houſe, was departing. Our Lord ſpoke this as he was going out of his houſe for the laſt time. See Howe's Tears of the Redeemer.

Ver. 39. Henceforth] απ' αρτι, hereafter. "Becauſe you have killed the prophets, and endeavoured to ſtone me, whom the father hath ſent unto you; becauſe your great men are at this moment plotting againſt me, who am the Lord of the temple; and becauſe you will aſſiſt them in putting me to death; your temple ſhall be deſolate: It ſhall never be favoured with my preſence any more. Nay, your nation ſhall be deſerted by me; For you ſhall not ſee me from henceforth, &c." In the capacity of a teacher, Jeſus had often filled the temple with the glory of his doctrine and miracles; and as a kind friend, had tried with unweared application to gather the nation under his wings, that he might protect them from the impending judgements of God. Therefore, by their not ſeeing him from that time forth, we are to underſtand their not enjoying his preſence and care as a teacher, guardian, and friend. This was the diſcourſe that Jeſus pronounced in public; with it his miniſtry ended. From that moment he abandoned the Jewiſh nation, gave them over to walk in their own counſels, and devoted them to deſtruction; nor were they ever Chriſt foretelleth the deſtruction of the temple: what and how great calamities ſhall precede it. The ſigns of his coming to judgement. And that becauſe that day and hour is unknown, we ought to watch like good ſervants, expecting every moment our Maſter's coming.

AND Jeſus went out, and departed from the temple: and his diſciples came to him, for to ſhew him the buildings of the temple.

after to be the objects of his care, till the period of their converſion to Chriſtianity ſhould come, which he now foretold: Ye ſhall not ſee me till ye ſay, Bleſſed, &c. that is, till your nation is converted; for the ſtate of the nation, and not of a few individuals, is here ſpoken of, as it is alſo in the parables of the vineyard and the marriage ſupper. Bleſſed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord was the cry of the believing multitude when Jeſus made his public entry into Jeruſalem a few days before this. Hence, in predicting their future converſion, he alludes in a very ſtriking manner to that exclamation, by which they had expreſſed their faith in him as the Meſſiah. This is by far the moſt ſpirited of all our Lord's diſcourſes, and being pronounced no doubt with an elevation of voice, and vehemence of geſture, ſuitable to the ſentiments which it expreſſed, it could not but aſtoniſh the people, who had always looked upon their teachers as the holieſt of men. Even the perſons themſelves againſt whom it was levelled were confounded; their conſciences witneſſing the truth of what was laid to their charge. They knew not what courſe to take, and ſo, in the midſt of their heſitation, they let Jeſus go away quietly, without attempting to lay hands on him, or ſtone him, as they had ſometimes done before upon leſs provocation. See Grotius, Macknight, and Olearius. Thus did our Lord pull the maſk of hypocriſy from off the teachers of his own times, condemning it in all its forms. He treated hypocriſy with ſeverity, becauſe it is a moſt enormous ſin, rendering men criminal before God by things, which in their own nature are calculated to pleaſe him; ſuch as prayer, alms-giving, faſting, and other religious duties. The ſharpneſs with which our Lord ſpoke now, and on other occaſions, againſt hypocrites, plainly and ſtrongly intimates to us, that we ſhould ſtrive more to be good, than to appear ſo. But on this ſubject, I will ſpeak more in the Reflections on Luke xi. poſtponing to that place any further Reflections on this chapter, on account of the neceſſary length of the obſervations upon the next.

Chap. XXIV. Ver. 1. And Jeſus—departed, &c.[Our Saviour was in the temple, ſpeaking to a mixed audience of his diſciples and the multitude, when he uttered that pathetic lamentation at the cloſe of the preceding chapter; wherein he hath left to his diſciples a generous and amiable pattern of a patriot ſpirit; and from whence we ſee how contrary to truth is the inſinuation of a noble writer, that there is nothing in the Goſpels to recommend and encourage the love of one's country. See Shafteſbury's characteriſticks, vol. i. p. 99. Such a reſolution as that mentioned by our Lord, ver. 38, 39. appeared very ſtrange to his diſciples, and affected them much; for which reaſon they ſtopped him, as he was departing out of the temple, and deſired him to obſerve what a magnificent ſtructure it was; inſinuating, that they were ſurpriſed to hear him talk of leaving it deſolate; that ſo rich and glorious a fabrick was not to be deſerted raſhly; and that they ſhould all be very happy when he, as Meſſiah, took poſſeſſion of it, with the other palaces which of right belonged to him. They were going to the mount of Olives, which ſtood eaſtward from the city. It was the eaſtern wall, therefore, of the temple, fronting that mountain, which the diſciples deſired their maſter to look at, and which being built from the bottom of the valley to a prodigious height with ſtones of an incredible bulk, firmly compacted together, made a very grand appearance at a diſtance. The ſtones employed in the foundations were in magnitude forty cubits, i. e. above ſixty feet; and the ſuperſtructure was worthy of ſuch foundations. There were ſome ſtones of the whiteſt marble, forty-five cubits long, five cubits high, and ſix cubits broad, as a prieſt of the temple hath deſcribed them. In Mr. Mede's opinion, the eaſtern wall was the only part of Solomon's ſtructure which remained after the Chaldeans burned the temple. Hence the portico built on the top of it obtained the name of Solomon's porch or portico. See Joſeph. Antiq. l. xv. c. 14. War. l. vi. c. 6. The magnificence of the fabric, however, was not the only topic they deſcanted upon. They ſpake alſo of the precious utenſils wherewith it was furniſhed, and of the gifts wherewith the treaſury was enriched; for there the gifts of ages were depoſited, the preſents of kings and emperors, as well as the offerings of the Jews. Hanging up ſuch αναθηματα, or conſecrated gifts, was common in moſt of the ancient temples. Tacitus, Hiſtor. lib. 5. ſpeaks of the immenſe opulence of the temple at Jeruſalem. Amongſt other of its treaſures there was a golden table given by Pompey, and ſeveral golden vines of exquiſite workmanſhip, as well as immenſe ſize; for Joſephus tells us, that they had cluſters as tall as a man, which ſome have thought referred to God's repreſenting the Jewiſh nation under the emblem of a vine. Joſephus likewiſe aſſerts, in the place above quoted, that the marble of the temple was ſo white, thar it appeared at a diſtance like a mountain of ſnow; and the gilding of ſeveral of its external parts which he there mentions, muſt, eſpecially when the ſun ſhone upon it, render it a moſt ſplendid and beautiful ſpectacle. See Luke xxi. 5. and Mark 13. Chapters, which the reader will pleaſe to keep in view while we go through the preſent; and we would refer him by all means to Joſephus's Hiſtory of this event. Chriſtian writers have always, with great reaſon, repreſented his Hiſtory of the Jewiſh War as the beſt commentary on this chapter; and many have juſtly remarked it, as a wonderful inſtance of the care of Providence for the Chriſtian church, that this writer, an eye witneſs, and in theſe things of ſo great credit, ſhould be preſerved, and eſpecially in ſo extraordinary a manner preſerved, to tranſmit to us a collection of important tracts, which ſo exactly illuſtrate this noble prophecy in almoſt every circumſtance.

Ver. 2. There ſhall not be left here one ſtone] No impoſtor, Bp. Chandler very juſtly obſerves, would have attempted to foretel an event at once ſo diſagreeable, and ſo improbable as it ſeemed at preſent, conſidering the peace of the Jews with the Romans, and the ſtrength of their citadel; which forced Titus himſelf to acknowledge, that it was the ſingular hand of God which compelled them to relinquiſh fortifications unconquerable by human power. The worthy Bp. of Briſtol (to whoſe accuracy and learning we ſhall be particularly obliged in the courſe of theſe annotations, as we have already enriched a former part of this commentary from his valuable Diſſertations on the prophecies) obſerves, that our Saviour in his prophecies frequently alludes to phraſes and expreſſions uſed by the ancient prophets; and as Haggai ii. 15. expreſſeth the building of the temple, by a ſtone being laid upon a ſtone, ſo Chriſt expreſſeth the deſtruction of it by one ſtone not being left upon another. See Luke xix. 44. It is a proverbial expreſſion to denote an utter deſtruction; and the prophecy would have been amply fulfilled if the city and temple had been entirely ruined, though every ſingle ſtone had not been overturned. But it happened in this caſe that the words were almoſt literally fulfilled, and ſcarce one ſtone was left upon another. For when the Romans had taken Jeruſalem, Titus ordered his ſoldiers to dig up the foundations both of all the city and the temple. The temple was a building of ſuch ſtrength and grandeur, of ſuch ſplendor and beauty, that it was likely to be preſerved for a monument of the victory and glory of the Roman empire: Titus was accordingly very deſirous of preſerving it; and proteſted to the Jews who had fortified themſelves within it, that he would preſerve it even againſt their will. He had expreſſed the like deſire of preſerving the city too, and ſent Joſephus and other Jews, again and again, to their countrymen, to perſuade them to ſurrender; but one greater than Titus had determined it otherwiſe. The Jews themſelves firſt ſet fire to the porticos of the temple, and then the Romans. One of the ſoldiers, neither waiting for any command, nor trembling at ſuch an attempt, but urged by a certain divine impulſe, ſays Joſephus, mounted the ſhoulder of his companion, thruſt a burning brand in at the golden window, and thereby ſet fire to the building of the temple itſelf. Titus ran immediately to the temple, and commanded his ſoldiers to extinguiſh the flame; but neither exhortations nor threatnings could reſtrain their violence; they either could not, or would not hear; thoſe behind encouraging thoſe before to ſet fire to the temple. Titus was ſtill for preſerving the holy place: He commanded his ſoldiers even to be beaten for diſobeying him. But their anger and hatred of the Jews, and a certain warlike vehement fury, overcame their reverence for their general, and their dread of his commands. A ſoldier in the dark, ſet fire to the doors; and thus, as Joſephus ſays, the temple was burned againſt the will of Cæſar. Afterwards, as we read in the Jewiſh Talmud, and in Maimonides, Terentius Rufus, who was left to command the army at Jeruſalem, did with a plow-ſhare tear up the foundation of the temple, and thereby ſignally fulfilled Micah iii. 12. Euſebius too affirms that it was plowed up by the Romans, and that he ſaw it lying in ruins. The city alſo ſhared the ſame fate, and was burned and deſtroyed as well as the temple. The Romans burned the extremeſt parts of the city, and demoliſhed the walls; three towers only, and ſome part of the wall were left ſtanding, for the better encamping of the ſoldiers, and to ſhew to poſterity what a city, and how fortified, the valour of the Romans had taken. All the reſt of the city was ſo demoliſhed and levelled with the ground, that they who came to ſee it, could not believe that it was ever inhabited. After the city was thus taken and deſtroyed, great riches were found among the ruins; and the Romans dug them up, in ſearch of the treaſures which had been concealed and buried in the earth. So literally were our Saviour's words accompliſhed, in the ruin both of the city and of the temple; and well might Eleazar ſay, "That God had delivered his moſt holy city to be burned and ſubverted by their enemies;"—and "wiſh that they had all died, before they ſaw that holy city demoliſhed by the hands of their enemies, and the ſacred temple ſo wickedly dug up from the foundations." See Bp. Newton's 18th diſſertation, and Joſephus's War, l. 6 and 7.

3 And as he ſat upon the mount of Olives, the diſciples came unto him privately, ſayſaying, Tell us, when ſhall theſe things be? and what ſhall be the ſign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?

4 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, Take heed that no man deceive you.

5 For many ſhall come in my name, ſaying, I am Chriſt; and ſhall deceive many.

6 And ye ſhall hear of wars, and rumours of wars: ſee that ye be not troubled: for all theſe things muſt come to paſs, but the end is not yet.

Ver. 3. And as he ſat upon the mount of Olives] When the diſciples heard their Maſter affirm, that not ſo much as one of thoſe ſtones, which had mocked the fury of Nebuchadnezzar's army, and ſurvived the envy of time, was to be left upon another, but that they were all to be thrown down, they perceived that the temple was to be demoliſhed; but at this time none of our Lord's followers had the leaſt apprehenſion that he was to take away the ſacrifice, and make ſuch a change in religion, as would render the temple of no uſe: and therefore, hearing him ſpeak of its demolition, they no doubt ſuppoſed, that the fabrick then ſtanding was too ſmall for the numerous worſhippers who ſhould come when all nations were ſubjected to Meſſiah; and that it was for that reaſon to be pulled down, in order to be erected on a more magnificent plan, ſuitable to the idea they had conceived of the greatneſs of his future kingdom. Entertaining theſe imaginations, they received the news with pleaſure, and fancied to themſelves very glorious things as they travelled along.—Accordingly, when Jeſus was come to the mount of Olives, and had taken a ſeat on ſome eminence, from whence the temple and part of the city was to be ſeen, they drew near, and expreſſed their joy by deſiring to know when the demolition of the old ſtructure was to happen, and what were to be the ſigns of his coming, and of the end of the world. The ſign of thy coming, and of the end of the world, are only different expreſſions to denote the ſame period with the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; for they conceived, that when Jeruſalem ſhould be deſtroyed, then would be the coming of Chriſt; and when the coming of Chriſt, then the end of the world; or rather, as it ſhould be rendered, the concluſion of the age, Συντελεια τȣ αιωνος. The concluſion of the age is the ſame period with the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; for there being two ages, as they were called among the Jews, the one under the law, the other under the Meſſiah, when the city and temple were deſtroyed, and the Jewiſh polity in church and ſtate was diſſolved, the former age muſt of courſe be concluded, and the age under the Meſſiah be commenced. The phraſe appears to be uſed in the ſame manner as in Hebrews ix. 26. But now once, in the end of the world—[επι Συντελεια τῶν αιωνῶν,—in the concluſion of the Jewiſh age or ages] hath he appeared, to put away ſin. See Heb. vi. 5. Epheſ. ii. 2, 7. 1 Cor. x. 11. The coming of Chriſt is alſo the ſame period with the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, as may appear from ſeveral places in the Goſpel, but particularly from ch. xvi. 28. and John xxi. 22. The coming of Chriſt, and the concluſion of the age being therefore only different expreſſions to denote the ſame period with the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, the purport of the queſtion plainly is, "When ſhall the deſtruction of Jeruſalem be, and what ſhall be the ſigns of it?" The latter part of the queſtion our Saviour anſwers firſt, treating of the ſigns of his coming, and of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, from the 4th to the 31ſt verſe, and then paſſes on to the other part of the queſtion, concerning the time of his coming. By ſigns are meant the circumſtances and accidents which ſhould forerun, uſher in, and attend this great event; and we may venture to affirm, that the whole compaſs of hiſtory cannot furniſh us with a prophecy more exactly fulfilled in all points than this has been. "Our Lord (ſays Dr. Doddridge upon this ſubject) with perfect integrity and conſummate wiſdom, anſwers the queſtion of the diſciples, by giving them an account of the prognoſticating and concomitant ſigns of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; and then, without ſaying one word of any temporal kingdom to be erected, which was the ſtrongeſt idea then in their minds, raiſes their thoughts to the final judgement, to which the figures uſed in the former deſcription might many of them be literally applied; and ſets before them an heavenly kingdom, and eternal life, as the great object of their purſuit." See ch. xxv. 34—46. This I take to be the key to this whole diſcourſe. As the things which befel the Jewiſh nation, ſays Macknight,--their bondage in Egypt, their deliverance from that bondage, their paſſage through the Red-ſea, abode in the Wilderneſs, entrance into Canaan, &c. &c. were all typical, repreſenting the methods by which God delivers mankind from the bondage of ſin, and conducts them to heaven; ſo the deſtruction of the nations here ſet forth may prefigure the deſtruction of the world, though the prophecy certainly cannot be interpreted primarily of that deſtruction.

Ver. 4, 5. Take heed that no man deceive you] Our Saviour mentions falſe Chriſts as the firſt ſign of his coming. He begins with this in all the Evangeliſts, and in all uſes almoſt the ſame words: only in St. Luke xxi. 8. he adds, the time draweth near; and indeed within a little time this part of the prophecy began to be fulfilled. Very ſoon after our Saviour's deceaſe, appeared Simon Magus, who boaſted himſelf among the Jews as the ſon of God, and gave out amongſt the Samaritans, that he was ſome great one, Acts viii. 9, 10. Of the ſame ſtamp and character was Doſitheus the Samaritan, who pretended that he was the Chriſt foretold by Moſes. In the reign of Claudius, about twelve years after the death of our Saviour, an impoſtor, named Theudas, perſuaded a great multitude to follow him, with their beſt effects, to the river Jordan; for he ſaid that he was a prophet, and promiſed to divide the river for their paſſage; and ſaying theſe things, he deceived many, ſays Joſephus: but Fadus ſent a troop of horſe againſt them, who falling unexpectedly upon them, killed many, and made many priſoners; and having taken Theudas himſelf alive, they cut off his head, and brought it to Jeruſalem. A few years afterwards, in the reign of Nero, theſe impoſtors roſe ſo frequent, that many of them were apprehended and killed every day. They ſeduced great numbers of the people, ſtill expecting the Meſſiah. Our Saviour therefore might well caution his diſciples againſt them. See the note on ver. 24. Bp. Newton, and Achbp. Tillotſon's diſcourſe on this ſubject.

Ver. 6. And ye ſhall hear of wars, &c.] To relate the particulars of wars and rumours of wars, which happened at the period here referred to, would be to tranſcribe great part of Joſephus's hiſtory. There were more, eſpecially rumours of wars, when Caligula the Roman emperor ordered his ſtatue to be ſet up in the temple at Jeruſalem, which the Jews refuſed to ſuffer, and perſiſted in their refuſal; and having therefore reaſon to apprehend a war from the Romans, were in ſuch a conſternation, that they omitted even the tilling of their lands. But this ſtorm was ſoon blown over, and their fear diſſipated by the timely death of that emperor. But be ye not troubled, ſays our Lord, at the proſpect of theſe calamities, for all theſe things muſt firſt come to paſs: they muſt come to paſs a conſiderable time before the deſtruction of the nation; but the end is not yet. The end of the age, or Jewiſh diſpenſation, and the demolition of the temple, will not be immediately on the back of theſe things. See on ver. 8.

Ver. 7. For nation ſhall riſe, &c.] Here, as Grotius obſerves, Chriſt declares, that greater diſturbances than thoſe which happened under Caligula ſhould fall out in the latter times of Claudius, and in the reign of Nero. The riſing of nation againſt nation portended the diſſenſions, inſurrections, and mutual ſlaughters of the Jews, and thoſe of other nations, who dwelt in the ſame cities together; as particularly at Cæſarea, where the Jews and Syrians contended about the right of the city; which contention at length proceeded ſo far, that above twenty thouſand Jews were ſlain, and the city was cleared of the inhabitants. At this blow the whole nation of the Jews was exaſperated, and dividing themſelves into parties, they burned and plundered the neighbouring cities and villages of the Syrians, and made an immenſe ſlaughter of the people. The Syrians, in revenge, deſtroyed not a leſs number of Jews; and every city, as Joſephus expreſſes it, was "divided into two armies." At Scythopolis the inbitants compelled the Jews who reſided amongſt them to fight againſt their own countrymen, and after the victory, baſely ſetting upon them by night, murdered above thirteen thouſand of them, and ſpoiled their goods. At Aſcalon, they killed two thouſand five hundred; at Ptolemais, two thouſand, and made not a few priſoners. The Tyrians put many to death, and impriſoned more. The people of Gadara did likewiſe, and all the other cities of Syria, in proportion as they hated or feared the Jews. At Alexandria the old enmity was revived between the Jews and heathens, and many fell on both ſides, but of the Jews to the number of fifty thouſand. The people of Damaſcus too conſpired againſt the Jews of the ſame city, and aſſaulting them unarmed, killed ten thouſand of them. The riſing of kingdom againſt kingdom portended the open wars of different tetrarchies and provinces againſt one another; as that of the Jews who dwelt in Peræa againſt the people of Philadelphia concerning their bounds, while Caſpius Fadus was procurator; that of the Jews and Galileans againſt the Samaritans, for the murder of ſome Galileans going up to the feaſt at Jeruſalem, while Cumanus was procurator; and that of the whole nation of the Jews againſt the Romans and Agrippa, and other allies of the Roman empire, which began while Geſſius Florus was procurator. But as Joſephus ſaith, there was not only ſedition and civil war throughout Judea, but likewiſe in Italy, Otho and Vitellius contending for the empire. It is farther added, and there ſhall be famines, and peſtilences, and earthquakes in divers places. There were famines, as particularly that propheſied of by Agabus, and mentioned Acts xi. 28. and by Suetonius and other profane hiſtorians referred to by Euſebius, which came to paſs in the days of Claudius Cæſar, and was ſo ſevere at Jeruſalem, that, as Joſephus ſaith, many periſhed for want of victuals: —and peſtilences, for theſe are the uſual attendants upon famines. Scarcity and badneſs of proviſions almoſt always end in ſome epidemical diſtemper. We ſee many died by reaſon of the famine in the reign of Claudius; and Joſephus farther informs us, that when Niger was killed by the Jewiſh zealots, he imprecated, beſides other cruelties, famine and peſtilence upon them, (λιμοντε και λοιμον, the very words uſed by the Evangeliſt,) all which, ſaith he, God ratified and brought to paſs againſt the ungodly.—And earthquakes in divers places; as particularly that in Crete, in the reign of Claudius, mentioned kingdom againſt kingdom: and there ſhall be famines, and peſtilences, and earthquakes in divers places.

8 All theſe are the beginning of ſorrows.

9 Then ſhall they deliver you up to be afflicted, and ſhall kill you: and ye ſhall be hated of all nations for my name's ſake.

10 And then ſhall many be offended, and ſhall betray one another, and ſhall hate one another.

11 And many falſe prophets ſhall riſe, and ſhall deceive many.

12 And becauſe iniquity ſhall abound, the love of many ſhall wax cold.

13 But he that ſhall endure unto the end, the ſame ſhall be ſaved.

14 And this goſpel of the kingdom ſhall be preached in all the world, for a witneſs unto all nations; and then ſhall the end come.

mentioned by Philoſtratus in the life of Apollonius; thoſe alſo mentioned by Philoſtratus at Smyrna, Miletus, Chios, Samos, in all which places ſome Jews inhabited; thoſe at Rome mentioned by Tacitus; that at Laodicea, in the reign of Nero, mentioned by Tacitus, which city was overwhelmed, as were likewiſe Hierapolis and Coloſſe; that in Campania, mentioned by Seneca; that at Rome, in the reign of Galba, mentioned by Suetonius; and that in Judea, mentioned by Joſephus: for by night there broke out a moſt dreadful tempeſt, and violent ſtrong winds, with the moſt vehement ſhowers, and continual lightnings, and horrid thunderings, and prodigious bellowings of the ſhaken earth; ſo that it was manifeſt, as he obſerves, that the conſtitution of the univerſe was confounded for the deſtruction of men; and any one might eaſily conjecture, that theſe things portended no common calamity.

Ver. 8. All theſe are the beginning of ſorrows] ἀρχὴ ὠδίνων, the beginning of throes, or pangs. Great troubles and calamities are often expreſſed in Scripture language metaphorically, by the pangs of travailing women: "All theſe are only the firſt pangs and throes, and are nothing to that hard labour which ſhall ſucceed." See on ver. 6.

Ver. 9. Then ſhall they deliver you up, &c.] Had Jeſus been an impoſtor, he would, like all other impoſtors, have fed his followers with fair hopes and promiſes; but on the contrary, we ſee that he denounceth perſecution to be the lot of his diſciples; he pointeth out to them the difficulties they muſt encounter, the fiery trials they muſt undergo, and yet they did not therefore ſtagger in their faith; they did not therefore, like faint-hearted ſoldiers, forſake their colours, and deſert his ſervice. One hardly knows whom to admire moſt, Him for dealing ſo plainly, or them for adhering ſo ſteadily to him. Such inſtances are rarely found, of openneſs on the one hand, and of fidelity on the other. See Bp. Newton, vol. ii. p. 283.

Ver. 13. Then ſhall many be offended, &c.] By reaſon of perſecution and of the univerſal hatred which all nations bore againſt the Chriſtian name, many were indeed offended, and apoſtatized from the faith; as particularly Phygellus and Hermogenes, and many others in Aſia, 2 Tim. i. 15. and Demas,—iv. 10. But they were not only to apoſtatize from the faith, but alſo to betray and hate one another. To illuſtrate which point, we need only cite a ſentence out of Tacitus, ſpeaking of the perſecution under Nero: "At firſt, ſays he, ſeveral were ſeized, who confeſſed, and then by their diſcovery, a great multitude of others were convicted and executed." Bp. Newton, p. 232.

Ver. 11. Many falſe prophets ſhall ariſe] Such particularly were Simon Magus, and his very numerous followers, the Gnoſtics. Such alſo were the Judaizing teachers, mentioned 2 Cor. xi. 13. Such alſo were Hymeneus and Philetus, of whom the Apoſtle, 2 Tim. ii. 17. complains, that they affirmed the reſurrection to be paſt already, and overthrew the faith of ſome. See Bp. Newton, as above.

Ver. 12. Becauſe iniquity, &c.] The genuine fruit and effect of all theſe evils was the lukewarmneſs and coolneſs among Chriſtians. By reaſon of theſe trials and perſecutions from without, and theſe apoſtaſies and falſe prophets from within, the love of many to Chriſt and his doctrine, and alſo their love to each other ſhall wax old. Some ſhall openly deſert the faith, as ver. 18. ſome ſhall corrupt it, as ver. 11. and others again, as here, ſhall grow indifferent to it; and, not to mention other inſtances, who can hear St. Paul complaining at Rome, 2 Tim. iv. 16. that at his firſt anſwer all men forſook him; who can hear the divine author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews exhorting them, ch. x. 25. Not to forſake the aſſembling of themſelves together, as the manner of ſome is, and not conclude the event to have ſufficiently juſtified our Saviour's prediction? Bp. Newton, p. 233. Inſtead of love, Dr. Heylin reads charity. The word ἀγαπη, ſays he, originally ſignifies love in general; but in the Chriſtian ſtile it is become a technical term, and is commonly appropriated to ſignify the love of God; and when it is uſed in that important ſenſe, it may be proper to keep to the ſame term; becauſe different words in a verſion put for the ſame word, and where the enſe is preciſely the ſame as in the original, may cauſe obſcurity and iſtake, as hath happened in this very inſtance; for in common ac-eptation, charity has dwindled down to mean no more than alms-iving. Dr. Clarke's expoſition of this verſe is, "The general cor-uption and wickedneſs of the world ſhall diſcourage many from ad-ering to religion." See Serm. ix. vol. 11.

Ver. 13. But he that ſhall endure] "He who ſhall not be terrified y theſe trials and perſecutions; he who ſhall neither apoſtatize from e faith himſelf, nor be ſeduced by others; he who ſhall not be aſhamed to profeſs his faith in Chriſt, and his love to the brethren, the ſame ſhall be ſaved, both here and hereafter. And indeed it is very remarkable, and was certainly a moſt ſignal act of Providence, that none of the Chriſtians periſhed in the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. See Luke xxi. 18. 2 Pet. ii. 9. and Bp. Newton as above.

Ver. 14. This Goſpel—ſhall be preached in all the world—and then, &c.] Then ſhall the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the end of the Jewiſh polity come to paſs; when all nations ſhall be, or may be convinced of the crying ſins of the Jews in crucifying the Lord of glory, and of the juſtice of God's judgements upon them. Some imagine that by all the world is meant only the whole land of Judea, the very words of the text being uſed by the Septuagint, and by Joſephus himſelf in this ſenſe. But that ſomething more than this muſt be meant, will appear, if we conſider, that though the acts of the Apoſtles contains only a ſmall part of the hiſtory of a few of the Apoſtles, yet even in that hiſtory we ſee the Goſpel was diſſeminated, and had taken root in the moſt conſiderable parts of the Roman empire. As early as the reign of Nero the Chriſtians were grown ſo numerous at Rome, as to raiſe the jealouſy of the government, and the firſt general perſecution was commenced againſt them under pretence of their having ſet the city on fire. The Goſpel was preached by St. Paul in Arabia, and through the vaſt tract from Jeruſalem to Iconium, in Lycaonia, and in Galatia, through all Aſia Minor, in Greece, round about to Illyricum, in Crete, Italy, Spain, and Gaul. Clement, who was his contemporary and fellow-labourer, ſays of him in particular, "that he was a preacher both in the eaſt and weſt; and that he taught the whole world righteouſneſs, and travelled as far as the utmoſt borders of the weſt." And if ſuch were the labours of one Apoſtle, what muſt have been the united labours of them all? We have ſtill remaining the Epiſtles of St. Peter to the converted Jews in Pontus, Aſia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia. The Ethiopian eunuch converted by Philip probably carried the Goſpel into his own country. It appears, indeed, from the writers of the Hiſtory of the Church, that before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem the Goſpel was not only preached in the Leſſer Aſia, and Greece, and Italy, the great theatres of action then in the world, but was likewiſe propagated as far northward as Scythia, as far ſouthward as Ethiopia, as far eaſtward as Parthia and India, and as far weſtward as Spain and Britain. Our anceſtors of this iſland, though as remote from the ſcene of our Saviour's actions as almoſt any nation, probably heard the preaching of St. Simon; there is indeed much more probability that the Goſpel was preached here by St. Paul; and there is abſolute certainty that Chriſtianity was planted in this country in the days of the Apoſtles, before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. The evidence of Euſebius and Theodoret abundantly prove it to have been fact; and St. Paul himſelf, Col. i. 6, 23. ſpeaks of the Goſpel's being come into all the world, and preached to every creature under heaven. See alſo Rom. x. 18. Though the ſucceſs of the Apoſtles was ſo great, yet the difficulties they had to encounter were no leſs than the ſuperſtition, the prejudices, and the vices of the whole world; difficulties of ſo much the harder conqueſt, as being derived, though by corruption, from good principles; namely, the religion, the nature, and the reaſon of mankind. From a view of the Jewiſh and Gentile world it is evident, that every thing which moſt ſtrongly influences and tyrannizes over the mind of man, religion, cuſtom, law, policy, pride, intereſt, vice, and even philoſophy, was united againſt the Goſpel; enemies in their own nature very formidable and difficult to be ſubdued, had they even ſuffered themſelves to be attacked upon even ground, and come to a fair engagement; but, not relying upon their own ſtrength only, they intrenched themſelves behind that power of which they were in poſſeſſion, and rendered themſelves inacceſſible, as they imagined, to Chriſtianity, by planting round them not only all kinds of civil diſcouragements, but even torments, chains, and death. Theſe were the difficulties which Chriſtianity had to ſtruggle with, and over which ſhe at length ſo prevailed, as to change the whole ſcene of things, overturn the temples and altars of the gods, ſilence the oracles, humble the impious pride of the emperors, confound the preſumptuous wiſdom of the philoſophers, and introduce into the greateſt part of the known world a new principle of religion and virtue. But what were the inſtruments of ſo ſtupendous a work! a few illiterate perſons, many of whom were fiſhermen! The ſtate of the firſt preachers of the Goſpel, and their oppoſers, was this: the latter were poſſeſſed of all the wiſdom, authority and power of the world; the former were ignorant, contemptible, and weak. Which of them then, according to the natural courſe of human affairs, ought to have prevailed? The latter, without all doubt; and yet not St. Paul only, but all hiſtory, and our own experience aſſure us, that the ignorant, the contemptible, and the weak gained the victory from the wiſe, the mighty, and the noble. See Bp. Newton, Weſt on the Reſurrection, and Dr. Young on Idolatry. vol. 2.

Ver. 15, 16. When ye therefore ſhall ſee, &c.] Whatever difficulty there be in theſe words, it may be cleared up by the parallel place, Luke xxi. 20, 21. From whence it appears that the abomination of deſolation is the Roman army, and the abomination of deſolation ſtanding in the holy place, that army beſieging Jeruſalem. This, ſaith our Saviour, is the abomination of deſolation ſpoken of by Daniel the prophet, ch. ix. and x. and ſo let every one who reads theſe prophecies underſtand them. The Roman army is called the abomination, becauſe its enſigns and images were ſo to the Jews, among whom every image of a man, and every idol, was called an abomination. After the city was taken, the Romans brought their enſigns into the temple, and placed them over againſt the eaſtern gate, and ſacrificed to them there. The Roman army therefore is fitly called the abomination, and the abomination of deſolation, as it was to deſolate and lay waſte Jeruſalem: And this army's beſieging Jeruſalem, is called ſtanding in the holy place; the city, and ſuch a compaſs of ground about it, being accounted holy. "When therefore the Roman army ſhall approach to beſiege Jeruſalem, then let them who are in Judea conſult their own ſafety, and fly into the mountains." This counſel was wiſely remembered, and put in practice by the Chriſtians afterwards. When Ceſtius Gallus came with his army againſt Jeruſalem, many fled from the city: After his retreat, many of the noble Jews departed from it; and when Veſpaſian was approaching it with great forces, a vaſt multitude, ſays Joſephus, fled from Jericho into the mountainous country for their ſecurity. At this juncture all who believed in Chriſt left Jeruſalem, and removed to Pella, and other places beyond the river Jordan; ſo that they all marvellouſly eſcaped; and we do not read any where that ſo much as any one periſhed in the deſtruction of Jeruſalem: Of ſuch ſignal ſervice was this caution of our Saviour to the believers! See Bp. Newton, vol. ii. p. 241, &c. and Bullock's Vindication, book i. ch. 4. Dr. Heylin reads the laſt words, Let him that reads, conſider it well.

Ver. 17. Let him who is on the houſe-top] The houſes of the Jews, the preſent inhabitants of the eaſt, as well as thoſe of the ancient Greeks and Romans, were flat on the top for them to walk on, and had uſually two pair of ſtairs, one on the inſide, and the other on the out, by the latter of which they could aſcend and deſcend, without coming into the houſe. In the eaſtern walled cities theſe flat-roofed houſes uſually formed continued terraces from one end of the city to the other, which terraces terminated at the gates. He, therefore, who is walking and regaling himſelf upon the houſe-top, let him not come down to take any thing out of his houſe; but let him inſtantly purſue his courſe along the tops of the houſes, and eſcape out at the city-gate as faſt as he poſſibly can. Bp. Newton, p. 244.

Ver. 18. Neither let him who is in the field return] Our Saviour makes uſe of theſe expreſſions to intimate, that their flight muſt be as ſudden and haſty as Lot's was out of Sodom; and the Chriſtians eſcaping juſt as they did was the more providential, becauſe afterwards all egreſs out of the city was prevented. Theſe are as ſtrong expreſſions as one can imagine, to urge the ſpeedieſt retreat. It is indeed obſervable that this whole diſcourſe abounds with very lively figures of oratory, and is heightened with the nobleſt beauties of deſcription. See Bp. Newton, and Elſner's Obſervations, vol. 1.

Ver. 19. Woe unto them that are with child, &c.] For neither will ſuch perſons be in a condition to fly, neither will they be able to endure the diſtreſs and hardſhips of a ſiege. This woe was ſufficiently fulfilled in the cruel ſlaughters which were made both of the women and children, and particularly in that grievous famine which ſo miſerably afflicted Jeruſalem during the ſiege. For mothers, as Joſephus reports, ſnatched the food from the very mouths of their infants; and the houſes were full of women and children who periſhed by famine. See the note on Deut. xxviii. 53—56. and Bp. Newton, p. 245.

Ver. 20. But pray ye that your flight be not, &c.] And pray ye, &c. MS. "Pray that theſe evils be not further aggravated by the concurrence of other natural and moral evils, ſuch as the inclemencies of the ſeaſons, and your own ſuperſtitions: Pray that your flight be not in the winter; for the hardneſs of the ſeaſon, the badneſs of the roads, and the ſhortneſs of the days, will all be great impediments to your flight; neither on the Sabbath day; that you may not raiſe the indignation of the Jews by travelling on that day, nor be hindered from doing it by your own ſuperſtition." This ſeems to be ſpoken a good deal in condeſcenſion to the Jewiſh prejudices, a Sabbath-day's journey among the Jews being but about a mile; and conſequently inſufficient for the ſecurity of their lives who fled. It has been obſerved, (on Pſ. cxlvii. 16. and Ezra x. 9.) that the winters are extremely cold in the Holy Land. St. Jerome ſpeaks of the cold of that country as frequently too ſevere to be borne by thoſe who might be glad to ſecrete themſelves for fear of their lives; and in his letter to Algaſia, he thus underſtands, as to the literal ſenſe, the direction of our Lord here given to his diſciples; the ſeverity of the cold being ſuch, as would not permit them to conceal themſelves in the deſarts. Agreeable to this, and at the ſame time a lively comment on theſe words of our Lord, is the account which William of Tyre gives of the ſtate of Saladine's troops after their defeat in the neighbourhood of Aſcalon. "They for haſte threw away their armour and clothes, [veſtium genera quælibet; i. e. their hykes and burnooſes, deſcribed by Dr. Shaw, p. 226. which they found intangled them, and retarded their flight] but ſo ſunk under the cold, with want of food, tediouſneſs of the ways, and greatneſs of the fatigue, that they were daily taken captives in the woods, mountains, and wilderneſs; and ſometimes threw themſelves in the way of their enemies, rather than periſh with cold and hunger." See the Obſervations on Sacred Scripture, p. 15. As our Saviour cautioned his diſciples to fly when they ſhould ſee Jeruſalem encompaſſed with armies; ſo was it very providentially ordered that Jeruſalem ſhould be compaſſed with armies, and yet that they ſhould have ſuch favourable opportunities of making their eſcape. In the 12th year of Nero, Ceſtius Gallus came againſt Jeruſalem with a powerful army; and though, if he had aſſaulted the city, he might have taken it, and have put an end to the war; yet, without any apparent reaſon, and contrary to every one's expectation, he raiſed the ſiege. Veſpaſian, who ſucceeded him in the command, inveſted the city on all ſides; but the news of Nero's death, and ſoon after Galba's, cauſed him to ſuſpend his operations againſt Jeruſalem; and the city was not actually beſieged in form, till Veſpaſian was confirmed in the empire, and Titus was ſent to command the forces in Judea. Theſe incidental delays were very opportune for the Chriſtians, and thoſe who had thoughts of retreating and providing for their ſafety. Bp. Newton.

Ver. 21. Then ſhall be great tribulation] In the preceding verſes our Saviour warned his diſciples to fly as ſoon as ever they ſaw Jeruſalem beſieged by the Romans, and now he aſſigns a reaſon for his giving them this caution. The words uſed in this verſe ſeem to be a proverbial form of expreſſion, as in Exod. x. 14. Joel ii. 2. Daniel xii. 11. 1 Macc. ix. 27. Our Lord, therefore, might fitly apply the ſame manner of ſpeaking upon the preſent occaſion: But he doth not make uſe of proverbial expreſſions without a proper meaning; and this may be underſtood even literally. For indeed all hiſtory cannot furniſh us with a parallel to the calamities and miſeries of the Jews; rapine and murder, famine and peſtilence within, fire and ſword, and all the terrors of war without. Our Saviour wept at the foreſight of theſe calamities, and it is almoſt impoſſible for perſons of any humanity to read the relation of them without weeping too. The Jewiſh hiſtorian might well ſay, as he doth in the preface to his hiſtory: "If the misfortunes of all, from the beginning of the world, were compared with thoſe of the Jews, they would appear much inferior upon compariſon. In ſhort, no other city ever ſuffered ſuch things, as no other generation, from the beginning of the world, was ever more fruitful of wickedneſs." See Luke xxi. 22, &c. and Bp. Newton, p. 250.

Ver. 22. Except thoſe days ſhall be ſhortened.] "If theſe wars and deſolations were to continue, no fleſh—none of the Jews, would eſcape deſtruction." The number of thoſe who periſhed in the ſiege were about eleven hundred thouſand, beſides thoſe who were ſlain in other places; and if the Romans had gone on deſtroying in this manner, the whole nation of the Jews would certainly, in a little time, have been extirpated. But, for the elect's ſake, thoſe days ſhall be ſhortened. The elect is a well-known appellation in Scripture and antiquity for the Chriſtians; and the Chriſtian Jews, partly through the fury of the zealots on the one hand, and the hatred of the Romans on the other, and partly through the difficulty of ſubſiſting in the mountains, without houſes or proviſions, would in all probability have been almoſt all deſtroyed, either by the ſword or by famine, if the days had not been ſhortened; but providentially the days were 24 For there ſhall ariſe falſe Chriſts, and falſe prophets, and ſhall ſhew great ſigns and wonders; inſomuch that (if it were poſſible) they ſhall deceive the very elect.

25 Behold, I have told you before.

26 Wherefore, if they ſhall ſay unto you, Behold, he is in the deſert; go not forth: Behold, he is in the ſecret chambers; believe it not.

27 For, as the lightning cometh out of the eaſt, and ſhineth even unto the weſt; ſo ſhall alſo the coming of the Son of man be.

28 For wherefoever the carcaſe is, there will the eagles be gathered together.

29 Immediately after the tribulation of thoſe days, ſhall the ſun be darkened, and the moon ſhall not give her light, and the ſtars ſhall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens ſhall be ſhaken.

ſhortened. Veſpaſian, who was advanced in years, and therefore could not carry on the ſiege with that vigour which might cauſe the city ſoon to fall into his hands, transferred the command to Titus; who, having Rome, and the riches and pleaſures there, before his eyes, took every meaſure which might render his expedition ſucceſsful, and contribute to his glory, by the ſhortneſs of the time which he employed to effect it. The beſieged too helped to ſhorten the days by their diviſions and mutual ſlaughters, by burning their proviſions, which would have ſufficed for many years, and by fatally deſtroying their ſtrong-holds, where they could never have been taken by force, but by famine alone. By theſe means the days were ſhortened; and indeed otherwiſe Jeruſalem could never have been taken in ſo ſhort a time, ſo well fortified as it was, and ſo well fitted to ſuſtain a longer ſiege. The enemy could hardly ever have prevailed, but for the factions and ſeditions within. Titus himſelf could not but aſcribe his ſucceſs to God, as he was viewing the fortifications after the city was taken. His words to his friends are very remarkable: "We have fought with God on our ſide, and it is God who has pulled the Jews out of their ſtrong-holds; for what could the hands of men or machines do againſt theſe towers?" God, therefore, in the opinion of Titus, ſhortened theſe days. After the deſtruction of Jeruſalem too, God inclined the heart of Titus to take ſome pity upon the remnant of the Jews, and to reſtrain the nations from effecting the cruelty that they would have exerciſed againſt them. At Antioch particularly, the ſenate importuned him to expel the Jews from the city; but he anſwered, that their country being laid waſte, there was no place to receive them. They then requeſted him to deprive the Jews of their former privileges; but thoſe he permitted them to enjoy as before. Thus, for the elect's ſake, thoſe days of perſecution were ſhortened. See Bp. Newton, p. 254. and particularly Dr. Jackſon's Credibility of the Scriptures.

Ver. 23, 24. Lo, here is Chriſt, or there] In fact, many ſuch impoſtors did ariſe about that time, and promiſed deliverance from God; but as it was to little purpoſe for a man to take upon him the character of the Chriſt, or even of a prophet, without miracles to vouch his divine miſſion, ſo it was the common artifice and pretence of theſe impoſtors to ſhew ſigns and wonders. Simon Magus performed wonders, according to the account given of him, Acts viii. 9—11. Doſitheus likewiſe was reputed to do ſo; and Barchochebas is ſaid to have pretended to vomit flames. Such alſo were the Jews of whom St. Paul ſpeaks, 2 Tim. iii. 8, 13. There is a ſtrange propenſity in mankind to believe things marvellous and aſtoniſhing; and no wonder that weak and wicked men, Jews and Samaritans, were deceived by ſuch impoſtors, where, if it had been poſſible, they would have deceived the very elect,—even the Chriſtians themſelves. See Bp. Newton, p. 257. This is not a mere repetition of what was ſaid before, ver. 5. but relates more particularly to thoſe impoſtors who appeared during the time of the ſiege; concerning whom, ſee Joſephus's War, b. vi. c. 5. Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. b. iv. ch. 6. and Grotius on the place.

Ver. 25, 26. Behold, &c.] "Behold, I have given you ſufficient warning." It is ſurpriſing that our Saviour ſhould not only foretel the appearance of theſe impoſtors, but alſo the manner and circumſtances of their conduct; for ſome he mentions as appearing in the deſart, and ſome in ſecret chambers, and the event hath in all points anſwered to the prediction. Several of the falſe Chriſts and falſe prophets conducted their followers into deſarts, where they promiſed to ſhew wonders and ſigns; and many being perſuaded, ſuffered the puniſhments of their folly; ſome of them being brought back by Felix, and chaſtiſed or ſlain by him. The Egyptian falſe prophet. mentioned Acts xxi. 38. led out four thouſand into the wilderneſs, that were murderers; but being engaged by Felix, the Egyptian himſelf with others fled away, and moſt of thoſe who had been with him were ſlain or taken priſoners. Theſe things happened before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. And a little after, one Jonathan, a weaver, rſuaded many indigent fellows to follow him into the deſart, proſing to ſhew them ſigns; but moſt of his followers were alſo ſlain, me made priſoners, and he himſelf was afterwards taken, and rned alive, by order of Veſpaſian. As ſeveral of thoſe impoſtors nducted their followers into the deſart, ſo did others of them into e ſecret chambers, or places of ſecurity; particularly the falſe prot mentioned by Joſephus, who declared, that God commanded e people to go up into the temple, where they ſhould receive the ns of deliverance. A multitude of men, women, and children went up accordingly; but, inſtead of deliverance, the place was ſet on fire by the Romans, and ſix thouſand periſhed miſerably in the flames, or by throwing themſelves down to eſcape them. From hence it is obvious to obſerve, that in all probability there hath been a true prophet, a true Chriſt, otherwiſe there would hardly have been ſo many cheats and counterfeits. We may likewiſe obſerve, that the Meſſiah was particularly expected about the time of our Saviour, and conſequently that the prophets had beforehand marked out that very time for his coming. We read not of any falſe Meſſiahs before the age of our Saviour, nor of ſo many in any age after; and why did they riſe in that age particularly, if the Meſſiah was not at that time particularly expected? And why did the Jews expect their Meſſiah at that time more than at any other, if that was not the time before appointed for his coming? Bp. Newton, p. 259, and 266. Dr. Waterland, inſtead of ſecret chambers, reads ſecret places.

Ver. 27. As the lightning—ſhall the coming of the Son of man be] His coming will not be in this or that particular place, but, like the lightning, ſudden and univerſal. The appearance of the true Chriſt will be as diſtinguiſhable from that of the falſe Chriſts, as lightning, which ſhineth all round the hemiſphere, is from a blaze of ſtraw. It is very remarkable, "That the Roman army entered into Judea on the eaſt-ſide of it, and carried on their conqueſts weſtward; as if not only the extenſiveneſs of the ruin, but the very route which the army ſhould take was intended, in the compariſon of the lightning coming out of the eaſt, and ſhining even in the weſt." See Pearce's Diſſert. on the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and Bp. Newton, p. 263.

Ver. 28. Whereſoever the carcaſe is, &c.] By the word carcaſe is meant the Jewiſh nation, which was morally and judicially dead, and whoſe deſtruction was pronounced in the decrees of heaven. Our Saviour, after his uſual manner, applies a proverbial expreſſion with a particular meaning: for as, according to the old proverb whereſoever, &c. ſo whereſoever the Jews are, there will Chriſt be taking vengeance upon them by the Romans, who are properly compared to eagles, as the fierceſt beaſts of prey, and whoſe enſign was an eagle, to which alſo probably our Saviour in this paſſage alluded. And as it was ſaid, ſo it was done; for the victories of the Romans were not confined to this or that place, but like a flood over-ran the whole land. There was no part of Judea that did not partake of the calamities of the captivity. At Antioch many were burnt in the theatre, and others were ſlain; the Romans ſlew them every where; at Jardes not fewer than three thouſand were put to death. Being on the point of being taken at Maſade, they firſt murdered their wives and children, and then themſelves, to the number of nine hundred and ſixty, to avoid falling into the enemies hands. In Cyrene the followers of Jonathan the weaver, were moſt of them ſlain; he himſelf was taken priſoner, and by his accuſation, three thouſand of the richeſt Jews were put to death. Bp. Newton, p. 263.

Ver. 29. Immediately after the tribulation, &c.] Commentators generally underſtand this and what follows, of the end of the world, and of Chriſt's coming to judgement; but the words evidently ſhew that he is not ſpeaking of any diſtant event, but of ſomething conſequent upon the tribulation before-mentioned, and that muſt be the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. It is true, his figures are very ſtrong; but no ſtronger than are uſed by the ancient prophets on ſimilar occaſions. See Iſai. xiii. Bp. Warburton obſerves upon the ſubject, that this prophecy of Jeſus concerning the approaching deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Titus, is conceived in ſuch high and ſwelling terms, that not only the modern interpreters but the ancient likewiſe have ſuppoſed, that our Lord interweaves into it a direct prediction of his coming to judgement: but if we conſider the nature of the two diſpenſations, and the neceſſity of aboliſhing the former, before the introduction of the latter, it will then appear, that this prophecy doth not reſpect Chriſt's ſecond coming to judgement, but his firſt, in the abolition of the Jewiſh polity, and the eſtabliſhment of the Chriſtian; that kingdom of Chriſt which commenced on the total ceaſing of the theocracy. For as God's reign over the Jews intirely ended with the abolition of the temple ſervice, ſo the reign of Chriſt, in ſpirit and in truth, had then its firſt beginning. This was the true eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity, not that effected by the donations or converſions of Conſtantine. Thus till the Jewiſh law was aboliſhed, over which the Father preſided as king, the reign of the Son could not take place; becauſe the ſovereignty of Chriſt over mankind was 30 And then ſhall appear the ſign of the Son of man in heaven: and then ſhall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they ſhall ſee the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory.

31 And he ſhall ſend his angels with a great ſound of a trumpet, and they ſhall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.

32 Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that ſummer is nigh:

34 Verily I ſay unto you, This generation ſhall not paſs, till all theſe things be fulfilled.

35 Heaven and earth ſhall paſs away, but my words ſhall not paſs away.

that very ſovereignty of God over the Jews transferred, and more largely extended. This therefore being one of the moſt important æras in the œconomy of grace, and the moſt aweful revolution in all God's religious diſpenſations, we ſee the elegance and propriety of the terms in queſtion, to denote ſo great an event, together with the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, by which it was effected: for in the old prophetic language, the change and fall of principalities and powers, whether ſpiritual or civil, are ſignified by the ſhaking heaven and earth—the darkening the ſun, and moon,—and the falling of the ſtars; as the riſe and eſtabliſhment of new ones are by proceſſions in the clouds of heaven, by the ſound of trumpets, and the aſſembling together of hoſts and congregations." See Bp. Newton, p. 281, 285. Bp. Warburton's Julian, b. i. ch. 1. p. 21. and the next note.

Ver. 30. And then ſhall appear the ſign, &c.] The plain meaning of this is, that the deſtruction of Jeruſalem will be ſuch a remarkable inſtance of divine vengeance, ſuch a ſignal manifeſtation of Chriſt's power and glory, that all the Jewiſh tribes ſhall mourn, and many will be led from thence to acknowledge Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion. In the ancient prophets God is frequently deſcribed as coming in the clouds, upon any remarkable interpoſition and manifeſtation of his power; and the ſame deſcription is here applied to Chriſt. The deſtruction of Jeruſalem will be as ample a manifeſtation of Chriſt's power and glory, as if he was himſelf to come viſibly in the clouds of heaven. Bp. Newton, p. 283. See on John vi. 30. and Gerhard's Diſſertations, p. 200, &c.—Dr. Clarke ſays, that the ſign here mentioned means the figure given by the prophet Daniel, the ſignal of that Son of man there deſcribed. vol. v. ſerm. 2. Inſtead of the tribes of the earth, Dr. Waterland reads the tribes of the land.

Ver. 31. And he ſhall ſend his angels] This is all in the ſtile and phraſeology of the prophets, and, ſtripped of its figures, meaneth only, that after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, Chriſt, by his angels or miniſters, will gather to himſelf a glorious church out of all the nations under heaven. No one ever ſo little verſed in hiſtory needs to be told that the Chriſtian religion ſpread and prevailed mightily after this period; and hardly any one thing contributed more to this ſucceſs of the goſpel, than the deſtruction of Jeruſalem falling out in the very manner, and in the very circumſtances ſo particularly foretold by our bleſſed Saviour. Bp. Newton, p. 234. Moſt tranſlations, as well as our own, have greatly obſcured this text, by rendering the word αγγελους, angels; for though it generally ſignifies thoſe celeſtial ſpirits who are on great occaſions the meſſengers of God to our world, it is well known that the word refers not to their nature, but to their office, and is often applied to men, and rendered meſſengers. See Mark i. 2. Luke vii. 24, 47. ix. 52. 2 Cor. viii. 23. Philip ii. 25. and James ii, 23. in ſome of which places it ſignifies, as here, preachers of the Goſpel, who were ſent forth to carry on God's great deſigns of uniting all his choſen people in one ſociety, under Chriſt their common head. See Epheſ. i. 10.

Ver. 32, 33. Now learn a parable of the fig-tree] Our Lord having anſwered the latter part of the queſtion propoſed ver. 3. proceeds in theſe verſes to anſwer the former part, as to the time of his coming, and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. And he begins by obſerving, that the ſigns which he had given would be as certain an indication of the time of his coming, as the fig-tree's putting forth its leaves is of the approach of ſummer. Dr. Heylin reads the laſt clauſe of the 33d verſe, know that the Son of man is near; but from Luke xxi. 29. it appears that ours is the moſt proper tranſlation.

Ver. 34. This generation ſhall not paſs, &c] Our Lord proceeds to declare, that the time of his coming was at no very great diſtance; and to ſhew that he hath been ſpeaking all the while of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, he affirms with his uſual aſſeveration, Verily I ſay unto you, &c. It is therefore matter of wonder how any man can refer part of the foregoing diſcourſe to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and part of it to the end of the world, or any other diſtant event, when it is ſaid ſo poſitively here, all theſe things ſhall be fulfilled in this generation. See Bp. Newton, p. 517. Matth. xxvi. 64. and Mark ix. 1.

Ver. 35. Heaven and earth ſhall paſs away] It ſeems as if our Saviour had been aware of ſome ſuch miſapplication of his words, as is intimated in the preceding note, by adding yet greater force and emphaſis to his affirmation: heaven and earth ſhall paſs, &c. It is a common figure of ſpeech in the oriental languages, to ſay of two things, that the one ſhall be, and the other ſhall not be, when the meaning is only, that the one ſhall happen ſooner or more eaſi than the other,—as in this inſtance of our Saviour: The meaning therefore is, "Heaven and earth ſhall ſooner or more eaſily paſs away, than my words ſhall paſs away: The frame of the univerſe ſhall ſooner or more eaſily be diſſolved, than my words ſhall fail of being fulfilled." See Luke xvi. 17.

It appears next to impoſſible that any man ſhould duly confider theſe prophecies, and the exact completion of them; and if he is a believer, not be confirmed in the faith; or if he is an infidel, not be converted: Can any ſtronger proof be given of a divine revelation than the Spirit of prophecy? And can any ſtronger proof be given of the ſpirit of prophecy, than the example now before us? In which ſo many contingencies, and we might ſay improbabilities, which human wiſdom or prudence could never foreſee, are ſo particularly foretold, and ſo punctually accompliſhed! At the time when Chriſt pronounced theſe prophecies, the Roman governor reſided at Jeruſalem, and had a force ſufficient to keep the people in obedience; and could human prudence foreſee, that the city as well as the country would revolt and rebel againſt the Romans? Could any human prudence foreſee famines, and peſtilences, and earthquakes in divers places? Could human prudence foreſee the ſpeedy propagation of the Goſpel, ſo contrary to all human probability? Could human prudence foreſee ſuch an utter deſtruction of Jeruſalem, with all the circumſtances preceding and following it? It was never the cuſtom of the Romans abſolutely to ruin any of their provinces; it was improbable therefore that ſuch a thing ſhould happen at all, and ſtill more improbable that it ſhould happen under the humane and generous Titus, who was indeed, as he was called, the love and delight of mankind. Yet however improbable this was, it has happened, and it was foreſeen and foretold by Chriſt; but how was it poſſible for him to do it, unleſs his foreſight was divine, and his prediction the infallible oracle of God? See Bp. Newton, p. 317, 326. and Macknight.—Euſebius obſerves well upon this place, that whoever ſhall compare the words of our Saviour with the hiſtory of the war which Joſephus has wrote, cannot but admire the wiſdom of Chriſt, and acknowledge his prediction to be divine.

Ver. 36. But of that day and hour knoweth no man] The word is of a larger ſignification than hour; and beſides, it ſeems ſomewhat improper to ſay, of that day and hour knoweth no man; for if the day was not known, certainly the hour was not, and it was ſuperfluous to make ſuch an addition. The paſſage therefore might be rendered "of the day and ſeaſon," &c. as the word is frequently uſed in the beſt authors, both ſacred and profane. It is true our Saviour declares, all theſe things ſhall be fulfilled in this generation; It is true the prophet Daniel hath given ſome intimation of the time in his famous prophecy of the ſeventy weeks: But though this great revolution was to happen in that generation; though it was to happen at the concluſion of ſeventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety years to be computed from a certain date that is not eaſy to be fixed; yet the particular day, the particular ſeaſon in which it was to happen might ſtill remain a ſecret to men and angels: And our Saviour had before (ver. 20.) adviſed his diſciples to pray, that their flight might not be in the winter, neither on the ſabbath-day. The DAY not being known, they might pray that their flight be not on the ſabbath-day; the ſeaſon not being known, they might pray that their flight might not be in the winter. See the note on Mark xiii. 32. and Bp. Newton, p. 519.

Ver. 37—39. But as the days of Noah, &c.] The days of Noah ſignify the days in which he preached to the old world that righteouſneſs which they ought to have practiſed, and denounced the judgements of God to fall on them, if they did not repent of their wickedneſs. By parity of reaſon, the days of the Son of man ſignify the days in which Chriſt and his Apoſtles preached to the Jewiſh nation, whoſe behaviour here is ſaid to have been the ſame with that of the old world, and of the Sodomites, under the preaching of Noah and the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, 39 And knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; ſo ſhall alſo the coming of the Son of man be.

40 Then ſhall two be in the field; the one ſhall be taken, and the other left.

41 Two women ſhall be grinding at the mill; the one ſhall be taken, and the other left.

42 Watch therefore: for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come.

43 But know this, that if the good-man of the houſe had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have ſuffered his houſe to be broken up.

44 Therefore, be ye alſo ready: for in ſuch an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh.

45 Who then is a faithful and wiſe ſervant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his houſhold, to give them meat in due ſeaſon?

46 Bleſſed is that ſervant, whom his lord when he cometh, ſhall find ſo doing.

47 Verily I ſay unto you, That he ſhall make him ruler over all his goods.

48 But if that evil ſervant ſhall ſay in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming;

49 And ſhall begin to ſmite his fellow-ſervants, and to eat and drink with the drunken;

50 The lord of that ſervant ſhall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of;

51 And ſhall cut him aſunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth.

Lot. See Luke xvii. 28. They went on ſecure, and wholly intent upon their worldly affairs, without being in the leaſt moved by the repeated warnings of the divine judgements, which Jeſus and his Apoſtles gave them; for which cauſe theſe judgements fell on them, and deſtroyed them. Dr. Woodward, in his Theory of the Earth, thinks, that the phraſes eating and dring, &c. were modeſt expreſſions to ſignify their giving themſelves up to all the extravagances of riot and luſt. And Wolfius upon the place has fully proved, that γαμίζεσθαι is often uſed in every criminal ſenſe: but how great reaſon ſoever there may be to believe, that the antediluvian ſinners did ſo, the words may be intended to expreſs no more than the ſecurity and gaiety with which they purſued the uſual employments and amuſements of life, when they were on the very brink of utter deſtruction. See Doddridge.

Ver. 40, 41. Then ſhall two be in the field, &c.] Providence will then make a diſtinction between ſuch, as are not at all diſtinguiſhed now. Some ſhall be reſcued from the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, like Lot out of the burning of Sodom; while others, no ways perhaps different in outward circumſtances, ſhall be left to periſh in it. See Bp. Newton's diſſertations, p. 321. and Luke xvii. 31. Dr. Doddridge is of opinion, that the grand tranſition from the deſcription of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem to that of the day of judgement, is made preciſely after theſe two verſes. For after them there is not a word peculiar to that deſtruction, but many circumſtances are introduced which refer to the day of judgement, and of death as tranſmitting to it, and which can only be thus underſtood. Our Lord, in the following verſes of St. Matthew and St. Mark, directs their thoughts to that final ſolemnity in which they are ſo highly concerned, by repeating, almoſt in the ſame words, the cautions and advices he had formerly given, Luke xii. 35, &c. In which whole context there is no reference to the temporal calamities coming on the Jews, which have been the ſubject of almoſt the whole preceding diſcourſe; and the remembrance of what had paſſed on the former occaſion, might the more eaſily lead them to the diſtinct underſtanding of what was now added; though it may not be improper to recollect, that the ſame pious care in the temper and conduct, which would be a preparative againſt national judgements, and intitle them to the ſpecial protection of Providence in them, would alſo ſecure them from any unwelcome ſurpriſe by a call to the tribunal of God.

Ver. 43. But know this, that, &c.] But conſider, that if, &c. Heylin.

Ver. 44. Therefore, be ye alſo ready] As the miſeries which men were to undergo at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, the reaſons of that deſtruction, the paſſions which its approach would raiſe in their minds, together with the ſuddenneſs and unexpectedneſs of it, nearly reſembled what ſhall happen at the deſtruction of the world and the general judgement; it was natural for our Lord, on this occaſion, to put the diſciples in mind of that judgement, and to exhort them to the faithful diſcharge of their duty, from the uncertainty of the time of his coming to call every particular perſon to an account at death. Concerning the form and ſtructure of the parable in the next verſes, ſee the notes on Luke xii. 42, &c.

Ver. 46, 47. Bleſſed is that ſervant] "You, the miniſters of religion, ought to be particularly faithful in the diſcharge of your duty; for it is not an ordinary truſt which is committed to your charge; you are ſtewards, whoſe buſineſs it is to take care of the whole family; and who, becauſe of the influence which your example may have upon the reſt, ought to be remarkably diligent, that you may provoke your fellows to be frugal, active, and ſober. Your duty is, to be well acquainted with the ſtores of evangelical truths, and to underſtand how they may be beſt applied. You ſhould know likewiſe the characters of the various perſons under your charge; that you may be able to give every one of them their portion of meat in due ſeaſon: And if when I come, I find you thus employed, you are bleſſed; for I will highly reward you with the joys of my kingdom; even as an earthly maſter beſtows particular marks of reſpect on ſuch ſervants as have been remarkably faithful in any important truſt." We may juſt obſerve, that as no peculiar rewards were conferred on any of the Apoſtles, or other faithful miniſters, at the time of Chriſt's coming to deſtroy Jeruſalem, this clauſe ſufficiently proves a reference to the final judgement; and will not permit us, with Dr. Hammond, to underſtand the Gnoſtics, or with Dr. Whitby, the apoſtate Jews, as particularly intended by the ſubſequent mention of the wicked ſervant; which ſeems plainly to refer to a debauched and perſecuting clergy, hypocritically pretending to a diſtinguiſhed zeal for Chriſtian forms and inſtitutions. See Hammond, Whitby, and Doddridge.

Ver. 48—51. But, &c.] But if that ſervant, being evil, ſhall ſay, &c. Wat. Heylin, and MS. "If on the other hand you behave like wicked ſtewards, who, becauſe their Lord delays his coming, beat their fellow-ſervants, and get drunk with ſots and epicures: If you tyrannize over the conſciences of your brethren, neglect the duties of your function, and give yourſelves up to ſenſual pleaſures; I will come, when you little think of it, and make you dreadful examples of my indignation, by the ſevere puniſhments which I will inflict upon you." It is remarkable, that in this parable the crime of the unfaithful ſteward is ſaid to have been ſenſuality; particularly drunkenneſs, than which a more abominable vice can hardly be named. A drunkard,—one who employs himſelf in eraſing the illuſtrious ſignature of reaſon, which God ſtamped upon him in creation, as the prerogative of his nature; and who makes himſelf incapable of his duty, while he is ready to commit every ſin to which a temptation offers; What a monſter is this, and how unlikely to lead others in the way of eternal life! See Macknight.

Ver. 51. Shall cut him aſunder] This was one of the heavieſt kinds of puniſhment anciently uſed: See 1 Sam. xv. 33. 2 Sam. xii. 31. Dan. ii. 5. iii. 29. A. Gellius, lib. xx. c. 1. In the paſſage firſt cited we are told that Samuel hewed Agag to pieces; wherefore, as that action proceeded from the greatneſs of the prophet's wrath, the ſame puniſhment inflicted on the ſlothful, ſenſual, merciless ſteward, fitly expreſſes the greatneſs of his Lord's indignation. In ancient times the ſtewards of great families were ſlaves, as well as the ſervants of the lower claſs, being raiſed to that truſt on account of their fidelity, wiſdom, ſobriety, and other good qualities: If any ſteward, therefore, in the abſence of his Lord, behaved as is repreſented in the parable, it was a plain proof that the virtues on account of which he was raiſed were counterfeit, and by conſequence that he was an hypocrite. Slaves of this character, among other chaſtiſements, were ſometimes condemned to work in the mines; and as this was one of the moſt grievous puniſhments: When they firſt entered, nothing was heard amongſt them but weeping and gnaſhing of teeth, on account of the intolerable fatigue to which they were ſubjected in theſe hideous caverns, without hope of releaſe:—There ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth: But, becauſe the immediate effect of being cut aſunder is death, and not a ſtate of bitter lamentation, the Greek particle of connection may be underſtood in this verſe disjunctively; —Shall cut him aſunder, or appoint him, &c.] unleſs we can ſuppoſe that in the latter clauſe our Lord ſpeaks not according to the form, but the meaning of his parable. The truth is, as cutting aſunder gives us a lively idea of the torment of an awakened conſcience, the portion of hypocrites is a proper emblem to repreſent the melancholy ſtate of the damned; who are ſhut up for ever in the dreadful dungeon of hell, never more to ſee the light of God's countenance, whereby the whole ſpiritual creation is enlightened, and made unſpeakably happy. The Pruſſian editors, after ſeveral learned critics, render the word διχοτομήσει, which literally ſignifies ſhall cut aſunder, —by ſhall ſeparate him, which it ſignifies metaphorically; (ſee ch. xxv. 32.) This interpretation they obſerve is proved from hence, that it is immediately added, and ſhall appoint him his portion with the hypocrites; which plainly expreſſes his ſeparation from the company of faithful ſervants. See Stockius on the word. Dr. Doddridge paraphraſes it, "Will ſcourge him with that ſeverity, that he will even cut him aſunder:" (Comp. Luke xii. 46.) And it ſeems not improbable that the word may be uſed in this ſenſe, to expreſs a ſevere ſcourging. Mahomet in his Koran mentions ſeven caverns in hell, the deepeſt and moſt wretched of which is to be inhabited by hypocrites. It ſeems by this, and ſeveral other paſſages, ſays Dr. Heylin, that hell is made chiefly for hypocrites: Men incur great guilt by their other vices, but that guilt is infinitely aggravated by the habitual lie of their pretenſions to virtue and honour. As to this, and other circumſtances here mentioned, it is to be obſerved, that as rich mines ſometimes grow up even to the ſurface of the earth, ſo in the parable of our Lord, the ſpiritual ſenſe ſometimes breaks through the literal, which it interrupts with a ſudden tranſition to the application. It has been obſerved upon this laſt verſe, that if miniſters are the perſons here primarily intended, there is a peculiar propriety in the expreſſion, ſhall appoint him his portion with the hypocrites; for no hypocriſy can be greater, than to call ourſelves miniſters of Chriſt, while we are the ſlaves of ambition, avarice, and intemperance. Wherever ſuch are found, under whatever mark or form, may God reform them by his grace; or diſarm them of that power and influence which they continually abuſe, to his diſhonour, and to their own aggravated damnation!

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XXIV.

The firſt reflection which naturally occurs to the thinking mind on reading this remarkable chapter, is the ſtrange and ſurpriſing manner in which the prophecies recorded in it have been fulfilled, and the unanſwerable arguments which may thence be drawn, for the truth of our Saviour's divine miſſion; as hath been urged at large in the note on ver. 35.

What is uſually objected to the other predictions of holy writ, cannot with any pretence be objected to theſe prophecies of our Saviour,—that they are figurative and obſcure; for nothing can be conveyed in plainer ſimpler terms, except where he affected ſome obſcurity for particular reaſons, as hath been hinted in the courſe of the notes. It is allowed, indeed, that ſome of theſe prophecies are taken from Moſes and Daniel; our Saviour propheſying of the ſame events, hath borrowed and applied ſome of the ſame images and expreſſions; but this is a commendation, rather than any diſcredit to his predictions: He hath built upon the foundations of the inſpired writers before him; but what a ſuperſtructure did he raiſe! He hath acted in this caſe, as in every other, like one who came not to deſtroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfil them. He hath manifeſted himſelf to be a true prophet, by his exact interpretation and application of other prophets. He is alſo much more particular and circumſtantial than either Moſes or Daniel; in ſeveral inſtances his prophecies are entirely new, and properly his own; and beſides, he uſes greater preciſion in fixing and confining the time to that very generation.

The ſincerity and ingenuity of Chriſt, and the courage and conſtancy of his diſciples, ſtrike us alſo ſtrongly, from a review of theſe prophecies. See the note on ver. 9.

The ſudden and amazing progreſs of the Goſpel, which ſpread ſo far and ſo wide before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and which our Saviour here ſo minutely foretold, cannot fail to ſtrike us. The greatneſs of the work which was wrought, the meanneſs of the inſtruments who wrought it, and the ſhort time that it was wrought in, muſt force all conſidering men to ſay, This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. The Mahometan religion, indeed, in leſs than a century over-ran a great part of the world; but then it was propagated by the ſword, and owed its ſucceſs to arms and violence: But the Chriſtian religion was diffuſed over the face of the earth in the ſpace of forty years, and prevailed not only without the ſword, but againſt the ſword; not only without the powers civil and military to ſupport it, but againſt them all united to oppreſs it: And what but the Spirit of God could bid it thus go forth conquering, and to conquer? Had this counſel or this work been of men, as Gamaliel argued, it would have come to nought; but being of God, nothing could overthrow it.

Obſerve we again, that for the completion of theſe prophecies, the perſons ſeem to have been wonderfully raiſed up and preſerved by divine Providence. Veſpaſian was promoted from obſcurity; and though feared and hated by Nero, was yet preferred by him, and ſingled out as the only general among the Romans, who was equal to ſuch a war; God perhaps, as Joſephus intimates, ſo diſpoſing and ordering affairs. Titus was wonderfully preſerved in ſome of the moſt critical articles of danger; upon which Joſephus obſerves, remarkably enough, that from hence it is obvious to underſtand that the turns of war, and the dangers of princes, are under the peculiar care of God; and indeed Joſephus himſelf was no leſs wonderfully preſerved than Titus; the one to deſtroy the city, the other to record its deſtruction, in a hiſtory which was moſt particularly authenticated. As a general in the wars, he muſt have had an exact knowledge of all tranſactions; and as a Jewiſh prieſt, he would not relate them with any favour or partiality to the Chriſtian cauſe. His hiſtory was approved by Veſpaſian and Titus, who ordered it to be publiſhed; and by king Agrippa, and many others, both Jews and Romans, who were preſent in thoſe wars. He had likewiſe many enemies, who would readily have convicted him of falſification, if he had been guilty of any. He deſigned nothing leſs;—and yet, as if he had deſigned more, his Hiſtory of the Jewiſh Wars may ſerve as a larger comment on our Saviour's prophecies of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

As theſe prophecies are the cleareſt, and the moſt minutely fulfilled, ſo were the calamities the greateſt which the world ever ſaw; and what heinous ſin was it which could bring down ſuch heavy judgements on the Jewiſh church and nation? Can any other be deſigned with half ſo much probability as what the Scripture aſſigns,—their crucifying the Lord of glory? This is always objected as the capital crime of the nation: and upon reflection we ſhall find ſome correſpondence between their crime and their puniſhment, as every reader may have remarked from what hath gone before.—They put Jeſus to death when the nation was aſſembled to celebrate the paſſover: and when the nation was aſſembled alſo to celebrate the paſſover, Titus ſhut them up within the walls of Jeruſalem. The rejection of the true Meſſiah was their crime; and the following of falſe Meſſiahs to their deſtruction was their puniſhment. They ſold and bought Jeſus as a ſlave; and they were themſelves afterwards ſold and bought as ſlaves at the loweſt prices. They preferred a robber and a murderer to Jeſus, whom they crucified between two thieves; and they themſelves were afterwards infeſted and over-run with robbers and murderers. They put Jeſus to death, leſt the Romans ſhould come and take away their place and nation; the Romans did come, and take away their place and nation. They crucified Jeſus before the walls of Jeruſalem; and before the walls of Jeruſalem, they themſelves were crucified in ſuch numbers, that room was wanting for the croſſes, and croſſes for the bodies. One would think it hardly poſſible for any man to lay theſe things together, and not conclude the Jews own imprecation to be remarkably fulfilled, His blood be upon us, and upon our children!

We Chriſtians indeed cannot be guilty of the ſame offence in crucifying the Lord of glory; but it behoves us to conſider, whether we may not be guilty in the ſame kind, and by our ſins and iniquities crucify afreſh the Son of God, and put him to an open ſhame; and therefore, whether, being like them in their crime, we may not alſo reſemble them in their puniſhment.—They rejected Chriſt; and we indeed have received him: but have our lives been agreeable to our holy profeſſion? or rather, as we have had opportunities of knowing Chriſt more, have we not obeyed him leſs than other Chriſtians, and trodden under foot the Son of God, counting the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was ſanctified, an unholy thing, and doing deſpite to the Spirit of grace?

The flagrant crimes of the Jews, and the principal ſources of their calamities, in the opinion of Joſephus, were their trampling upon all human laws, deriding divine things, and making a jeſt of the oracles of the prophets, as ſo many dreams and fables: and how hath the ſame ſpirit of licentiouſneſs and infidelity prevailed likewiſe in our land! how have the laws and lawful authority been inſulted with equal inſolence and impunity!—How have the holy Scriptures, theſe treaſures of divine wiſdom, not only been rejected, but deſpiſed, derided, and abuſed to the very worſt purpoſes! How have the principal articles of our faith been denied, the prophecies and miracles of Moſes and the prophets, of Chriſt and the Apoſtles been ridiculed, and impiety and blaſphemy not only been whiſpered in the ear, but proclaimed from the preſs! How have all publick worſhip and religion, and the adminiſtration of the ſacraments been ſlighted and contemned!—Alas, how much are they ſtill ſlighted, and the ſabbath profaned! and that too by thoſe who ought to have ſet a better example, to whom much is given, and of whom therefore much will be required! And how few ſerve God with a loving willing ſpirit, deſirous to advance in holineſs, and to be more and more perfect, influenced by the powerful love of their maſter.—On the contrary, they ſeek only how little is neceſſary to be done, and with how ſmall a portion of religion a man may be ſuppoſed to ſave his future intereſts, as if they were unwilling to ſerve God, who gives them all, more than needs muſt. Surely nothing can be more abominable to the great God of love! And if for their ſins and provocations God ſpared not the natural branches, take heed leſt he alſo ſpare not thee: Becauſe of unbelief they were broken off, and thou ſtandeſt by faith!—Be not high-minded, but fear. God bore long with the Jews, and hath he not bore long with us alſo;—but at length the fearful day came:—It may come to Us alſo.

Whatever may be the caſe with particular ſtates and people, this we do know aſſuredly, that as Jeruſalem periſhed in ſore deſtruction, ſo ſhall deſtruction, utter and terrible, one day overwhelm this world, and with it all our hopes, and all our earthly pleaſures! The ſun ſhall then indeed be darkened, the moon ſhall then indeed withhold her light, and all the ſtars ſhall withdraw their ſhining.—And then in all his glory ſhall the Son of man himſelf appear,—appear to judge,—to judge and fix irrevocably the doom of all mankind!

When reflection caſts her eye on that great, that important hour, how aſtoniſhing doth it ſeem, that poor weak worms like us, ſhould dare to defy ſuch Omnipotence, and arm ſuch a power, by our bold offences, in wrath againſt us! How amazing doth it ſeem, that any thing in this life ſhould captivate our hearts, and make us wretched ſlaves to things ſo ſoon to periſh, and be utterly diſſolved! How CHAP. XXV.

The parable of the ten virgins, and of the talents. Alſo the deſcription of the laſt judgement.

THEN ſhall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom.

2 And five of them were wiſe, and five were fooliſh.

3 They that were fooliſh took their lamps, and took no oil with them:

4 But the wiſe took oil in their veſſels with their lamps.

5 While the bridegroom tarried, they all ſlumbered and ſlept.

6 And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.

7 Then all thoſe virgins aroſe, and trimmed their lamps.

8 And the fooliſh ſaid unto the wiſe, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out.

9 But the wiſe anſwered, ſaying, Not ſo; leſt there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that ſell, and buy for yourſelves.

10 And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready, went in with him to the marriage: and the door was ſhut.

11 Afterward came alſo the other virgins, ſaying, Lord, Lord, open to us.

12 But he anſwered and ſaid, Verily I ſay unto you, I know you not.

Ver. 1. Epheſ. v. 30. Rev. xix. 7. xxi. 2, 9.—V. 5. 1 Theſſ. v. 6.—V. 8. Or, going out.—V. 10. Luke xiii. 25.—V. 11. Ch. vii. 21, 22, 23.

amazing doth it ſeem, that pride and arrogance, vanity and ſelf-conceit ſhould ever ſwell our boſoms, when the remembrance of Omnipotence ſeated in glory to judge us and our fellow ſinners, ſhould ſink us into the deepeſt humility, and moſt perfect ſelf-renunciation.

Let us think ourſelves happy, that the great Lord of love vouchſafes to us this ſeaſon of mercy; and let us, if we would act as reaſonable creatures, endeavour duly to uſe this bleſſed ſeaſon, and to prepare for that ſolemn appearance, which we muſt all aſſuredly make. Let us only aſk our own hearts, in what ſtate we would wiſh to be found on that day, when eternal rewards and eternal puniſhments ſhall be awfully diſpenſed. And as we find our hearts wiſh, ſo let us act by all means, nor ſuffer our better reaſon and our conſcience to condemn us. Trifle as we may, neglect it as we will, put it off as we can, truth it is, that this great day will come. We may diſbelieve it, as the Jews did the deſtruction of their city; but as aſſuredly as their deſtruction came to them, ſo aſſuredly will Chriſt come in judgement upon the world. The day of death is indeed that day to all of us: this day we know will come, and it is haſtening on the wing; and this night perchance may bring it nearer to ſome of us, and for ever preclude our further preparations. Boaſt we not then of our reaſon and our ſenſe, if we live in neglect of ſo awful an hour. Man is created only for eternity; and he ſadly inverts the great Creator's deſigns, who lives only for the preſent time, and neglects the time eternal! If the compaſſionate Jeſus wept over Jeruſalem, think how contrary it is to his benevolent purpoſe, that any of thoſe who are baptized into his faith, ſhould forfeit his favour, and have the things concerning their peace, hid from their eyes: and therefore, in pleaſing reliance on his mercy and love, in conſtant expectation of the future day approaching, and with ſincere deſire to be accepted on that day, let us unite all our efforts, and ſo live to, and ſo ſerve him here below, that he may welcome us to his right hand, and ſay,—Well done, good and faithful ſervant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord! Amen.

Chap. XXV. Ver. 1. Then ſhall the kingdom of heaven be likened, &c.] Be like to, &c. Wat. and MS. The particle then evidently points out the connection of the preſent parable with the latter part of the preceding chapter. Our Lord having mentioned the rewards and puniſhments of a future ſtate, in order to animate his diſciples to the rigorous diſcharge of their duty, it was eaſy and elegant to paſs from that ſubject to the conſideration of the general judgement, at which theſe rewards will be diſtributed in their utmoſt extent. And therefore, to rouſe men in every age, he has given a ſtriking repreſentation of the laſt judgement, with its conſequences, in three excellent parables. He had before frequently declared what would be the portion of all the workers of iniquity: But what will become of thoſe who do no harm, though they do no good?—Inoffenſive, good ſort of people? We have in the preſent chapter a clear and full anſwer to this important queſtion. The firſt parable is that of the ten virgins, who waited to meet the bridegroom: Then ſhall the kingdom of heaven, &c. i. e. "At the general judgement, the character, conduct, and lot of the ſubjects of the kingdom of heaven, (of the profeſſors of the Goſpel) may be repreſented by the character, conduct, and lot of virgins at a wedding." It ſeems in thoſe countries, the bridegroom commonly brought home his bride in the evening; and that ſhe might be received at his houſe in a ſuitable manner, his female friends, of the younger ſort, were invited to come and wait with lamps, till ſome of his retinue, diſpatched before the reſt, brought word that he was at hand; on this they went forth with their lamps trimmed to welcome him, and conduct him with his bride into the houſe. And for this ſervice they had the honour of being gueſts at the marriage feaſt. Mr. Wynne conjectures that probably a wedding proceſſion paſſing by, gave occaſion to this parable; and the following account of the marriage ceremony at Aleppo, the capital of Syria, by a perſon who lately reſided there, may poſſibly throw ſome light on the parable, as it alludes to the cuſtoms of thoſe countries on that occaſion. "On the appointed day, in the afternoon, the bridegroom's relations go to the bride's houſe; and having ſupped there, they return to that of the bridegroom, who is by cuſtom obliged to hide himſelf, or at leaſt, is not to be found without a ſeemingly ſtrict ſearch: When he is brought out dreſſed in his beſt clothes, great noiſe and rejoicings are made upon finding him; and he and the brideſmen, being led ſeveral times round the court-yard in a noiſy proceſſion, are carried into a room. There he is dreſſed in his wedding clothes, and led back into the court-yard. At midnight, or a few hours later, the relations, accompanied by all who are invited to the wedding, both men and women, return again to the bride's houſe in proceſſion, each carrying a candle, and muſic playing before them. When they come to the door, it is ſhut againſt them. Then they knock and demand the bride, but are refuſed admittance: Upon this enſues a mock fight, in which the bridegroom's party always prevails; the women then go to the bride's chamber, leading her out veiled; and in the like proceſſion as above deſcribed carry her to the bridegroom's houſe." See the notes on Pſ. xlv. Solomon's Song, and the Cuſtoms of the Jews and Indians compared, p. 41, &c.

Ver. 3, 4. They that were fooliſh, &c.] Five of the virgins that waited for the bridegroom were ſo fooliſh, as to take only a little oil in their lamps, to ſerve their preſent occaſion: but the other five being more wiſe, knew that the coming of the bridegroom was uncertain; for which reaſon, beſides filling their lamps at firſt, they prudently took a Quantity of oil in their veſſels to ſupply their lamps, that they might be in readineſs to go forth at a moment's warning. See ver. 12. for an explanation of the parable.

Ver. 6. And at midnight there was a cry] Perhaps the tradition which St. Jerome mentions, wherein it was aſſerted, that Chriſt would come to judgement at midnight, might be borrowed from hence; tho' certainly it is abſurd enough, ſince that can be the caſe only under one meridian.

Ver. 9. Saying, not ſo, &c.] Saying, for fear there ſhould not be enough for us and you, go rather, &c. Wat. This, ſays Dr. Doddridge, ſeems merely an ornamental circumſtance; and it is ſtrange, that any Popiſh writer ſhould conſider it as favouring their doctrine of a ſtock of Merits in the church, founded on works of ſupererogation; ſince if it referred to them at all (which there is no reaſon to imagine) it would rather expoſe than encourage any dependance upon them.

Ver. 12. Verily, I know you not] This circumſtance in the parable is not abſurd; for nothing intimated a perſonal acquaintance with them; and gueſts aſking admittance with ſuch a pretence, might have been multiplied beyond all reaſon and convenience: at leaſt its ſignificancy and application is very apparent and important. In this parable, by the kingdom of heaven is meant the goſpel kingdom; the kingdom of grace in its laſt diſpenſation, when it is about to be ſwallowed up in glory. By the ten virgins are meant the compleat and general number of all Chriſtian profeſſors; the church of God upon earth, mixed with good and bad; and as an equal number of each is mentioned, it may perhaps be inſinuated, that the number of thoſe who will be ſaved, is not inferior to thoſe who will be loſt. By their taking the lamps, and going forth to meet the bridegroom, is meant their taking upon them by baptiſm, and their leading their lives in, the outward profeſſion of the Chriſtian faith. By the bridegroom is meant the Lord Jeſus, the everlaſting bridegroom of his ſpouſe the 13 Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour, wherein the Son of man cometh.

14 For the kingdom of heaven is as a man travelling into a far country, who called his own ſervants, and delivered unto them his goods.

15 And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his ſeveral ability; and ſtraightway took his journey.

16 Then he that had received the five talents, went and traded with the ſame, and made them other five talents.

17 And likewiſe he that had received two, he alſo gained other two.

18 But he that had received one, went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money.

19 After a long time, the lord of thoſe ſervants cometh, and reckoneth with them.

20 And ſo he that had received five talents, came and brought other five talents, ſaying, Lord, thou deliveredſt unto me five talents: behold, I have gained beſides them five talents more.

21 His lord ſaid unto him, Well done, thou good and faithful ſervant: thou haſt been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord.

22 He alſo that had received two talents, came and ſaid, Lord, thou deliveredſt unto me two talents: behold, I have gained two other talents beſides them.

23 His lord ſaid unto him, Well done, good and faithful ſervant; thou haſt been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord.

24 Then he which had received the one talent, came and ſaid, Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou haſt not ſown, and gathering where thou haſt not ſtrawed:

25 And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou haſt that is thine.

26 His lord anſwered and ſaid unto him, Thou wicked and ſlothful ſervant, thou knewest that I reap where I ſowed not, and gather where I have not ſtrawed:

27 Thou oughteſt therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I ſhould have received mine own with uſury.

28 Take therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents.

church. By the fooliſh virgins are meant mere profeſſors; Chriſtians only in name, who have a lamp without oil, faith with love. By the wiſe virgins are meant real Chriſtians, who to an outward profeſſion join inward holineſs; who have not only the form, but the power of godlineſs; faith which works by love: a life beautified by the fruits of the Holy Spirit, whoſe gifts and graces particularly are figured out to us by the oil. By the ſlumber and ſleep of them all, wiſe as well as fooliſh, is meant death, the common lot of good and bad. By the midnight cry to go forth and meet the bridegroom, is meant the laſt aweful ſummons to judgement, the archangel's trumpet, and the voice of God. By the ſolicitude of the fooliſh virgins, the diſcovery which nominal profeſſors will make too late of their deficiency in holineſs. By the reproof of the wiſe is ſhewn, the impoſſibility of transferring good works from one to another; and of conſequence the abſurdity of the papiſt doctrine of ſupererogation; ſince no man at that day will be found to have more than enough for himſelf. By the admiſſion of the wiſe to the marriage-feaſt, is meant the happy entrance of true Chriſtians into bliſs eternal with their all-glorious bridegroom; and by the excluſion of the fooliſh, the everlaſting baniſhment of the ſtrangers to true holineſs from that bliſs. And as the parable repreſents the ſuddenneſs of Chriſt's coming, it ſhews us both the folly and danger of delaying repentance to a death-bed, and powerfully enforces habitual watchfulneſs, both in the acquiſition and exerciſe of grace, upon all men in every age, from the uncertainty of life;—for the day of death is to each one of us as the day of judgement. Accordingly, the application of the parable is, watch therefore, &c. ver. 13. The reader will find theſe particulars more fully explained in the 16th ſermon, vol. ii. of my Diſcourſes on the Parables, and in archbiſhop Tillotſon's ſermon on this parable.

Ver. 14. For the kingdom of heaven is as a man travelling] For He [the Son, ver. 13] is as a man, &c. The kingdom of heaven, added by our tranſlators, appears to be repeated from the firſt verſe; but the connection ſeems to require the verſion here given. See the notes on Luke xix. 12. Inſtead of goods, Dr. Waterland reads ſtock;—his effects, Dr. Heylin.

Ver. 15. Unto one he gave five talents] A talent being in value about 187*l.* 10*s.* He who had five talents, received 937*l.* 10*l.* and he who had two, 375 l. ſterling. The diſtributing theſe various ſums in proportion to the different abilities, wiſdom, and activity of the perſons to whom they were given, ſhews the propriety of the choice, and the prudence of the giver. See the note on ver. 30. and Prideaux's preface to his Connection, p. 20.

Ver. 21. Well done!] The original word Εὖ, hath a peculiar force and energy, far beyond what we can expreſs in Engliſh. It was uſed by auditors or ſpectators, in any publick exerciſe, to expreſs the higheſt applauſe, when any part had been excellently performed. By joy, is here meant the place appointed for feaſtings and rejoicings, as is evident from ver. 30. where we read, that the wicked ſervant is caſt into outer darkneſs, in oppoſition to the lights which illuminated the feaſting-room. Enter thou into the joy, &c. means, "ſhare with me in the pleaſures of my palace, and by ſitting down at the entertainment which I have prepared, rejoice with me on account of my ſafe return." Grotius well obſerves upon the words over a few things, that even the obedience of Apoſtles and martyrs muſt appear trifling indeed, when compared with the exceeding weight of glory wherewith it ſhall be rewarded.

Ver. 24. Then he who had received the one talent came, &c.] This circumſtance may intimate probably, that we are accountable for the ſmalleſt advantages with which we are entruſted; but it cannot imply that they who have received much, will in general paſs their accounts beſt; for it is too plain in fact, that moſt of thoſe whoſe dignity, wealth, and genius give them the greateſt opportunities of ſervice, ſeem to forget they have either any maſter in heaven to ſerve, or any future reckoning to expect; and many of them render themſelves much more criminal than this wicked and ſlothful ſervant, who hid his talent in the earth. See Grotius and Doddridge. Where thou haſt not ſtrewed, might be rendered, where thou haſt not ſcattered; i. e. where thou haſt not ſown, by ſcattering the grain.

Ver. 25. Lo, there thou haſt that is thine] Dr. Heylin renders this, ſee, you have your own, and it comes nearer to the emphatical beauty of the original, which ſtrongly expreſſes the moroſe ſurly brevity of the ſlothful ſervant. The language is a lively picture of the mind, and an echo to the ſenſe: Ἴδε, ἔχεις τὸ σόν. Lo! thou haſt that—thine. This is one inſtance among a thouſand of the excellency of the Sacred Scriptures in this reſpect alſo. The next verſe might be rendered more properly by interrogation, Kneweſt thou that, &c.? Dr. Whitby well obſerves, that when he ſaid, Thou kneweſt, or kneweſt thou that I was an hard man, &c. this is no conceſſion that the maſter was truly ſo, but an argument out of his own mouth to condemn him, for not acting ſuitably to his own hard conceptions of his lord. See Luke xix 22. Nor do theſe words, thou oughteſt to have put my money to the exchangers, &c. ſhew that Chriſt approved of uſury; but only that he who thought ſo ſordidly of his maſter, ſhould have uſed his talent agreeably, that ſo he might have had his own with intereſt.

Ver. 28, 29. Take therefore the talent from him] Dr. Foſter has obſerved, that there is not a nobler proof of the equal quantity of good being always preſerved in the world, not a more illuſtrious defence of the wiſdom of permitting moral evil, than what may be deducted from the 28th verſe; and it ſhould be added, that as this was not 29 For unto every one that hath ſhall be given, and he ſhall have abundance: but from him that hath not ſhall be taken away even that which he hath.

30 And caſt ye the unprofitable ſervant into outer darkneſs: there ſhall be weeping and gnaſhing of teeth.

31 When the Son of man ſhall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then ſhall he ſit upon the throne of his glory:

32 And before him ſhall be gathered all nations: and he ſhall ſeparate them one from another, as a ſhepherd divideth his ſheep from the goats:

33 And he ſhall ſet the ſheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left.

34 Then ſhall the King ſay unto them on his right hand, Come, ye bleſſed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world;

35 For I was an-hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirſty, and ye gave me drink: I was a ſtranger, and ye took me in:

diſcoverable by human reaſon; the principle itſelf is a glaring proof of the divine miſſion and inſpiration of its author. By having, ver. 29. is meant improving, or making a right uſe of a thing. See ch. xiii. 10—13. A man is ſaid not to have what he does not make uſe of: Avaro tam deeſt quod habet, quam quod non habet. St. Chryſoſtome obſerves, that it availed not this ſlothful ſervant that he waſted not his lord's talent; but this ruined him—that he rerurned it not improved with ſome increaſe. And another father obſerves beautifully, that as the ſervant, who having ſeed to ſow, loſes the ſeed-time, and omits to ſow it, though he loſes not the ſeed; ſo he who receives faith in Chriſt, and omits in this ſeaſon of ſowing, to work righteouſneſs, though he may not loſe his faith, yet offends ſo much, as he might have wrought righteouſneſs, had he not been ſlothful and negligent. See the Reflections.

Ver. 30. And caſt ye the unprofitable ſervant, &c.] This puniſhment muſt have been greatly imbittered to him by the happier lot of his fellow-ſervants, who were highly applauded for their diligence, and gladdened with the proſpect of their reward. See on ch. viii. 12.

In this parable, by the man travelling into a far country, is repreſented to us our Saviour, who is ſaid to do ſo either in reference to his aſcent into heaven, or to that long-ſufferance of his, whereby he waiteth for the fruit of our works. By his own ſervants are meant not mankind in general, but the ſubjects of his Goſpel kingdom, who are entruſted with his ſpiritual gifts and graces, as well as with ſuch as are common to the reſt of the world; and of neceſſity, by the goods or talents entruſted to them, muſt be meant not only the gifts of nature, but of grace, which God diſtributes to his ſervants, to ſome more, to ſome leſs, according to his own good pleaſure and ſovereign will; and according to the ability and capacity of improvement, which he in wiſdom diſcerns in the ſeveral ſubjects of his free bounty. By the ſervants who improved their lord's talents are meant thoſe who diligently labour to improve all the gifts of God, natural and ſpiritual, agreeable to the will of their heavenly Maſter, perfecting holineſs in the fear of the Lord; while by the ſlothful ſervant, ſuch are pictured out to us as live ſolely to themſelves, without regard to the glory of God, or the good of mankind. "He who lives not ſolely to his own profit, ſays Theophylact, but whether he have prudence, or riches, or power and authority with the great; or whatever influence and art he hath, endeavours thereby to ſerve and be uſeful to others, this is the man who doubles that which is given him; but he who hides his talent, is the man who hath regard ſolely to his own advantage, and not to that of others; and therefore is condemned. And whenever you ſee a man of good underſtanding and induſtrious, uſing his parts in the purſuit of worldly things, and earthly devices, of him you may ſay, that he hides his talent in the earth; to take an account whereof, the maſter will one day come,—the eternal judge of heaven and earth, whoſe future coming for that great purpoſe is figured out to us by the return of the lord of thoſe ſervants, after a long time, to reckon with them; as by the reward of the good and faithful ſervant the bleſſedneſs of all true Chriſtians is ſhewn; and by the puniſhment of the wicked and ſlothful one, the miſery of all nominal and merely outward profeſſors of the faith and religion of Chriſt; who on the day when veſted in terrible majeſty, the Lord Jeſus ſhall be revealed from heaven, &c. (2 Theſſ. i. 7, &c.) ſhall be puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction from the preſence of the Lord.

Ver. 31—33. When the Son of man ſhall come, &c.] Our Saviour begins here his third parable, which is agreeable to the language of the Old Teſtament, in which good men are compared to ſheep, on account of their innocence and uſefulneſs, (ſee Pſ. xxiii.) and the wicked men to goats, for the exorbitancy of their luſts. See Ezek. xxxiv. 17. The alluſion however is dropped almoſt at the entrance of the parable, the greateſt part of this repreſentation being expreſſed in terms perfectly ſimple: ſo that though the ſenſe be profound, it is obvious. Here the judgement of all nations, Gentiles as as well as Chriſtians, is deſcribed, and the points on which their trials are to proceed are known: they ſhall be acquitted or condemned, according as it ſhall then appear that they have performed or neglected works of charity;—the duties which in Chriſtians neceſſarily ſpring from the great principles of faith and piety, and which the heathens themſelves were invited to perform by the light of nature, the diſpenſation they were under. But then we are not to underſtand this as if ſuch works were meritorious in either; for all who are acquitted at that day, whether heathens or Chriſtians, ſhall be acquitted ſolely on account of that redemption which is in Chriſt, as the meritorious cauſe. By the throne of his glory, ver. 31. perhaps is meant ſome ſhining cloud, like that on which he aſcended into heaven, Acts i. 9. for the angels at his aſcenſion declared, that he ſhall come to judgement riding on a cloud, Acts i. 11. See Exod. xvi. 10—32. Zech. xiv. 5. Dan. vii. 13. If we obſerve the correſpondence between theſe words and ch. xxiv. 30, 31. it will ſeem probable, that Chriſt intended to teach his diſciples to conceive of his firſt coming to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, as a kind of emblem of his final appearance to judgement; and conſequently we may be authorized in uſing ſome of the texts in the former chapter, when diſcourſing of that great and important day. Every reader muſt remark with what majeſty and grandeur our Lord ſpeaks of himſelf in this portion of Scripture, which is a noble inſtance of the true ſublime, and paints the ſolemnities of the great and final audit in the ſtrongeſt manner. Dr. Heylin, inſtead of nations, reads the heathen, ἐθνη, whence the Engliſh word heathen ſeems to be derived. The two former parables repreſent the judgement of Chriſtians, who conſtitute the church or kingdom of heaven. See ver. 1. virgins, and ver. 14. his proper ſervants;—ἰδίους δούλους. Inſtead of divideth, Dr. Waterland reads ſeparateth.

Ver. 34. Then ſhall the king ſay] The ſentence paſſed upon the righteous affords a noble motive to patience, and continuance in well-doing. In the beginning of the parable our Lord calls himſelf the Son of Man only: but he now changes the appellation, taking the title of king with great propriety, when he is ſpeaking of himſelf as exerciſing the higheſt act of kingly power; in paſſing final ſentence upon all men as his ſubjects, whereby their ſtate will be unalterably fixed forever. And this title adds unutterable beauty to the condeſcending words he is repreſented as ſpeaking on this great occaſion. One cannot imagine a more magnificent image than this before us! The aſſembled world, diſtinguiſhed with ſuch unerring penetration, and diſtributed into two grand claſſes, with as much eaſe as ſheep and goats are ranged by a ſhepherd in different companies;—that aſſembled world waiting to receive their everlaſting doom from the lips of Almighty and impartial juſtice! But while in this grand repreſentation, Jeſus aſſerts his proper dignity as Lord over all, he acknowledges his ſubordination in the kingdom of his Father, by addreſſing the righteous in the ſentence he paſſes upon them, as perſons bleſſed of his Father. The preſent ſtate of good men, is at beſt but a melancholy baniſhment from their native country; an exile in which they are frequently expoſed to manifold temptations, to perſecutions, to poverty, to reproach, and to innumerable other evils. But that they may bear all with unfainting courage and conſtancy, they are given to know by this ſentence, that they are beloved and bleſſed of God, as his own children; that there is no leſs than an eternal kingdom prepared for them, even from the foundation of the world; and that they are undoubted heirs of this eternal kingdom. Well may ſuch bear with the violence of their oppreſſors, knowing what an exceeding and eternal weight of glory awaits them.

Ver. 35, 36. For I was an-hungred, &c.] I was hungry. Wat. and MS. and ſo ver. 42. In ver. 36. inſtead of, And ye viſited me, Heylin, Doddridge, and the MS. read, And ye looked after me: ἐπισκέψασθε με, which ſignifies in general to take the overſight and care of any thing; an office which requires diligent inſpection and attendance. Comp. James i. 27. And it ſtrongly intimates, that ſuch an attendance on the poor in their illneſs, is a very acceptable charity, and is what many may have an opportunity of doing, who have very little money to ſpare. How aſtoniſhing is it to hear the Great Judge declaring that all the good offices which men have ever performed, were done to him! For I was hungry, &c. "In the whole of your conduct you have imitated the goodneſs and benevolence of my Father; and therefore I now declare you bleſſed and beloved of him, and appoint you to inherit this kingdom. Moreover, that you may know how acceptable acts of kindneſs and charity are to me, I aſſure you, that I reckon every thing of this ſort as done to myſelf. It was I who was hungry and thirſty; a ſtranger, and naked, and ſick, and in priſon. It was I whom you clothed, and lodged, and viſited, and comforted; coming to condole with me in my ſufferings, and to rerelieve my neceſſities in confinement and afflictions." See the next note.

36 Naked, and ye clothed me: I was ſick, and ye viſited me: I was in priſon, and ye came unto me.

37 Then ſhall the righteous anſwer him, ſaying, Lord, when ſaw we thee an-hungred, and fed thee? or thirſty, and gave thee drink?

38 When ſaw we thee a ſtranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee?

39 Or when ſaw we thee ſick, or in priſon, and came unto thee?

40 And the King ſhall anſwer, and ſay unto them, Verily I ſay unto you, Inaſmuch as ye have done it unto one of the leaſt of theſe my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

41 Then ſhall he ſay alſo unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye curſed, into everlaſting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels;

42 For I was an-hungred, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirſty, and ye gave me no drink:

43 I was a ſtranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: ſick, and in priſon, and ye viſited me not.

44 Then ſhall they alſo anſwer him, ſaying, Lord, when ſaw we thee an-hungred, or a-thirſt, or a ſtranger, or naked, or ſick, or in priſon, and did not miniſter unto thee?

45 Then ſhall he anſwer them, ſaying, Verily I ſay unto you, Inaſmuch as ye did it not to one of the leaſt of theſe, ye did it not to me.

46 And theſe ſhall go away into everlaſting puniſhment: but the righteous into life eternal.

Ver. 40. Verily I ſay—inaſmuch, &c.] This is unſpeakably aſtoniſhing! The united wiſdom of angels could not have thought of any thing more proper to convey an idea of the warmth and ſtrength of the divine benevolence to man, or offer a more conſtraining motive to charity, than that the Son of God ſhould declare from the judgement-ſeat, in preſence of the whole aſſembled univerſe, that ſuch good offices as are done to the afflicted are done to Him. Having in the day of his fleſh ſuffered injuries and afflictions unſpeakable, he conſiders all the virtuous diſtreſſed as members of his body, loves them tenderly, and is ſo much intereſted in their welfare, that when they are happy, he rejoices; when they are diſtreſſed he is grieved. Inaſmuch as ye have done it unto one of the leaſt of theſe my brethren, ye have done it unto me. Wonderful condeſcenſion of the Son of God! Aſtoniſhing ſtupidity of men! who neglect altogether, or are perſuaded with difficulty, to do good to Chriſt. That Jeſus ſhould call the poor, even among the heathen, his brethren, is a great honour to the human nature, and ſhews the divine benignity in an amiable light. This happy relation ariſes from the manhood, which he ſtill poſſeſſes in common with men; and from the poverty, affliction, and other human miſeries to which he was expoſed while he lived in the world. He may call good men, whether heathens or Chriſtians, his brethren likewiſe, becauſe they are children of the ſame Father, namely God; after whoſe image they are formed through the influence of his ſpirit working faith in them; i. e. a firm and ſolid conviction of the truths of religion, ſo far as it hath pleaſed God to diſcover them. It is this conformity of nature, human and divine, which makes men Chriſt's brethren; for which reaſon, in whatever perſon it is found, he will acknowledge the relation, without regard to any circumſtance whatever, that is out of the perſon's power. See Macknight. By theſe my brethren, Dr. Heylin underſtands, the ſaints, who ſhould come in Chriſt's train to judgement. That alms-deeds ſhould be remembered with peculiar regard in the day of judgement, was a notion that early prevailed among the Jews; as appears by the Chaldee paraphraſe on Eccleſ. ix. 7. which bears a remarkable reſemblance to theſe words of Chriſt, and might perhaps be an imitation of them. See Mede's Works, p. 81. and Wetſtein.

Ver. 41—46. Depart from me, ye curſed] That is, of my Father, as is evident from ver. 34. What the wicked are here repreſented as anſwering, ver. 44. perhaps may only intimate that ſuch will be the language of their hearts; which Chriſt perceiving, will reply to it, as in ver. 45. But there is no neceſſity for ſuppoſing that they will actually plead thus; multitudes, no doubt, will remember, that they have often heard what reply will be made to ſuch a plea. God grant that none who read it here may be in the number of thoſe to whom it will be made! In this parable the abſolution of the righteous is repreſented as happening before the condemnation of the wicked, to ſhew that God takes greater delight in rewarding, than in puniſhing mankind. Moreover it is remarkable, that the fire of hell is here ſaid to be prepared, not for the wicked, but for the devil and his angels; whereas the kingdom of heaven is ſaid to be prepared expreſsly for the righteous. Perhaps our Lord by this deſigned to teach us, that God's orginal intention was to make men happy, and not to damn them. No ſooner were we created than a ſtate of conſummate felicity was formed for us. But the fire of hell was prepared for the devil and his angels, namely, after their fall; and becauſe wicked men partake with devils in their ſin of rebellion againſt God, they are doomed to ſhare with them in their puniſhment. Perhaps alſo the fire of hell is declared to be made for the devil and his angels, to intimate the greatneſs of the miſery to which men irreclaimably wicked ſhall be conſigned. The puniſhment which they ſhall ſuffer is of the heavieſt kind, being the puniſhment of devils. The condemnation of the wicked for having neglected to take pity on Chriſt's brethren, does not imply that he would have our works of charity confined to good men; or that he does not diſapprove of inhumanity and cruelty towards thoſe who are bad. The circumſtance is formed only to ſhew more effectually, the niggardly, mercileſs, ſelfiſh diſpoſition of the wicked: for if a perſon be hard-hearted to a ſaint, he muſt be more ſo to a ſinner, who, as his covetouſneſs will immediately ſuggeſt, deſerves nothing; ſo that it was needleſs to mention their cruelty to ſuch. The iſſue of the judgement, as it is repreſented in this parable, is aweful beyond deſcription. Theſe ſhall go away into everlaſting puniſhment, but the righteous into everlaſting life. If the meaning of this ſhort ſentence was fully underſtoood or duly conſidered, what an impreſſion would it make upon the ſoul! everlaſting puniſhment!——everlaſting life!——What is there which is not comprehended in theſe words, and how miſerable are they, who dare to venture their ſouls on the ſuppoſition, that the important word in the orginal [αιωνιον,] which is the ſame in both places, ſignifies a limited duration in either!

It may ſeem ſtrange, that in this repreſentation of the judgement, the enquiry ſhould be ſaid to turn not upon the commiſſion of crimes, but upon the performance of duties. The reaſon may be, that generally ſpeaking, men look upon the neglect of duties, as a trivial affair, but dread the commiſſion of crimes: and hence it comes to paſs, that while they keep themſelves clear of the latter, they are apt to find many excuſes for the former. Wherefore, as there is not a more pernicious error reſpecting religion and morality than this, it was highly becoming the wiſdom of Jeſus, to give ſuch an account of the judgement, as ſhould be the moſt ſolemn caution poſſible againſt it.

But ſince the enquiry is ſaid to turn wholly upon the performance of duties, it may ſeem more ſtrange ſtill, that the offices of charity are mentioned, and not a word ſpoken of any ſearch made into men's conduct with regard to the duties of piety; notwithſtanding the judge himſelf upon another occaſion declared ſuch to be of greater importance than the duties of charity, which are ſo highly applauded in the parable. See on chap. xxii. 34, &c. Nevertheleſs, to juſtify this part of the repreſentation, let it be conſidered, that piety and charity never can ſubſiſt ſeparately; piety and its root, faith, always producing charity; and charity, wherever it ſubſiſts, neceſſarily preſuppoſing piety.

The connection between piety and charity will clearly appear, provided this dictate of reaſon and experience is attended to, namely, that no man can be truly benevolent and merciful without loving thoſe diſpoſitions. If ſo, he muſt love benevolence in God, that is, he muſt love God himſelf;—I ſpeak of thoſe who believe there is a God:—for piety, or the love of God, is nothing elſe but the regard we cheriſh towards God, on account of his perfections.

Piety and charity being thus eſſentially connected together, to examine mens conduct with reſpect to either of theſe graces was ſufficient. In the parable the inquiry is repreſented as turning upon the duties of charity, perhaps becauſe in this branch of goodneſs there is leſs room for ſelf-deceit than in the other. Hypocrites, by ſhewing much zeal in the externals of religion, oftentimes makes ſpecious pretenſions to extraordinary piety, and uncommon heights of the love of God, while in the mean time they are altogether defective in charity; are covetous, unjuſt, rapacious, and proud; conſequently really void of the love of God.

The caſe is otherwiſe with the love of man. None can aſſume the appearance of this grace, but by feeding the hungry, cloathing the naked, relieving the diſtreſſed, and performing the other friendly offices of love. Charity therefore does not eaſily admit of ſelf-deceit. It is true, works of charity may in ſome particular caſes proceed from other principles than the holy root of a pious benevolent diſpoſition,—ſuch as from vanity, or even from views of intereſt; but then it muſt be

CHAP. XXVI.

The rulers conſpire againſt Chriſt. The woman anointeth his head. Judas ſelleth him. Chriſt eateth the paſſover: inſtituteth his holy ſupper: prayeth in the garden: and being bebe remembered, that an ordinary hypocriſy will hardly engage men to undertake them. They are by far too weighty duties to be ſuſtained by thoſe hollow falſe principles which ſupport bad men, and by that means are ſeldom counterfeited; for which cauſe, wherever a genuine, extenſive, and permanent charity is found, we may ſafely conclude, that there the love of God reigns in perfection.

This parable therefore teaches us, in the plaineſt manner, that pretenſions of piety, however loud, will avail a man nothing at the bar of God, if he be deficient in works of charity. At the ſame time, taken in its true light, it gives no man reaſon to hope well either of himſelf, or of others, if they be wanting in their duty to God, and although they ſhould not be charitable, but grateful alſo, and juſt, and temperate, and outwardly blameleſs in all their dealings with men. The reaſon of this is, the duty we owe to God is no other than what is due to men, in the like circumſtances, and which, if we neglected, we ſhould be unjuſt to them. It conſiſts of diſpoſitions and actions, the ſame in kind, but different in degree, proportionable to the perfection of the object.

He who loves and admires holineſs, juſtice, goodneſs, and truth in men, cannot but love theſe perfections in God; that is, he muſt love God; ſo likewiſe he that is truly grateful to an earthly benefactor, cannot be ungrateful to one, from whoſe bounty all the good things he enjoys do flow. And ſince ingratitude in men conſiſteth in this, that the perſon obliged forgetteth the benefit he hath received, never thinks of his benefactor, and is at no pains to make ſuitable returns; How can he acquit himſelf from the charge of ingratitude, who never thinks of God, nor of all the favours that he hath received from him; hath no ſenſe of the obligations he lieth under to him, and is not at the pains ſo much as to return him thanks, that is to ſay, wholly neglects the external and internal exerciſes of devotion. Since therefore the duty which we owe to God is the ſame in kind with that which men claim from us in like circumſtances, it is unqueſtionable that true morality never can exiſt, where there is no piety; and that for one to pretend to morality who is deſtitute of piety, is altogether ridiculous.

But if this parable gives perſons no encouragement who are deſtitute of piety, although they make a fair ſhew of many moral virtues, it much leſs gives thoſe any ground of hope, who are not only void of piety, but are faulty almoſt in every reſpect; unleſs it be that they have a lovely kind of tenderneſs and humanity in their diſpoſition, which leads them on ſome occaſions to do excellent acts of beneficence. For though there be nothing ſaid of any inquiry made concerning the duties of juſtice, temperance, chaſtity, and fidelity, we are by no means on that account to fancy theſe virtues ſhall not be inquired after at the judgement, and rewarded wherever they are found; or that the contrary vices of falſhood, and fraud, and debauchery ſhall not be taken notice of and puniſhed. Charity being the end of the commandment, ſo far as it reſpects our duty to men, is the higher branch, and therefore has for its ſupports juſtice, veracity, and the other ſocial virtues. Moreover, being connected with temperance, chaſtity, and ſelf-government, it can never be without theſe attendant graces, the neglect of which is evidently a direct and groſs breach of charity, and leadeth thereto.—In a word, as among the vices, ſo among the virtues, there is a natural affinity and cloſe connection. They are ſomehow abſolutely eſſential and neceſſary to each other, and ſo can in no caſe ſubſiſt ſeparately. For which reaſon, if any of them be wanting, much more if ſo capital a virtue as the love of God be wanting, it is a ſure proof that our charity, our juſtice, our temperance, or whatever other graces we may ſeem to have, are but the mimickry of theſe virtues, and not the virtues themſelves. At the ſame time, it cannot be denied that the parable is formed ſo, as to give us the higheſt idea of works of charity; they are demanded at the judgement as the fruit and perfection of all the virtues, and loudly applauded wherever they are found. On the other hand, hard-heartedneſs, cruelty, and uncharitableneſs are branded with the blackeſt mark of infamy, being the foundation on which the ſentence of condemnation paſſed againſt the wicked, is unalterably and eternally fixed.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XXV.

The ſame great and important truth, that there is no ſuch thing as negative goodneſs, is three times ſhewn in this chapter. In the parable of the virgins,—in the much plainer parable of the ſervants who had received the talents,—and in a direct declaration of the manner wherein our Lord will proceed at the laſt day. The ſeveral parts of theſe anſwer exactly to each other, only each riſes above the preceding.

In the firſt parable we cannot fail to obſerve, that the virgins differ in no reſpects ſave one. They are called virgins; they all take lamps; they all go forth to meet the bridegroom; they all ſlumber and ſleep; they are all awakened and ariſe, and prepare to trim their lamps. The great and only difference which ſo materially diſtinguiſheth them is,—with the fooliſh, the want of oil in their veſſels; with the wiſe, the poſſeſſion of that oil; and this is the only thing which can diſtinguiſh true and formal profeſſors: each is called by the name of Chriſt; each is baptized, and made a candidate for immortality; each dies, and ſlumbers in the grave; and each will be awakened by the laſt trump. But then the material difference will be found: Theſe ſhall hear, "Come, ye bleſſed; for I was hungry, and ye gave me meat, and thus proved your faith by your living, holy works of mercy and of love;"—while thoſe ſhall hear, "Depart, ye curſed, for I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat; profeſſing my faith only, but deſtitute of that love and charity to your brethren, which is the ſure characteriſtick of all my diſciples."

How careful ſhould we be to provide for this deciſive day; to ſee that we bear not an empty lamp only; are not Chriſtians merely in name, but Chriſtians in heart and life! To this purpoſe we ſhould labout to obtain the divine oil of the Spirit; carefully examining ourſelves with regard to our baptiſmal covenant; inquiring whether, as we have been baptized with water, ſo we have alſo been baptized with the Holy Ghoſt; whether, as admitted into the outward pale of Chriſt's church, we are by a due performance of our baptiſmal covenant engrafted as living members in him; whether, as earneſtly deſirous of his grace, we omit no opportunity to obtain it; more eſpecially by frequenting the bleſſed communion, the moſt plentiful channel of divine grace. But how jealous ſhould we be over our ſouls, that we be not found formal frequenters only of that bleſſed communion; under which apprehenſion, we ſhould from time to time diligently ſearch and try our hearts, how we have improved in grace: how we have performed our promiſes at the holy table to amend and advance; whether we are leſs and leſs worldly, leſs and leſs uncharitable, leſs and leſs luſtful, leſs and leſs ambitious and vain; whether we love God more and more; whether we find the love of our neighbour more and more increaſed;—whether we find our love of holineſs, and our deſire to be diſſolved, and to be with Chriſt, daily advancing and quickening into perfection. Thus ſhould we be ſolicitous and careful in our inquiries after the ſupplies of grace; not content merely to ſtand ſtill, to remain from year to year the ſame; the ſame trifling, vain, worldly, uncharitable, cenſorious, and envious profeſſors, but zealous to pluck all theſe evils from our hearts, and to implant there all the fair flowers of paradiſe, all the ſweet graces and holy affections which make the ſoul indeed the kingdom of God, and transfuſe an ineffable ſweetneſs and happineſs into our whole life and converſation. Giver of all good gifts! make us more than ordinarily zealous to increaſe in holineſs and in all good works, that we may not only adorn the profeſſion of our Lord and Saviour, but be found happily prepared, with our lamps trimmed and burning when the bleſſed bridegroom calls, and gives us a glorious admiſſion into his everlaſting joy.

In the parable of the talents, our Saviour deſcribes in a ſtriking manner the judgement of his own ſervants,—his Apoſtles, miniſters, and all who are in eminent ſtations of life; ſhewing, that though they are not bleſſed indeed with equal advantages, yet that all the gifts, whether of nature or of grace, which they enjoyed, are beſtowed on them for their maſter's ſervice, to whom they properly belong; and that they ſhould be employed in promoting his intereſt, the intereſts of truth and righteouſneſs, which he came to eſtabliſh on earth; He who eſteems the moſt uſeful life to be the moſt praiſeworthy, and will reward it accordingly.

The behaviour of a good man in an eminent ſtation of life is fitly enough compared to a courſe of merchandize: for as merchants, by laying out their money in trade, receive it again with profit, ſo the ſervants of God, by occupying the abilities and opportunities which he has put into their hands, improve, ſtrengthen and increaſe them; and whatever ſucceſs they have in this ſpiritual merchandize, their maſter is pleaſed to conſider it as his own, and to think himſelf enriched thereby, rejoicing infinitely in the happineſs of his creatures. Can we have a fairer or more amiable view of the deity?

The excuſe which the ſlothful ſervant made for himſelf, truly expreſſes the thoughts of wicked men. They look on Chriſt as a hard tyrannical maſter, who rigorouſly exacts what he has no title to, and who puniſhes with unreaſonable ſeverity things that are no faults at all, or but ſmall ones; and they regard his laws as ſo many infringements of their liberty, by which they are ſecluded from much innocent pleaſures. But the anſwer which the judge is ſaid to have returned, demonſtrates that all the excuſes which wicked men can make for themſelves will avail them nothing at the great day; and truly, it is not to be imagined how any man can produce before God a reaſon ſufficient to juſtify his neglect of doing good, and improving thoſe talents which are entruſted to him ſolely for that purpoſe.

The crime and puniſhment of this idle ſervant ought to be attentively conſidered by all; eſpecially by perſons addicted to pleaſure, who imagine that there is no harm in giving themſelves up to ſenſual gratifications, provided thereby they do no injury to others: for the judge of the world here ſolemnly declares, that to have done no harm, will be by no means a ſufficient plea at his bar. That a life ſpent merely in amuſements will be ſeverely puniſhed; that it is highly criminal to ſuffer the divine grace to lie buried in idleneſs, and that all God's ſervants muſt be actively good, exerting themſelves to the utmoſt in promoting his intereſt, which is no other than the happineſs of his creatures. By this indeed they acquire no merit; yet it is by this that they are qualified for the enjoyment of heaven, the gates of which Chriſt hath ſet open by his blood.

But further we may reflect, that if the ſervant who hid his talent in a napkin was reckoned unfaithful to his truſt, and puniſhed accordingly, notwithſtanding he delivered it up to his lord intire; what may they expect, who deſtroy the noble faculties beſtowed on them, or uſe thoſe temporal bleſſings as occaſions of ſin, which God intended as means for the exerciſe and improvement of grace? trayed with a kiſs, is carried to Caiaphas, and denied by Peter.

AND it came to paſs, when Jeſus had finiſhed all theſe ſayings, he ſaid unto his diſciples,

2 Ye know that after two days is the feaſt of the paſſover, and the Son of man is betrayed to be crucified.

3 Then aſſembled together the chief prieſts, and the ſcribes, and the elders of the people, unto the palace of the high prieſt, who was called Caiaphas,

4 And conſulted that they might take Jeſus by ſubtilty, and kill him.

5 But they ſaid, Not on the feaſt-day, leſt there be an uproar among the people.

6 Now when Jeſus was in Bethany, in the houſe of Simon the leper,

7 There came unto him a woman having an alabaſter-box of very precious ointment, and poured it on his head, as he ſat at meat.

8 But when his diſciples ſaw it, they had indignation, ſaying, To what purpoſe is this waſte?

9 For this ointment might have been ſold for much, and given to the poor.

10 When Jeſus underſtood it, he ſaid unto them, Why trouble ye the woman? for ſhe hath wrought a good work upon me.

Chap. XXVI. Ver. 1, 2. When Jeſus had finiſhed, &c.] See Luke xxi. 37, 38. When our Lord ſat down on the mount of Olives to foretel the deſtruction of the city, and to deliver the parables which repreſent the method of the general judgement, he was far on his way to Bethany. After the parables were pronounced, and before he departed, he thought fit to add a word or two concerning his own death. The greateſt trial that his diſciples were ever to meet with, was now approaching in their maſter's ſufferings; wherefore, to prepare them, he foretold thoſe ſufferings, together with the particular time and manner of them; and by ſo doing proved that he knew perfectly whatever was to befal him, and that his ſufferings were all voluntary and neceſſary. The preceding diſcourſes were moſt likely delivered on the Tueſday of the week in which our Lord ſuffered; and he probably delivered what we have here, that evening, which was juſt two days before the Paſchal Lamb was eaten. We do not find that any of the tranſactions of Wedneſday are recorded, beſides the general account given in the place of St. Luke above referred to. This being the laſt day of our Lord's public teaching, (Tueſday) it was more full of action than any other mentioned in the hiſtory, as will appear from the following induction of particulars. He came to Bethany ſix days before the paſſover, probably about ſun-ſetting. He rode into the city ſurrounded by the multitude the next afternoon; for when he had looked round on all things in the temple, after his entry, it was evening; Mark xi. 11. This happened five days before the paſſover. He went thither again from Bethany the day following; namely, four days before the paſſover, and by the way blaſted the fig-tree, and after that drove the buyers and ſellers out of the temple. Next morning, namely, three days before the paſſover, and the laſt of his public teaching, being on his way to the city, He ſpake concerning the efficacy of faith, on occaſion of the diſciples expreſſing great aſtoniſhment at ſeeing the fig-tree withered from the roots. When he appeared in the temple, the deputies, who were ſent by the council, came and aſked him concerning his authority; he anſwered them with a queſtion concerning the baptiſm of John; then ſpake the parable of the two ſons, and after that the parables of the vineyard and the huſbandmen, and of the marriage ſupper. Then he avoided the ſnare which was laid for him, in the queſtion concerning the tribute-money; confuted the doctrine of the Sadducees, concerning the reſurrection; ſhewed the ſcribe which was the greateſt commandment in the law; aſked the Phariſees whoſe ſon the Chriſt is; cautioned his diſciples to beware of the Scribes and Phariſees, againſt whom he denounced many grievous woes. When the woes were finiſhed, he obſerved the people throw their gifts into the treaſury,—probably as they worſhipped at the evening ſacrifice, and commended the poor widow for her charity. After the ſervice was over, he left the temple, and went to the mount of Olives, where he foretold the downfal of the nation, and ſpake three parables repreſenting the procedure at the general judgement. Laſt of all, he concluded the work of the day with predicting his own ſufferings. By this time it muſt have been about ſun-ſetting. He went away therefore with his diſciples to Bethany, intending to paſs the night there, at a diſtance from his enemies the Scribes and Phariſees, who were now gathered together at the high-prieſt's palace, to deliberate how they might take him, and put him to death. There was a tradition among the Jews, (ſtill extant in the Cabaliſtic books) that the people ſhould be redeemed in the days of the Meſſiah, the ſame day upon which they went out of Egypt; for though their departure from Egypt was on the fifteenth day of the month, yet they prepared for it on the fourteenth, and ate the paſſover, ſtanding, on that very day; conſequently on the very day that the paſchal lamb, the type of the great Deliverer of mankind, was eaten by the Jews, the Saviour typified by that lamb was ſacrificed for the ſins of mankind. See Macknight, Grotius, and Calmet.

Ver. 3. Who was called Caiaphas] See John xi. 49. Joſeph Caiaphas was made high-prieſt by Valerius Gratus, as we learn from Joſephus, Antiq. b. xviii. c. 3. and afterwards depoſed by Vitellius, ch. 6. We may infer from Acts v. 17. that Caiaphas was of the ſect of the Sadducees.

Ver. 4. By ſubtilty] Surpriſe. Wat. and Pruſſian Teſtament. See Luke xxii. 6.

Ver. 5. Not on the feaſt-day] Ἑορτῆ, the feaſt; i. e. the whole time of the ſolemnity, which laſted ſeven days. All this interval was favourable to uproars and ſeditions, on account of the vaſt concourſe of people. It is very remarkable that the Jews in this inſtance receded from their uſual cuſtom, which was to puniſh the moſt heinous criminals at this very time, that the example might be more general and diffuſive. The prieſts, however, were doubtleſs more apprehenſive of the Galileans, among whom Jeſus reſided, than of the inhabitants of Jeruſalem. However, through fear of an uproar, amongſt the people, they determined to depart from their uſual mode of proceeding. This circumſtance, therefore, affords us an illuſtrious proof of the interpoſition of the divine Providence; for the Jews having a fair opportunity offered them by the treachery of Judas, of apprehending our bleſſed Lord, relinquiſhed their intended deſign of not apprehending him on the feaſt-day, and thereby our Lord's crucifixion had a greater number of witneſſes, and fell out upon the very time when the paſchal lamb was ſlain. See Grotius, L'Enfant, and Joſeph. Antiq. b. xx. c. 4.

Ver. 6, 7. Now when Jeſus was in Bethany] Now Jeſus being in Bethany. Wat. and MS. It is not to be thought that Simon was now a leper; for in this caſe he would not have been ſuffered to live in a town, nor would the Jews have come to an entertainment at his houſe; but either he was once a leper, and had been cured by Jeſus, or elſe the name was given to the family, as ſome conſiderable perſon in it had formerly been a leper. The boxes here ſpoken of were called only alabaſters, not becauſe they were all made of alabaſter, for there were ſome of glaſs; the greateſt part of them were of a kind of alabaſter, called onyx, and made in the ſhape of a pyramid. It was cuſtomary among the ancients to regale their gueſts at entertainments with perfumes, odours, and chaplets of flowers, in token of reſpect; odoriferous balſams, gums, &c. were likewiſe uſed by the Jews and Egyptians to embalm their dead. Inſtead of, very precious ointment, ſome would render the Greek, odoriferous balſam of great price. See Mark xiv. 3.

Ver. 8. But when his diſciples ſaw it] It appears from John xii. 14. that none but Judas found fault with what this woman had done. St. Matthew hath put the diſciples in general, for one of the diſciples; as he ſaith elſewhere, with St. Mark, that the thieves reviled Jeſus Chriſt, though it is evident from St. Luke xxiii. 39. that there was but one guilty of that crime. By the figure called enallagé, the plural number is put for the ſingular, which Longinus mentions as an elegance in his treatiſe on the ſublime. See Joſh. vii. 1, 21. and comp. Luke xxiii. 36. John xix. 29. with Matth. xxvii. 48. and Mark xv. 36. Some have thought that Judas Iſcariot was the ſon of that Simon, in whoſe houſe the feaſt was made; But the name was ſo common, that it cannot be concluded with any certainty.

Ver. 10—12. Why trouble ye the woman?] This vindication of the woman ſuggeſts the reaſon why Jeſus permitted ſo expenſive a compliment to be paid to him. He told them that God had ordered it for the exerciſe and improvement of virtue, that there ſhould always be poor in the land to whom they might do good offices at any time; But if their love was not teſtified to him at that juncture, they would have no opportunity to ſhew it afterwards; becauſe he was to die within two days, for which reaſon the woman had come very ſeaſonably to anoint him for his burial; πρὸς τὸ ἐνταφιάσαι με, corpus meum ad funus componere,—ornamentis ſepulchralibus ornare,—"to prepare my body for its funeral:" See Mark xiv. 8. "You think, ſays our Lord, that this profuſion of precious ointment is a piece of extravagance; but if the very ſame thing was done to a dead body, none would find fault with it: For this is not only an eſtabliſhed cuſtom, but likewiſe a deed which is worthy of praiſe, eſpecially when a king is the ſubject, and ſuch this woman eſteems me. Why then ſhould the ſame action, which would be praiſe-worthy if the dead were the object, be thought blameable, when applied to the living? I have often told you and others that my death is not far off. This woman therefore has only anticipated the ſolemn office to my body, a ſhort time 11 For ye have the poor always with you; but me ye have not always.

12 For in that ſhe hath poured this ointment on my body, ſhe did it for my burial.

13 Verily I ſay unto you, Whereſoever this goſpel ſhall be preached in the whole world, there ſhall alſo this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her.

14 Then one of the twelve, called Judas Iſcariot, went unto the chief prieſts, 15 And ſaid unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? And they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of ſilver.

16 And from that time he ſought opportunity to betray him.

17 Now the firſt day of the feaſt of unleavened bread, the diſciples came to Jeſus, ſaying unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the paſſover?

18 And he ſaid, Go into the city to ſuch a man, and ſay unto him, The Maſter ſaith, My time is at hand; I will keep the paſſover at thy houſe with my diſciples.

19 And the diſciples did as Jeſus had appointed them; and they made ready the paſſover.

20 Now when the even was come, he ſat down with the twelve.

21 And as they did eat, he ſaid, Verily I ſay unto you, that one of you ſhall betray me.

22 And they were exceeding ſorrowful, and began every one of them to ſay unto him, Lord, is it I?

23 And he anſwered and ſaid, He that dippeth his hand with me in the diſh, the ſame ſhall betray me.

24 The Son of man goeth, as it is written of him: but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! it had been good for that man, if he had not been born.

25 Then Judas, which betrayed him, anſwered, and ſaid, Maſter, is it I? He ſaid unto him, Thou haſt ſaid.

time before it will be really neceſſary." This poſſibly was not the deſign of Mary; but our Saviour puts this conſtruction upon what ſhe did, that he might confirm thereby what he had ſaid to his diſciples concerning his approaching death. See ch. xx. 18. John xii. 3, &c. and the note on Deut. xv. 11.

Ver. 15. They covenanted with him for thirty pieces of ſilver] Judas Iſcariot, one of the twelve, (a circumſtance of ſuch high aggravation, that each of the Evangeliſts hath marked it out in this view) having been more forward than the reſt in condemning the woman, or, moſt probably, the only one who did ſo, thought himſelf peculiarly affronted by the rebuke which Jeſus gave. Riſing up, therefore, he went ſtraightway into the city, to the high prieſt's palace, where he found the whole council ſeaſonably aſſembled, and being in a paſſion he promiſed to put his maſter into their hands, for the reward of thirty pieces of ſilver, τριάκοντα ἀργύρια;—The Αργυριον is commonly ſuppoſed to have been the Jewiſh ſhekel, which, properly ſpeaking, was the denomination of a weight equal to twenty gerahs, (Exod. xxx. 13.) each weighing ſixteen barley corns. The ſhekel therefore was equal to the weight of 320 barley corns, or half a Roman ounce, conſequently in ſilver was equal to two ſhillings one farthing and a half ſterling. Thirty ſhekels were the price of a ſlave. See Zech. xi. 13. It deſerves to be remarked that Judas did not fix this price himſelf, but the Jewiſh Sanhedrim; and therefore, as it was the very price predicted by a prophet, no colluſion could be ſuſpected between Chriſt and his diſciples, to make an appearance of his reſembling the Meſſiah in ſuch circumſtances, as otherwiſe he might not have reſembled him. This price was fixed by his enemies, who would have done all they could to prevent any reſemblance between the circumſtances of our Lord's life, and thoſe which were foretold of the life of the Meſſiah. It was choſen above all other prices, to ſhew their enmity, and to diſgrace the character of Chriſt, as it was the price and ranſom of the meaneſt ſlave: But their malice counter-acted itſelf; and the circumſtance which they pitched upon to vilify our Lord's character, ſerved to exalt and ennoble it, by ſhewing him really to be the perſon of whom the prophet had ſpoken. As the treachery of Judas Iſcariot muſt raiſe the aſtoniſhment of every reader, who has any juſt notion of our Lord's character, ſome particular conſiderations will be found at the end of this chapter reſpecting the motives which ſwayed him to be guilty of ſuch an atrocious crime, and the circumſtances which attended it.

Ver. 17, 18. Now the firſt day of the feaſt, &c.] We learn from Mark xiv. 12. and Luke xxii. 7. that this was done the very day on which the paſchal lamb was killed; for though the feaſt of unleavened bread did not, properly ſpeaking, begin till the 15th of April, (ſee Lev. xxiii. 5. Numb xxviii. 16, 17.) yet they began to abſtain from leavened bread on the evening of the 14th day, Exod. xii. 18. The paſſover [το πάσχα] means the paſchal lamb; for the word is often uſed to denote the lamb itſelf, which was killed and eaten during the celebration of this ſolemnity. Into the city, means Jeruſalem, by way of eminence. The phraſe to ſuch a man, implies that Jeſus named the perſon to whom they were ſent; though the Evangeliſts have not thought it of importance to mention his name. See Mark xiv. 13. and Luke xxii. 10. My time is at hand, ſeems to mean, "the time of my ſufferings and death;" for every body knew that the time of eating the paſſover was near. I will keep the paſſover, means, "I will eat the paſchal lamb." It was cuſtomary for the inhabitants of Jeruſalem to prepare rooms, tables, &c. for ſtrangers to celebrate this feſtival; at which time, as appears by the Talmudiſts, the houſes were not to be lett, but were of common right for any one to eat the paſſover in: So that there would have been nothing extraordinary in the orders which our Lord gave his diſciples, to make ready the paſchal ſupper, though he had not ſpecified the perſon, which, however, he moſt probably did; the Jews uſed to prepare the place in which they intended to eat the paſſover the night before, as they do at preſent. Their chief ſolicitude in their preparation conſiſts in ſearching after any leavened bread, and their ſcrupulouſneſs goes ſo far, as to pick up the leaſt crumb they can find. After this they make the beds or couches on which they recline, furniſh their room, and dreſs their meat. See the notes on Exod. xii. L'Enfant's Introduction, and Calmet's Dictionary under the word PASSOVER.

Ver. 20. Now when the even was come] When the Jews celebrated the paſſover, they aſſembled together, from ten to twenty in number, at ſome private houſe, where, after they had waſhed their feet, they ſat, or more properly ſpeaking, laid down, and ate the lamb with unleavened bread. After this repaſt was finiſhed, they waſhed again, and lying down the ſecond time, they had for the ſecond courſe, a diſh of ſallad, conſiſting of bitter herbs, into which they put a kind of ſauce named Haroſeth, made of palm-tree branches, or raiſins and berries, bruiſed and mixed with vinegar and ſeaſoning, to repreſent the clay of which their fathers made bricks in Egypt; for Haras, is the Hebrew word for a brick. Then the maſter of the family, dividing the bread into two parts, is ſaid to have bleſſed one of them in the following form of words: "Bleſſed be thou, Lord our God, the king of the whole world, in the eating of unleavened bread;" but he hid the other part under the napkin till the feaſt was ended. Afterwards, he took the piece of bread which was hidden, and having divided it into as many parts as there were perſons preſent, diſtributed to every one of them, uſing theſe words; "This is the bread of affliction which our fathers ate in the land of affliction. Let him that is hungry come, and eat the paſſover; let him that hath need come, and eat the paſſover." Then taking the cup, he firſt taſted it himſelf, and afterwards preſented it to each of them, ſaying, "Bleſſed be thou, O Lord, who haſt created the fruit of the vine." We ſhould obſerve, that after eating the unleavened bread and bitter herbs, one of the younger perſons preſent, (generally a child) aſked the reaſon of what was peculiar in that feaſt, according to Exod. xii. 26. which introduced the Haggadah, i. e. the ſhewing forth or declaration of it: in alluſion to which we read of ſhewing forth the Lord's death, 1 Cor. xi. 26. After theſe things they ſung Pſalm cxiii. and the five Pſalms following, which they called The great Hallelujah; and thus the feaſt ended. See the author's above quoted, Joſephus's war, b. vi. ch. ix. and the Religious Ceremonies, vol. i. p. 215.

Ver. 23. He that dippeth his hand with me, &c.] Grotius and others think this implies that Judas had placed himſelf ſo near his maſter, as to eat out of the ſame diſh with him; but their way of lying on couches at meat, muſt have made it inconvenient for two or more perſons to eat in that manner. It is more probable that the diſciples being in the deepeſt diſtreſs, had left off eating; only Judas, to conceal his guilt, continued the meal, and was dipping his meat into the Haroſeth, or thick ſauce beforementioned, when Jeſus happened to be putting his into it; which ſauce, according to cuſtom, was ſerved up in a ſeparate diſh. See on John xiii. 26.

Ver. 24. The Son of man goeth] Is going indeed, i. e. is departing, or near his death. Heylin.

Ver. 25. Thou haſt ſaid] This expreſſion is equivalent to a poſitive aſſertion, both in ſacred and profane authors. Compare ver. 64, with Mark xiv. 62. The firſt time Jeſus Chriſt diſcovered that he ſhould be

26 And as they were eating, Jeſus took bread, and bleſſed it, and brake it, and gave it to the diſciples, and ſaid, Take, eat; this is my body.

27 And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, ſaying, Drink ye all of it;

28 For this is my blood of the new teſtament, which is ſhed for many, for the remiſſion of ſins.

Ver. 26. Mark xiv. 22. Luke xxii. 19. 1 Cor. xi. 23, 24. Many Greek copies have, gave thanks.—V. 27. Mark xiv. 23.—V. 28. See Exod. xxiv. 8. Jer. xxxi. 31. Ch. xx. 28. Rom. v. 15.

be betrayed, he only told it in John's ear that Judas was to be the author of that atrocious villainy. John told it to Peter; but the reſt knew nothing of it. Now Jeſus plainly points him out.

Ver. 26. And as they were eating, Jeſus took bread] After they had done eating, &c. Jeſus Chriſt inſtituted the holy communion, after the paſchal feaſt. See Luke xxii. 20. and 1 Cor. xi. 25. This paſſage might otherwiſe be rendered, as they were yet eating. The loaves of the Jews were round, flat, thin, and conſequently very eaſy to break. The word it, is not in the original; for which reaſon and becauſe St. Luke in the parallel paſſage uſes the word εὐχαριστήσας, giving thanks, many are of opinion, that the word God ſhould be ſupplied in this place;—he bleſſed God. The Jews, as appears from the Talmudiſts and Philo, never ate bread, or received wine, without having firſt returned their thanks and praiſes to God their Creator. Maimonides and other rabbies tell us, that it was a rule among the Jews, at the end of the ſupper, to take a piece of the lamb for the laſt thing they ate that night. If this cuſtom was as old as Chriſt's time, it would make this action ſo much the more remarkable; it would plainly ſhew that the bread here diſtributed was a very diſtinct thing from the meal they had been making together, and might be, in the firſt opening of the action, a kind of ſymbolical intimation that the Jewiſh paſſover was to give way to another and nobler divine inſtitution. Our Lord having taken the bread and broken it, gave it to his diſciples, ſaying, Take, eat, this is my body; that is, "This is the repreſentation of my body broken on the croſs." This is agreeable to the ſtyle of the ſacred writers. See Gen. xl. 12, 18. xli. 26, 27. Dan. viii. 20. Gal. iv. 25. Rev. i. 20. and laſtly, Exod. xii. 11. where, after God hath ſpoken of the paſchal lamb, he ſays, This is the Lord's paſſover. Now our Saviour, ſubſtituting the holy communion to the paſſover, follows the ſtile of the old teſtament, and uſes the ſame expreſſions as the Jews were wont to uſe at the celebration of the paſſover. The word σῶμα, which is uſed in the original, ſignifies properly a dead body, without blood. Thus the Jews were uſed to call the lamb, which they ate at the paſchal ſupper, "the body of the lamb." The Syriac tranſlator has rendered the original word by one ſignifying a dead carcaſe. Several fathers of the church, inſtead of this is my body, have tranſlated, this is my fleſh: It is very plain that Jeſus Chriſt meant it ſo, ſince he makes mention of the effuſion of his own blood. See L'Enfant's Introduction, p. 135. Bp. Warburton obſerves, after Dr. Cudworth, that the laſt ſupper was of the nature of feaſts upon ſacrifice, in which feaſts the very body ſacrificed was eaten Now as this rite was inſtituted and firſt celebrated by the very perſon who was offered up for our redemption, the introduction muſt needs precede the ſacrifice; of neceſſity therefore ſome ſymbolic elements muſt be given, to be received by the participants, inſtead of the very body and blood; but as the fleſh of the animal ſacrificed was the meat eaten in the feaſt after the ſacrifice, the ſymbolical elements of bread and wine are naturally, properly, and elegantly called his body and blood. But if, as in fact was the caſe, the ſame wiſdom thought proper, in conformity to ancient religious cuſtoms, to intimate this only by the occaſion and through the words of the inſtitution, then the figurative expreſſion of body and blood became neceſſary, theſe only being fully declarative of the nature of the rite: and as a feaſt upon ſacrifice made the uſe of the terms body and blood to be neceſſary; ſo on the other ſide, the terms body and blood ſhew this rite to have been a feaſt upon ſacrifice. On the whole, we have indeed no conception how divine wiſdom could contrive a more natural, proper, and elegant way of acquainting his diſciples, that the rite now inſtituted was of the nature of a feaſt upon ſacrifice, than by terming the elements of bread and wine communicated, his body and blood. Thus doth the eſtabliſhment of the ſpecific nature of this rite ſerve to remove a difficulty which hath long embarraſſed all the ſeveral oppoſers of the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, by ſhewing that the figurative words of the inſtitution are eaſy, natural, elegant and neceſſary. An eminent Catholic biſhop hath indeed ſaid, that the Proteſtants have but lamely juſtified the figure of this is my body, by thoſe other of I am the vine,—I am the door; and his reaſon is ſolid: "Jeſus, ſaith he, in the inſtitution of this rite, was neither propounding a parable, nor explaining an allegory." But when he would have us infer from hence that there could be no other occaſion for ſuch a figure, he impoſes his uſual art upon us. He would not ſpeak out; he knew there were other occaſions, ſuch as the declaring the nature of a rite, which was the caſe in queſtion. But he would cut off our way to this by ſuppoſing it to be allowed on all hands, "that the words are detached and ſeparate from all other diſcourſe;—that there is no leading preparation." Now this we have ſhewn to be an abſolute falſhood; the leading preparation was a plain one, it was the paſchal lamb. The preceding diſcourſe was an affecting one; it was the mention of Chriſt's approaching death and ſufferings: therefore the words do not carry their whole meaning with themſelves, but refer to things preceding and exterior. This peculiarity ſerves a ſtill further and greater end. It is conſtrued to be declarative of the true nature of the death and ſufferings of Chriſt. That his death on the croſs was a ſacrifice for the ſins of the world, had been always held a part of the Catholic doctrine, founded on the expreſs declarations of Scripture; but thoſe ſects who oppoſe the doctrine of a real redemption, have always ſtriven to evade the notion of a real ſacrifice, as that on which the doctrine of redemption is founded, upon pretence that the Scripture expreſſions of Chriſt's ſacrifice were only figurative and alluſory. Now if the laſt ſupper, the rite which commemorates the death of Chriſt, be of the nature of feaſts upon ſacrifice, it is ſelf-evident that the death itſelf was a real ſacrifice, and not merely called ſo by converſion of terms, or accommodation of ideas. As it was contrived to declare the real nature of Chriſt's death, ſo it likewiſe ſerved this further purpoſe,—a purpoſe of great importance—to declare the abolition of ſacrifices in revealed religion. For if in the moſt ſolemn act of worſhip, where a ſacrifice always took place, a commemoration only of a ſacrifice is celebrated, it is plain all ſacrificial rites are excluded from that religion, and (if that religion be the completion of the diſpenſation) conſequently aboliſhed. The ſacrifice on the croſs does indeed in its nature aboliſh all thoſe Jewiſh ſacrifices, which evidently prefigured it; but to be aſſured of the abolition of ſacrifice in general, ſome more expreſs declaration, like what we find in this ſignificant rite, ſeemed to be expedient. See his "Principles of Religion." vol. ii. ſerm. x.

Ver 27, 28. And he took the cup] We learn from Jewiſh writers, that the wine was mixed with water on theſe occaſions; and from the firſt fathers, that the primitive Chriſtians adopted this cuſtom. He bleſſed the cup, according to the uſual method mentioned in the note on ver. 20. Hence the cup itſelf is named the cup of bleſſing. It was cuſtomary at the feaſts on ſacrifice, to make uſe of the ceremony of drinking, as a token of every one's entering into covenant with the Deity to whom the ſacrifice was offered; from whence we ſee the propriety of Chriſt's ordering all the diſciples to drink of the cup. As the words this is my body ſignify, "This is the repreſentaion of my body," ſo the words this is my blood of the new covenant, muſt ſignify, "this is the repreſentation of my blood of the new covenant." And by the ſame rule, that difficult expreſſion, 1 Cor. xi. 27. Guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, undoubtedly ſignifies, "guilty of profaning the repreſentation of the body and blood of the Lord." Wherefore Chriſt's meaning in the paſſage before us was this, "All of you, and all my diſciples in all ages, as many as ſhall believe, whether Jews or Gentiles, muſt drink of this cup, becauſe it repreſents my blood ſhed for the remiſſion of mens ſins; my blood, in which the new covenant between God and man is ratified; my blood therefore of the new covenant." So that this inſtitution exhibits to your joyful meditation the grand foundation of mens hopes, and perpetuates the memory of the ſame to the end of the world. Every ſacrifice conſiſted of two parts, of fleſh and blood; the moſt conſiderable part of the ſacrifice was the blood. See Lev. xvii. 11. and Exod. xxiv. 8. The firſt covenant was ratified with blood. It is ſaid of the blood of the ſacrifices in the place juſt quoted from Exodus, This is the blood of the covenant. See 1 Macc. vi. 34. Theſe words of inſtitution relative to the cup ſhew, that it is a primary end of this ſervice to bring to the devout remembrance of Chriſtians the death of their Maſter, as the foundation of the remiſſion of their ſins; and in ſhort, the whole mercy of the new covenant, as founded on the ſhedding of his blood; therefore they greatly err who make the keeping up the memory of Chriſt's death in the world as a ſimple fact, the only end of the Lord's ſupper. Dr. Doddridge, upon this ſubject, obſerves very well, "I apprehend this ordinance of the euchariſt to have ſo plain a reference to the atonement and ſatisfaction of Chriſt, and to do ſo ſolemn an honour to that fundamental doctrine of the church, that I cannot but believe, that while this ſacred inſtitution continues in the church, (as it will undoubtedly till the end of the world) it will be impoſſible to root that doctrine out of the minds of plain humble Chriſtians, by all the little artifices of ſuch forced and unnatural criticiſms as thoſe are by which it has been attacked. Unprejudiced and honeſt ſimplicity will always ſee the analogy this ordinance has to eating the fleſh of the Son of God, and drinking his blood, and will be taught by it, to feed on him as the Lamb that was ſlain, by the gracious appointment of God, to take away the ſin of the world. The enemies of this heart-reviving truth might as well hope to pierce through a coat of mail with a ſtraw, as to reach ſuch a truth, defended by ſuch an ordinance as this, with any of their trifling ſophiſtries." A very able friend has favoured me with the following remarks on the words, This is my body—This is my blood, in the paſſage before us. "Strange, ſays he, have been the inferences which the Romaniſts have pretended to draw from theſe and ſome other paſſages of Scripture of the like import, namely, that the elements of bread and wine are each of them actually tranſubſtantiated into the whole natural body and blood of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt; but it may reaſonably be aſked, why theſe perſons endeavour to impoſe ſuch an unwarrantable ſignification on the above terms, while at the ſame time they deny that other parts of the ſacred writ, which are expreſſed in the like words, (ſee 1 Cor. xii. 27. Epheſ. i. 22, 23.) can ever be admitted to have any ſuch meaning? However, to ſpeak more directly to the point, certain it is, that the above doctrine can-

29 But I ſay unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.

30 And when they had ſung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives.

31 Then ſaith Jeſus unto them, All ye ſhall be offended becauſe of me this night: for it is written, I will ſmite the ſhepherd, and the ſheep of the flock ſhall be ſcattered abroad.

32 But after I am riſen again, I will go before you into Galilee.

33 Peter anſwered and ſaid unto him, Though all men ſhall be offended becauſe of thee, yet will I never be offended.

34 Jeſus ſaid unto him, Verily I ſay unto thee, That this night before the cock crow, thou ſhalt deny me thrice.

35 Peter ſaid unto him, Though I ſhould die with thee, yet will I not deny thee. Likewiſe alſo ſaid all the diſciples.

36 Then cometh Jeſus with them unto a place called Gethſemane, and ſaith unto the diſciples, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder.

not be contained in the places under conſideration, as it is impoſſible to be true in the very nature of the thing. This muſt evidently appear, from the following abſolute contradictions, which, among many others, the tranſubſtantiation in queſtion neceſſarily implies, and to which it is obvious the moſt unlimited power can never give a being. That the ſame numerical body which has invariably exiſted for more than ſeventeen hundred years, does often at this time begin to be;—that the body of Chriſt is formed out of a particular ſubſtance, which never had a being till many centuries after the ſaid body had unchangeably exiſted in full perfection;—that the body aforeſaid does at once exiſt in its own proper form, and not in its own proper form; that the ſaid body is at one and the ſame moment of time both greater and leſs than itſelf, (the ſize of an ordinary man, and yet no larger than a grain of ſand;) that the above body is remote and diſtant from itſelf; that it is where it is not; that it is at once plainly ſeen and not ſeen by the ſame perſons; that it is in real motion, while at abſolute reſt; that it comes where it was not before, and never comes to ſuch place at all; that it is always in a glorified ſtate, incapable of the leaſt injury or defilement, and yet is ſometimes not only eaten by the moſt contemptible vermin, but likewiſe totally immerſed in the worſt filthineſs. Theſe obſervations abundantly demonſtrate the falſhood of the tenet above-mentioned; And with regard to the phraſes, this is my body—this is my blood, it is to be obſerved, that they are ſomewhat figurative; their preciſe meaning is, "This is ſymbolically, repreſentatively, interpretatively, or in effect, my body—my blood." Thus 1 Cor. x. 3, 4. manna is affirmed to have been ſpiritual meat, and water ſpiritual drink, and the drinkers of the ſame are ſaid to have drank Chriſt; that is, not literally, but ſymbolically, and in divine conſtruction. In Exod. vii. 1. Moſes is declared to have been made a God to Pharaoh, i. e. repreſentatively. So Matth. xix. 6. man and wife are aſſerted to be one fleſh, i. e. are conſidered in that view by Almighty God. In 1 Cor. vi. 11, 17. he that is joined to the Lord, is affirmed to be one ſpirit [with him,] i. e. in divine eſtimation; and 1 Cor. xii. 22, 23. the church is ſaid to be the body of Chriſt, and the ſeveral individuals which compoſe it, members in particular, i. e. not corporeally ſo, but myſtically, according to to the eſtabliſhed rules of the Chriſtian œconomy. The doctrine therefore contained in the paſſages under examination is, that by divine appointment the ſacred elements do, in their uſe, actually ſignify, ſtand for, and repreſent the body of Chriſt, as broken upon the croſs, and his blood as ſhed there for our ſins; and likewiſe do really exhibit Chriſt himſelf, with all his benefits, ſo that every worthy partaker of the ſame does certainly receive Chriſt, with all the advantages of his undertaking for mankind; that is to ſay, Chriſt is made his, and he is made a miniſter of Chriſt's myſtical body, by a divine conſtructional union; all his ſins are forgiven, in conſequence of Chriſt's death; his title to heaven is ſecured by virtue of Chriſt's obedience; he is endued with the Holy Spirit, to ſanctify his nature, and reſtore the divine likeneſs to his, and finally is intitled to a glorious reſurrection at the laſt day. Such is the true interpretation of the foregoing controverted ſentences; which at the ſame time that it correſponds with the analogy of faith, is likewiſe agreeable to the ſentiments of the beſt divines, both primitive and reformed. See Waterland on the Euchariſt, ch. 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10."

Ver. 29. But I ſay unto you] Moreover I ſay, &c. Wat. and MS. In Luke xxii. 18. our Lord made the ſame declaration concerning the paſſover cup. Hence we gather his meaning, upon the whole, to have been this; that he would neither partake of the paſſover, nor of the ſacrament, till he had the ſatisfaction to ſee the things ſignified by theſe inſtitutions fulfilled in the Goſpel diſpenſation, which therefore was nigh at hand. See on Mark xiv. 25. Or we may interpret the words in a more general ſenſe, thus; that he would not partake of any joy, till he rejoiced with them in the communications of the Holy Spirit, which were to be beſtowed plentifully on them as ſoon as the Goſpel diſpenſation began. If the reader refers to the note on John xiii. 34. he will find it proved that the word new, applied to a ſubject, often ſignifies in Scripture excellence and truth, conſequently the ſubſtance repreſented by any emblematical ſhadow. Dr. Clarke paraphraſes the preſent verſe thus: "I will have the Jewiſh paſſover commemoration no longer continued; but the things of which theſe were the figures, ſhall now be fulfilled and accompliſhed in the kingdom of the Meſſiah." See L'Enfant, and Whitby.

Ver. 30. And when they had ſung an hymn] This is thought by ſome to have been one of the Pſalms uſed at the paſchal feaſt, ſee on ver. 20. though Grotius and others are of opinion that it poſſibly was ſome other hymn more cloſely adapted to the celebration of the euchariſt. The mount of Olives ſtood over-againſt the temple of Jeruſalem, about fifteen ſtadia from the city. Our Lord uſually retired thither after having taught in the temple.

Ver. 31, 32. All ye ſhall be offended, &c.] That is, "You ſhall loſe all ſenſe of your duty, as diſciples, and ſeeing me in a condition inconſiſtent with the vulgar idea of the Meſſiah, ſhall leave me to the cruelties of mine enemies." This was a remarkable completion of Zech. xiii. 7. See the note. Our Lord might uſe this as a proverbial expreſſion, I will ſmite the ſheep, &c. but it being ſo remarkably accompliſhed in him above all others, eſpecially as he was the great Shepherd of ſouls, as he was deſcribed under that image in the Old Teſtament, and had aſſumed the title peculiarly to himſelf;—his diſciples could not but conſider this circumſtance as a proof of his being the Meſſiah. No ſooner did Jeſus mention the offence which his diſciples were to take at his ſufferings, than, to ſtrengthen their faith, he told them of his reſurrection, as well as of the particular place where they ſhould ſee him after He was riſen. An appointment to meet in ſo large a region as Galilee would, without this, have been of very little uſe; and ch. xxviii. 16. expreſly declares ſuch an appointment. We do not know the exact place, but we there learn that it was a certain mountain; probably it might be near the ſea of Tiberias, not only becauſe we find Chriſt on the borders of that ſea after his reſurrection, John xxi. 1. but alſo becauſe, as he had reſided there longer than any where elſe, he had no doubt the greateſt number of his diſciples thereabouts; and it lay pretty near the centre of his chief circuits, and therefore muſt be moſt convenient, eſpecially for thoſe beyond Jordan, where many had of late believed in him. See John x. 40, 42. The angel repeats the words of the 33d verſe to the diſciples who viſited our Saviour's tomb, ch. xxviii. 7. The words go before, allude to the image of the ſhepherd in the preceding verſe, it being the cuſtom of the eaſtern ſhepherds to precede their flocks. See Doddridge, L'Enfant, and John x. 4.

Ver. 33—35. Peter anſwered, &c.] St. Peter, no doubt, was ſincere in this proteſtation which he made; nevertheleſs, he was greatly to blame for not paying a due attention to his maſter's repeated predictions concerning his fall, (See Luke xxii. 31. and John xiii. 38.) for the preference which he gave himſelf above his brethren, and for depending upon his own ſtrength, inſtead of begging aſſiſtance of Him from whom all human ſufficiency is derived. The 34th verſe is expreſſed differently by St. Mark, who repreſents our Lord as ſaying, before the cock crow twice, &c. and from ch. xiii. 35. of that Goſpel it appears, that one of the four watches of the night was named the cock crowing: Now as this ended with the ſecond crowing, before the cock crow, is equivalent to before the cock crow twice, both ſignifying, "before the expiration of the watch called the cock crowing;"—at three in the morning, when the cock commonly crows the ſecond time. Or we may ſuppoſe that this expreſſion in the three hiſtorians is elliptical; and that the twice is underſtood, and muſt be ſupplied. See examples of this kind of ellipſis, on John xiii. 36.

Ver. 36. Unto a place called Gethſemane] Reland thinks Gethſemane was a particular ſpot in the mount of Olives. But its ſituation, like that of ſome other places, mentioned in the Goſpel, has been ſettled by conſidering the deſcription of a particular Evangeliſt only, without comparing their accounts together. From John xiv. 31. it appears, that Jeſus went out with his diſciples immediately after he had pronounced the conſolatory diſcourſe; for at the concluſion of it he ſaid to them, Ariſe, let us go hence; and conſidering the ſubject of the next ſermon, I am the true vine, &c. it is probable, he was in the mount of Olives, among the vines, when he ſpake that parable, it being his manner to preach from ſuch ſubjects as were at hand. Here alſo he delivered the diſcourſe and prayer recorded John xvi. xvii. Accordingly, when he prayed, ch. xvii. 1. it is ſaid he lifted up his eyes to heaven; a circumſtance which ſeems to imply, that he was then in the open air. His coming down from the mount of Olives is expreſſed indeed by the word ἐξελθὼν, John xviii. 1. which has led moſt 37 And he took with him Peter, and the two ſons of Zebedee, and began to be ſorrowful, and very heavy.

38 Then ſaith he unto them, My ſoul is exceeding ſorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here, and watch with me.

39 And he went a little farther, and fell on his face, and prayed, ſaying, O my Father, if it be poſſible, let this cup paſs from me: nevertheleſs, not as I will, but as thou wilt.

40 And he cometh unto the diſciples, and findeth them aſleep, and ſaith unto Peter, What, could ye not watch with me one hour?

41 Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the ſpirit indeed is willing, but the fleſh is weak.

42 He went away again the ſecond time, and prayed, ſaying, O my Father, if this cup may not paſs away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done.

43 And he came and found them aſleep again: for their eyes were heavy.

44 And he left them, and went away again, and prayed the third time, ſaying the ſame words.

45 Then cometh he to his diſciples, and ſaith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your reſt: behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of ſinners.

46 Riſe, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me.

47 And while he yet ſpake, lo, Judas one of the twelve came, and with him a great multitude with ſwords and ſtaves from the chief prieſts and elders of the people.

48 Now he that betrayed him, gave them

Ver. 37. Ch. iv. 21. John xii. 27.—V. 39. John xviii. 1, 2. Mark xiv. 36. Luke xxii. 42. Hebr. v. 7. John xii. 27. Ch. xx. 22.——V. 41. Mark xiii. 33. Epheſ. vi. 18.—V. 47. Mark xiv. 43. Luke xxii. 47. John xviii. 3.

readers to imagine, that by ſome accident or other they were hindered from leaving the houſe till then, notwithſtanding Jeſus had ordered them to ariſe and go away with him before he preached the conſolatory diſcourſe: The anſwer is, that ἐξῆλθε, being a general term, may be applied with propriety to one's going out of an incloſed field, or mount, as well as to his going out of an houſe; and though St. Luke ſeems to connect what happened in the mountain with the tranſactions in the gardens, ch. xxii. 39—41. omitting their going to Gethſemane from the mountain; it ſhould be conſidered that St. Matthew and St. Mark mention it particularly, and that the difficulty ariſing from St. Luke's connection is no greater, on ſuppoſition that Gethſemane was in the valley at the foot of the mountain, than on ſuppoſition that it was in the mountain itſelf. The truth is, there are many inſtances of this kind of connection to be met with in the Goſpels. It may be allowed then that Jeſus came down from the mount of Olives with his diſciples, croſſed the brook Cedron, which ran through the valley, and ſo entered the garden of Gethſemane, which therefore lay between the brook Cedron and the city: Probably it belonged to ſome of the country-ſeats, with which the fields round the metropolis were beautified. The word Gethſemane in Hebrew ſignifies the valley of fatneſs. The garden probably had its name from its ſoil and ſituation; with ſome peculiar reference whereto, ſome have rendered it, torcular olei,—a vat of oil. See Iſai. lx. 3. Macknight, and Univ. Hiſt. vol. 10. It deſerves to be remarked, that the words which our Saviour here uſes to his diſciples, are the words of Abraham to his ſervants, when he went to offer up Iſaac, the great type of our Redeemer. See Gen. xx. 5. in the LXX.

Ver. 37. He took with him Peter, &c.] Theſe diſciples were admitted to the moſt ſtriking circumſtances of our Lord's conduct: They were preſent when he raiſed Jairus's daughter; they were preſent at his transfiguration; and were now made witneſſes of his agony, the reſt of his diſciples being left at the entrance of the garden, to watch the approach of Judas and his company. See the note on ch. xvii. 1.

Ver. 38. My ſoul is exceeding ſorrowful] The words uſed here, and in the latter part of ver. 37. by our tranſlators, are very flat, and fall extremely ſhort of the emphaſis of thoſe terms in which the Evangeliſt deſcribes this aweful ſcene; for λυπεῖσθαι, rendered, to be ſorrowful, ſignifies, to be penetrated with the moſt lively and piercing ſorrow, and ἀδημονεῖν, rendered, to be very heavy, ſignifies to be quite depreſſed, and almoſt overwhelmed with the load. St. Mark expreſſes it, if poſſible, in a more forcible manner; for ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι, ch. xiv. 33. imports the moſt ſhocking mixture of terror and amazement; and περίλυπος, exceeding ſorrowful, in this verſe intimates, that he was ſurrounded with ſorrow on every ſide, ſo that it broke in upon him with ſuch violence, that, humanly ſpeaking, there was no way to eſcape. Dr. Doddridge tranſlates and paraphraſes the paſſage thus: "He began to be in a very great and viſible dejection, amazement, and anguiſh of mind, on account of ſome painful and dreadful ſenſations, which were then impreſſed upon his ſoul by the immediate hand of God. Then turning to his three diſciples, he ſays to them, My ſoul is ſurrounded on all ſides, with an extremity of anguiſh and ſorrow, which tortures me even almoſt unto death; and I know that the infirmity of human nature muſt quickly ſink under it, without ſome extraordinary relief from God: While therefore I apply to him, do you continue here, and watch:"—And had they done this carefully, they would ſoon have found a rich equivalent for their watchfulneſs in the eminent improvement of their graces, by this wonderful and inſtructive ſight. Dr. More truly obſerves, that Chriſt's continued reſolution, in the midſt of theſe agonies and ſupernatural horrors, was the moſt heroic that can be imagined, and far ſuperior to valour in ſingle combat, or in battle; where, in one caſe the ſpirit is raiſed by natural indignation, and in the other by the pomp of war, the ſound of martial muſic, the example of fellow-ſoldiers, &c. See More's Theological works, p. 38. and Pſ. cxvi. 3.

Ver. 39. And fell on his face] The human nature of our Lord being now burdened beyond meaſure, he found it neceſſary to retire and to pray, that if it was poſſible, or conſiſtent with the ſalvation of the world, he might be delivered from the ſufferings which were then lying on him; for, that it was not the fear of dying on the croſs, which made him ſpeak and pray in the manner here related, is evident from this conſideration, that to ſuppoſe it would be to degrade our Lord's character infinitely. Make his ſufferings as terrible as poſſible, cloath them with all the aggravating circumſtances imaginable, yet, if no more is included in them but the pains of death, for Jeſus,—whoſe human nature was ſtrengthened far beyond the natural pitch, by its union with the divine,—to have ſhrunk at the proſpect of it, would ſhew a weakneſs, to which many of his followers were ſtrangers, who encountered more terrible deaths without the leaſt emotion. Our Lord firſt kneeled and prayed, as St. Luke tells us, ch. xxii. 41. then, in the vehemence of his paſſion, he fell on his face, and ſpake the words recorded both by St. Matthew and St. Mark; in the mean time his prayer, though moſt fervent, was accompanied with expreſſions of the utmoſt reſignation. See Macknight, and Calmet.

Ver. 40, 41. And he cometh, &c.] It was now very late in the evening; for after ſupper, Chriſt had made his diſciples a long diſcourſe, from John, ch. xiv. to xvii. and beſides they were oppreſſed and ſtupified with ſorrow. See Luke xxii. 45. Our Lord ſpeaks to Peter in particular, who was ſo forward to boaſt that he would follow his maſter even unto death. Every one is apt to flatter himſelf, when he is out of danger, that he can eaſily withſtand temptations; but without a particular care and watchfulneſs, the paſſions are generally found to prevail over reaſon at the ſight of danger. Archbp. Tillotſon very juſtly and beautifully obſerves, that ſo gentle a rebuke, and ſo kind an apology as we read in theſe verſes, were the more remarkable, as our Lord's mind was now diſcompoſed with ſorrow, ſo that he muſt have had the deeper and tenderer ſenſe of the unkindneſs of his friends: And alas! how apt are we, in general, to think affliction an excuſe for peeviſhneſs, and how unlike are we to Chriſt in that thought, and how unkind to ourſelves, as well as our friends, to whom in ſuch circumſtances, with our beſt temper, we muſt be more troubleſome than we could wiſh. See L'Enfant, and Archbp. Tillotſon's ſermons, vol. 2.

Ver. 44. Saying the ſame words] It is plain, by comparing ver. 39, and 42. that the words were not intirely the ſame; and it is certain that λόγος often ſignifies matter; ſo that no more appears to be intended than that he prayed to the ſame purpoſe as before. The reader, by referring to Luke xxii. 43, 44. will find a more diſtinct account of this aſtoniſhing ſcene.

Ver. 45. Sleep on now, &c.] Dr. Waterland reads this interrogatively, Do you ſleep on ſtill, and take repoſe? See Luke xxii. 46. This is a reproof which very well agrees with ver. 40, 41. and the words following that paſſage. Into the hands of ſinners, means of the Gentiles, according to the ſtile of the Hebrews, (See Gal. ii. 15. Heb. xii. 3.) of which ſort were the ſoldiers whom Judas brought along with him, John xviii. 3.

Ver. 38. He that betrayed him, gave them a ſign] The ſoldiers having perhaps never ſeen Jeſus before, and it being now night, and there

a ſign, ſaying, Whomſoever I ſhall kiſs, that ſame is he: hold him faſt.

49 And forthwith he came to Jeſus, and ſaid, Hail, maſter; and kiſſed him.

50 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Friend, wherefore art thou come? Then came they and laid hands on Jeſus, and took him.

51 And behold, one of them which were with Jeſus, ſtretched out his hand, and drew his ſword, and ſtruck a ſervant of the high prieſt's, and ſmote off his ear.

52 Then ſaid Jeſus unto him, Put up again thy ſword into his place: for all they that take the ſword, ſhall periſh with the ſword.

53 Thinkeſt thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he ſhall preſently give me more than twelve legions of angels?

54 But how then ſhall the ſcriptures be fulfilled, that thus it muſt be?

55 In that ſame hour ſaid Jeſus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as againſt a thief, with ſwords and ſtaves for to take me? I ſat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me.

56 But all this was done, that the ſcriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the diſciples forſook him, and fled.

57 And they that had laid hold on Jeſus, led him away to Caiaphas the high prieſt, where the ſcribes and the elders were aſſembled.

58 But Peter followed him afar off, unto the high-prieſt's palace, and went in, and ſat with the ſervants to ſee the end.

59 Now the chief prieſts and elders, and there being twelve perſons together, probably dreſſed much alike, Judas found it neceſſary to point him out to them by ſome ſuch ſign as this. It was a Jewiſh cuſtom, after a long abſence, or at departing from each other, to make uſe of the ceremony of a kiſs. They uſed it likewiſe as a ſign of affection to their equals, and as a mark of homage and reverence to their ſuperiors. See Pſalm ii. 12. Luke vii. 45. It is very probable that our Lord, in great condeſcenſion, had uſed, agreeably to this cuſtom, to permit his diſciples thus to ſalute him, when they returned to him, after having been any time abſent. One would be apt to believe, from the precaution which gives Judas at the end of the verſe, hold him faſt, that he might ſuſpect Chriſt would on this occaſion renew the miracles he had formerly wrought for his own deliverance; (comp. Luke iv. 30. John viii. 59. x. 39.) though he had ſo expreſly declared the contrary, ver. 24.

Ver. 50. Friend, wherefore art thou come?] The heroic behaviour of the bleſſed Jeſus, in the whole period of his ſufferings, will be obſerved by every attentive eye, and felt by every pious heart; although the ſacred hiſtorians, according to their uſual but wonderful ſimplicity, make no encomiums upon it. With what compoſure does he go forth to meet the traitor! With what compoſure receive that malignant kiſs! with what dignity does he deliver himſelf into the hands of his enemies! yet plainly ſhewing his ſuperiority over them, and even then leading as it were captivity captive. See Bp. Hall's Contemplations on the ſubject.

Ver. 51—53. And behold one of them—drew his ſword] None of the Evangeliſts but John (ch. xviii. 10.) mentions the name of Peter on this occaſion, which perhaps the others omitted, leſt it ſhould expoſe him to any proſecution. But John writing long after his death, needed no ſuch precaution. Janſenius juſtly obſerves, that it was a remarkable inſtance of the power of Chriſt over the ſpirits of men, that they ſo far obeyed his word, as not to ſeize Peter when he had cut off the ear of Malchus, or John while he ſtood by the croſs, though they muſt know them to have been of the number of his moſt intimate Aſſociates. One would have thought, as Bp. Hall remarks, that Peter ſhould rather have ſtruck Judas; but the traitor perhaps, on giving the ſignal, had mingled with the croud; or Peter might not underſtand the treacherous deſign of his kiſs, or ſeeing Malchus more eager than the reſt in his attack on Chriſt, he might poſtpone all other reſentments, to indulge the preſent ſalley of his indignation. Though this might ſeem a courageous action, it was really very imprudent; and had not Chriſt, by ſome ſecret influence, overawed their ſpirits, it is very probable that not only Peter, but the reſt of the Apoſtles, might have been cut to pieces. Accordingly our Saviour ordered him to ſheathe his ſword, telling him that his unſeaſonable and imprudent offence might prove the occaſion of his deſtruction; or rather, as Grotius interprets it, that there was no need of fighting in his defence, becauſe God would puniſh the Jews for putting him to death; ſee Rev. xiii. 10. where this very expreſſion is uſed, in predicting the deſtruction of the perſecutors of true Chriſtians. Our Lord told him further, that it implied both a diſtruſt of the divine Providence, which can always employ a variety of means for the ſafety of good men, and alſo a groſs ignorance of the Scriptures, ver. 53, 54. The legion was a Roman military term, and as the band which now ſurrounded them was a Roman cohort, our Lord might make uſe of this term by way of contraſt, to ſhew what an inconſiderable thing the cohort was, in compariſon of the force he could ſummon to his aſſiſtance;—more than twelve legions, not of ſoldiers, but of angels,—inſtead of twelve deſerting timorous diſciples. How dreadfully irreſiſtible would ſuch an army of angels have been, when one of theſe celeſtial ſpirits was able to deſtroy an hundred and eighty-five thouſand Aſſyrians at one ſtroke! See 2 Kings xix. 35. the note on ver. 56. and Milton's Par. Loſt, b. vi. ver. 219, &c. Inſtead of give me, ver. 53, Waterland reads, ſend to my aſſiſtance.

Ver. 56. But all this was done] Is done, Wat. and MS. This was a conſideration, which, if duly applied, might have prevented his diſciples from being offended at his ſufferings; and it ſtrongly intimates that he ſtill kept up the claim which he had formerly made of being the Meſſiah, and that what he was now to go through was ſo far from being at all inconſiſtent with that claim, that on the whole it was abſolutely neceſſary, in order to make it out to full ſatisfaction.

The diſciples ſeeing their maſter in the hands of his enemies, forſook him and fled, according to his prediction. Perhaps they were afraid that the action of Peter ſhould be imputed to them all, and might bring their lives into danger. But whatever they apprehended, their precipitate flight in theſe circumſtances was the baſeſt cowardice and ingratitude, conſidering not only how lately they had been warned of their danger, and what ſolemn promiſes they had all made of a courageous adherence to Chriſt, but alſo what an agony they had juſt ſeen him in, what zeal he had a few moments before ſhewn in their defence, and what amazing power he had exerted to terrify his enemies into a compliance with that part of his demand which related to the ſafety of his friends. He had alſo at the ſame time intimated his purpoſe of giving them a ſpeedy and kind diſmiſſion; ſee John xviii. 8. So that it was very indecent thus to run away without him, eſpecially as Chriſt's prophecy of their continued uſefulneſs in his church was equivalent to a promiſe of their preſervation, whatever danger they might now meet with. But our Lord probably permitted it, that we might learn not to depend too confidently even on the friendſhip of the beſt of men. See Doddridge and Macknight.

Ver. 57. Led him away to Caiaphas] It appears from John xviii. 13. that Jeſus was firſt led to Annas, becauſe he was the father-in-law of Caiaphas; beſides that, having been himſelf a high prieſt, and very much concerned in this whole matter, it was but natural that he ſhould have this honour done him. St. Matthew makes no mention of Annas, becauſe nothing remarkable happened at his houſe, Jeſus Chriſt having ſtaid there no longer than what was juſt neceſſary to acquaint the council that they were going to lead him to Caiaphas.

Ver. 58. But Peter] And Peter. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 59, 60. Now—the council ſought falſe witneſs] Falſe evidence, Wat. When the council found that Jeſus declined anſwering the queſtion, whereby they would have drawn from him an acknowledgment of his being the Meſſiah, (ſee John xviii. 18, 19, &c.) they examined many witneſſes to prove his having aſſumed that character; for by what afterwards happened, it appears, that they conſidered ſuch a pretenſion as blaſphemy in his mouth, who, being nothing but a man, as they ſuppoſed, could not, without affronting the majeſty of God, take the title of God's Son, which of right belonged to the Meſſiah. In examining the witneſſes, they acted like intereſted and enraged perſecutors, rather than impartial judges; for they formed the queſtions after ſuch a manner, as if poſſible to draw from them expreſſions which they might pervert into grounds of guilt, whereupon they might condemn Jeſus. But notwithſtanding they were at the utmoſt pains to procure ſuch a proof, as in the eye of the law would juſtify the ſentence they were reſolved at all hazards to paſs upon Jeſus, they exerted themſelves to no purpoſe. As this was a great proof of Chriſt's innocence (for otherwiſe his confederates might have been glad to purchaſe their own ſecurity by impeaching him,) ſo it is a ſingular inſtance of the power of God over mens minds, that for all the rewards theſe great men could offer, no two conſiſtent witneſſes, could be procured to charge Jeſus with any groſs crimes. Poſſibly the exertion of his miraculous power, in ſtriking to the ground thoſe who were moſt forward to ſeize him, might intimidate the ſpirits of ſome, who might otherwiſe have been prevailed upon. See John xviii. 6.

all the council, ſought falſe witneſs againſt Jeſus, to put him to death;

60 But found none: yea, though many falſe witneſſes came, yet found they none. At the laſt came two falſe witneſſes, 61 And ſaid, This fellow ſaid, I am able to deſtroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days.

62 And the high prieſt aroſe, and ſaid unto him, Anſwereſt thou nothing? what is it which theſe witneſs againſt thee?

63 But Jeſus held his peace. And the high prieſt anſwered and ſaid unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us, whether thou be the Chriſt the ſon of God.

64 Jeſus ſaith unto him, Thou haſt ſaid: neverthe leſs, I ſay unto you, Hereafter ſhall ye ſee the Son of man ſitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

65 Then the high prieſt rent his clothes, ſaying, He hath ſpoken blaſphemy; what further need have we of witneſſes? behold, now ye have heard his blaſphemy.

66 What think ye? They anſwered and ſaid, He is guilty of death.

67 Then did they ſpit in his face, and buffeted him; and others ſmote him with the palms of their hands, 68 Saying, Propheſy unto us, thou Chriſt; Who is he that ſmote thee?

69 Now Peter ſat without in the palace: and a damſel came unto him, ſaying, Thou alſo waſt with Jeſus of Galilee.

Ver, 60, 61. At the laſt came two falſe witneſſes] St. Mark, ch. xiv. 15. tells us, that theſe falſe witneſſes alledged, that Jeſus Chriſt had ſaid, I will deſtroy this temple made with hands. Now it is in the addition of theſe laſt words that their falſe teſtimony conſiſts, becauſe it reſtrains to the temple of Jeruſalem the expreſſion of Jeſus, which might otherwiſe be underſtood both of that temple, and of his body, and which indeed he meant of the latter. Beſides, our Lord had not ſaid I will deſtroy, but do you deſtroy this temple. See John ii. 9. The witneſſes, it ſeems, either through ignorance, or more probably through malice, perverted his anſwer into an affirmation, that he was able to deſtroy and build the temple in three days; and the judges reckoned it blaſphemy, becauſe it was an effect that could be accompliſhed by nothing leſs than divine power; wherefore theſe men are juſtly branded through the world with the name of falſe witneſſes, and their teſtimony was deſervedly diſregarded by our Lord, eſpecially as they had expreſſed great ill-will to him in giving it, contrary to the rules of equity and goodneſs.—This fellow, ſaid they, contemptuouſly. This is one inſtance, among many others, in which the bow of malice has been broken by overſtraining it, and innocence cleared up by the very extravagance of thoſe charges which have been advanced againſt it. It is obſervable, that the words which they thus miſrepreſented were ſpoken by Chriſt at leaſt three years before. Their going back ſo far to find matter for the charge they brought, was a glorious though ſilent atteſtation of the unexceptionable manner in which our Lord had behaved himſelf, during all the courſe of his public miniſtry. See Doddridge, Macknight, L'Enfant.

Ver. 62, 63. The high-prieſt aroſe, &c.] When the high-prieſt found that Jeſus took little notice of the things which the witneſſes ſaid againſt him, he fell into a paſſion, ſuppoſing that Chriſt intended to put an affront upon the council. For he aroſe from his ſeat, which judges ſeldom do, unleſs when in ſome perturbation, and ſpake to him, deſiring him to give the reaſon of his conduct. The rabbis ſay, that a judge ſtands up only when he hears witneſſes depoſing that ſome perſon hath blaſphemed. But the high-prieſt finding this in vain, in order to cut the trial ſhort, and enſnare Jeſus, he adjured or called upon him to anſwer upon oath, whether he were the Chriſt. It appears from comparing Exod. xxii. 11. Levit. v. 1. and Prov. xxix. 24. xxx. 9. that the Jewiſh high-prieſts had the power of adminiſtring that oath, which laid the perſon adjured under the neceſſity of giving an explicit anſwer, and of ſpeaking the whole truth without diſguiſe. The craft of the queſtion put to our Lord, lay in this, that if he anſwered in the affirmative, they were ready to condemn him as a blaſphemer; but if in the negative, they propoſed to puniſh him as an impoſtor, who, by accepting the honours and titles of the Meſſiah from the people, had deceived them.

Ver. 64. Jeſus ſaith unto him, Thou haſt ſaid] Our Lord would not vouchſafe to give an anſwer to ſo frivolous an accuſation as was that brought againſt him, ver. 61. But when he is called upon to acknowledge ſo important a truth as that contained in this verſe, a truth, which he came to reveal to the world, and for the maintaining of which he ventured the loſs of his life, then he ſpeaks boldly and openly. Hereafter ye ſhall ſee, &c. means, "You ſhall ſee the ſign from heaven which you have ſo often demanded in confirmation of my miſſion." Heinſius would have the words 'Απ' ἄρτι, rendered hereafter, joined together, ſo as to make απαρτι, the ſame with απηρτισμενως, truly, expreſly. Moreover I ſay unto you expreſly, you ſhall ſee, &c. By the right hand of power or greatneſs, is meant the right-hand of God, who by the Jews is called power, as Dr. Whitby has fully proved. There is a plain reference here to the view in which the Son of man is repreſented, Dan. vii. 13, 14. where he is ſaid to come in the clouds of heaven—to receive a dominion, &c. Our Lord looked very unlike that perſon now; but nothing could be more aweful, majeſtic and becoming, than ſuch an admonition in theſe circumſtances. The ſending down of the Holy Ghoſt, the wonderful progreſs of the goſpel, the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, of the temple, and of the Jewiſh ſtate, were unqueſtionable proofs and demonſtrations, ſhewn forth by Jeſus Chriſt, of the infinite power wherewith he was inveſted at the right-hand of God.

Ver. 65. Then the high-prieſt rent his clothes] Though the high-prieſt was forbidden to rend his clothes in ſome caſes, when others were allowed to do it, (Levit. x. 6. xxi. 10.) yet in caſe of blaſphemy or any public calamity, it was thought allowable. See 2 Kings xix. 1. 1 Macc. xi. 71. and Joſephus, War, b. 2. chap. 15. Caiaphas therefore by this action, expreſſed in the ſtrongeſt and moſt artful manner, his horror at hearing ſo vile a wretch, as he pretended Jeſus was, thus claiming the ſovereignty over Iſrael, and a ſeat at the right-hand of God, and this when adjured upon oath on ſo ſolemn an occaſion. That the high-prieſt was clothed in ordinary apparel on this occaſion, appears from Exod. xxix. 29, 30. where the pontifical garments are ordered to deſcend from father to ſon, and therefore were to be worn only at their conſecration, and when they miniſtered.

Ver. 66. He is guilty of death.] He deſerves, or is worthy of death. Wat. and MSS.

Ver. 67, 68. Then did they ſpit in his face] Spitting in the face was the greateſt contempt and diſgrace which could poſſibly be ſhewn. See Numb. xii. 14. Buffeting, or ſtriking with the fiſt on the temples, was eſteemed one of the moſt diſgraceful puniſhments by the Greeks, from whom the Romans might have adopted it: ſmiting with the open palms of their hands, was eſteemed ſuch a diſhonour, as none but a ſlave ought to endure. See Luke xxii. 64. Iſa. i. 6. and liii. 3, 7. Becauſe St. Matthew ſays, that they who condemned Jeſus, ſpit in his face and buffeted him, and St. Mark, ch. xiv. 65. mentions the indignities in particular which the ſervants put upon him,—it appears that he was ſmitten, blind-folded and buffeted, even by ſome of the council; who, to ridicule him for having pretended to be the great prophet foretold by Moſes, bade him, ſarcaſtically, to exerciſe his prophetical gifts in gueſſing who it was that ſmote him. Propheſy unto us, thou Chriſt, who is he that ſmote thee? The word rendered propheſy, ſignifies not only to fortel things that are future, but alſo to diſcover any thing obſcure or beyond the reach of uninſpired nature. It was hardly poſſible for theſe miſcreants to invent any thing more expreſſive of the contempt in which they held our Lord's pretenſions to the Meſſiahſhip. Thus was the judge of the world, placed at the bar of his own creatures; falſely accuſed by the witneſſes, unjuſtly condemned by his judges, and barbarouſly inſulted by all! Yet, becauſe it was agreeable to the end of his coming, he patiently ſubmitted, though he could with a frown have made his judges, his accuſers, and thoſe who had him in cuſtody, all to drop down dead in a moment, or ſink into nothing! See Macknight, Grotius, Wetſtein.

Ver. 69. Now Peter ſat without] Our Lord's trial in the high-prieſt's palace, and Peter's denying him, being cotemporary events, might be related the one before the other, according to the hiſtorian's pleaſure. St. Matthew and St. Mark deſcribe the trial firſt, becauſe it is a principal fact. But St. Luke brings it in after the denials. St. John has preſerved the exact and natural order; for he begins with the firſt denial, becauſe it happened immediately after Peter entered the palace; then gives the hiſtory of the trial as the principal fact, and concludes with the ſubſequent denials. The apoſtles, no doubt, were in great conſternation when their maſter was apprehended, as appears from their forſaking him. Some of them, however, recovering out of the panick that had ſeized them, followed the band at a diſtance, to ſee what the end would be: Of this number was Peter, and another diſciple, whom John has mentioned, without giving his name, and who therefore is generally ſuppoſed to have been 70 But he denied before them all, ſaying, I know not what thou ſayeſt.

71 And when he was gone out into the porch, another maid ſaw him, and ſaid unto them that were there, This fellow was alſo with Jeſus of Nazareth.

72 And again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man.

73 And after a while came unto him they that ſtood by, and ſaid to Peter, Surely thou alſo art one of them; for thy ſpeech bewrayeth thee.

74 Then began he to curſe and to ſwear, ſaying, I know not the man. And immediately the cock crew.

75 And Peter remembered the word of

been John himſelf, it being the manner of this Evangeliſt to ſpeak of himſelf in the third perſon. See John xiii. 23. xxi. 20. St. Matthew and St. Mark ſeem to differ in the account which they give of the place where Peter firſt denied his maſter. St. Matthew ſays, Peter ſat without in the palace; St. Mark, ch. xiv. 66. ſays this denial happened as Peter was beneath in the palace. It appears from John xviii. 25. that Peter was with the ſervants at the fire, when he denied his maſter the third time; and from Luke xxii. 61, that Jeſus looked upon Peter, juſt as he was pronouncing the words of the third denial. Our Lord, therefore, and his diſciples were not the one in the court, and the other in the veſtibule of the palace, during his trial, as ſome have ſuppoſed; but they were together in one room, Jeſus with his judges at the upper end of it, and Peter with the ſervants at the fire at the other end. According to this diſpoſition Peter might be ſaid to have been without in the hall, i. e. without, in relation to the croud of judges, witneſſes, and ſoldiers, around Jeſus; but in relation to the place where the council ſat, he was beneath in the hall, in the lower part of it; a way of ſpeaking common even in our own language. Further John, ver. 18. ſays, that Peter after the firſt denial ſtood with the officers at the fire; whereas St. Matthew and St. Luke tell us, that when he firſt denied his maſter, he ſat by the fire. It ſeems the maid's words had put him into ſuch confuſion, that before he anſwered her, he aroſe from the ſeat, which the ſervants had given him at his firſt coming in. We learn from St. John, that the damſel who attacked Peter, was ſhe who kept the door; it ſeems after having admitted him, ſhe followed him to the fire, and ſpoke to him in an angry tone, having been informed that it was he who had cut off her fellow ſervant's ear. See John xviii. 17, 26. Thou alſo waſt with Jeſus, means, when he was apprehended in the garden; to be with, ſignifies ſometimes to be a diſciple. The woman probably, either had ſome knowledge of Peter before, or was informed by John, or ſome of thoſe who had been in the garden, that he was one of Chriſt's friends. See ver. 73. The word Galilee is added by way of diſtinction, Jeſus being a very common name at this time. See Macknight, Grotius, Doddridge.

Ver. 71. When he was gone out into the porch] St. Matthew and St. Mark ſay it was a woman that attacked Peter in the porch; St. Luke ſays it was a man; and Grotius, to reconcile the evangeliſts, hath ſhewn that the Greek word Ανθρωπος, ſignifies both man and woman, as homo does in the Latin. But without having recourſe to this criticiſm, which appears rather too nice, it is natural and eaſy to ſuppoſe, that the apoſtle was accoſted in the porch both by a woman and a man; the former mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark, the latter by St. Luke. The word προαυλιον, rendered porch, anſwers moſt exactly to the Latin word veſtibulum, by which many good interpreters render it. And conſidering the magnificence of the Jewiſh buildings at this time, it is reaſonable to conclude, that this which belonged to the high-prieſt's palace, was ſome ſtately piazza or colonnade, and therefore the word would be better rendered portico. The Jews gave our Lord the appellation of Jeſus of Nazareth, to ſhew that they looked upon him as an impoſtor, who was neither a prophet nor the Meſſiah, and that they held him in the greateſt contempt; and in that view the modern Jews give him the ſame appellation.

Ver. 72. And again he denied, with an oath] To his denial he now added perjury. Jeſus was ſo public a perſon, and ſo well known to thouſands, not at all in his intereſt, that this additional falſhood, I do not know the man, was moſt unneceſſary; and—as it frequently happens, when people allow themſelves to tranſgreſs the bounds of truth,—it was more likely to entangle and diſcover him, than to clear him. Dr. Clarke conjectures, that Peter was ſuffered to fall fouler than any of the reſt of the apoſtles, except Judas the traitor, and to make more remarkable miſtakes in his conduct, that we might thus be cautioned againſt that extravagant regard which would afterwards be demanded, to him and his pretended ſucceſſors. How muſt theſe people, before whom Peter denied his Lord, be ſurprized, when they ſaw, as no doubt ſome of them did, this timorous diſciple, within the compaſs of a few weeks, when he was brought with John before the council, not only maintaining the cauſe and honour of Jeſus, but boldly charging the murder of this prince of life upon the chief men of the nation, and ſolemnly warning them of their guilt and danger in conſequence of it! See Acts iv. 5, 12. Perhaps when it is ſaid there, ver. 13. that they took knowledge of Peter and John, that they had been with Jeſus, the meaning may be, that ſome of them or their attendants remembered Peter and John, as the two perſons who had followed Jeſus thus far, when the reſt had forſaken him. See John xviii. 15, 86. Doddridge, and Clarke's 17 Sermons, p. 236.

Ver. 73, 74. And after a while came, &c.] The words of Malchus's kinſman, (ſee John xviii. 26.) bringing to Peter's remembrance what he had done to that ſlave, threw him into ſuch a pannic, that when thoſe who ſtood by repeated the charge, he impudently denied it. When the ſervants at the fire heard Peter deny the charge which John has mentioned, they drew near, and ſupported the argument drawn from the accent with which he had pronounced his anſwer. We are told by the Jews, that the Galileans had a clowniſh and uncouth way of ſpeaking, for which they were ridiculed by the inhabitants of Judea; and as the Galileans were generally ſuſpected of being diſciples of Jeſus, Peter's having the Galilean accent is therefore urged as a ſtrong preſumption that he was one of the diſciples of Jeſus. Thus preſſed on all ſides, to give his lie the better colour, he profaned the name of God by ſwearing and wiſhing the bittereſt curſes on himſelf, (for ſuch is the force of the original) if he was telling a falſhood. Perhaps he hoped by theſe acts of impiety to convince them effectually indeed, that he was not the diſciple of the holy Jeſus. All the evangeliſts agree, that the cock crew immediately after Peter pronounced the words of the third denial, which they themſelves have related: but upon comparing the things ſaid when this third attack was made, it appears that the ſpeeches at leaſt which John hath recorded, did not come from the perſons mentioned by the other evangeliſts; wherefore the third denial was occaſioned by different attacks made in ſucceſſion; unleſs the men ſpoke all at once, which is not very probable. It is more natural to think, that when Peter denied his maſter to them who firſt attacked him, the others who ſtood by ſupported the charge with an argument drawn from his accent in ſpeaking, which proved him to be a Galilean. However, as in either caſe the ſucceſſion of his anſwers muſt have been very quick, the veracity of the evangeliſts remaineth unſhaken, becauſe thus the cock crew immediately after Peter pronounced the words which they have ſeverally related. To this part of the hiſtory it has been objected, that the Jews, as their tradition goes, never kept any cocks within the walls of Jeruſalem, and conſequently that Peter could not hear them crow, while he was in the high-prieſt's palace; but the objection may be removed either by calling the tradition itſelf in queſtion, becauſe it contradicts the teſtimony of writers whoſe veracity is indubitable, and who could not but know the cuſtoms of the age in which they lived; and becauſe many traditions of this kind were framed by the rabbis, with a view to magnify the ſanctity of Jeruſalem. Or the objection may be removed by ſuppoſing, that the Romans who lived in the city, neglecting the inſtitutions of the Jews, might keep this kind of fowl about their houſes, perhaps for their table, or for the auſpices, a ſort of divination they were peculiarly addicted to. See Macknight.

Ver. 75. And Peter remembered the words of Jeſus, which ſaid, &c.] Who had ſaid, &c. Wat. and MSS. See Luke xxii. 61. where the remarkably beautiful circumſtance of Chriſt's turning and looking upon Peter is recorded: ſee alſo Mark xiv. 72. Hence we learn, that St. Peter denied his maſter three different times, and with oaths, forgetting the vehement proteſtations he had made a few hours before. He was permitted to fall in this manner, to teach mankind two leſſons: firſt, that whatever a perſon's attainments may have been formerly, if once he paſſes the bounds of innocence, he commonly proceeds from bad to worſe, one ſin naturally drawing on another; for which reaſon, the very leaſt appearances of evil are to be dreaded, and the greateſt humility and ſelf-diffidence maintained. In the ſecond place, the goodneſs wherewith Jeſus treated his fallen apoſtle, teaches us, that no ſinner whatever needs deſpair of mercy, who truly repents. But I forbear any R*eflections* on the fall and repentance of St. Peter, poſtponing them to one of the following evangeliſts, and referring the reader mean time to the excellent Diſcourſes of Bp. Sherlocke, vol. ii. p. 369, and of Dr. Foſter, vol. i. p. 379, 4to. inſerting here, according to promiſe, REFLECTIONS ON THE CHARACTER AND CONDUCT OF JUDAS ISCARIOT.

The treachery of Judas Iſcariot, in betraying his maſter, muſt raiſe the aſtoniſhment of every reader, who has any juſt notion of our Lord's character. Wherefore, the motives ſwaying him to be guilty of ſuch an atrocious crime, and the circumſtances which attended it, deſerve a particular conſideration.

Some are of opinion, that he was incited to commit this villainy by his reſentment of the rebuke which Jeſus gave him, for blaming the woman who came with the precious ointment. But though this may have had its weight with him, it could hardly be the only motive; ſince the rebuke was not levelled againſt him ſingly, but was directed alſo to the reſt, who had been equally forward with him in cenſuring the woman, and who, being rebuked at the ſame time, muſt have kept him in countenance. Beſides, though he had been rebuked alone, it can hardly be ſuppoſed that ſo mild a reproof would provoke any perſon, how wicked ſoever, to the horrid act of murdering his friend; much leſs Judas,—whoſe covetouſneſs muſt have diſpoſed him to bear every thing at the hand of his maſter, from Jeſus, which ſaid unto him, Before the cock crow, thou ſhalt deny me thrice. And he went out, and wept bitterly.

CHAP. XXVII.

Chriſt is delivered bound to Pilate. Judas hangeth himſelf. Pilate admoniſhed by his wife, waſheth his hands, and looſeth Barabbas. Chriſt is crowned with thorns, crucified, reviled, dieth, and is buried: his ſepulchre is ſealed and watched.

Ver. 75. Ver. 34. Mark xiv. 30. John xiii. 38.

whom he expected great preferment If it is replied, that his reſentment was ſo great, as to hinder him from exerciſing his reaſon, and hurried him on precipitately; it ſhould be conſidered, that though he ſtruck the bargain with the prieſts a few hours after he was rebuked, yet almoſt two days paſſed before he fulfilled his bargain. Beſides, to impute this treachery to the ſudden impulſe of a ſtrong reſentment, is ſuch an alleviation of his crime, as ſeems inconſiſtent with the character given of it in ſcripture; where it is always repreſented in the blackeſt colours, and ſaid to merit the heavieſt puniſhment.

Others think that Judas betrayed his maſter out of covetouſneſs. But neither can this be admitted, if by covetouſneſs is underſtood an eager deſire of the reward given him by the prieſts: for the whole ſum was not in value above 3*l.* 10*s.* ſterling; a trifle, which the moſt covetous wretch cannot be ſuppoſed to have taken as an equivalent for the life of a friend, from whom he had the greateſt expectations of gain. The reader will ſee the ſtrength of this reaſon, when he calls to mind that all the diſciples believed the kingdom was inſtantly to be erected, and that, according to the notion which they entertained of it, each of them, but eſpecially the apoſtles, had the proſpect of being raiſed in a little time to immenſe riches. Beſides the ſcripture tell us, that Judas's predominant paſſion was covetouſneſs. He would not therefore be ſo inconſiſtent with himſelf, as when juſt on the point of reaping ſuch a reward of his ſervice, to throw all away for the trifling ſum above mentioned.

Others attribute Judas's perfidy to his doubting whether his maſter was the Meſſiah, and ſuppoſe that he betrayed him in a fit of deſpair. But of all the ſolutions, this is the worſt founded. For if Judas thought that his maſter was an impoſtor, he muſt have obſerved ſomething in his behaviour which led him to form ſuch an opinion of him; and in that caſe he certainly would have mentioned it to the chief-prieſts and elders, at the time that he made the bargain with them; which it is plain he did not, otherwiſe they would have put him in mind of it, when he came to them, and declared his remorſe for what he had done. Doubtleſs alſo they would have urged it againſt our Lord himſelf in the courſe of his trial, when they were at ſuch a loſs for witneſſes to prove their accuſations; and againſt the apoſtles afterwards, when they reproved them for preaching in Chriſt's name. Acts iv. 15. v. 27. · Farther, had Judas thought that his maſter was an impoſtor, and propoſed nothing by his treachery, but the price he put upon his life, how came he to ſell him for ſuch a trifle, when he well knew that the prieſts would have given him any ſum, rather than not have gotten him into their hands? To conclude this head, the ſuppoſition of Judas's believing that his maſter was an impoſtor, is directly confuted by the ſolemn declaration which he made to the prieſts, implying the deepeſt conviction of Chriſt's innocence, (ch. xxvii. 4.) I have ſinned, ſaid he, in betraying the innocent blood! It is alſo confuted by the remorſe which he felt for his crime when Jeſus was condemned; a remorſe, ſo bitter, that he was not able to bear it, but fled to a halter for relief.

Since Judas's treachery then proceeded from none of theſe motives mentioned, it may be aſked, what other motive can be aſſigned for his conduct? St. John tells us, that he was ſo covetous, as to ſteal money out of our Lord's bag. This account of him gives us reaſon to believe, that he firſt followed Jeſus with a view to the riches and other temporal advantages which he expected the Meſſiah's friends would enjoy. It likewiſe authoriſes us to think, that as he had hitherto reaped none of theſe advantages, he might grow impatient under the delay; and the more ſo, as Jeſus had of late diſcouraged all ambitious views among his diſciples, and neglected to embrace the opportunity of erecting his kingdom, which was offered by the multitude who accompanied him into Jeruſalem with Hoſannahs. His impatience, therefore, becoming exceſſive, put him upon the ſcheme of delivering his maſter into the hands of the council, thinking it the moſt proper method of obliging him to aſſume the dignity of Meſſiah, and conſequently of enabling him to reward his followers. For as this court was compoſed of the chief-prieſts, elders, and ſcribes, that is, the principal perſons belonging to the ſacerdotal order, the repreſentatives of the great families, and the doctors of the law, Judas did not doubt, but that Jeſus, when before ſuch an aſſembly, would prove his pretenſions to their full conviction, gain them over to his intereſts, and forthwith enter on his royal dignity. And though he could not but be ſenſible, that the meaſure which he took to bring this about, was very offenſive to his maſter, he might think that the ſucceſs of it would procure his pardon, and even recommend him to favour. In the mean time his project, however plauſible it might appear to one of his turn, was far from being free from difficulty: and therefore, while he revolved it in his own mind, many things might occur to ſtagger his reſolution. At length ſomething happened which urged him on. Thinking himſelf affronted by the rebuke which Jeſus had given him, in the matter of the laſt anointing, and that rebuke ſitting the heavier on him, as he had procured a former mark of his maſter's diſpleaſure by an imprudence of the like kind, he was provoked; and though his reſentment was not ſuch as could inſpire him with the horrid deſign of murdering his maſter, it impelled him to execute the reſolution he had formed of making him alter his meaſures. Riſing up therefore from table, he went ſtraightway into the city to the high-prieſt's palace, where he found the chief-prieſts and elders aſſembled, conſulting how they might take Jeſus by ſubtilty (ver. 4.). To them he made known his intention, and undertook for a ſmall ſum of money to conduct a band of armed men to the place where Jeſus uſually ſpent the nights, and where they might apprehend him without the danger of a tumult. Thus the devil, laying hold on the various paſſions which now agitated the traitor's breaſt, tempted him by them all.

That theſe were the views with which Judas acted in betraying his maſter, may be gathered firſt from the nature of the bargain which he ſtruck with the prieſts, ver. 15. What will ye give me, ſaid he, and I will deliver him unto you? He did not mean that he would deliver him up to be put to death. For though the prieſts had conſulted among themſelves how they might kill Jeſus, none of them had been ſo barefaced as to declare their intention publickly. They only propoſed to bring him to a trial, for having aſſumed the character of the Meſſiah, and to treat him as it ſhould appear he deſerved. The offer therefore which Judas made to them of delivering him up, was in conformity to their public reſolution. Nor did they underſtand it in any other: for had the prieſts thought that his deſign in this was to get Jeſus puniſhed with death, they muſt likewiſe have thought that he believed him to be an impoſtor; in which caſe they certainly would have produced him as one of their principal evidences, no perſon being more fit to bear witneſs againſt any criminal than his companion. Or, though Judas had repented before the trial came on, and had withdrawn himſelf, the prieſts might have argued with great plauſibility, both in their own court, and before the governor, that for a man's diſciple to require the judges to bring him to condign puniſhment, branded him with ſuch a ſuſpicion of guilt, as was almoſt equal to a full proof. Again, when Judas returned to them with the money, declaring that he had ſinned in betraying innocent blood, inſtead of replying (as they did ch. xxvii. 4.) what is that to us? ſee thou to that, it was the moſt natural thing in the world to have upbraided him with the ſtain he had put upon his maſter's character, by the bargain he had entered into with them. It is true, they called the money they gave him the price of blood (ch. xxvii. 6.) but they did not mean this in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, as they neither had hired Judas to aſſaſſinate his maſter, nor can be ſuppoſed to have charged themſelves with the guilt of murdering him. It was only the price of blood conſequentially, being the reward they had given to the traitor for putting it into their power to take away Chriſt's life, under the colour and form of public juſtice. Nay, it may be even doubted whether Judas aſked the money as a reward of his ſervice. He covetouſly indeed kept it, and the prieſts for that reaſon called it the price of blood; but he demanded it perhaps on pretence of gratifying and encouraging the people who were to aſſiſt him in apprehending Jeſus. To conclude, Judas knew that the rulers could not take away the life of any perſon whatſoever, the Romans having deprived them of that power, (John xviii. 31.) and therefore could have no deſign of this kind in delivering him up; not to mention that it was a common opinion among the Jews, that Meſſiah would never die (John xii. 34.;) an opinion which Judas might eaſily embrace, having ſeen his maſter raiſe ſeveral perſons from the dead, and among the reſt one who had been in the grave no leſs than four days.

That the traitor's intention in betraying his maſter was what has been above urged, is probable, ſecondly, from his hanging himſelf when he found him condemned, not by the governor, but by the council, whoſe prerogative it was to judge prophets. Had Judas propoſed to take away his maſter's life, the ſentence of condemnation paſſed upon him, inſtead of filling him with deſpair, muſt have gratified him, being the accompliſhment of his project; whereas the light wherein we have endeavoured to place his conduct ſhews this circumſtance to have been perfectly natural. Judas having been witneſs to the greateſt part of our Lord's miracles, and having experienced the certain truth of them in the powers which had been conferred upon himſelf, could never think that the council would have condemned him as a falſe Chriſt, far leſs as a blaſphemer. He knew him to be perfectly innocent, and expected that he would have wrought ſuch miracles before the council, as ſhould have conſtrained them to believe. Therefore, when he found that nothing of this kind was done, and that the prieſts had paſſed ſentence of condemnation upon him, and were carrying him to the governor to get it executed, he repented of his raſh and covetous project, came to the chief prieſts and elders, the perſons to whom he had betrayed him, offered them the money again, and ſolemnly declared the deepeſt conviction of his Maſter's innocence, hoping that they would have deſiſted from the proſecution; but they were obſtinate, and would not relent; upon which his remorſe aroſe to ſuch a pitch, that, unable

WHEN the morning was come, all the chief prieſts and elders of the people took counſel againſt Jeſus to put him to death.

2 And when they had bound him, they led him away, and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor.

3 Then Judas, which had betrayed him, when he ſaw that he was condemned, repented himſelf, and brought again the thirty pieces of ſilver to the chief prieſts and elders,

4 Saying, I have ſinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. And they ſaid, What is that to us? ſee thou to that.

5 And he caſt down the pieces of ſilver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himſelf.

6 And the chief prieſts took the ſilver pieces, and ſaid, It is not lawful for to put them into the treaſury, becauſe it is the price of blood.

7 And they took counſel, and bought with them the potters field, to bury ſtrangers in.

Ver. 1. Mark xv. 1. Luke xxii. 66. xxiii. 1. John xviii. 28.—V. 3. Ch. xxvi. xiv.—V. 5. Acts i. 18.

able to ſupport the torments of his conſcience, he went and hanged himſelf.

Thus it ſeems probable that the traitor's intention in delivering up his maſter was, to lay him under a neceſſity of proving his pretenſions before the grandees, whom he had hitherto ſhunned; thinking that if they had yielded, the whole nation would immediately have ſubmitted, and the diſciples have been raiſed ſorthwith to the ſummit of their expectations.

This account of Judas's conduct is by no means calculated to leſſen the foulneſs of his crime, which was the blackeſt imaginable. For, even in the light above-mentioned, it implied both an inſatiable avarice, and a wilful oppoſition to the counſels of Providence, and ſo rendered the actor of it a diſgrace to human nature. But it is calculated to ſet the credibility of the traitor's action in a proper light, and to ſhew that he was not moved to it by any thing ſuſpicious in the character of his Maſter; becauſe, according to this view of it, his perfidy, inſtead of implying that he entertained ſuſpicions of his maſter's integrity, plainly proves that he had the fulleſt conviction of his being the Meſſiah. And, to ſay the truth, it was not poſſible for any one, intimately acquainted with our Lord as Judas was, to judge otherwiſe of him; having ſeen his miracles, which were great and true beyond exception, and having experienced his power in the ability of working miracles, which, along with the reſt of the Apoſtles, he had received from him, and no doubt exerciſed with extraordinary pleaſure. However, as the motives of men's actions, at ſuch a diſtance of time, muſt needs be intricate, eſpecially where hiſtory is in a great meaſure ſilent concerning them, we ought to be very modeſt in our atttempt to unravel them: for which cauſe the above account of Judas's conduct is propoſed only as a conjecture worthy of farther inquiry. See Macknight,—a Treatiſe on "The character and conduct of Judas Iſcariot conſidered," and the notes on the next chapter.

Chap. XXVII. Ver. 1, 2. When the morning was come] The preceding tranſactions of this malignant night being over, as ſoon as the day dawned, the prieſts and elders having condemned Jeſus, reſolved to carry him, loaded with chains, before the governor, that he likewiſe might give ſentence againſt him: They could not otherwiſe accompliſh their purpoſe, the power of life and death being now taken out of their hands. From the hiſtory of the Acts it appears, that the Roman governors of Judea reſided commonly at Cæſarea, and that there was only an inferior officer in Jeruſalem, with a ſingle legion to keep the peace of the city. At the great feſtivals, however, they came up to ſuppreſs or prevent tumults, and to adminiſter juſtice; for the governors of provinces frequently viſited the principal towns under their juriſdiction on this latter account. See John xviii. 39. and Lardner's credibility, part i. b. 1. ch. Pilate was, properly ſpeaking, no more than procurator of Judea; but he was called governor, becauſe this name was better known, and becauſe Pilate diſcharged all the offices of a governor, namely, in taking cognizance of criminal cauſes, as his predeceſſors had done, and as was uſual with the procurators in the ſmaller provinces of the empire, where there were no proconſuls. See Joſeph. War, b. 2. and Tacitus, lib. xv. c. 44. Our Saviour ate the paſchal ſupper in the evening; then he went into the garden, where he was apprehended, and was in the high-prieſt's palace the reſt of the night. In the morning they hurry him away, bound with fetters, to the common magiſtrate.

Ver. 3. Then Judas—repented himſelf, &c.] St. Matthew introduces this account of the fate of Judas, as we ſee, immediately after the Jews had delivered Jeſus to Pilate; but after this, the Jews muſt have been ſo intent on perſuading Pilate to conſent to his death, that there was hardly time for the Sanhedrim's adjourning to the temple, where this occurrence happened, before they had prevailed with Pilate to condemn him; and as Judas muſt have often heard his maſter ſay that he ſhould be crucified, Pilate's order for his execution muſt have more ſenſibly affected him, than the Jews paſſing ſentence on him, as they had not then the power of putting any one to death; and therefore this event, moſt probably, happened immediately after the condemnation of Jeſus by Pilate. The word τοτε, then, with which the Evangeliſt begins this ſtory, may be taken in ſome latitude to introduce the mention of an occurrence which happened about that time, whether a little before or after, and need not be interpreted with ſo much rigour, as to determine it to an aſſertion of obſerving the exacteſt order in all circumſtances. See Doddridge, Gerhard, &c. Macknight, however, is of a different opinion; "Becauſe, ſays he, Judas caſt down this money in the temple, it is thought that the council adjourned thither, before they carried Jeſus to the governor, and that Judas found them there; but they were too much in earneſt to delay their revenge one moment; beſides, they had now no time to ſpend in the temple: He might come to the prieſts immediately after they had condemned his Maſter, while they were yet in the high-prieſt's palace; or he might accoſt them as they were paſſing along the ſtreet to the prætorium; or he might find them ſtanding before the prætorium, into which they would not enter, leſt they ſhould be defiled: This latter ſeems to be the true ſuppoſition; for the hiſtorian inſinuates, that Judas addreſſed the prieſts, after they had carried Jeſus to the governor. When they refuſed the money, he left them, and went to hang himſelf; but taking the temple in his way, he threw down the whole ſum in the treaſury, or that part of the women's court where the cheſts were placed for receiving the offerings of the people who came to worſhip. This money might be gathered up by the Levite porters, who always waited at the gates of the temple, (1 Chron. xxvi.) and might be carried by them to the prieſts, with an account how they got it.

Ver. 5. And went and hanged himſelf] When Judas found that he could not prevent the horrid effects of his treachery, his conſcience laſhed him more furiouſly than before, ſuggeſting thoughts, which by turns made the deepeſt wounds in his ſoul. His Maſter's innocence and benevolence, the uſefulneſs of his life, the favours he had received from him, with many other conſiderations, crowded into his mind, and racked him to ſuch a degree, that his torment became intolerable. Wherefore, unable to ſuſtain the miſery of thoſe agonizing paſſions and reflections, he makes a full confeſſion of his Maſter's innocence, returns the wages of iniquity, and goes and hangs himſelf. St. Peter ſeems to give a different account of the traitor's death:—Falling headlong, he burſt aſunder in the midſt, and all his bowels guſhed out, Acts i. 18. And to reconcile the two paſſages, Tobit iii. 10. is commonly brought to prove that the word ἀπήγξατο, in St. Matthew, may ſignify ſuffocation with grief, in conſequence of which a man's bowels may guſh out; and inſtances are cited from Virgil, eclogue vii. 27.

Invidia rumpantur ut ilia Codro.

And from Joſephus, Antiq. l. xv. c. 13. where one Zenodorus is is mentioned, who is ſuppoſed to have died in this manner. The Talmudiſts make ſuch a ſuffocation the puniſhment uſually inflicted by God, upon ſuch perſons as bore falſe witneſs againſt their neighbour. But as the above-quoted inſtances may be otherwiſe underſtood, it is more natural to ſuppoſe that Judas hanged himſelf on ſome tree growing out of a precipice, and that the branch breaking, or the knot of the rope wherewith he hanged himſelf opening, he fell down headlong, and daſhed himſelf to pieces, ſo that his bowels guſhed out. Peter's phraſe, ἐλάκησε μέσος, he burſt aſunder, favours this conjecture, for ληκεω ſignifies properly, lacero cum ſtrepitû, and ſo may imply that Judas burſt aſunder by falling from an height. See Le Clerc, Grotius, and Wetſtein. Thus periſhed Judas Iſcariot the traitor; a miſerable example of the fatal influence of covetouſneſs and worldly paſſions, and a ſtanding monument of the divine vengeance, fit to deter future generations from acting contrary to conſcience, through love of the world; for which this unhappy wretch betrayed his Maſter, Friend, and Saviour, and caſt away his own ſoul!

Ver. 6—8. The treaſury] Κορβαναν: The place where the gifts ſet apart for the ſervice of the temple, and other pious uſes, were depoſited, 2 Kings xii. 10. Mark xii. 41, 42. Such an offering as this price of blood would have been as much an abomination to the Lord, as the hire of a whore, or the price of a dog, Deut. xxiii. 18. The chief prieſts therefore determined to buy the potters field with it, for burying ſtrangers in; i. e. ſuch perſons, whether Jews or Gentiles, who, happening to die at Jeruſalem, had no burying-place of their own. Becauſe the deliberation of the prieſts concerning this matter, and their buying the potters field, had an immediate relation to Judas's treachery, St. Matthew very properly takes notice of it here, though the purchaſe might not have been made for ſome days, perhaps weeks or months, after the unhappy death of Judas. Thirty pieces of ſilver may ſeem a very inconſiderable price for a field ſo near Jeruſalem. But, as Grotius well obſerves, the ground was probably much ſpoiled by digging it up for earth to make potters veſſels;

8 Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood unto this day.

9 (Then was fulfilled that which was ſpoken by Jeremy the prophet, ſaying, And they took the thirty pieces of ſilver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Iſrael did value;

10 And gave them for the potters field, as the Lord appointed me.)

11 And Jeſus ſtood before the governor: and the governor aſked him, ſaying, Art thou the King of the Jews? And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Thou ſayeſt.

12 And when he was accuſed of the chief prieſts and elders, he anſwered nothing.

13 Then ſaid Pilate unto him, Heareſt thou not how many things they witneſs againſt thee?

14 And he anſwered him to never a word, inſomuch that the governor marvelled greatly.

15 Now at that feaſt the governor was wont to releaſe unto the people a priſoner, whom they would.

16 And they had then a notable priſoner, called Barabbas.

17 Therefore when they were gathered together, Pilate ſaid unto them, Whom will ye that I releaſe unto you? Barabbas, or Jeſus which is called Chriſt?

veſſels; ſo that it was now unfit for tillage or paſture, and conſequently of ſmall value. This field was called Aceldama, or the field of blood, becauſe it was bought with the money which Judas received for betraying his maſter's life. Providence ſeems to have ſet this name upon the field, to perpetuate the memory of the tranſaction: In St. Peter's ſpeech it is intimated that Judas made an acquiſition of this field; not as an eſtate, but as an eternal monument of infamy and diſgrace; for the people of thoſe times might be ſuppoſed to ſay, as they paſſed by, "This field was purchaſed with the money for which Judas ſold his Maſter." Some ancient authors have even ſuppoſed that this was the place where Judas hanged himſelf, and was buried. St. Jerome, who had been upon the ſpot, tells us, that they ſtill ſhewed this field in his time; that it lay ſouth of mount Sion, and that they buried there the pooreſt and meaneſt of the people. The hiſtorians mentioning the purchaſe of the potter's field, with the money for which Judas betrayed his Maſter, being an appeal to a very public tranſaction, puts the truth of this part of the hiſtory beyond all manner of exception.

Ver. 9, 10. [Then was fulfilled, &c.] I. Concerning this prophecy we muſt FIRST remark, that there is, by ſome means or other, a miſtake in the name of the prophet, not Jeremy, but Zachary, being the prophet in whoſe writings this paſſage is found. Some learned men have ſuppoſed, that there might have been ſuch a paſſage as this in ſome of Jeremiah's writings, which were extant in the Apoſtles times, but now are loſt; and indeed St. Jerome expreſly affirms, that theſe very words were read by him in an apocryphal book of the prophet Jeremy; and as we find in 2 Macc. ii. 1—9. many words ſpoken by the prophet Jeremy, which are not in the book of his prophecy, why might not theſe words alſo have been ſpoken by him, and kept in memory, or in ſome writing, till the time of Zechary? of whom it is obſervable, that he loved to uſe the words of Jeremiah, as appears on comparing many paſſages; whence the Jews uſed to ſay, that the ſpirit of Jeremiah was in Zechariah; and ſo both made but one prophet: And the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, and Mr. Mede think it highly probable, that Jeremiah wrote the 9th, 10th, and 11th chapters of Zechariah, in the laſt of which theſe words are found. Others aſſert, that, as the Jews place Jeremiah's prophecy firſt of of the ſixteen, the whole book of the prophets might be called by the ſingle name of Jeremiah; ſo that by quoting Jeremiah, the book of the prophets, or the collection of prophecies in general was quoted; juſt as by the Pſalms they meant the hagiographa, or the moral books of Scripture in general, becauſe the Pſalms were placed at the head of this collection. See Luke xxiv. 24. But it ſeems much more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, what might very eaſily have happened, that there is a ſmall miſtake of ſome early tranſcriber's pen, who, by the change of one letter only, as Bp. Hall ingeniouſly conjectures, might have written Jeremiah for Zechariah; ζȣ̃ for ιȣ̃; ſuppoſing the words to be contracted, as they are written in the Manuſcripts. But though the preſent reading is certainly very ancient, it appears to me very doubtful, whether any prophet's name was mentioned in the firſt copies, as the Syriac verſion, which is allowed to have been made in the moſt early times, reads only, which was ſpoken by the prophet; and St. Auſtin tells us, that in his time there were many Greek copies, in which no particular name of any prophet was inſerted. We may therefore well conclude, either that by the miſtake of ſome early tranſcriber, Jeremiah was written for Zechariah, (and how eaſy is it, in a large work, to miſtake in a letter—) or that the paſſage ſtood originally without any prophet's name, which was afterwards inſerted from ſome marginal remark, and ſo hath remained ever ſince Origen's time; a full proof, as it appears to me, not of what the enemies of Chriſtianity would object, but intirely to the contrary; namely, that the writings of the New Teſtament ſo far from being in any degree corrupted, have been preſerved with ſuch a ſcrupulous exactneſs, that the preſervers of them have not preſumed to alter a tittle even in the points of the leaſt conſequence, and where they might have been juſtified; a reflection of great importance, and of much comfort to every true believer in theſe ſacred books. II. Now ſecondly, with reſpect to the prophecy itſelf, we refer to the notes on Zech. xi. 13. St. Matthew does not quote intirely either from the Hebrew or the LXX, but rather gives the ſenſe than the exact words of the prophet; but by following the Syriac verſion, the paſſage may be tranſlated thus, more agreeably to the original: "I have received of the children thirty pieces of ſilver, the price of him that was valued, to buy the potter's field, as the Lord commanded me." Dr. Doddridge obſerves, "As for the general propriety of applying theſe words on this occaſion, I think it may well be vindicated; for the connection and ſenſe of the prophecy ſeems to be this: In order to repreſent to Zechariah the contempt which Iſrael put upon their God, he had a viſion to the following purpoſe: He thought God firſt appointed him to appear among them as a ſhepherd, making him, by that emblem, a repreſentation of himſelf. After ſome time he directs him to go to the rulers of Iſrael, and aſk them what they thought he deſerved for his labours in that office. They give him the price of a ſlave, thirty pieces of ſilver, and this in the houſe of the Lord, where the court ſat. On this, God, as reſenting this indignity offered to him in the perſon of his prophet, orders him to throw it down with diſdain before the firſt poor labourer he met,—who happened to be a potter at work by the temple gates,—as a fitter price for a little of his paltry ware, than a ſuitable acknowledgement of the favours they had received from God. Now ſurely, if there was ever any circumſtance in which the children of Iſrael behaved themſelves, ſo as to anſwer this viſionary repreſentation, it muſt be when they gave this very ſum of thirty pieces of ſilver, as a price for the very life of that perſon whom God had appointed their great Shepherd; and in order to point out the correſpondence more ſenſibly, Providence ſo ordered it, that the perſon to whom this money went, ſhould be a potter, though the prophecy would have been anſwered, if he had been a fuller, or of any other profeſſion. It may alſo be further obſerved, that God's ceaſing to be the Shepherd of Iſrael, which was repreſented by the prophet's breaking his paſtoral ſtaves, was never fully anſwered, till their final rejection after the death of Chriſt, which may further lead us to refer the affront of their giving the pieces of ſilver to this event. See Zechariah xi. and the Reflections on Acts i. Dr. Waterland, following Sir Norton Knatchbul, reads the paſſage, And I took the thirty pieces of ſilver, the price of him that was prized of the children of Iſrael: ver. 10. (and they gave them for the potter's field) as the Lord commanded me.

Ver. 11. And Jeſus ſtood, &c.] See John xviii. 29, &c. and Luke xxiii. 2. for a more full account of our Saviour's appearance before Pilate.

Ver. 14. And he anſwered him to never a word, &c.] Jeſus made no reply to the heavy charges laid againſt him; nay, he continued mute, notwithſtanding the governor expreſly required him to ſpeak in his own defence. See Iſaiah xxiii. 7. A conduct ſo extraordinary in ſuch circumſtances, aſtoniſhed Pilate exceedingly, for he had good reaſon to be perſuaded of Chriſt's innocence. Indeed, his humble appearance was a ſufficient refutation of the charge which the Jews brought againſt him, and his ſilence ſerved inſtead of the moſt elaborate defence; and poſſibly Jeſus might decline making any public defence, leſt the common people, moved by what he muſt have ſaid, ſhould have aſked his releaſe, and prevented his death; in which reſpect, he has ſhewn his followers a noble example of courage and ſubmiſſion to the divine will.

Ver. 15. Now at that feaſt, &c.] Pilate had already ſent Jeſus to Herod, having learned that he belonged to Galilee, and Herod had ſent him back to him. Luke xxiii. 6—9. At former paſſovers, the governor had courted the favour of the people, by gratifying them with the pardon of any one priſoner they pleaſed. There was no law to oblige him to this; but as acts of grace are generally popular things, this ſeems to have been firſt freely uſed by the Romans, to pleaſe their tributaries, and now by cuſtom was in a manner eſtabliſhed.

Ver. 16. A notable priſoner] A notorious criminal. Heylin. It ſeems he was the head of the rebels; (See John xviii. 40. Luke xxiii. 19, 25.) The ringleader of a ſedition, in which murder had been committed.

18 (For he knew that for envy they had delivered him.)

19 When he was ſet down on the judgement-ſeat, his wife ſent unto him, ſaying, Have thou nothing to do with that juſt man: for I have ſuffered many things this day in a dream, becauſe of him.

20 But the chief prieſts and elders perſuaded the multitude that they ſhould aſk Barabbas, and deſtroy Jeſus.

21 The governor anſwered and ſaid unto them, Whether of the twain will ye that I releaſe unto you? They ſaid, Barabbas.

22 Pilate ſaith unto them, What ſhall I do then with Jeſus, which is called Chriſt? They all ſay unto him, Let him be crucified.

23 And the governor ſaid, Why, what evil hath he done? But they cried out the more, ſaying, Let him be crucified.

24 When Pilate ſaw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and waſhed his hands before the multitude, ſaying, I am innocent of the blood of this juſt perſon: ſee ye to it.

25 Then anſwered all the people, and ſaid, His blood be on us, and on our children!

26 Then releaſed he Barabbas unto them: and when he had ſcourged Jeſus, he delivered him to be crucified.

27 Then the ſoldiers of the governor took Jeſus into the common hall, and gathered unto him the whole band of ſoldiers.

28 And they ſtripped him, and put on him a ſcarlet robe.

Ver. 18. (For he knew that for envy they had delivered him)] Pilate had probably heard of the ſtir made by the rulers on this occaſion, and as a prudent magiſtrate, could not but have inquired into the reaſon of it. The modeſty with which Jeſus appeared before him, muſt have given credit to the report he had received; and the confidence which Jeſus placed in his innocence, by not replying to any charge that was brought againſt him, might have been ſufficient to convince Pilate, that there was no fault in him. Nicodemus or Joſeph of Arimathea might have been conſulted by Pilate, at the firſt appearance of the tumult; for Joſeph of Arimathea moſt probably was perſonally acquainted with Pilate, as may be inferred from his going to him to beg the body of Jeſus. We can have no doubt of their being acquainted, if Joſeph was one of the council who aſſiſted Pilate in managing the affairs of his province, and particularly in judging cauſes. All governors of provinces had a council of this kind. Accordingly we find it mentioned, Acts xxv. 12. by the name of Συμβȣλιον. It is objected to Joſeph's being a member of Pilate's council, that it was compoſed of Romans only; yet even on this ſuppoſition he might be a member of it, ſince he might have enjoyed the privileges of a Roman citizen, as well as St. Paul. What other reaſon can be aſſigned for his being called βȣλευτης, a counſellor, Luke xxiii. 50. and an honourable counſellor? Mark xv. 43. a name not commonly given to the members of the ſanhedrim, whoſe proper title was αρχοντες, rulers. Further St. Luke tells us, ch. xxiii. 51. that Joſeph did not conſent to the counſel (βουλη) and deed of them; i. e. he did not agree to the advice which the governor's council gave, when they deſired him to gratify the Jews. See Macknight, Grotius, and Lardner's Credibility, b. i. ch. 2.

Ver. 19. When he was ſet down, &c.] While he was ſitting on, &c. Wat. and MS. While Rome was governed by a commonwealth, it was unuſual for the governors of provinces to take their wives with them; but afterwards it grew cuſtomary, and the motion made againſt it in the fourth year of Tiberius was rejected with ſome indignation. This circumſtance aſcertains the time of the event, and affords a ſtrong proof of the veracity of the ſacred hiſtorian. Poſſibly the word σήμερον rendered this day, may imply, that ſhe had dreamed theſe things that morning, ſince Pilate roſe; and as the heathens imagined thoſe dreams moſt ſignificant which came about break of day, ſhe might on that account lay the greater ſtreſs upon them. Janſenius thinks, and very probably, that ſhe had now a repreſentation or foreſight of thoſe calamities which afterwards befel Pilate and his family. Joſephus aſſures us, that Pilate having ſlain a conſiderable number of ſeditious Samaritans, was depoſed from his government by Vitellius, and ſent to Tiberius at Rome, who died before he arrived there. And Euſebius tells us, that quickly after, having been baniſhed to Vienne in Gaul, he laid violent hands upon himſelf, falling on his own ſword. Agrippa, who was an eye-witneſs to many of his enormities, ſpeaks of him in his oration to Caius Cæſar, as one who had been a man of the moſt infamous character. The words δικαιω εκεινω would be rendered more properly, that juſt or righteous one.

Ver. 23. Why, what evil hath he done?] So bent were the chief prieſts and elders to have Jeſus put to death, that though the governor urged them again and again to deſire his releaſe, declaring his innocence, and offering three ſeveral times to diſmiſs him, they would not hear him; to ſuch a pitch was their enmity carried againſt the Lord of life! They inſiſted upon his crucifixion, as the moſt ignominious death; they inſiſted upon his being ſentenced to this death by a Roman governor; and among the Romans it was inflicted only upon the vileſt of ſlaves. To have inflicted ſuch a puniſhment as this upon any free Jew, would probably have been ſufficient to have thrown the whole city and nation into an uproar. But now they were deaf to every thing but the clamour of paſſion; and in their madneſs forgot with how dangerous a precedent they might furniſh the Roman governor: and indeed it turned dreadfully on themſelves, when ſuch vaſt numbers of them were crucified for their oppoſition to the Romans during the time of their laſt war. See on ver. 25. and the Reflections on ch. xxiv.

Ver. 24. Pilate—took water, &c.] It is well known that the Jews in ſome caſes were appointed to waſh their hands, as a ſolemn token that they were not themſelves concerned in a murder committed by ſome unknown perſon. See Deut. xxi. 6—9. In alluſion to which law the Pſalmiſt ſays, I will waſh mine hands in innocency, i. e. in teſtimony of mine innocence. But as this was alſo a rite which was frequently uſed by the Gentiles in token of innocence, it is more probable that Pilate, who was a Gentile, did it in conformity to them. He thought poſſibly by this avowal of his reſolution to have no hand in the death of Chriſt, to have terrified the populace; for one of his underſtanding and education could not but be ſenſible that all the water in the univerſe was not able to waſh away the guilt of an unrighteous ſentence. The following lines of Ovid may be juſtly applied to Pilate:

> Ah nimium faciles, qui triſtia crimina cædis
> Fluminea tolli poſſe putetis aquâ! Faſt. l. ii. v. 45.

Ver. 25. His blood be on us, &c.] As this terrible imprecation was dreadfully anſwered in the ruin ſo quickly brought on the Jewiſh nation, and the calamities which have ſince purſued that wretched people, in almoſt all ages and countries, ſo it was peculiarly illuſtrated in the ſeverity with which Titus, merciful as he naturally was, treated the Jews whom he took during the ſiege of Jeruſalem; of whom Joſephus himſelf writes, that μαστιγουμενοι ανεσταυρουντο, having been ſcourged, and tortured in a very terrible manner, they were crucified, in view and near the walls of this city, perhaps, among other places, on mount Calvary; and it is very probable this might be the fate of ſome of thoſe very perſons who now joined in this cry, as it undoubtedly was of many of their children. For Joſephus, who was an eye-witneſs, expreſly declares, "that the number of thoſe thus crucified was ſo great, that there was not room for the croſſes to ſtand by each other, and that at laſt they had not wood enough to make croſſes of:" a paſſage which, eſpecially when compared with the verſe before us, muſt impreſs and aſtoniſh the attentive reader beyond any other in the whole ſtory. If this were not the very finger of GOD, pointing out their crime in crucifying his Son, it is hard to ſay what could deſerve to be called ſo. Elſner has abundantly ſhewn, that among the Greeks, the perſons on whoſe teſtimony others were put to death, uſed by a very ſolemn execration to devote themſelves to the divine vengeance, if the perſons ſo condemned were not really guilty. See his Obſervat. vol. i. p. 123. Joſeph. War. l. v. c. 11. Doddridge, and the Reflections on ch. xxiv. Bp. Fleetwood obſerves, that the modern Jews are as virulent againſt the name of Jeſus, as their fathers were againſt his power; ſo that they ſuffer as their fathers did, and for a like reaſon.

Ver. 26. And when he had ſcourged Jeſus] The Romans uſually ſcourged the criminals whom they condemned to be crucified: this was the reaſon why Pilate ordered our Lord to be ſcourged before he delivered him to the ſoldiers to be crucified. St. Matthew and St. Mark inſinuate, that the ſcourging was performed on the pavement; for they tell us, that after it was over, the ſoldiers took Jeſus into the prætorium, and mocked him; we may therefore ſuppoſe that the prieſts and the multitude required the governor to ſcourge him openly in their ſight, and that he, to pacify them, conſented, contrary to his inclination; which, as he believed Jeſus to be innocent, muſt have led him to ſhew him all the favour in his power, and probably he thought that this previous puniſhment would have excited the pity of the Jews, and have prevented the crucifixion of Jeſus. See Elſner and Wetſtein.

Ver. 28. And they—put on him a ſcarlet robe] St. Mark ſays, they 29 And when they had platted a crown of thorns, they put it upon his head, and a reed in his right hand: and they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, ſaying, Hail, king of the Jews!

30 And they ſpit upon him, and took the reed, and ſmote him on the head.

31 And after that they had mocked him, they took the robe off from him, and put his own raiment on him, and led him away to crucify him.

32 And as they came out, they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name: him they compelled to bear his croſs.

33 And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to ſay, a place of a ſkull.

34 They gave him vinegar to drink, mingled with gall: and when he had taſted thereof, he would not drink.

35 And they crucified him, and parted his garments, caſting lots: that it might be fulfilled which was ſpoken by the prophet, They parted my garments among them, and upon my veſture did they caſt lots.

36 And ſitting down, they watched him there:

37 And ſet up over his head, his accuſation written, THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

Ver. 30. Iſai. l. 6. Ch. xxvi. 67.—V. 32. Mark xv. 21. Luke xxiii. 26.—V. 33. John xix. 17.—V. 34. Pſ. lxix. 21.—V. 35. Mark xv. 24. Luke xxiii. 34. John xix. 24. Pſ. xxii. 18.—V. 37. Mark xv. 26. Luke xxiii. 38. John xix. 19.—V. 38. Iſai. liii. 12. Luke xxiii. 32, 33.

cloathed him with purple; but the ancients gave the name of purple to all colours which had any mixture of red in them. This was probably ſome old purple robe which they put upon him in deriſion of his claim to the kingdom of Judea, purple being worn by kings and great perſonages. See Braunius, de Veſtit. ſacerd. l. i. c. 14.

Ver. 29. And when they had platted a crown of thorns] Though it is unqueſtionable that they intended hereby to expoſe our Lord's pretended royalty to ridicule and contempt, as well as by the purple robe and mock ſceptre; yet had that been all, a crown of thorns might have ſerved as well. They meant, without all queſtion, to add cruelty to their ſcorn, which eſpecially appeared in their ſtriking him on the head, to drive the horrid thorns into the tender parts of his temples when this crown was put on. If the beſt deſcriptions of the eaſtern thorns are to be credited, they are much larger than any commonly known in theſe parts. Haſſelquiſt, ſpeaking of the naba, or nabka of the Arabians, ſays, " In all probability this is the tree which afforded the crown of thorns put on the head of Chriſt; it grows very common in the eaſt, and the plant is extremely fit for the purpoſe; for it has many ſmall and moſt ſharp ſpines, which are well adapted to give great pain. The crown might be eaſily made of theſe ſoft, round, and pliant branches, and what in my opinion ſeems to be the greateſt proof it is, that the leaves much reſemble thoſe of ivy, as they are of a very deep green: Perhaps the enemies of Chriſt would have a plant ſomewhat reſembling that with which emperorors and generals were uſed to be crowned, that there might be calumny even in the puniſhment." It hath been obſerved, that the curſe inflicted on our firſt parents included thorns as the product of the earth, and this curſe was put an end to by the thorns here uſed. See Solomon's Song, ch. ii. 2. The word καλαμος does indeed ſometimes ſignify a ſlender reed (ch. xi. 7. xii. 20. 3 John ver. 13.) but it alſo includes all kind of canes, and it is moſt probable that this was a walking Cane, which they put into his hand as a ſceptre; for a blow with a ſlight reed, would ſcarce have been felt, or have deſerved a mention, in a detail of ſuch dreadful ſufferings. See Haſſelquiſt's Travels, p. 288. and Doddridge.

Ver. 31. They took the robe from, &c.] It is not ſaid that they took the crown of thorns off his head, which ſerved to gratify their paſſions both of malice and contempt; probably our Lord died wearing it, that the title which was written over him might be better underſtood. It was a Jewiſh cuſtom in the time of Moſes to execute delinquents without the camp; but after Jeruſalem was built, they were executed without the city walls. Dr. Lardner has abundantly proved by many quotations, that it was cuſtomary not only for the Jews, but alſo for the Sicilians, Epheſians, and Romans to execute their malefactors without the gates of the cities. See Heb. xiii. 12, 13. and Lardner's credibility, part i. vol. 1.

Ver. 32. And as they came out, &c.] We learn from the other Evangeliſts, that our bleſſed Lord had borne his croſs agreeable to the cuſtom in executions, at his firſt ſetting out. It was not indeed the whole croſs which criminals carried, but only that tranſverſe piece of wood to which the arms were faſtened, and which was called antennæ, or furca, going croſs the ſtipes or upright beam, which was fixed on the earth; the criminal, from carrying this, was called furcifer. Our bleſſed Lord, through the fatigue of the preceding night, ſpent wholly without ſleep, the agony he had undergone in the garden, his having been hurried from place to place, and obliged to ſtand the whole time of his trial, the want of food, and the loſs of blood which he had ſuſtained, was become ſo faint, that he ſunk beneath the burden, and was not able to bear the weight of the croſs. The ſoldiers therefore (for amongſt the Romans the execution of criminals was performed by them) meeting with Simon of Cyrene, a town in Africa abounding with Jews, ſeized on him, probably by the inſtigation of the Jews, and compelled him to carry the croſs after Jeſus. Simon's ſons, Alexander and Rufus, were two noted men among the firſt Chriſtians, at the time St. Mark wrote his Goſpel. See Mark xv. 25. The ſoldiers however did not remove the croſs out of compaſſion to Chriſt, but from an apprehenſion of his dying by the exceſſive fatigue, and thereby eluding the public puniſhment to which they were eſcorting him. See L'Enfant, Lipſius de Cruce, and Bp. Pearſon on the Creed, p. 203.

Ver. 33. A place called Golgotha] A Syriac word, which ſignifies a ſkull or head. In Latin it is called Calvary: The place was ſo named either becauſe malefactors uſed to be executed there, or becauſe the charnel houſe, or common repoſitory for bones and ſkulls, might have been there. See Mark xv. 22.

Ver. 34. They gave him vinegar to drink, mingled with gall] It was uſual to give criminals before they ſuffered, a ſtupefying potion to render them inſenſible of the ignominy and pain of their puniſhment: But our bleſſed Lord, becauſe he would bear his ſufferings, however ſharp, not by intoxicating and ſtupifying himſelf, but through the ſtrength of patience, fortitude, and faith, therefore refuſed to drink of it. St. Mark ſays, they gave him to drink wine mingled with myrrh, ch. xv. 23. But the two Evangeliſts ſpeak of the ſame ingredients: For though St. Mark terms that wine, which St. Matthew calls vinegar, he may have really meant vinegar, which was a common drink among the ancients, (ſee Numb. vi. 6.) and ſuch as might very properly be called wine, in regard it was uſually made of wine, or of the juice of grapes; beſides, it is well known that the ancients gave the general name of wine to all fermented liquors: It is evident therefore, that to reconcile the Evangeliſts here, we have no occaſion for the reading of Beza's copy, which has οἶνον inſtead of ὄξος. Ὄξος might be rendered ſour wine, as indeed the word vinegar properly imports; and this mixed with water was the common drink of the Roman ſoldiers, and conſequently was in a veſſel at hand. As to the other ingredient of this potion, let it be obſerved, that the word χολῆ in the LXX, is often uſed as the tranſlation of the Hebrew word רוש rûſh; which properly was the name of a poiſonous herb common in thoſe countries, and remarkable for its bitterneſs; hence an infuſion of it is called ὑδῶρ πικρὸν, bitter water, Jer. iii. 15. and υδωρ χολῆς, the water of bitterneſs, Jer. viii. 14. ix. 14. Probably it was a weak infuſion of this herb in vinegar and water, which our Lord's friends offered him, (as we have obſerved was uſual on ſuch occaſions) to make him inſenſible, and to ſhorten his life. It is called indeed by St. Mark ἐσμυρνισμένον οἶνον, myrrhed vinegar, perhaps becauſe it had myrrh mixed with it, there being nothing more common than for a medicine compounded of many ingredients, to take its name from ſome one of them which is prevalent in the compoſition. That myrrh was proper in a potion of this kind has been ſhewn by Voſſius; who proves from Dioſcorides, lib. ii. c. 70. that frankincenſe, macerated in liquors, makes thoſe who drink them mad, and that if the quantity taken be large, it ſometimes produces death. Hence, when Ptolemy Philopater deſigned to engage his elephants, " He gave them wine mingled with frankincenſe to enrage them." The Evangeliſts may be reconciled more directly ſtill, by ſuppoſing that χολῆ ſignifies any bitter drug whatſoever; for it is applied to wormwood, Prov. v. 4. and by parity of reaſon may denote myrrh, which hath its name from a Hebrew word ſignifying bitterneſs. Caſaubon has given a third ſolution of this difficulty; he thinks that our Lord's friends put a cup of myrrhed wine into the hands of one of the ſoldiers to give it to Jeſus, but that he, out of contempt, added gall to it. See the note on Pſ. lxix. 21. Lipſius de Milit. Rom. and Wetſtein.

Ver. 35. And they crucified him, and parted his garments, &c.] This was the cuſtom of the Romans; the ſoldiers performing the office of executioners, divided among them the ſpoils of the criminals. There was only Chriſt's tunick which they did not divide, but caſt lots to ſee whoſe it ſhould be. See John xix. 23, 24. They alſo uſed to appoint a guard, to tarry by the crucified perſons, that nobody might come and take them away, ver. 36. Reſpecting the inſcription, ver. 37. which was alſo a Roman cuſtom, ſee on John xix. 19, &c.

Ver. 38. Then were two thieves crucified with him] They placed fied with him: one on the right hand, and another on the left.

39 And they that paſſed by, reviled him, wagging their heads,

40 And ſaying, Thou that deſtroyeſt the temple, and buildeſt it in three days, ſave thyſelf. If thou be the Son of God, come down from the croſs.

41 Likewiſe alſo the chief prieſts mocking him, with the ſcribes and elders, ſaid, 42 He ſaved others; himſelf he cannot ſave. If he be the King of Iſrael, let him now come down from the croſs, and we will believe him.

43 He truſted in God; let him deliver him now, if he will have him: for he ſaid, I am the Son of God.

44 The thieves alſo which were crucified with him, caſt the ſame in his teeth.

45 Now from the ſixth hour there was darkneſs over all the land unto the ninth hour.

46 And about the ninth hour Jeſus cried with a loud voice, ſaying, Eli, Eli, lama

Ver. 39. Pſ. xxii. 7. Mark xv. 29. Luke xxiii. 35.—V. 40. Ch. xxvi. 61. John ii. 19. Ch. xxvi. 63.—V. 43. Pſ. xxii. 8. Wiſd. ii. 16, 17, 18.—V. 44. Luke xxiii. 39.—V. 45. Mark xv. 33.—V. 46. Hebr. v. 7.

Jeſus in the middle, by way of mock honour, becauſe he had called himſelf a king, and was now crowned with thorns; or, if the prieſts had any hand in this, they might deſign hereby to impreſs the ſpectators with the thought of his being an impoſtor, and to make them look upon him as the chief malefactor: By thieves may be meant here perſons concerned in an inſurrection, perhaps confederates with Barabbas; for the Greek word ſignifies thoſe who take up arms, without commiſſion or authority of a ſuperior; and ſuch, by the Roman laws, were ſubject to crucifixion. See Mark xv. 28. and on ver. 44.

Ver. 39, 40. And they that paſſed by reviled] The common people, whom the prieſts had incenſed againſt our Lord by the malicious lies which they ſpread concerning him, and which they pretended to found on the evidence of the witneſſes, ſeeing him hang as a malefactor on the croſs, and reading the ſuperſcription placed over his head, expreſſed their indignation againſt him by railing on him,—blaſpheming—in the original. See Pſ. xxii. 8. They thought their ſarcaſm, thou that deſtroyeſt the temple, &c. the more biting, as this was one of the charges brought againſt him by the falſe witneſſes, ch. xxvi. 61. and the latter part of the verſe was that on which they had condemned him as being guilty of blaſphemy.

Ver. 41—43. Likewiſe alſo the chief prieſts, mocking, &c.] The rulers having, as they imagined, wholly overturned our Lord's pretenſions as Meſſiah, ridiculed him on that head, and with a meanneſs of ſoul which will for ever render them infamous, mocked him even in the agonies of death. They ſcoffed at the miracles of healing, by which he demonſtrated himſelf the Meſſiah, and promiſed faith on condition he would prove his pretenſions, by coming down from the croſs. In the mean time nothing could be more falſe and hypocritical; for they continued in their unbelief, notwithſtanding Jeſus raiſed himſelf from the dead, which was a much greater miracle than his coming down from the croſs would have been; a miracle alſo that was atteſted by witneſſes, whoſe veracity they could not call in queſtion; for it was told them by the ſoldiers, whom they had themſelves placed at the ſepulchre to watch his body. It is plain, therefore, that the prieſts ſaid they would believe if Jeſus came down, not becauſe their incorrigible ſtubbornneſs would have yielded to any proof, however convincing, but to inſult Chriſt; fancying it impoſſible for him now to eſcape out of their hands. It is difficult to tell what it was the rulers alluded to in the 43d verſe: He truſted in God;—let him deliver him now, if he will have him;—ει θελει αυτον, if he delights in him, &c. Perhaps thoſe who now ſpake were the perſons who attended Judas and the armed band, when they apprehended Jeſus, Luke xxii. 52. On that occaſion they had heard him order Peter to put up his ſword, telling him that he could pray to his Father, and he would give him more than twelve legions of angels. In deriſion of this expreſſion of his reliance on God, whom he called his Father, they ſay to him, now that he was hanging on the croſs, "He truſted in God that he would deliver him, and claimed a peculiar relation to him as his Son. If God really delights in him as his Son, let him ſhew it now, by delivering him from this ignominious puniſhment." But whatever the particular was to which they now alluded, certain it is that the rulers, by ſpeaking as above, fulfilled a remarkable prophecy concerning the Meſſiah's ſufferings, Pſ. xxii. 8. where it is foretold that the Meſſiah's enemies would utter theſe words in deriſion of his pretenſions. Many of the Jewiſh writers themſelves acknowledge that theſe words belonged to the Meſſiah; and it certainly merits a ſerious reflection, that at the very time theſe prieſts and elders intended to explode our Lord's pretenſions to the Meſſiahſhip, they ſhould make uſe of what their own writers acknowledged to be a characteriſtic of the true Meſſiah. See Macknight, and Doddridge.

Ver. 44. The thieves alſo—caſt the ſame in his teeth] Reproached him in like manner. St. Luke ſays, that one only of the thieves reproached our Lord; the other exerciſed a moſt extraordinary faith in him. See Luke xxiii. 40. Some commentators endeavour to remove this difficulty, by ſuppoſing that both the thieves might revile Jeſus at firſt; but this ſolution is not very probable: The phraſe is an Hebraiſm, it being very common in that language to expreſs a ſingle thing in the plural number, eſpecially when it is not the ſpeaker's or writer's intention to be more particular. Thus, Judg. xii. 7. then died Jephtha the Gileadite, and was buried in the cities of Gilead; i. e. in one of the cities of Gilead, as it is well ſupplied by our tranſlators: So likewiſe the writer of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, ſpeaking of the worthies of the Old Teſtament, ſays, they ſtopped the mouths of lions, they were ſawn aſunder; whereas the former ſentence is applicable only to Daniel, and the latter to Iſaiah. So that by the word thieves, both here and in St. Mark, we are to underſtand only one of the thieves; But ſee more on this ſubject on ch. xxvi. 6.

Ver. 45. Now from the ſixth hour, &c.] During the laſt three hours that our Lord hung on the croſs, a darkneſs covered the face of the earth, to the great terror and amazement of the people preſent at his execution. This extraordinary alteration in the face of nature was peculiarly proper, whilſt the Sun of Righteouſneſs was withdrawing his beams from the land of Iſrael, and from the world, not only becauſe it was a miraculous teſtimony borne by God himſelf to his innocence, but alſo becauſe it was a fit emblem of his departure and its effects, at leaſt till his light ſhone out anew with additional ſplendor, in the miniſtry of his Apoſtles. The Jews had been accuſtomed to the figurative language of the eclipſe of the luminaries, as ſignificative of ſome extraordinary revolution or calamity, and could not but recollect the words of Amos viii. 9, 10. on this occaſion. The heathens likewiſe had been taught to look on theſe circumſtances as indications of the perpetration of ſome heinous and enormous crime; and how enormous was that now committed by the Jews. The darkneſs which now covered Judea, together with the neighbouring countries, beginning about noon, and continuing till Jeſus expired, was not the effect of an ordinary eclipſe of the ſun, for that can never happen, except when the moon is about the change; whereas now it was full moon; not to mention that total darkneſſes occaſioned by eclipſes of the ſun, never continue above twelve or fifteen minutes. Wherefore it muſt have been produced by the divine power, in a manner we are not able to explain. Accordingly Luke, after relating that there was a darkneſs over all the earth, adds, and the ſun was darkened, ch. xxiii. 44. Farther, the Chriſtian writers, in their moſt ancient apologies to the heathens, affirm, that as it was full moon at the paſſover when Chriſt was crucified, no ſuch eclipſe could happen by the courſe of nature. They obſerve alſo, that it was taken notice of as a prodigy by the heathens themſelves. To this purpoſe we have ſtill remaining the words of Phlegon the aſtronomer, and freed-man of Adrian, cited by Origen from his book, at the time when it was in the hands of the public; That heathen author, in treating of the 4th year of the 202d Olympiad, which is the 19th of Tiberius, and ſuppoſed to be the year in which our Lord was crucified, tells us, "That the greateſt eclipſe of the ſun that ever was known happened then; for the day was ſo turned into night, that the ſtars in the heavens were ſeen." See Orig. Contr. Celſ. p. 83. If Phlegon, as Chriſtians generally ſuppoſe, is ſpeaking of the darkneſs which accompanied our Lord's crucifixion, it was not circumſcribed within the land of Judea, but muſt have been univerſal. This many learned men have believed, particularly Huet, Grotius, Guſſet, Reland, and Alphen. Another ancient writer aſſerts, "that walking in Heliopolis, a town of Egypt, with a ſtudious friend, he obſerved this wonderful darkneſs, and ſaid, that it certainly portended ſomething extraordinary: That either the God of nature was ſuffering, or nature itſelf was about to be diſſolved." Joſephus, it is true, takes no notice of this wonderful phœnomenon; but the reaſon may be, that he was unwilling to mention any circumſtance favourable to Chriſtianity, of which he was no friend; and the Jews would, no doubt, diſguiſe this event as much as they could, and perhaps might perſuade him and others who heard the report of it at ſome diſtance of time or place, that it was only a dark cloud, or a thick miſt, which the followers of Jeſus had exaggerated, becauſe it happened when their maſter died. Such repreſentations are exceedingly natural to hearts corrupted by infidelity. See Macknight, Doddridge, and Calmet's diſſertation on the ſubject.

Ver. 46. Jeſus cried with a loud voice, ſaying, &c.] A little before he expired, Jeſus repeated the firſt verſe of the 22d pſalm, pronouncing it in the Syriac dialect, which was the common language of the country; and ſpeaking with a loud voice, that all who ſtood around might hear him diſtinctly, and know that he was the perſon ſpoken of by David. Some would tranſlate the words, My God, my Gok, to what a degree, or to what a length of time, haſt thou forſaken me? Lamma in the Hebrew has this ſignification. Accordingly St. Mark, in the parallel paſſage, has rendered it by εις τι. But however tranſlated, our Lord's words muſt be viewed in the ſame light with his prayer in the garden. For, as that prayer expreſſed only the ſabachthani? that is to ſay, My God, my God! why haſt thou forſaken me?

47 Some of them that ſtood there, when they heard that, ſaid, This man calleth for Elias.

48 And ſtraightway one of them ran, and took a ſpunge, and filled it with vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink.

49 The reſt ſaid, Let be, let us ſee whether Elias will come to ſave him.

50 Jeſus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghoſt.

51 And behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain, from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent;

52 And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the ſaints which ſlept, aroſe, 53 And came out of the graves after his reſurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many.

Ver. 46. Pſ. xxii. 1.—V. 48. Pſ. lxix. 21. Mark xv. 36. Luke xxiii. 36. John xix. 29.—V. 50. Luke xxiii. 46.—V. 51. Exod. xxvi. 31. 2 Chron. iii. 14. Mark xv. 38.

feelings and inclinations of his human nature, ſorely preſſed down with the weight of his ſufferings, ſo his words on the croſs proceeded from the greatneſs of his ſufferings then, and expreſſed the feelings of his human nature; viz. an exceeding grief at God's forſaking him, and a complaint that it was ſo. But as his prayer in the garden was properly tempered by the addition of the clauſe, yet not as I will, but as thou wilt; ſo his complaint on the croſs may have been tempered in the ſame manner; perhaps by his repeating the following third verſe of the pſalm, though the Evangeliſts have not mentioned it particularly: For, that in the inward diſpoſition of his mind, Jeſus was perfectly reſigned, even while he hanged on the croſs, is evident beyond all doubt, from his recommending his ſpirit to God in the article of death; which he could not have done, had he either deſpaired of the divine favour, or been diſcontented with the divine appointments. The ſufferings which made our Lord cry out, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? were not merely thoſe which appeared to the ſpectators, viz. the pains of death which he underwent. Many of his followers have ſuffered ſharper, and more lingering bodily torture, ending in death, without thinking themſelves on that account forſaken of God; on the contrary, they both felt and expreſſed raptures of joy under the bittereſt torments. Why then ſhould Jeſus have complained, and been ſo dejected under inferior ſufferings, as we muſt acknowledge them to be, if there was nothing here but the pains of crucifixion? Is there any other circumſtance in this hiſtory which leads us to think him defective in courage or patience? In piety and reſignation came he behind his own Apoſtles? Were his views of God and religion more confined than theirs? Had he greater ſenſibility of pain than they, without a proper balance ariſing from the ſuperiority of his underſtanding? In ſhort, was he worſe qualified for martyrdom than they? The truth is, his words on the croſs cannot be accounted for, but on the ſuppoſition that he ſuffered in his mind pains inexpreſſible, inflicted on him by an immediate interpoſition of the power of God, the nature and intenſeneſs of which cannot in the language of men be more juſtly, or more emphatically expreſſed, than by the metaphor of God's forſaking him. Some think Jeſus on this occaſion repeated the whole 22d pſalm; and certainly, as it is compoſed in the form of a prayer, it muſt be acknowledged, that no addreſs could be more ſuitable to the circumſtances wherein our Lord then was, or better adapted to impreſs the minds of the beholders with becoming ſentiments. Nevertheleſs, the things mentioned by the Evangeliſts as next happening, were of ſuch a kind that they muſt have followed immediately upon the repetition of the firſt three or four verſes of the pſalm. It is probable, therefore, that he ſtopped there. Perhaps it was not his intention to go farther; for as it was the cuſtom of the Jews, when they quoted large portions of Scripture, to mention only the firſt verſes or words of the paſſage, ſuch of his hearers as knew theſe to be the firſt verſes of the 22d pſalm, would eaſily underſtand that Jeſus meant to apply the whole pſalm to himſelf. And as it contains the moſt remarkable particulars of our Lord's paſſion, being a ſort of ſummary of all the prophecies relative to that ſubject, by citing it on the croſs, and applying it to himſelf, Jeſus ſignified, that he was now accompliſhing the things therein predicted concerning the Meſſiah. Farther, as the pſalm is compoſed in the form of a prayer, by citing it at this time, Jeſus alſo claimed of his Father the performance of all the promiſes he had made, whether to him, or to his people, the chief of which are recorded in the latter part of the pſalm.

Ver. 47. This man calleth for Elias] Though Jeſus ſpoke in the vulgar dialect, ſome of the people preſent did not underſtand him; for they fancied that he called on the prophet Elijah to help him. Hence ſome have conjectured that they were Roman ſoldiers who thus miſunderſtood Chriſt's words. The conjecture, however, cannot be admitted, unleſs theſe ſoldiers were proſelytes, and had learned the language and religion of the Jews more perfectly than is reaſonable to ſuppoſe. We may therefore believe it was our Lord's own countrymen who gave their opinion concerning the meaning of his words; and though they miſunderſtood him, it may have ariſen neither from their ignorance of the language in which he ſpoke, nor from their hearing him indiſtinctly, for he ſpake with a loud voice; but from their not conſidering that he was repeating the words of the 22d pſalm. Others have ſuppoſed that this was the miſtake of ſome Helleniſt Jews, who did not underſtand the Syro-Chaldaic language. See Craddock's Harmony, part ii. p. 256. and Grotius.

Ver. 48. One of them—took a ſpunge, &c.] We have before obſerved that vinegar, or a ſmall ſharp wine and water,—a mixture which was called poſca,—was the common drink of the Roman ſoldiers. Poſſibly, therefore, this vinegar was ſet here for their uſe, or for that of the crucified perſons, whoſe torture would naturally make them thirſty. See John xix. 28, 29. where we are told that they put the ſponge upon hyſſop; i. e. a ſtalk of hyſſop, called by the other Evangeliſts καλαμος, which ſignifies not only a reed or cane, but the ſtalk of any plant: For that hyſſop was a ſhrub, appears from 1 Kings iv. 33. where it is reckoned among the trees. They did this office to Jeſus, not ſo much from pity, as to preſerve him alive, in hopes of ſeeing the miracle of Elijah's deſcent from heaven. See the next verſe.

Ver. 50. Jeſus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghoſt] St. John tells us, that when our Lord had received the vinegar, he ſaid, It is finiſhed. "The predictions of the prophets are all fulfilled, and the redemption of the world is finiſhed, to accompliſh which I came into the world." And the other evangeliſts inform us, that in ſpeaking theſe words, our Lord cried with a loud voice; probably to ſhew that his ſtrength was not exhauſted, but that he was about to give up his life of his own accord. The Evangeliſts uſe different words in expreſſing our Lord's death, which our tranſlators, notwithſtanding, render in the ſame manner,—He yielded, or gave up the ghoſt; St. Mark and St. Luke ſay, εξεπνευσε, He expired; St. John παρεδωκε το πνευμα, He yielded up his ſpirit; but St. Matthew's language is moſt ſingular, ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα, He diſmiſſed his ſpirit; as the ſame word αφιημι is uſed ch. xiii. 36. Mark iv. 36. xi 6. and elewhere. Now this expreſſion ſeems admirably to ſuit our Lord's words, John x. 18. No man taketh my life from me, but I lay it down of myſelf, &c. ſhewing, (as did alſo the ſtrong cry, which ſo much impreſſed the centurion) that he died by the voluntary act of his own mind, according to the power received from the Father; and in a way peculiar to himſelf, by which he alone of all men that ever exiſted could have continued alive, even in the greateſt tortures as long as he pleaſed, or have retired from the body whenever he thought fit. Which view of the caſe, by the way, ſuggeſts an illuſtration of the love of Chriſt manifeſted in his death, beyond what is commonly obſerved; inaſmuch as he did not uſe this power to quit his body as ſoon as ever it was faſtened to the croſs, leaving only an inſenſible corpſe to the cruelty of his murderers; but continued his abode in it with a ſteady reſolution as long as it was proper, and then retired from it with a majeſty and dignity never known, or to be known in any other death; dying, if we may ſo expreſs it, like the prince of life! See Heb. v. 7. Doddridge, and Gerhard.

Ver. 51. The veil of the temple was rent, &c.] While Jeſus breathed his laſt, the veil of the temple was miraculouſly rent from top to bottom; moſt probably in preſence of the prieſt who burned the incenſe in the holy place at the evening ſacrifice; for the ninth hour, at which Jeſus expired, was the hour of offering that ſacrifice. The ſudden rending of that veil was a ſupernatural ſign of the deſtruction of the temple being at hand, and of the diſſolution of the Jewiſh œconomy. The earth alſo trembled, and the rocks rent, in token of the Almighty's diſpleaſure againſt the Jewiſh nation, on account of the horrid impiety whereof they were now guilty. Mr. Fleming tells us, that a deiſt lately travelling through Paleſtine, was converted by viewing one of theſe rocks, which ſtill remains torn aſunder, not in the weakeſt place, but acroſs the veins; a plain proof that it was done in a ſupernatural manner. Sandys, in his travels, p. 264. has given a natural deſcription and delineation of this fiſſure; and Mr. Maundrell tells us, that it is about a ſpan wide at the upper part, and two ſpans deep, after which it cloſes, but opens again below, and runs down to an unknown depth in the earth. He adds, that every man's ſenſe and reaſon muſt convince him, that this is a natural and genuine breach. See Fleming's Chriſtology, vol ii. p. 97. and Maundrell's journey from Aleppo, p. 73.

Ver. 52, 53. And the graves were opened, &c.] The ancient ſepulchres were hewn out of rocks, which being rent by the earthquake, diſcovered the cells wherein the bodies of the dead were depoſited; but though theſe ſepulchres were opened by the earthquake at our Lord's death, yet the dead in them did not come to life till his reſurrection: for Jeſus himſelf was the firſt-born from the dead, Col. i. 18. and the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept, 1 Cor. xv. 20. It ſeems probable, that thoſe ſaints were not ſome of the moſt eminent ones mentioned in the Old Teſtament, but diſciples, who had died lately; for when they went into the city, they were known by the perſons

54 Now when the centurion, and they that were with him, watching Jeſus, ſaw the earthquake, and thoſe things that were done, they feared greatly, ſaying, Truly this was the Son of God.

55 And many women were there (beholding afar off,) which followed Jeſus from Galilee, miniſtering unto him:

56 Among which was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joſes, and the mother of Zebedee's children.

57 When the even was come, there came a rich man of Arimathea, named Joſeph, who alſo himſelf was Jeſus' diſciple:

58 He went to Pilate, and begged the body of Jeſus. Then Pilate commanded the body to be delivered.

59 And when Joſeph had taken the body, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, 60 And laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock: and he rolled a great ſtone to the door of the ſepulchre, and departed.

61 And there was Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, ſitting over againſt the ſepulchre.

62 Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation, the chief prieſts and Phariſees came together unto Pilate,

63 Saying, Sir, we remember that that who ſaw them, which could not well have happened, had they not been their cotemporaries; and as the rending of the veil of the temple intimated that the entrance into the holy place, the type of heaven, was now laid open to all nations, ſo the reſurrection of a number of ſaints from the dead, demonſtrated that the power of death and the grave was broken, the ſting was taken from death, and the victory wreſted from the grave. In ſhort, our Lord's conqueſts over the enemies of mankind were ſhewn to be complete, and an earneſt was given of a general reſurrection from the dead. There is an ancient Greek MS. which reads in ver. 43. after their reſurrection; and this reading is followed by the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions. Perhaps it may be as natural to read the paſſage with Grotius, when he yielded up the ghoſt, the graves were opened; and after his reſurrection, many bodies of ſaints aroſe, and came out of their graves.

Ver. 54. Truly this was the Son of God] Or the Meſſiah. It is probable that this centurion was a proſelyte to the Jewiſh religion, and acquainted with their opinions. Others however think, that it ſhould be rendered, This was a Son of God; for as the centurion was a Roman, ſay they, among whom it was not uncommon to ſtile a perſon of remarkable abilities and merit a ſon of ſome deity, the centurion, in conſequence of this cuſtom, ſeeing the circumſtances which attended this event, was convinced, that though Chriſt was executed as an impoſtor, yet he could not be leſs than the ſon of a god. The former however ſeems the moſt probable opinion, as it is moſt likely that theſe words of the centurion refer to thoſe of the chief prieſts and ſcribes, ver. 43. He ſaid, I am the Son of God. See ch. xxvi. 63, 64. Elſner, in a note on this place, hath ſhewn, that ſome of the heathens had a notion among them, that prodigies, eſpecially ſtorms and earthquakes, ſometimes attended the death of extraordinary perſons peculiarly dear to the gods; and among other paſſages, he mentions that of Plutarch, wherein we are told, that when Ptolemy had crucified Cleomenes, while the body hung dead on the croſs, a large ſerpent wound itſelf round his face, and defended it from birds of prey; from whence the Egyptians concluded, that he was a hero more than mortal, and a ſon of the gods. Bp. Sherlock, (diſc. ix. vol. 1. 270.) has made a fine uſe of the paſſage before us in the following words: "Go to your natural religion, ſays he, lay before her Mahomet and his diſciples arrayed in armour and in blood, riding in triumph over the ſpoils of thouſands and tens of thouſands, who fell by his victorious ſword. Shew her the cities which he ſet in flames, the countries which he ravaged and deſtroyed, and the miſerable diſtreſs of all the inhabitants of the earth. When ſhe has viewed him in this ſcene, carry her to his retirements; ſhew her the prophet's chamber, his concubines, and wives: let her ſee his adultery, and hear him alledge revelation and a divine commiſſion to juſtify his luſt and his oppreſſion. When ſhe is tired with this proſpect, then ſhew her the bleſſed Jeſus, humble and meek, doing good to all the ſons of men, patiently inſtructing both the ignorant and the perverſe: let her ſee him in his moſt retired privacies; let her follow him to the mount, and hear his devotions and ſupplications to God: Carry her to his table, to view his poor fare, and hear his heavenly diſcourſe; let her ſee him injured, but not provoked; let her attend him to the tribunal, and conſider the patience with which he endured the ſcoffs and reproaches of his enemies; lead her to his croſs, and let her view him in the agony of death, and hear his laſt prayer for his perſecutors, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!——

"When natural religion has viewed both, aſk which is the prophet of God?—But we have already had her anſwer; when ſhe ſaw part of this ſcene through the eyes of the centurion who attended at the croſs by him,—ſhe ſpoke and ſaid, Truly this was the Son of God."

Ver. 56. And the mother of Zebedee's children] Though the conſtruction of the original be dubious, yet I think it very rational, ſays Doddridge, to conclude, that the mother of the ſons of Zebedee, or of James the Greater and John, was a different perſon from the mother of James the Leſs and Joſes; both as the ſons of Zebedee, though ſuch diſtinguiſhed friends of Chriſt, are never called his brethren, as James and Joſes are, (ſee ch. xiii. 55. and Mark vi. 3.) and as ſome ſcriptures plainly intimate, that no more than two of the Apoſtles were the ſons of Zebedee. See ch. x. 2. xxvi. 37. and Mark iii. 17. The frequent mention which is made in the Evangeliſts of the generous and courageous zeal of ſome pious women in the ſervice of Chriſt, and eſpecially of the faithful and regular conſtancy with which they attended him in thoſe laſt ſcenes of his ſufferings, might very poſſibly be intended to obviate that haughty and ſenſeleſs contempt which the pride of men, often irritated by thoſe vexations to which their own irregular paſſions have expoſed them, has in all ages affected to throw on that ſex; which probably in the ſight of God conſtitute the better half of mankind, and to whoſe care and tenderneſs the wiſeſt and beſt of men generally owe and aſcribe much of the daily comfort and enjoyment of their lives. See Mark xv. 40. Doddridge, and Henry.

Ver. 57. A rich man of Arimathea] A city of the Jews, anciently called Ramoth, which lay in the tribe of Ephraim, and was the city of the prophet Samuel. St. Mark xv. 42. deſcribes Joſeph under theſe two characters; firſt, that he was an honourable counſellor; ſecondly, that he waited for the kingdom of God. And St. Luke xxiii. 51. adds, that he had not conſented to the condemnation of Jeſus with the reſt of the ſanhedrim. See on John xix. 38. and the note on ver. 1. of this chapter. Some critics would render the laſt clauſe, who himſelf alſo made diſciples to Jeſus; i. e. after his aſcenſion. The word ἐμαθήτευσε has that ſenſe in the 19th verſe of the next.

Ver. 58. He went to Pilate, and begged the body of Jeſus] St. Mark ſays, ch. xv. 43. that he went in boldly, and craved the body. And it was certainly a courageous act for that rich and noble ſenator thus publickly to own his friendſhip to Jeſus in the midſt of his greateſt infamy; and a perſon of ſuch ſagacity could not but know, that if a reſurrection ſhould happen, nothing would have been more natural than that he ſhould be brought into queſtion as a confederate in the pretended fraud of conveying him away. But the regard he had for his Maſter overcame all other conſiderations: He therefore requeſted leave to take down his body, becauſe, if no friend had obtained it, it would have been ignominiouſly caſt out with thoſe of the common malefactors. See a more diſtinct account of this event in John xix. 38, &c.

Ver. 60. In his own new tomb] See on John xix. 41. The ſepulchre in which they laid our Lord being but lately made, was unfiniſhed, and had not yet a lock on its door; therefore they faſtened the door by rolling a great ſtone to it. The word roll implies, that the ſtone was both ponderous and large, too large to be carried, and therefore it was rolled upon the ground; According to Beza's copy, it was ſo weighty, that twenty men could not roll it; which was the reaſon why the women aſked that queſtion recorded by another Evangeliſt,—Who ſhall roll away the ſtone for us? Which implied, that they were both too few and too weak to do it for themſelves. This ſepulchre, it ſeems, differed from that of Lazarus, in being partly above ground; whereas the other, being wholly under ground, had a ſtone laid on the mouth of it, covering the entry of the ſtair by which they went down to it. See Beza and Macknight.

Ver. 62, 64. Now the next day that followed the day of the preparation] That is, after the ſun was ſet. They took this meaſure, therefore, not on the morrow, in our ſenſe of the word, but in the evening, after ſun-ſetting, when the Jewiſh ſabbath was begun; and when they underſtood the body was buried, to have delayed it till ſun-riſing would have been prepoſterous, as the diſciples might have ſtolen away the body during the preceding night. Beſides, there is no inconſiſtency between this account of the time when the watch was placed, and the ſubſequent articles of the hiſtory, which proceed on the ſuppoſition that the women preſent at our Lord's funeral were ignorant that any watch was placed at his grave; for they departed ſo early, that they had time to buy ſpices and ointment in the city before the preparation of the ſabbath was ended; whereas the watch was not placed till the ſabbath began. The day of preparation was deceiver ſaid, while he was yet alive, After three days I will riſe again.

64 Command therefore that the ſepulchre be made ſure until the third day, leſt his diſciples come by night, and ſteal him away, and ſay unto the people, He is riſen from the dead: ſo the laſt error ſhall be worſe than the firſt.

65 Pilate ſaid unto them, Ye have a watch: go your way, make it as ſure as ye can.

66 So they went and made the ſepulchre ſure, ſealing the ſtone, and ſetting a watch.

Ver. 63. Ch. xvi. 21. xvii. 23. xx. 19. Mark viii. 31. x. 34. Luke ix. 22. xviii. 33. xxiv. 6.

the day before the ſabbath, (ſee Mark xv. 42.) whereon they were to prepare for the celebration of it. The next day then was the ſabbath, according to the Jewiſh ſtile; but the Evangeliſt here expreſſes it by this circumlocution, the day which followed the day, becauſe the Jewiſh ſabbath was then aboliſhed, and a new order ſucceeded. The Chriſtian Sunday is the octave of that week. See Heylin.

When the Scribes and Phariſees demanded a ſign from Jeſus, he referred them to that of the prophet Johah, ſee ch. xii. 59, 40. where he foretold his own reſurrection from the dead the third day. Alſo at the firſt paſſover, when the Jews required a miracle of him, in confirmation of his miſſion, he replied, "Deſtroy this temple, and I will raiſe it up in three days." See alſo what he ſaid further to the Phariſees, John x. 17, 18. Now if the perſons to whom theſe two laſt declarations were made happened to hear the promiſe of the miracle of the prophet Jonah, they might, by connecting the three, underſtand, that Jeſus meant to ſignify to them his reſurrection from the dead on the third day, and might tell Pilate they remembered that he had ſaid, while yet alive, after three days I will riſe again Perhaps alſo, on ſome occaſions not mentioned by the Evangeliſts, our Lord might have made a public declaration of his reſurrection in the very terms here ſet down; or we may ſuppoſe that Judas informed the council of his prediction; in ſhort, whatever way they came to the knowledge of it, certain it is, that the chief prieſts and Phariſees were well acquainted with our Lord's predictions concerning his reſurrection. It ſeems they were often repeated, and ſo public, that they were univerſally known; and one cannot help remarking upon this circumſtance, that if our Lord's reſurrection had been a cheat, impoſed upon mankind by his diſciples, it was the moſt ſimple thing imaginable for him to ſpeak of it beforehand, becauſe the only effect of ſuch a prediction was to put all his enemies on their guard. Accordingly the precaution and care which we find the rulers uſed in guarding the ſepulchre, rendered it next to impoſſible for the diſciples to be guilty of any deceit in this matter; and ſo by the Providence of God, what they meant for the intire ſubverſion of the Chriſtian cauſe, turned out the ſtrongeſt confirmation of it. Mr. Weſt, in his very excellent obſervations on the hiſtory of the reſurrection, has the following very uſeful remarks concerning the evidence of our Saviour's riſing on the third day, "That he did not riſe before the third day, ſays this author, p. 222. is evident from what St. Matthew here relates of the watch or guard ſet at the door of the ſepulchre. Now I obſerve from theſe words, 1. That the watch or guard was ſet at the ſepulchre the very next day after the death and burial of Chriſt. 2. It is moſt probable this was done on what we call the evening of that day, becauſe that was a high-day,—not only a ſabbath, but the paſſover; and it can hardly be imagined that the chief prieſts, and eſpecially the Phariſees, who pretended to greater ſtrictneſs and purity than any other ſect of the Jews, ſhould, before the religious duties of the day were over, defile themſelves by going to Pilate; for that they were very ſcrupulous upon that point, appears from what St. John ſays ch. xviii. 28. of their not entering into the hall of judgement or prætorium, where Pilate's tribunal was, the day before, leſt they ſhould be defiled, and ſo kept from eating the paſſover. And if it ſhould be ſaid, that the paſchal lamb being always eaten in the night, all their ſacrifices upon that account were over, and they at liberty to go to Pilate in the morning, or at what other time they pleaſed; I anſwer, that allowing the objection, it is ſtill farther to be conſidered that this was the ſabbath-day; and can it be ſuppoſed that the Phariſees, who cenſured Jeſus for healing, and his diſciples for plucking and eating the ears of corn on the ſabbath-day, would profane that day, and defile themſelves, not only by going to Pilate, but with the ſoldiers to the ſepulchre of Chriſt, and ſetting a ſeal upon the door of the ſepulchre before the religious duties of that ſolemn day were paſt? Eſpecially as they were under no neceſſity of doing it before the evening, though it was highly expedient for them not to delay it beyond that time. Jeſus had ſaid, whilſt he was yet alive, that he ſhould riſe again from the dead on the third day; which prophecy would have been equally falſified by his riſing on the firſt or the ſecond as on the fourth. If his body therefore was not in the ſepulchre at the cloſe of the ſecond day, the chief prieſts and Phariſees would gain their point, and might have aſſerted boldly that he was an impoſtor; from whence it will follow, that it was time enough for them to viſit the ſepulchre at the cloſe of the ſecond day. On the other hand, as he had declared he ſhould riſe on the third day, it was neceſſary for them (if they apprehended what they gave out,—that his diſciples would come and ſteal him away) to guard againſt any ſuch attempt on that day, and for that day only. And as the third day began from the evening or ſhutting in of the ſecond, according to the way of computing uſed among the Jews, it was as neceſſary for them not to delay viſiting the ſepulchre, and ſetting their guard, till after the beginning of that third day; for if they had come to the ſepulchre, though never ſo ſhort a time after the third day was begun, and had found the body miſſing, they could not from thence have proved him an impoſtor. And accordingly Matthew tells us, they went thither on the ſecond day, which was the ſabbath; and though the going to Pilate, and with the Roman ſoldiers to the ſepulchre, and ſealing up the ſtone, was undoubtedly a profanation of the ſabbath in the eyes of the ceremonious Phariſees, yet might they excuſe themſelves to their conſciences, or (what ſeems to have been of greater conſequence in their opinions) to the world, by pleading the neceſſity of doing it that day: and ſurely nothing could have carried them out on ſuch a buſineſs, on ſuch a day, but the urgent neceſſity of doing it then or not at all. And, as I have ſhewn above, that this urgent neceſſity could not take place till the cloſe of the ſecond day, and juſt, though but one moment, before the beginning of the third, it will follow, from what has been ſaid, that in the eſtimation of the high-prieſts and Phariſees, the day on which they ſet their guard was the ſecond day, and the next day conſequently was the third, to the end of which they requeſted Pilate to command that the ſepulchre might be made ſure. Here then we have a proof, furniſhed by the murderers and blaſphemers of Chriſt themſelves, that he was not riſen before the third day; for it is to be taken for granted, that before they ſealed up the ſepulchre, and ſet the guard, they had inſpected it, and ſeen that the body was ſtill there. Hence alſo are we enabled to anſwer the cavils that have been raiſed upon theſe expreſſions, three days and three nights, and after three days; for it is plain that the chief prieſts and Phariſees, by their going to the ſepulchre on the ſabbath-day, underſtood that day to be the ſecond; and it is plain, by their ſetting the guard from that time, and the reaſon given to Pilate for their ſo doing, viz. leſt the diſciples ſhould come in the night, and ſteal him away, that they conſtrued that day, which was juſt then beginning, to be the day limited by Chriſt for his riſing from the dead; that is, the third day. For had they taken theſe words of our Saviour, the Son of man ſhall be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, in their ſtrict literal ſenſe, they needed not have been in ſuch haſte to ſet their guard; ſince, according to that interpretation, there were yet two days and two nights to come; neither for the ſame reaſon had they any occaſion to apprehend ill conſequences from the diſciples coming that night, and ſtealing away the body of their maſter: So that unleſs it be ſuppoſed that the chief prieſts and Phariſees, the moſt learned ſect among the Jews, did not underſtand the meaning of a phraſe in their own language; or that they were ſo impious or impolitic as to profane the ſabbath, and defile themſelves without any occaſion; and ſo ſenſeleſs and impertinent, as to aſk a guard of Pilate for watching the ſepulchre that night and day, to prevent the diſciples ſtealing away the body of Chriſt the night or the day following; unleſs, I ſay, theſe ſtrange ſuppoſitions be admitted, we may fairly conclude, that in the language and to the underſtanding of the Jews, three days and three nights, and after three days, were equivalent to three days, or in three days. That he roſe on the third day, the teſtimony of the angels, and his own appearances to the women, to Simon, and to the two diſciples on the way to Emmaus, which all happened on that day, are clear and ſufficient proofs."

Ver. 65. Pilate ſaid unto them, ye have a watch] See ver. 54. Pilate thinking their requeſt reaſonable, allowed them to take as many ſoldiers as they pleaſed out of the cohort, which at the feaſt came from the caſtle Antonia, and kept guard in the porticos of the temple; for, that they were not Jewiſh, but Roman ſoldiers, whom the prieſts employed to watch the ſepulchre, is evident from their aſking them of the governor. Beſides, when the ſoldiers returned with the news of Chriſt's reſurrection, the prieſts deſired them to report, that his diſciples had ſtolen him away while they ſlept; and to encourage them to tell the falſehood boldly, promiſed that if their neglect of duty came to the governor's ear, proper means ſhould be uſed to pacify him, and to keep them ſafe; a promiſe which there was no need of making to their own ſervants. See Joſephus's Antiq. l. xx. c. 4.

Ver. 66. So they went, &c.] The prieſts going along with the guards granted them by the governor, placed them in their poſt, and ſealed the ſtone that was rolled to the door of the ſepulchre, to hinder the guards from combining with the diſciples in carrying on any fraud whatever. We find a precaution of the like kind made uſe of by Darius, Dan. vi. 17. in the caſe of Daniel ſhut up in the lions den. Thus while the prieſts cautiouſly propoſed to prevent our Lord's reſurrection from being palmed upon the world, reſolving, no doubt, to ſhew his body publickly after the third day as an impoſtor; they put the truth of his reſurrection beyond all queſtion, by furniſhing a number of unexceptionable witneſſes to it, whoſe teſtimony they themſelves could not refuſe.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XXVII.

The ſentence of death is paſt; and now who, with dry eyes, can behold the ſad pomp of the Saviour's bloody execution! All the ſtreets are full of gazing ſpectators, waiting for the ruthful ſight; at laſt, O Saviour, I behold thee coming out of Pilate's gate, bearing

CHAP. XXVIII.

Chriſt's reſurrection is declared by an angel to the women: he himſelf appeareth unto them. The chief prieſts give the ſoldiers money to ſay that he was ſtolen out of his ſepulchre.

that which ſhall ſoon bear thee; But alas! worn out with ſorrows, and unequal to the burden, the bleſſed Jeſus ſoon ſinks beneath its inſupportable weight. It is not out of any compaſſion of thy miſery, or care of thine eaſe, bleſſed ſufferer, that Simon of Cyrene is forced to ſuſtain thy Croſs: it was out of thine enemies eagerneſs for thy diſpatch; thy feeble paces were too ſlow for their purpoſe; their thirſt after thy blood made them impatient of delay.

Hadſt thou done this out of choice, which thou didſt out of conſtraint, how ſhould I have envied thee, O Simon, as too happy in the honour to be the firſt man who bore that croſs of thy Saviour, an honour, wherein multitudes of bleſſed martyrs, ſince that time, have been ambitious to ſucceed thee! Thus to bear thy croſs for thee, O Saviour, was more than to bear a crown from thee. Could I be worthy to be thus graced by thee, I ſhould pity all other glories.

Jeruſalem could not want malefactors, though Barabbas was diſmiſſed: that all this execution might ſeem to be done out of zeal for juſtice, two capital offenders ſhall accompany thee, O Saviour, both to thy death, and in it. Long ago was this unbecoming ſociety foretold by the evangelical ſeer. He was taken from priſon and from judgement; He was cut off out of the land of the living; He made his grave with the wicked. It had been diſparagement enough to thee, adorable Jeſus, to be ſorted with the beſt of men, ſince there is much ſin in the moſt perfect, and there could be no ſin in thee. But to be matched with the refuſe of mankind, whom juſtice would not ſuffer to live, is ſuch an indignity as confounds my thoughts! Surely there is no angel in heaven, but would have rejoiced to attend thee, and what could the earth afford worthy of thy train? No, ye fond judges, ye are deceived. This is the way to grace your dying malefactors. This is not the way to diſgrace Him, whoſe guiltleſſneſs and perfection triumph over your injuſtice. His preſence was able to make your thieves happy: Their preſence could no more blemiſh him than your own. Thus guarded, thus attended, thus accompanied, is the bleſſed ſufferer led to that loathſome and infamous hill, which now his laſt blood ſhall make ſacred. There, while he is addreſſing himſelf for his laſt act, He is preſented with that bitter and farewel potion, wherewith dying malefactors were wont to have their ſenſes ſtupified, that they might not feel the torments of their execution. It was but the common mercy to alleviate the death of offenders, ſince the intent of their laſt doom is not ſo much ſhame, as diſſolution. That draught, O Saviour, was not more welcome to the guilty, than hateful to thee. In the vigour of all thine inward and outward ſenſes, thou wouldeſt encounter the moſt violent aſſaults of death, and ſcornedſt to abate the leaſt touch of thy quickeſt apprehenſion! Thou doſt but taſte of this cup; it is a far bitterer than this that thou art about to drink up to the dregs. Thou refuſedſt that which was offered thee by men, but that which was mixed by thine eternal Father, though mere wormwood and gall, thou didſt drink up to the laſt drop; and therein, O bleſſed Jeſus! lies all our health and ſalvation. I know not whether I do more ſuffer in thy pain, or joy in the iſſue of thy ſufferings.

Now, even now, O Saviour, art thou entering into thoſe dreadful liſts, and now art thou grappling with thy laſt enemy, as if thou hadſt not ſuffered till now. Now thy bloody paſſion begins. A cruel expoliation is the preface to this violence; again do theſe mercileſs ſoldiers lay their rude hands upon thee, and ſtrip thee naked; again are thoſe bleeding ſcourges laid open to all eyes; again muſt thy ſacred body undergo the ſhame of an abhorred nakedneſs: Lo! Thou that clotheſt man with raiment, and all nature with its covering, ſtandeſt expoſed to the ſcorn of all beholders! As the firſt Adam entered into his paradiſe, ſo doſt thou the ſecond Adam into thine,—naked; and as the firſt Adam was clothed in innocence, when he had no covering, ſo wert thou the ſecond too: and more than ſo, thy nakedneſs, O Saviour, clothes our ſouls, not with innocence only, but with beauty: Hadſt not thou been naked, we had been clothed with confuſion. O happy nakedneſs! whereby we are covered with ſhame: O happy ſhame! whereby we are inveſted with glory.

Shame is ſucceeded by pain; methinks I ſee and feel, how having faſtened the tranſverſe to the body of that fatal tree, and laid it upon the ground, they racked and ſtrained the tender and ſacred limbs of my Redeemer, to fit the extent of their four appointed meaſures, and having tortured out his arms beyond their natural reach, how they faſtened them with cords, till thoſe ſtrong iron nails, which were driven up to the head through the palms of his bleſſed hands, had not more firmly than painfully fixed him to the croſs! The fatal tree is raiſed up, and with a vehement concuſſion ſettled in the mortice!——Woe is me, how are the joints and ſinews of this patient ſufferer torn, by this ſevere diſtenſion! how doth his own weight torment him, whilſt his whole body reſts upon this forced and dolorous hold! how did the rough iron pierce his ſoul, while, paſſing through thoſe tender and ſenſible parts, it carried his fleſh before it, and, as it were, riveted it to that ſhameful tree!

There now, Almighty Sufferer, there now thou hangeſt between heaven and earth, naked, bleeding, forlorn, deſpicable, a ſpectacle of miſeries, the ſcorn of men. Is this the head that is decked by thine eternal Father with a crown of pure gold, of immortal and incomprehenſible Majeſty, which is now bleeding with a diadem of thorns? Is this the eye that ſaw the heavens opened, and the Holy Ghoſt deſcending upon that head, which now begins to be overclouded with death? Are theſe the ears that heard the voice of thy Father owning thee out of heaven, which now glow with reproaches, and bleed with thorns? Are theſe the lips, that ſpake as never man ſpake,—full of grace and power, which are now ſwollen with blows, and diſcoloured with blueneſs and blood? Is this the face that ſhould be fairer than the ſons of men, which the angels of heaven ſo deſired to ſee, and can never be ſatisfied with ſeeing, which is thus defiled with the foul mixtures of ſweat and blood and ſpittings? Are theſe the hands, that ſtretched out the heavens as a curtain; that by their touch healed the lame, the deaf, the blind; which are now bleeding with the nails? Are theſe the feet, which walked lately upon the liquid pavement of the ſea, before whoſe footſtool all the nations of the earth are forbidden to worſhip, which are now ſo painfully fixed to the croſs? O cruel and unthankful mankind, that offered ſuch treatment to the Lord of life! O infinitely merciful Saviour, who would ſuffer all this for unthankful men; where ſhall we find words ſufficiently ſtrong to expreſs our boundleſs obligations?

Now, O ye cruel prieſts and elders of the Jews, you have full leiſure to feed your eyes with the ſight you have ſo much longed for! There is the blood ye purchaſed; and is not your malice yet ſatiated? Is not all this enough, without your taints and ſcoffs at ſo exquiſite a miſery? The people, the paſſengers, are taught to inſult where they ſhould pity; every man hath a ſcorn ready to caſt at a dying innocent: a generous nature is more wounded by the tongue, than with the hand. Thine ear, O Saviour, was more painfully pierced than thy brows, or hands, or feet. It could not but go deep into thy ſoul, to hear theſe bitter reproaches from thoſe whom thou cameſt to ſave.

But alas! how trifling were theſe, in compariſon of the inward torments which thy ſoul felt, in the ſenſe and apprehenſion of thy Father's wrath for the ſins of the whole world; which now lay heavier upon thee for ſatisfaction. This, O this it was that preſſed thy ſoul, as it were, to the nethermoſt hell: whilſt thine eternal Father looked lovingly upon thee, what didſt thou, what neededſt thou to care for the frowns of men or of devils? But once he turned his face from thee, or bent his brows upon thee, this was worſe than death. It is no marvel now if darkneſs were upon the face of the whole earth, when thy Father's face was eclipſed from thee by the interpoſition of our ſins; how ſhould there be light in the world without, when the God of the world, the Father of lights, complains of the want of light within! That word of thine, O Saviour, was enough to bring down the ſun out of heaven, and to diſſolve the whole frame of nature, when thou criedſt, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me!

Oh what pangs were thoſe, bleſſed Lord, which drew this dolorous complaint from thee! Thou well kneweſt that nothing could be more cordial to thine enemies, than to hear this mournful language from thee! They could ſee but the outſide of thy ſufferings. Never could they have conceived ſo deep an anguiſh of thy ſoul, if thy own lips had not expreſſed it. Yet, as not regarding their triumph, thou thus poureſt out thy ſorrow; and when ſo much is uttered, who can conceive what is felt! This was the very acme of that bitter paſſion, which thou wouldeſt undergo for us; when the Lord laid on thee the iniquities of us all. O Saviour, hadſt thou not thus ſuffered, we muſt have borne the heavy weight for ever; hadſt thou not been thus forſaken for a moment, we muſt have periſhed from the preſence of God eternally. Thy ſufferings are our ſalvation; Thy diſſolution is our ſafety.

But the ſeverity of this torment was not long to be borne; and now the meaſure of thy ſufferings, as well as the prophecies concerning thee, being fulfilled; all types and ceremonies, all ſatisfactions, both happily effected and proclaimed; nothing now remains, but a voluntary, ſweet, and heavenly reſignation of thy bleſſed ſoul into the hands of thine eternal Father; and a bowing of thy head for the change of a better crown, and an inſtant entrance into reſt, triumph, and glory.

And now, O bleſſed Jeſus, how eaſily have carnal eyes all this while miſtaken the paſſages and intentions of this thy laſt and moſt glorious work! Our weakneſs could hitherto ſee nothing here but pain and ignominy; now my better enlightened eyes ſee in the elevation of thine both honour and happineſs. Lo thou that art the Mediator between God and man, the Reconciler of heaven and earth, art lifted up betwixt earth and heaven, that thou mighteſt accord both. Thou that art the great captain of our ſalvation, the conqueror of all the adverſe powers of death and hell, art exalted upon this triumphal chariot of the croſs, that thou mighteſt trample upon death, and drag all thoſe infernal principalities manacled after thee. Thoſe arms which thine enemies meant violently to extend, are ſtretched forth for the embracing all mankind. Even whilſt thou ſuffereſt, thou reigneſt. O the impotent madneſs of vain men! they think to diſgrace thee with bitter ſcoffs, with poor wretched indignities; when in the mean time, the heavens declare thy righteouſneſs, O Lord, and the earth ſhews forth thy power! The ſun withholds his light, as not enduring to ſee the ſuffering of his Creator. The earth trembles under a ſenſe of the wrong done to her maker. The rocks rend; the veil of the temple tears from the top to the bottom; in ſhort, the frame of the whole world acknowledges the dominion of that Son of God whom man deſpiſed. Thou therefore, O my ſoul, unite in acknowledgment not only of his dominion, but of his love; and living in conſtant adoration of his tender mercies, who died for thee on the croſs, intreat him in the laſt hour to ſuſtain thee, and to enable thee to ſay, with all his fortitude and faith, Father, into thine hands I commend my ſpirit!

Chriſt appeareth to his diſciples, and ſendeth them to baptize and teach all nations.

IN the end of the ſabbath, as it began to dawn towards the firſt day of the week, came Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, to ſee the ſepulchre.

2 And behold, there was a great earthquake: for the angel of the Lord deſcended from heaven, and came and rolled back the ſtone from the door, and ſat upon it.

3 His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as ſnow;

4 And for fear of him the keepers did ſhake, and became as dead men.

Chap. XXVIII. Ver. 1. In the end of the ſabbath, &c.] Dr. Waterland cloſes the laſt chapter thus, Sealing a ſtone, and ſetting a watch late on the ſabbath; and begins the preſent,—and when it began to dawn, &c. As the Jewiſh day began at ſun-ſetting, the Jews diſtinguiſhed the evening into two parts, which they called the firſt and ſecond evening; the firſt being the evening with which the preceding day ended, and the ſecond the evening with which the new day began. The firſt evening was the ſpace from three in the afternoon to ſun-ſetting; the ſecond began at ſun-ſetting, and laſted till nine, comprehending the whole firſt watch of the night. Thoſe able and ingenious writers who have wrote upon our Lord's reſurrection are not agreed whether the word rendered the end, ſignifies the firſt evening or the ſecond. I. They who imagine that the firſt evening was intended by the hiſtorian, ſuppoſe that the two Maries went to viſit the ſepulchre at the end of the Jewiſh ſabbath, or about the ſetting of the ſun; but that they were prevented by the earthquake, mentioned ver. 2. which frighted them ſo, that they turned back. To remove the objection which might be drawn from the expreſſion, as it began to dawn, τῃ ἐπιφωσκούσῃ, they obſerve, that the Greek word, though it implies that idea in its primary ſignification, yet in Luke xxiii. 54. ſignifies to be about to begin, or to draw on, and that the word ſhould be uſed in the ſame ſenſe in this paſſage;—In the end of the ſabbath, as it drew near to the firſt day of the week. II. They who imagine the hiſtorian is ſpeaking of the ſecond evening, are ſupported by the account in St. Mark, as well as that in St. John; for whether we take the Greek word to ſignify to draw near, or to dawn, as both theſe interpretations may imply it was yet dark, its beginning, or drawing near to the dawn, will be allowed to denote the ſame point of time; namely, the end of the night, and the beginning of the day. The only queſtion ariſing from this interpretation is, how this can be reconciled with the time mentioned by St. Mark, namely, the riſing of the ſun, ch. xvi. 2. But this queſtion may be ſolved upon the principle of the former hypotheſis, that the women ſet out towards the end of the evening, or towards the dawn, but were prevented from coming to the ſepulchre till the time determined by St. Mark. And indeed the order of St. Matthew's narration requires, that his words ſhould be underſtood to ſignify the time of their ſetting out, otherwiſe all that is related of the earthquake, &c. muſt be thrown into a parentheſis, which very much diſturbs the ſeries of the ſtory, and introduces much greater harſhneſs into the conſtruction, than any avoided by it; nay, it muſt be confeſſed that there can hardly be any harſhneſs in the interpretation now contended for. The word ἦλθε in St. Matthew, might as well have been tranſlated went, as came. The verb itſelf ſignifying both to go, and to come, and conſequently being capable of either ſenſe, as the context may require. That in St. Matthew requires to take the original word in the former ſenſe, for the ſake of order, and for the following reaſon. The principal fact, upon the account of which the whole ſtory of the women's going to the ſepulchre ſeems to have been related, is the reſurrection of Chriſt; and this fact is abſolutely without a date, if the words of St. Matthew are to be underſtood to denote the time of the women's arrival at the ſepulchre. When we ſay without a date, we mean, that it does not appear from any thing in St. Matthew or the other evangeliſts what hour of that night this great event happened: All the information they give us is, that when the women came to the ſepulchre, they were told by angels that he was riſen. But on the contrary, by underſtanding St. Matthew to ſpeak of the time of Mary Magdalen's ſetting out to take a view of the ſepulchre, we have the date of the reſurrection ſettled, and know preciſely that Chriſt roſe from the dead between the dawning of the day and the ſun riſing; and can any ſubſtantial reaſon be aſſigned, why St. Matthew, having thought fit to enter into ſo circumſtantial an account of the reſurrection, ſhould omit the date of ſo important a fact; or that, not intending to mark it, by mentioning the time of the women's going to the ſepulchre, he ſhould place that fact before another, which in order of time is prior to it. All theſe conſiderations, therefore, ſeem to be powerful arguments for underſtanding this paſſage of St. Matthew in the ſenſe above expreſſed. About St. Mark's meaning there is no diſpute: He certainly intended to expreſs the time of the women's arrival at the ſepulchre; his words cannot be taken in any other ſenſe: Thoſe in St. John are limited to the ſame interpretation with thoſe of St. Matthew; it having been allowed before, that they both ſpeak of the ſame point of time.

The reaſon of the two Maries ſetting out ſo early is here aſſigned, They went to take a view of the ſepulchre; i. e. in general, to ſee if all things were in the ſame condition in which they had left them two days before; that if in that interval any thing extraordinary had happened, they might report it to their companions, and in conjunction with them take their meaſures accordingly. Hence it is alſo evident why they were ſo few in number; they came to view the ſepulchre, and came before the time appointed for their meeting. They knew that they themſelves were not able to roll away the ſtone which they had ſeen placed by Joſeph of Arimathea at the mouth of the ſepuchre, and which they knew could not be removed without a great number of hands. Accordingly, as they drew near, they ſaid among themſelves, Who ſhall roll away the ſtone for us from the door of the ſepulchre? Words which intimate that one of their chief views in coming to ſee the ſepulchre was to ſurvey this ſtone, and to conſider whether they, and the other women who had appointed to meet them there, were by themſelves able to remove it, or whether they muſt have recourſe to the aſſiſtance of others; for who ſhall roll away the ſtone for us? implies a ſenſe of their own inability, and of the neceſſity of calling in others; after which the only thing to be conſidered was whom, and how many. This therefore was the point under deliberation, when they approached the ſepulchre. It is plain from theſe words that they did not expect to find any body there, and conſequently that they knew nothing of the guard which the high prieſts had ſet to watch the ſepulchre; of which had they received any intelligence, they would hardly have ventured to come at all, or would not have deliberated about rolling away the ſtone, as the only or greateſt difficulty. See Weſt on the Reſurrection, p. 48, 49.

Ver. 2—4. And behold, there was a great earthquake] While the women were going to the ſepulchre, there was a great earthquake, namely, that which preceded the moſt memorable event which ever happened among men,—the reſurrection of the Son of God from the dead. This earthquake probably frightened the women to ſuch a degree, that they immediately returned back; or their return might have been rendered neceſſary by a ſtorm, if this earthquake was attended with a ſtorm; or we may eſpouſe the opinion of Hammond and Le Clerc, who interpret the words σεισμὸς μέγας in this paſſage of a tempeſt only. Σεισμὸς properly ſignifies any ſhaking, whether in earth, air, or ſea. As the tempeſt therefore, or earthquake, which preceded our Lord's reſurrection was a great one, it could hardly fail to lay the women under a neceſſity of returning. The guards, it is true, remained at the ſepulchre all the while; but there was a great difference between the tempers of the perſons; not to mention that the men being ſoldiers, duty obliged them to keep their poſt as long as poſſible. The whole of this account acquires a further degree of probability from the following remark; that on ſuppoſition our Lord's reſurrection was preceded by a tempeſt, or earthquake, or both, which frightened the two Maries as they went to the ſepulchre, and made them turn back, we can ſee the reaſon why the women did not go out with the ſpices till the morning, notwithſtanding, according to St. Luke, they had bought and prepared at leaſt the greateſt part of them the evening on which Jeſus was buried; and notwithſtanding the nature of embalming required that they ſhould make as much diſpatch as poſſible. After the two Maries returned, they went with their companions to get ready ſuch ſpices as were neceſſary to complete their preparation; ſee Mark lxi. 1. and while they were making theſe preparations for embalming Jeſus, he aroſe from the dead; this reſurrection being preceded, as we obſerve, by the deſcent of an angel, who aſſumed a very aweful and majeſtic form, inſomuch that the keepers ſhook, and became as dead men, for fear of him: probably they fainted away. It is not ſaid at what particular inſtant Jeſus aroſe, whether it was before the guards fell into the ſwoon, or after they recovered themſelves and fled. St. Mark indeed, by obſerving that Jeſus appeared firſt to Mary Magdalen, may be thought to inſinuate that the guards did not ſee him when he aroſe; yet the Evangeliſt's words do not neceſſarily imply this: for his meaning may be, that he appeared to Mary Magdalen firſt of all the diſciples only. Beſides, though the guards ſaw him ariſe, it was, properly ſpeaking, no appearance of Chriſt to them: however, be this as it will, it is certain that Jeſus was ariſen and gone, before any of the women arrived at the ſepulchre. Probably alſo the angel had left the ſtone on which he ſat at firſt, and had entered into the ſepulchre; for, as we ſhall ſee imediately, when he ſhewed himſelf to the women, he invited them not to go away, but to come, and ſee the place where the Lord lay. Beſides, when the women obſerved the ſtone rolled from the door of the ſepulchre, they ſaw no angel ſitting on the ſtone, as is evident from their going forward ſo briſkly; ſee Mark xvi. 5. The purpoſe of this angel's deſcending from heaven, ſays Mr. Weſt, ſeems to have been, not only to roll away the ſtone from the mouth of the ſepulchre, that the women who were on their way thither might have free entrance to it, but alſo to fright away the ſoldiers who were ſet to guard it; and who, had they continued there, would certainly not have permitted the diſciples of Jeſus to have made the neceſſary inquiries for their conviction. Could it be ſuppoſed that either they or the women would have attempted to enter into the ſepulchre while it was ſurrounded by a Roman guard? For this end it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe he might not only raiſe a tempeſtuous earthquake, but aſſume a countenance of terror, flaſhing with dreadful light amidſt the darkneſs

5 And the angel anſwered and ſaid unto the women, Fear not ye: for I know that ye ſeek Jeſus, which was crucified.

6 He is not here: for he is riſen, as he ſaid. Come, ſee the place where the Lord lay.

7 And go quickly, and tell his diſciples, that he is riſen from the dead; and behold, he goeth before you into Galilee: there ſhall ye ſee him: lo, I have told you.

8 And they departed quickly from the ſepulchre, with fear and great joy; and did run to bring his diſciples word.

9 And as they went to tell his diſciples, behold, Jeſus met them, ſaying, All hail! And they came and held him by the feet, and worſhipped him.

10 Than ſaid Jeſus unto them, Be not afraid: go tell my brethren, that they go into Galilee, and there ſhall they ſee me.

11 Now when they were going, behold, ſome of the watch came into the city, and neſs of the night; which were circumſtances ſo full of amazement, that they could not fail of producing, even in the hearts of Roman ſoldiers, the conſternation mentioned by the Evangeliſts, and driving them from a poſt, of which the Divinity (for ſo, according to their way of ſpeaking and acting, they might have ſtiled the angel) had now taken the poſſeſſion. The reaſonableneſs of theſe two purpoſes every body muſt acknowledge, and that this is a very material point towards eſtabliſhing the credibility of the fact. Eſpecially if we conſider, that without the interpoſition of heaven the ſepulchre would not have been opened, nor the guard removed, till after the expiration of the third day, the day prefixed by Chriſt for his reſurrection from the dead: in which caſe, though no earthly power could have hindered Chriſt from coming out of the ſepulchre, yet the door remaining cloſed, and the guard continuing there, muſt effectually have prevented that examination into the ſtate of the ſepulchre, which convinced St. John that Chriſt was riſen; and which, if it did not of itſelf amount to a clear proof of the reſurrection, was at leaſt admirably calculated to prepare the minds not of the Apoſtles only, but of all the Jews who were at that time in Jeruſalem, to admit ſuch other proofs as were afterwards offered to their conſideration; for it is not to be imagined that none but the diſciples of Jeſus viſited the ſepulchre that day. See Weſt and Macknight.

Ver. 5—7. And the angel anſwered] This paragraph is not ſo connected with the preceding, as if nothing had intervened; ſince it will be found, upon a cloſer examination of it, and comparing it with its parallel, Mark xvi. 2—8. that between the ſoldiers becoming like dead men, and the angels ſpeaking to the women, Salome had joined the two Maries in their way to the ſepulchre; that before they arrived there, the keepers were fled, and the angel was removed from off the ſtone, and ſeated within the ſepulchre; for which reaſon the particle δὲ, inſtead of being rendered by the copulative and, ſhould rather be expreſſed by the disjunctive but, or now, as denoting an interruption in the narration, and the beginning of a new paragraph. See Weſt, p. 23.

Ver. 8. And they departed quickly, &c.] And they inſtantly left the ſepulchre:—Verſion of 1729. And they haſtily went out of the ſepulchre, Heylin. This verſe contains a beautiful deſcription of the mingled paſſions.

Ver. 9, 10. And as they went—Jeſus met them] In the general ſcheme of the reſurrection which I propoſe giving at the end of St. John's Goſpel, when we have had the whole narrative before us, the preciſe time and circumſtances of this meeting of our Lord's with the women will be ſhewn.

Ver. 11—15. Now when they were going, &c.] The chief prieſts, having received the report of the guard, called the whole ſenate together, and conſulted among themſelves what they were to do. The deliberations, however, of the meeting were not kept ſecret. They were reported to the diſciples, perhaps by Joſeph and Nicodemus, two members of the council, who were our Lord's friends. The prieſts were reduced to a moſt abſurd ſtory, though certainly the beſt colour which they could put on the affair; a ſtory, which they endeavoured by bribery and every other mean method to propagate as much as they could; and accordingly St. Matthew tells us, ver. 15. that this idle tale was commonly reported among the Jews, even ſo long after the aſcenſion of our Lord, as when he wrote his Goſpel. Juſtin Martyr informs us, that the Jews ſent a reſcript or embaſſy to their brethren of the diſperſion, and their converts, all over the globe, affirming this very thing; and Tertullian likewiſe ſays as much. To furniſh the Jewiſh converts with an anſwer to this abſurd ſtory, ſo induſtriouſly propagated among their unbelieving brethren, and ſupported by the authority of the chief-prieſts and elders, this Evangeliſt relates at large the hiſtory of the guarding the ſepulchre, the earthquake, the deſcent of the angel, his rolling away the ſtone, and the fright of the ſoldiers at his appearance: And indeed, by comparing this relation with the report given out by the ſoldiers, it will eaſily appear on which ſide the truth lay. For as there is nothing in the miraculous reſurrection of our Lord, ſo repugnant to reaſon and probability, as that the diſciples ſhould be able to roll away the ſtone which cloſed up the mouth of the ſepulchre, and carry off the body of Jeſus unperceived by the ſoldiers, who were ſet there on purpoſe to guard againſt ſuch an attempt; ſo it is alſo evident, that the particulars of the ſoldiers report were founded upon the circumſtances of this hiſtory. In this report three things are aſſerted; viz. that the diſciples ſtole the body—that they ſtole it in the night—and that they ſtole it while the guards were aſleep. That Jeſus came out of the ſepulchre before the riſing of the ſun, St. Matthew informs us; who ſays, that the earthquake, &c. happened at the time when Mary Magdalene and the other Mary ſet out to take a view of the ſepulchre, which was juſt as the day began to break. This fact was undoubtedly too notorious for the chief prieſts to venture at falſifying it, and was beſides favourable to the two other articles: This therefore they admitted; and taking the hint from what the ſoldiers told them, of their having been caſt into a ſwoon or trance, and becoming like dead men at the appearance of the angel, and conſequently, not having ſeen our Saviour come out of the ſepulchre, they forged the remaining part of this ſtory, that his diſciples came and ſtole him away, while they ſlept. They took the hint, we ſay, of framing theſe two laſt mentioned articles from that circumſtance related by St. Matthew, of the keepers ſhaking and becoming like dead men upon the ſight of the angel; for throughout this whole hiſtory there was no other beſides this, upon which they could prevaricate and diſpute. The ſtone was rolled away from the ſepulchre, and the body was gone; this the chief prieſts were to account for, without allowing that Jeſus was riſen from the dead. The diſciples, they ſaid, ſtole it away. What! while the guards were there? Yes; the guards were aſleep. With this anſwer they knew many would be ſatisfied, without enquiring any farther into the matter: but they could not expect that every body would be ſo contented; eſpecially as they had reaſon to apprehend, that although the ſoldiers, who had taken their money, might be faithful to them, keep their ſecret, and atteſt the ſtory they had framed for them, yet the truth might come out by means of thoſe whom they had not bribed; for St. Matthew ſays, ver. 11. "SOME of the watch went into the city, and ſhewed, &c." Some therefore remained behind, who probably had no ſhare of the money which the chief prieſts gave to the ſoldiers; or, if they had, in all likelihood it came too late: they had already divulged the truth, as well from the eagerneſs which all men naturally have to tell a wonderful ſtory, as from a deſire of juſtifying themſelves for having quitted their poſt. The chief prieſts therefore were to guard againſt this event alſo; in order to which nothing could be more effectual than to counterwork the evidence of one part of the ſoldiers, by putting into the mouths of others of them a ſtory, which, without directly contradicting the facts, might yet tend to overthrow the only concluſion which the diſciples of Jeſus would endeavour to draw from them, and which they were ſo much concerned to diſcredit; viz. That Jeſus was riſen from the dead. For if the diſciples and partizans of Jeſus, informed by ſome of the ſoldiers of the ſeveral circumſtances related in St. Matthew, ſhould urge theſe miraculous events as ſo many proofs of the reſurrection of their Maſter, the unbelieving Jews were, by the teſtimony of thoſe ſuborned witneſſes, inſtructed to anſwer that the earthquake and angel were illuſions and dreams,—that the ſoldiers had honeſtly confeſſed they were aſleep, though ſome of them, to ſcreen themſelves from the ſhame or puniſhment that ſuch a breach of duty deſerved, pretended they were frightened into a ſwoon or trance by an extraordinary appearance, which they never ſaw, or ſaw only in a dream;—that while they ſlept, the diſciples came and ſtole the body; for none of the ſoldiers, not even thoſe who ſaw moſt, pretend to have ſeen Jeſus come out of the ſepulchre;—they were all equally ignorant by what means the body was removed;—when they awaked it was miſſing;—and it was more likely that the diſciples ſhould have ſtolen it away, than that an impoſtor ſhould riſe from the dead. This ſtory is founded entirely upon the circumſtance of the ſoldiers not having ſeen Jeſus come out of the ſepulchre; a circumſtance, that even thoſe who told the real truth could not contradict, though they accounted for it in a different manner, by ſaying they were frightened into a ſwoon or trance at the ſight of a terrible apparition, which came and rolled away the ſtone, and ſat upon it. But this fact the chief prieſts thought not prudent to allow, as favouring too much the opinion of Chriſt's being riſen from the dead; neither did they reject it entirely, becauſe they intended to turn it to their own advantage; and therefore, denying every thing that was miraculous, they conſtrued this ſwoon or trance into a ſleep, and, with a large ſum of money and promiſes of impunity, hired the ſoldiers to confeſs a crime, and, by taking ſhame to themſelves, to cover them from confuſion. The guards ſay that they were aſleep, and that the diſciples in the mean time ſtole away the body: But how came they to be ſo punctual in relating what happened when they were aſleep? What induced them to believe that the body was ſtolen at all? What, that it was ſtolen by the diſciples, ſhewed unto the chief prieſts all the things that were done.

12 And when they were aſſembled with the elders, and had taken counſel, they gave large money unto the ſoldiers;

13 Saying, Say ye, His diſciples came by night, and ſtole him away, while we ſlept.

14 And if this come to the governor's ears, we will perſuade him, and ſecure you.

15 So they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this ſaying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day.

16 Then the eleven diſciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jeſus had appointed them.

17 And when they ſaw him, they worſhipped him: but ſome doubted.

18 And Jeſus came and ſpake unto them, ſaying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth.

Ver. 16. Ch. xxvi. 32.—V. 18. Ch. xi. 27. Luke x. 22. John iii. 35. v. 22. xvii. 2. Epheſ. i. 21. Hebr. i. 2. ii. 8.

ſince by their own confeſſion, they were aſleep, and ſaw nothing,—ſaw nobody? As this ſtory has no evidence to ſupport it, ſo neither has it any probability. The diſciples were weak ignorant men, full of the popular prejudices and ſuperſtitions of their country; and is it likely that ſuch men ſhould engage in ſo deſperate a deſign, as to ſteal away the body in oppoſition to the combined power of the Jews and Romans? What could tempt them to do it? What good could the dead body do them? Or, if it could have done them any, what hope had they to ſucceed in the attempt? A dead body requires many hands to move it; beſides, the great ſtone at the mouth of the ſepulchre was to be removed, which could not be done ſilently, or by men walking on tip-toes to prevent diſcovery; ſo that if the guards had really been aſleep, yet there was no encouragement to go on in this enterprize; for it is hardly poſſible to ſuppoſe, but that rolling away the ſtone, moving the body, the hurry and confuſion in carrying it off, muſt awaken them. But ſuppoſing the thing practicable, yet the attempt was ſuch as the diſciples, conſiſtently with their national prejudices, could not undertake. They continued all their Maſter's lifetime to expect to ſee him a temporal prince, and they had the ſame expectations after his death. Conſider now their caſe; their Maſter was dead, and they are to contrive to ſteal away his body; for what? Did they expect to make a king of the dead body, if they could get it? or, did they think, if they had it, they could raiſe it again? This is in all views abſurd. It is not to be imagined that none but the diſciples of Jeſus viſited the ſepulchre that day. The ſtory told by the ſoldiers undoubtedly ſoon ſpread all over Jeruſalem; and bare curioſity, without any other motive, was ſurely ſufficient to carry numbers to ſurvey the ſcene of ſo aſtoniſhing an event:—A ſepulchre hewn out of a rock, cloſed with a vaſt ſtone, committed to a guard of Roman ſoldiers, notwithſtanding all theſe precautions, opened, as one part of the ſoldiers reported, by an angel, as others ſaid, by the diſciples of Jeſus, who ſtole away the body, which in effect was miſſing. Theſe two different and irreconcileable reports muſt have likewiſe induced others to go and conſider upon the ſpot, by examining into the nature and ſituation of the ſepulchre, the probability of that report, which charged the diſciples with having ſtolen away the body; for as, upon that ſuppoſition, none but human means are ſaid to be employed, to know whether thoſe means were proportioned to the effects aſcribed to them, it was neceſſary to compare what was done with the manner in which it was to be performed. And upon ſuch an examination, it muſt have appeared to every conſiderate man, if not impoſſible, at leaſt improbable in the higheſt degree, for the diſciples of Jeſus to have ſtolen his body away, while the guards were at their poſts. For ſuppoſing the diſciples to be the reverſe of what they were,—bold, enterprizing, cunning impoſtors, and capable of making ſo hazardous an attempt; can it alſo be ſuppoſed, that a company of Roman ſoldiers, trained up under the ſtricted diſcipline, and placed there but the evening before, ſhould be all aſleep at the ſame time, and all ſleep ſo ſoundly and ſo long, as not to be awakened, either by the rolling away the ſtone, which muſt certainly have been very large, or by the carrying off the body? the former of which required a great number of hands, and the latter muſt have appeared to have been done with ſome deliberation, ſince the linen cloths in which the body was wrapped, and the napkin that was about the head, were found folded up and laid in different parts of the ſepulchre. The ſepulchre was hewed or hollowed out of the ſolid rock, and conſequently muſt have been entered by that only paſſage which was cloſed up by a large ſtone, and guarded by a band of Roman ſoldiers. Theſe ſeveral circumſtances, duly attended to, were of themſelves ſufficient to invalidate the teſtimony of thoſe ſoldiers who pretended that the diſciples ſtole away the body. But they were, on the other hand, very ſtrong arguments for the credibility of that account in which all the reſt at firſt agreed. For in this relation a cauſe is aſſigned proportionable to all the effects; effects, which, as they were viſible and notorious, as well as extraordinary, could not fail of exciting the natural curioſity of mankind, to enquire by what means they were brought about. The ſolution is eaſy and full;—for the angel deſcended, &c. ver. 23. This accounts for the terror of the ſoldiers; their deſerting their poſt; their precipitate flight into the city; for the ſtone's being rolled away from the mouth of the ſepulchre, even while it was ſurrounded by a Roman guard; for the ſepulchral linen being left in the grave folded up, and lying in different places; and for the body's being miſſing; and therefore the cauſe here aſſigned, however wonderful, is likely to be true. See Weſt on the Reſurrect. p. 16, &c. Sherlock's trial of the witneſſes, p. 43. &c. and Ditton on the Reſurrection. Inſtead of large money, ver. 12. the MS. before me reads, a large ſum of money.

Ver. 16, 17. Then the eleven diſciples went away, &c.] The time now approached when Jeſus was to ſhew himſelf publickly in Galilee, after having frequently ſhewn himſelf in a more private manner to his diſciples and the women. This was the moſt remarkable of all his appearances. He promiſed it to his apoſtles before his death, ch. xxvi. 32. The angels who attended at his reſurrection ſpoke of it to the women who came to the ſepulchre, and repreſented it as promiſed to them alſo, Mark xvi. 7. Nay, Jeſus himſelf, after his reſurrection, deſired the company of women to tell his brethren to go into Galilee, where they ſhould ſee him, as if the appearance he was to make that day, and on the eighth day thereafter, were of ſmall importance in compariſon. Moreover, the place where he was to appear in Galilee was mentioned by him, as St. Matthew here informs us. Whether there were more preſent at this appearance than the eleven, the evangeliſt does not ſay: nevertheleſs the circumſtances of the caſe direct us to believe that it had many witneſſes. This appearance was known before-hand. The place where it was to happen was pointed out by Jeſus himſelf. The report, therefore, of his being to appear, muſt have ſpread abroad, and brought many to the place at the appointed time. In ſhort, it is reaſonable to think that moſt of the diſciples now enjoyed the happineſs of beholding perſonally their maſter raiſed from the dead. What confirms this ſuppoſition is, that St. Paul ſays expreſly, that Jeſus after his reſurrection was ſeen of above five hundred at once, 1 Cor. xv. 6. For the number of the witneſſes mentioned by St. Paul, agrees better with the appearance on the mountain in Galilee, deſcribed by St. Matthew, that with any other. Galilee having been the principal ſcene of Chriſt's miniſtry, the greateſt part of his followers lived there; for which reaſon he choſe to make, what may be called, his moſt ſolemn and public appearance after his reſurrection on a mountain in that country; the appearance to which a general meeting of all his diſciples was ſummoned, not only by the angels who attended his reſurrection, but by our Lord himſelf, the very day on which he roſe. The greateſt part of thoſe preſent were ſo fully convinced the perſon they ſaw was their maſter, that they worſhipped him:—and when they ſaw him, they worſhipped him;—but ſome doubted: with reſpect to a few, their joy on ſeeing their Lord, put them into a kind of perturbation; and their deſire that it might be him, made them doubtful, and afraid that it was not. This reaſon is aſſigned by St. Luke for the unbelief of ſome on an occaſion previous to this, (See ch. xxvi. 41.)—They believed not for joy and wonder, and therefore it may be fitly offered to account for the unbelief of others on this. Beſides, the thing is agreeable to nature, men being commonly afraid to believe what they vehemently wiſh, leſt they ſhould indulge themſelves in falſe joys, which they muſt ſoon loſe: Hence the ſaying in Terence,—Miſera mens incredula eſt; quo plus cupio minus credo. "My anxious mind is incredulous; the more I wiſh, the leſs I believe." The caſe of the diſciples, whoſe deſire and joy made them doubt the truth of what they ſaw, may be illuſtrated by the inſtance of the ſtates of Greece and Aſia, whoſe joy and ſurprize on hearing a Roman herald declare them all free, and at liberty to uſe their own laws, had a ſimilar effect on them, as you will find the ſtory beautifully related in Livy, lib. xxxiii. ch. 35. The Pruſſian editors, however, who are followed by ſome others, render the clauſe thus,—even thoſe who had doubted. It is probable, that at this appearance the apoſtles received orders to return to Jeruſalem; for from Acts i. 3—12, compared with Luke xxiv. 50, it is plain that our Lord's diſcourſes before his aſcenſion, related Mark xvi. 15. and Luke xxiv. 44. were delivered in or near to the city. Beſides, he aſcended from the mount of Olives, as we ſhall ſee in the ſubſequent Evangeliſts. Wherefore, if the orders for the apoſtles to repair to Jeruſalem were not given at this appearance, Jeſus muſt have ſhewed himſelf again, which indeed is not impoſſible, as it is evident from 1 Cor. xv. 7. that he ſhewed himſelf ſome where, after his appearance to the five hundred brethren, to the apoſtle James alone, though none of the Evangeliſts have given the leaſt hint of this appearance. In the college of the apoſtles there were two perſons of that name; one the brother of John, who was killed by Herod, another the brother or couſin of Jeſus. Perhaps it was to James the brother of John, that our Lord appeared after his reſurrection; and his being to ſuffer martyrdom ſo early, might make this ſpecial favour neceſſary. See Macknight, Weſt, L'Enfant.

Ver. 18. All power is given unto me, &c.] Our Saviour here declares

19 Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt;

20 Teaching them to obſerve all things whatſoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen.

Ver. 19. Mark xvi. 15. Acts xiv. 21. Or, make diſciples, or Chriſtians of all nations.—V. 20. Acts ii. 42.

clares all power and authority to be given to him at his reſurrection; in conſequence of which power, he commiſſions his diſciples to convert, baptize, and inſtruct the world. There is no doubt but this power is part of the exaltation ſpoken of by St. Paul, to which God raiſed Chriſt for his ſufferings. See Philip. ii. 6. The powers delegated to the miniſters of the church, plainly derive themſelves from this power ſo received; and conſequently all acts done by them in the name of Chriſt, are founded in the power which he received at his reſurrection. See Rom. i. 4. Col. i. 15. Epheſ. 1. Our Saviour has told us, that all power is given unto him, in which he aſſerts both his own and the Father's authority; his own, as being inveſted with all power; his Father's, as being the author and fountain of all the power claimed and exerciſed by the Son. He has told us by his apoſtle, that at the conſummation of all things, the Son ſhall reſign his power, that God may be all in all; a ſufficient declaration, that the power now exerciſed by him is the Father's power, which, as it is at laſt to be given up to him, ſo was it at firſt received from him. From hence it is manifeſt, that the honour paid to Chriſt is ultimately referred to God the Father; for the honour paid to Chriſt being founded in the power and glory to which he is exalted; the honours paid muſt naturally follow the power and glory to which it relates, and at the laſt, terminate in the fountain and origin of that power and glory, even God the Father. By this means the peculiar honour of God the Father is ſecured, whilſt we worſhip and adore the Son. If we adore the Son, it is becauſe of the relation to the Father: If we honour our Redeemer, that honour muſt redound to his glory, who was in Chriſt reconciling the world to himſelf. If we apply it to Chriſt as our High-prieſt, at the ſame time we acknowledge His glory, who anointed him to this office. If we worſhip him who is head of the church, we cannot but adore him who gave Chriſt to be the head of the church: If we fall down before him who has all power and might, at the ſame time do we confeſs the excellency of the Father, who hath given him all power, and put all things in ſubjection under him. So that we cannot honour the Son as we ought to do, but we muſt at the ſame time honour the Father with the honour due to him. And this ſufficiently ſhews, that the Goſpel has not ſtrained the precepts of natural religion, in teaching us to honour the Son whom the Father hath exalted to the right-hand of majeſty on high, and given to be head over all principalities and powers, even to the conſummation of all things. See Sherlock's Diſcourſes, vol. 4. diſc. 1. part 4.

Ver. 19. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, &c.] And make diſciples in all nations. Wat. This commiſſion of our Lord marks out the difference between the Moſaic and the Chriſtian diſpenſation; the one was confined to the Jews, the other was extended to all the ſons and daughters of Adam. The whole tenor of the ſucceding books of the New Teſtament ſhews, that Chriſt's deſign by this commiſſion, was that the Goſpel ſhould be preached to all mankind without exception, not only to the Jews, but to all the idolatrous Gentiles: but the prejudices of the apoſtles led them at firſt to miſtake the ſenſe, and to imagine, that it referred only to their going to preach the Goſpel to the Jews among all nations, or to thoſe who ſhould be willing to become Jews. The word Μαθητεύσατε, is very properly rendered Proſelyte, or Make diſciples of, to diſtinguiſh it duly from διδάσκοντες, teaching, in the next verſe. The former ſeems to import inſtruction in the eſſentials of religion, which it was neceſſary adult perſons ſhould know and ſubmit to, before they could be admitted to baptiſm: the latter may relate to thoſe more particular admonitions in regard to Chriſtian faith and practice, which were to be built upon that foundation. Becauſe proſelyting is here enjoined as previous to baptiſm, it has been inferred by ſome that infants are not to be baptiſed: But if this argument were good, it would follow from Mark xvi. 16. that infants cannot be ſaved; nay, it is there declared, that he who believeth not ſhall be damned. The truth is, both paſſages muſt be interpreted according to the ſubjects treated of in them, which are plainly adult perſons; and therefore no argument can be drawn from them concerning either the baptiſm or the ſalvation of infants. Concerning baptiſm, as a Jewiſh cuſtom, ſee the note on chap. i. 6. In or into the name, is an Hebraiſm, which ſignifies to devote one's ſelf to any particular perſon, and to be deſirous of being called after his name; to profeſs one's ſelf his diſciple. Thus St. Paul ſays, 1 Cor. i. 13, &c. that he had baptiſed no one in his name, i. e. that he had made no one a convert to himſelf, as the founder of a new religion: ſee alſo 1 Cor. x. 2. Though perhaps we ſhould not poſitively aſſert, that the uſe of theſe very words is eſſential to Chriſtian baptiſm, yet ſurely the expreſſion muſt intimate the neceſſity of ſome diſtinct regard, to each of the ſacred three, which is always to be maintained in the adminiſtration of this ordinance; and conſequently it muſt imply that more was ſaid to thoſe of whoſe baptiſm we read in the Acts, than is there recorded, before they were admitted to it. The Chriſtian church in ſucceeding ages has acted a ſafe and wiſe part in retaining theſe words; and they contain ſo ſtrong an intimation, that each of theſe perſons is properly God, and that worſhip is to be paid, and glory aſcribed to each, that we cannot but hope they will be a means of maintaining the belief of the one, and the practice of the other, among the generality of Chriſtians to the end of the world. See Doddridge, Grotius, and Waterland's Sermons on the Trinity, p. 286.

Ver. 20. Teaching them, &c.] Chriſt's commands that nothing ſhould be taught which he himſelf had not taught. From whence it is evident that every thing fundamental may be found in the Goſpel; and that even the Apoſtles themſelves could not teach any thing as neceſſary to ſalvation, which Chriſt himſelf had not aſſerted to be ſo. The aſcenſion of our bleſſed Lord ſeems to have been a fact ſo well known to all the Chriſtians in Paleſtine, that there was no neceſſity for St. Matthew to mention it. It ſeems to be implied, and to have been declared to his diſciples, from this paſſage, which is intended to obviate the objection which would ariſe from conſidering that circumſtance; and our Lord may be repreſented as ſaying, "I am indeed going to heaven and ſhall not appear viſibly among you; but I ſhall always be ſpiritually preſent with you." St. Mark and St. Luke, writing to thoſe who lived out of Judea, very properly mention the aſcenſion, and were under a neceſſity to do ſo. Our Saviour adds, I am with yon always even to the end of the world; that is, to the final diſſolution of this temporary ſyſtem. "I am with you; I, the eternal Son of God; I, who have the angels at my beck, and make the devils tremble with my looks; I, who in your ſight have cauſed the ſtorms to ceaſe, the blind to ſee, the lame to walk, the dead to riſe, only with the word of my mouth; I, who have all power in heaven and earth committed to me,—am with you;—Not I will be with you; but I am with you,—in the preſent tenſe;—minding them thereby of his divine eſſence and power, to which all things are preſent; and therefore, as he elſewhere ſaith, Before Abraham was, I am; ſo here, I am with you, at all times, to the end of the world, as really as at this preſent: It follows, I am with You, my Apoſtles, who now receive commiſſion to go and convert all nations to the Chriſtian faith, to baptize and teach mankind the commands of Chriſt. I am with you πασας τὰς ἡμέρας, every day. Whereſoever you are, whenſoever you do any thing towards the executing the commiſſion which I have given you, I am with you in the doing of it; and that too to the very end of the world, i. e. ſo long as I have a church upon earth, which ſhall be till my coming again to judge the world: All this while I promiſe to be with you, and conſequently as long as the world ſhall laſt." See Bp. Beveridge's excellent firſt ſermon, vol. i. on Chriſt's preſence with his miniſters. Though the word Amen, with which each of the Goſpels ends, ſeems chiefly to have been intended as an intimation of the concluſion of the book, and as an aſſeveration of the certain truth of the things contained in it; yet, conſidering the connection of the word with the preceding promiſe, which was undoubtedly the greateſt ſtrength and joy of St. Matthew's heart, it is very natural to ſuppoſe, that it hath ſome ſuch reference as this to that promiſe. "Amen! bleſſed Jeſus, ſo may it indeed be; and may this important promiſe be fulfilled to us, and to our ſucceſſors, to the remoteſt ages in its full extent." St. John uſes the like turn in more expreſs language, in the laſt verſe but one of the Revelation; Surely I come quickly; Amen! Even ſo, come Lord Jeſus!

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XXVIII.

The grave is an unuſual ſtage for the diſplay of glory; the beſt that Job could ſay of it, when in the anguiſh of his ſoul he moſt deſired it, was, "There the wicked ceaſe from troubling; there the weary are at reſt." And ſome others, diſtreſſed like him, may think death eligible, and long for the grave as a refuge from miſery. Generally ſpeaking, however, the grave is an object of horror too loathſome to be deſcribed. There lie the ruins of man ſinking into corruption and putrefaction; and though a prepoſterous vanity may ſtrive to hide this diſgrace with the magnificence of pompous edifices, yet will ſuch ſepulchres ever be, what our Lord uſed them for,—emblems of hypocriſy and impoſture; which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead mens bones, and all uncleanneſs.

So offenſive, ignominious, and loathſome is the grave, in the ordinary courſe of nature; and it was the peculiar privilege of our Lord, that his reſt, his ſepulchre, ſhould be glorious, Iſai. xi. 10. For it was the theatre of his reſurrection. To methodize our thoughts upon this ſubject, it may be proper to conſider the glory of our Lord's reſurrection in two views; firſt, as it illuſtrates him; and ſecondly, as it influences us; for it is of the eſſence of glory to be diffuſive, and to ſtream forth from its ſubject upon all objects within its ſphere; which occaſions theſe diſtinct conſiderations of the glory of this his reſurrection, in its ſource, and in its influenec.

I. We ſhall diſcover ſomewhat of the perſonal glory of Chriſt, in the circumſtances of his reſurrection related by the Evangeliſts; and here it is material to obſerve, that not only the prophets, but he himſelf had often foretold it; a circumſtance which was particularly remarked by the angel who firſt brought the glad tidings to the two Maries, at their early viſit to his ſepulchre, He is not here, he is riſen; as he ſaid, ver. 6. that is, "according to his own prediction;" a circumſtance of great moment for eſtabliſhing our faith in this myſtery, and preventing or anſwering the cavils of Infidelity.

And firſt, He had frequently told it to his diſciples, as appears from many paſſages in the Goſpel, wherein he commonly foretels his death and reſurrection together; perhaps to mitigate a little the ſcandal of the croſs, by the glories which were to enſue; and at the ſame time to prepare their faith by the one for the other. At firſt his ſufferings could not but appear highly improbable to his diſciples; for they could not conceive how a perſon like him, veſted with omnipotence, ſhould ſuffer by Jew or Gentile, much leſs that he ſhould die under their hands: yet they ſaw this verified within five days after his triumphant entry into Jeruſalem; and this in reaſon ſhould have confirmed their faith in the remaining part of the prophecy, which concerned his reſurrection; for ſo our Lord intended it ſhould, as he declared upon a like occaſion; I tell you before it come to paſs, that when it is come to paſs, ye may believe that I am He. John xiii. 9.

But had the diſciples only been acquainted with theſe predictions, ſceptical men might have had ſome pretences againſt their teſtimony, at leaſt we ſhould have loſt many ſubſtantial proofs of the reſurrection, which the vigilant malice of the Jews has furniſhed; and therefore our Lord took proper occaſions to inform them of it. Indeed the Jews in general underſtood ſufficiently that he appealed to ſuch a reſurrection for the final confirmation of his divine miſſion, as appears particularly from their addreſs to Pilate, for a guard to watch his ſepulchre; wherein they mention his foretelling his reſurrection as a thing that was notorious: Pilate readily conſenting to their requeſt, left the guards to their diſpoſal; for if he had given them their directions himſelf, they might ſtill have had ſome room to pretend that right meaſures were not taken for ſecuring the ſepulchre; and therefore by the eſpecial appointment of Providence, to remove all the ſubterfuges of infidelity, they had the ordering of the guard themſelves.

Thus authorized by the governor, and animated by the paſſion which tranſported them, they neglect nothing. The tomb is cloſed with a great ſtone, that ſtone is ſealed, and the whole ſepulchre inveſted, and as it were, beſieged by ſoldiers. No precaution was omitted. There was no want of care to reproach themſelves with, that there might be no want of evidence wherewith to reproach the truth.

A needleſs proviſion this, againſt a few poor fiſhermen, who were naturally timorous and mean-ſpirited; who had abandoned their maſter at the firſt appearance of danger; who were ſince ſunk into conſternation and deſpair at his death, and whoſe hopes were all buried in the tomb with him; who were ſo far from an inclination, as well as capacity, for ſo hazardous an enterprize, that they were ſtrangely backward even to believe the miracle itſelf, when it was accompliſhed; and Thomas in particular was ſo obſtinate in his unbelief, that he would not be perſuaded of his Maſter's revival, till he had the teſtimony of all his ſenſes.

It was reaſonable to expect, that our Lord's perſecutors ſhould have firſt heard of his reſurrection from his diſciples; but as they had contrived matters, they received the news of it from their own watch flying in diſmay from the angelic viſion. Thus God, who in the order of his Providence converts the evil purpoſes of men to his glory, made the Jewiſh malice contribute to eſtabliſh the certainty of our Lord's reſurrection by ſuch proofs, as could not have happened but by their oppoſition.

And it was needful, that his glory ſhould at laſt break forth with a luſtre ſufficient to diſſipate any reaſonable doubt and ſurmiſe. For all his foregoing tranſactions from the manger to the tomb, although infinitely excellent, were little glorious; becauſe their merit was ſo veiled by his humility, that it was ſcarce diſcernable. Now glory is merit diſplayed; 'tis a manifeſtation of excellence; and the reſurrection is therefore, by way of eminence, the glorious myſtery, becauſe it was the manifeſtation of the excellency of Chriſt; it was a demonſtration of his divinity, which emerged, as it were, from the abyſs of humiliations into which it was ſunk. Here he ſhewed, that what he had done and ſuffered was truly meritorious, becauſe it was voluntary. We know that he had willingly laid down his life, when we ſee him by his own power take it up again, and we learn to value his death as a free-will offering for our redemption, when we contemplate his reſurrection. Expiring on the croſs, he ſeemed to go the way of all fleſh, and fall like the reſt of Adam's ſons, by a common and unavoidable fate: but we cannot longer doubt that he ſought death as a conqueror, when we ſee him return in triumph from the grave.

St. Paul ſpeaks of this as a fundamental of Chriſtianity, that the reſurrection of Chriſt certifies us of his divinity. He was declared, ſays he, to be the Son of God by his reſurrection; and indeed there can be no doubt of this while we believe that he raiſed himſelf from the dead. Now, what a ſplendor and glory does this caſt upon all the parts of his precedent life; which if we conſider him only as what he often ſtiles himſelf, the Son of man, is indeed exceedingly pious and virtuous to a degree never before attained: But when his reſurrection ſhews him to be the Son of God, it is all amazing. That the Son of God ſhould be born in a ſtable; that the Son of God ſhould live in poverty and die in pain;—what inſtructions! what examples! what encouragement! But above all, how glorious is that Son of God, amidſt ſuch miracles of goodneſs, ſuch prodigies of divine love and condeſcenſion, for which the angels can never ſufficiently admire him; for which the univerſe ſhall eternally adore him!

II. So glorious and infinitely more than words can expreſs, is the reſurrection of our Lord, with regard to himſelf, as it aſſerts his divinity, and puts the ſeal to all his revelations. But glory, we obſerved, is of a diffuſive nature, iſſuing forth in bright influences upon all objects within its ſphere; and therefore we are next to conſider our Lord's reſurrection with regard to ourſelves, and ſhew the certain conſequence of it, which is our own reſurrection.

The world had now laſted four thouſand years, at the time of Chriſt's death, and all generations hitherto had ſunk into the grave, unknowing what would become of them. We muſt except here the patriarchs and ſaints of the Jewiſh church, who, by an anticipated revelation of a Redeemer, had their hopes full of immortality. But the bulk of mankind were in the dark, concerning a future ſtate. Good men might wiſh, and wiſe men expect a life to come; but theſe wiſhes, and theſe expectations, were perplexed with much doubt and miſgiving. Death was as a gulf, whereof they ſaw only the entrance, and could diſcern nothing beyond. But the glories of our Lord's reſurrection, have enlightened the grave, and ſo diſſipated the ſhades of death, as to ſhew that to be only a paſſage or thoroughfare, which before ſeemed a gulf and an abyſs. For life and immortality were brought to light by the Goſpel of Chriſt, who declared not only that there was a reſurrection, but that He himſelf was the reſurrection,—or that power whereby men ſhall be raiſed from the dead,—and the life, John xi. 25. As the ſun is light in himſelf, and the great ſource of day to all the worlds around him, ſo Chriſt is reſurrection to himſelf, and the great cauſe and author of reſurrection to all mankind; who, after they have undergone the common ſentence of death paſſed upon them in Adam, the firſt head of our race, are by this ſecond repreſentative of the human ſpecies reſtored to immortality; for ſince by man came death, by man alſo came the reſurrection of the dead; for as by Adam all died, even ſo by Chriſt ſhall all be made alive. And indeed it is a very natural prerogative of Chriſt, as Judge of the world, that he ſhould by his own power ſummon all men to his tribunal: of which he himſelf gives a moſt particular account, John v. 21—26, &c.

Reſurrection and a future judgement are the fundamental principles of morality, and they are in the Goſpel not only taught, but demonſtrated. The Divinity raiſed Chriſt's human body out of the grave, to convince us that he will alſo raiſe us at the laſt day. This is a miracle in kind, involving the thing in queſtion, moſt pertinent, cogent, and irrefragable; ſo that we cannot but conclude with St. Paul, That God has appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteouſneſs, by that Man, whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given aſſurance unto all men, in that he hath raiſed him from the dead, Acts xvii. 31.

Seeing then that we have this aſſurance, do we hope, or do we fear a reſurrection?—for we muſt expect it. If upon juſt grounds we hope for it, happy are we; but if we fear it, may we be warned in time to remove thoſe fears, by ſuch an amendment of life, as may give comfort and joy to the ſoul in the proſpect of futurity. It is my duty here to perſuade every reader to this, and to adviſe and direct him in the performance of it: But I can only perſuade and adviſe; he himſelf muſt work out his own ſalvation.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO SAINT MARK.

CHAP. I.

The office of John the Baptiſt. Jeſus is baptized: tempted: He preacheth: calleth Peter, Andrew, James, and John: healeth one that had a devil, Peter's mother-in-law, and many diſeaſed perſons; and cleanſeth the leper.

THE beginning of the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, the Son of God;

2 As it is written in the prophets, Behold, I ſend my meſſenger before thy face, which ſhall prepare thy way before thee.

3 The voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths ſtraight.

4 John did baptize in the wilderneſs, and preach the baptiſm of repentance, for the remiſſion of ſins.

5 And there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jeruſalem, and were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, confeſſing their ſins.

6 And John was clothed with camels hair, and with a girdle of a ſkin about his loins; and he did eat locuſts and wild honey:

7 And preached, ſaying, There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whoſe ſhoes I am not worthy to ſtoop down and unlooſe.

8 I indeed have baptized you with water: but he ſhall baptize you with the Holy Ghoſt.

9 And it came to paſs in thoſe days, that Jeſus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan.

10 And ſtraightway coming up out of the water, he ſaw the heavens opened, and the Spirit like a dove deſcending upon him.

11 And there came a voice from heaven, ſaying, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed.

12 And immediately the Spirit driveth him into the wilderneſs.

13 And he was there in the wilderneſs forty days tempted of Satan, and was with the wild beaſts; and the angels miniſtered unto him.

14 Now after that John was put in priſon, Jeſus came into Galilee, preaching the goſpel of the kingdom of God,

St. MARK] St. Mark is generally ſuppoſed to have converſed familiarly with St. Peter, who mentions him as his ſon, that is, his diſciple, 1 Pet. v. 13. Poſſibly this was the ſame Mark whom St. Paul took as a companion in his travels. See Acts xii. 25. As St. Matthew wrote his Goſpel for the Jews more particularly, ſo St. Mark ſeems to have compiled his for the uſe of the Gentiles. He wrote after St. Matthew, and moſt probably had his Goſpel before him. The date of his Goſpel is uncertain. It was probably written at Rome about A. D. 63. But ſee more on this ſubject in the "Diſſertation on the writers of the Goſpels, &c."

Chap. I. Ver. 1. Of Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God] This exordium, is ſingular; for whilſt the other Evangeliſts deſcribe our Saviour as the Son of man, St. Mark, in expreſs words, ſtiles him the Son of God. A title the moſt likely, as being the moſt auguſt, to engage the attention and obedience of the Romans, thoſe lords of the earth, to the religion which was promulgated by him. In deſcribing this religion, St. Mark has brought together ſo many of our Saviour's diſcourſes and miracles, as might ſerve to exhibit a general view of his character, and ſhew the world at the ſame time what kind of principles they were concerned to embrace, and what courſe of life they were bound to lead, who profeſſed themſelves his followers and diſciples. This fully anſwered the end of his deſign. The preſent verſe may be connected with the following, and the ſenſe will be, that the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt began, according to the prediction of the prophets, with the preaching and baptiſm of John the Baptiſt: But ſome ſuppoſe that this firſt verſe is the title which St. Mark prefixed to his hiſtory, and that there is here a ſmall tranſpoſition of the verſes; the Evangeliſt beginning ver. 4. John did baptize, &c. ver. 2. as it is written, &c. I ſhall not take up the reader's and my own time by inſiſting upon thoſe paſſages in this or the following Evangeliſts, which have been already explained in the notes on St. Matthew, and which explanations will be found by the copious references in the margin.

Ver. 12. Driveth] Conveyed, Wat.

Ver. 13. And was with the wild beaſts] St. Mark is often very circumſtantial in his narrations, and adds many things for the ſake of the Romans or Gentiles in general, to enable them the better to underſtand him. Thus, as a Roman might not know how wild and uninhabited the deſarts of Arabia were, in which Chriſt was tempted, he adds here, and was with the wild beaſts. See Owen on the Goſpel, and Grotius.

Ver. 14. Now after that John was put in priſon, &c.] We have here a remarkable particular in the conduct of our Saviour: No

15 And ſaying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the goſpel.

16 Now as he walked by the ſea of Galilee, he ſaw Simon, and Andrew his brother, caſting a net into the ſea: (for they were fiſhers.)

17 And Jeſus ſaid unto them, Come ye after me, and I will make you to become fiſhers of men.

18 And ſtraightway they forſook their nets, and followed him.

19 And when he had gone a little farther thence, he ſaw James the ſon of Zebedee, and John his brother, who alſo were in the ſhip mending their nets.

20 And ſtraightway he called them: and they left their father Zebedee in the ſhip with the hired ſervants, and went after him.

21 And they went into Capernaum; and ſtraightway on the ſabbath-day he entered into the ſynagogue, and taught.

22 And they were aſtoniſhed at his doctrine: for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the ſcribes.

23 And there was in their ſynagogue a man with an unclean ſpirit; and he cried out, 24 Saying, Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jeſus of Nazareth? art thou come to deſtroy us? I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God!

25 And Jeſus rebuked him, ſaying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him.

26 And when the unclean ſpirit had torn him, and cried with a loud voice, he came out of him.

27 And they were all amazed, inſomuch that they queſtioned among themſelves, ſaying, What thing is this? what new doctrine is this? for with authority commandeth he even the unclean ſpirits, and they do obey him.

28 And immediately his fame ſpread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee.

29 And forthwith, when they were come out of the ſynagogue, they entered into the houſe of Simon and Andrew, with James and John.

30 But Simon's wife's mother lay ſick of a fever, and anon they tell him of her.

31 And he came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her, and ſhe miniſtered unto them.

32 And at even, when the ſun did ſet, they brought unto him all that were diſeaſed, and them that were poſſeſſed with devils.

33 And all the city was gathered together at the door.

34 And he healed many that were ſick of divers diſeaſes, and caſt out many devils; and ſuffered not the devils to ſpeak, becauſe they knew him.

Acts xvi. 17, 18. Or, to ſay that they knew him.

ſooner was he informed that Herod had thrown John into priſon, than he quitted Judea, and went into Galilee. (Comp. Matth. iv. 12—to the end.) And traverſing it all over,—as well that part of it which was under Herod's juriſdiction, as that under Philip's; ſee ver. 39. and Matth. iv. 23.—he there began firſt to preach continually to the people, elected ſeveral of his diſciples to accompany him wherever he went, performed the moſt aſtoniſhing works, and drew the attention of the whole country upon him. Now, had Jeſus and the Baptiſt been aſſociate impoſtors, nothing ſeems more improbable than that Jeſus ſhould ſingle out this particular time, and the dominions of that particular prince, who had but juſt then impriſoned his partner in the ſame wicked impoſture, in order there firſt to make trial of all his devices, procure more aſſociates, and attended by them to draw the multitude about with him from all parts of the country. In an impoſtor, this would have been voluntarily ſeeking the ſame fate that his forerunner had but juſt experienced, and in reality provoking Herod to put an end at once to all their joint machinations: But this is what no impoſtor whatever can be ſuppoſed deſirous to have done. See Bell's Inquiry into the Divine Miſſions, &c. p. 388.

Ver. 19, 20. Ship] Boat. Wat.

Ver. 21. On the ſabbath-day] In the Greek it is plural, τοις σαββασιν, and when compared with the parallel place in Luke, ſhews that it was the cuſtom of Jeſus to frequent theſe places of worſhip on the ſabbath-days. The addition of this circumſtance ſeems therefore to intimate, that Chriſt was free from the imputation of profaning the ſabbath, which was objected to him by the Jews. See Matth. xii. 1. and Grotius. Dr. Heylin renders the latter part of this verſe, where he immediately began to inſtruct publickly in the ſynagogues, to which he went on the ſabbath-days.

Ver. 23, 24. And there was in their ſynagogue, &c.] It ſeems plain from what is ſaid afterwards, ver. 27. that the other perſons then preſent did not know Jeſus to be the Son of God; how then ſhould the demoniac know this, if he had been only mad, as ſome would vainly ſuppoſe, and not really poſſeſſed by an evil ſpirit? This caſe was ſo remarkable, that, as the Evangeliſt adds, immediately our Lord's fame ſpread abroad, throughout all the region round about Galilee. However, though madmen might not know Chriſt, yet the devils could not be ignorant of him, from the time of his baptiſm, when the voice from heaven ſaid, This is my beloved Son, &c. and therefore Satan ſoon after, in one of his temptations, ſays, If thou be the Son of God; Matth. iv. 6. See Ward's Diſſertation, p. 79. and on Matth. viii. 29.

Ver. 26. Had torn him] Had thrown him into convulſions. MS. That this is a proper tranſlation appears from St. Luke, who informs us, that the ſpirit did not hurt him. It is remarkable, that in all the cures of this ſort which our Lord performed, the perſon to be cured was ſeized with the diſorder in its violence at the time of the cure, and raiſed from the ſtupor of the fit, to perfect health in an inſtant. The reaſon was, that thus the reality and greatneſs, both of the diſorder and the cure, were fully proved, to the conviction of every beholder.

Ver. 29. They entered into the houſe of Simon] Peter was a native of Bethſaida; and when firſt admitted to Chriſt's acquaintance, ſeems to have had his reſidence there: but happening to marry a woman of Capernaum, as is generally ſuppoſed, he removed thither with his brother Andrew, and there proſecuted their common buſineſs of fiſhing, in company with James and John, the ſons of Zebedee, who lived with them in one houſe. Reſpecting this cure of Peter's wife's mother, ſee on Luke iv. 38.

Ver. 30. Anon] Forthwith. MS.

Ver. 32, 33. And at even, &c.] The news of the miracle above related being ſpread through the town, thoſe who had ſick relations or friends, reſolved to apply to Jeſus for a cure; Only, becauſe it was the ſabbath, they did not immediately come to him; they waited till the holy reſt was ended, which, according to the Jewiſh form of the day, was at ſun-ſetting; and then they brought their ſick in great numbers to him, fully perſuaded that he would heal them. The perſons who attended the ſick, or who brought them to be cured, together with the town's people, whoſe curioſity and admiration were excited by the reports of the two miracles performed that day, made ſuch a crowd at Peter's houſe, that it looked as if all the city had been gathered together. See the notes on Matth. viii. 4. xii. 16. for ſome reaſons why our Saviour ſuffered not his miracles to be publickly ſpoken of. Inſtead of them that were poſſeſſed with devils, Dr. Waterland reads, the demoniacs.

35 And in the morning, riſing up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a ſolitary place, and there prayed.

36 And Simon, and they that were with him, followed after him.

37 And when they had found him, they ſaid unto him, All men ſeek for thee.

38 And he ſaid unto them, Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there alſo: for therefore came I forth.

39 And he preached in their ſynagogues throughout all Galilee, and caſt out devils.

40 And there came a leper to him, beſeeching him, and kneeling down to him, and ſaying unto him, If thou wilt, thou canſt make me clean.

41 And Jeſus, moved with compaſſion, put forth his hand, and touched him, and ſaith unto him, I will; Be thou clean.

42 And as ſoon as he had ſpoken, immediately the leproſy departed from him, and he was cleanſed.

43 And he ſtraitly charged him, and forthwith ſent him away;

44 And ſaith unto him, See thou ſay nothing to any man: but go thy way, ſhew thyſelf to the prieſt, and offer for thy cleanſing thoſe things which Moſes commanded, for a teſtimony unto them.

45 But he went out, and began to publiſh it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, inſomuch that Jeſus could no more openly enter into the city, but was without in deſart places: And they came to him from every quarter.

CHAP. II.

Chriſt healeth one ſick of the palſy, calleth Matthew from the receipt of cuſtom, eateth with publicans and ſinners, excuſeth his diſciples for not faſting, and for plucking the ears of corn on the ſabbath-day.

AND again he entered into Capernaum after ſome days; and it was noiſed that he was in the houſe.

2 And ſtraightway many were gathered together, inſomuch that there was no room to receive them, no not ſo much as about the door: and he preached the word unto them.

3 And they come unto him, bringing one ſick of the palſy, which was borne of four.

4 And when they could not come nigh unto him for the preſs, they uncovered the roof where he was: and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed wherein the ſick of the palſy lay.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. I.

Reſpecting John the Baptiſt, and our Saviour's baptiſm, ſee the Reflections on Matth. iii. and for our Saviour's choice of his diſciples, &c. we refer to the Reflections on Luke iv. v. Let us at preſent contemplate the great Redeemer of our ſouls, giving us a proof of his divine power to heal our ſpiritual defilements, by curing the leper who applied to him.

Our ſouls are overſpread with the leproſy of ſin, and where ſhould we apply for help, but to the healing power and recovering grace of the adorable Saviour? Be the malady ever ſo deep, inveterate, or ſpreading, we may ſurely adopt the words of the leper before us, and ſay, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canſt make me clean. There is nothing better than frequently to make this prayer, and to be always diſpoſed in heart to do ſo, ſince there is always ſomething in us which needs a cure.

If we are ſo happy as to have received that favour, we are under the obligation of no command to conceal it. It is, on the contrary, our duty moſt gratefully to publiſh it abroad, for the honour of our benefactor, and the advantage of thoſe who may be encouraged to make the ſame application, in humble hope of the ſame ſucceſs. But when will the happy time come, that men ſhall be as ſolicitous about their ſpiritual welfare, as about the health of this mortal body? Almighty Phyſician! exert thine energy in this inſtance, as a token of further favours; convince men of their pollution and danger, and bow their ſtubborn knee, that it may bend in ſubmiſſive and importunate ſupplication.

We may learn from the inſtance before us, that the cure of our ſouls is the pure effect of the goodneſs and free mercy of God; that Jeſus Chriſt performs it by a ſovereign authority; (He put forth his hand, ver. 41.) that his ſacred humanity is the inſtrument of the divine operation in our hearts; and that it is by his will that his merits are applied to us. Fear then, for he doth not put forth his healing hand, and touch all: but hope alſo; for he frequently puts it forth, and touches the moſt miſerable.

The compaſſionate air with which the cure of this leper was wrought, ought to be conſidered by all ſpiritual phyſicians as a leſſon of condeſcenſion and tenderneſs; and the modeſty with which it was conducted, ſhould engage them to avoid every appearance of oſtentation and vain-glory.

Once more, let us be taught, from our Saviour's example, (ver. 35.) how good it is for a man ſometimes to withdraw himſelf from buſineſs and labour, in order to converſe with God alone. Chriſt himſelf found it proper to depart into a ſolitary place to pray, when crowds of admirers were flocking in upon him: And, like him, thoſe who are engaged in the ſcenes of public buſineſs, and fill them up with the greateſt applauſe, ſhould yet reſolutely command ſome ſeaſons for retirement; remembering, that the more various and important our public labours are, the more evidently do we need to draw down ſuccour by ardent prayer, that we may be ſtrengthened and proſpered in them. Prayer is ſo neceſſary to him particularly who preaches and labours in the church, that, far from diſpenſing with himſelf on this account, he ought to take a time for it out of that which belongs to reſt, and the other neceſſities of life, rather than be deficient therein.

Chap. II. Ver. 1. And again he entered into Capernaum] See the note on Luke v. 17. In the houſe, means, "In Peter's houſe."

Ver. 3. Which was borne of four] Who was carried by four. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 4. And when they could not come nigh, &c.] The better to underſtand the particulars in this verſe, it will be proper to conſider the manner of building in the eaſt, which we find largely deſcribed in Dr. Shaw's excellent Travels, where he has given us a full explanation of the paſſage before us. "The general method of building, ſays he, ſeems to be continued from the earlieſt ages down to this time, without the leaſt alteration or improvement. Large doors, ſpacious chambers, marble pavements, cloiſtered courts, with fountains ſometimes playing in the midſt, are conveniences well adapted to the circumſtances of theſe hotter climates. The jealouſy of theſe people is leſs apt to be alarmed, whilſt, if we except a ſmall latticed window or balcony, which ſometimes looks into the ſtreets, all the other windows open into their reſpective courts or quadrangles. It is during the celebration only of ſome Zeenah, (as they call a public feſtival) that theſe latticed windows or balconies are left open. For this being a time of great liberty, revelling, and extravagance, each family is ambitious of adorning both the inſide and outſide of their houſes with their richeſt furniture; whilſt crowds of ſpectators, dreſſed out in their beſt apparel, and laying aſide all modeſty and reſtraint, go in and out where they pleaſe.——The account we have 2 Kings ix. 30. of Jezebel's painting her face, and tiring her head, and looking out at a window, upon Jehu's public entrance into Jezreel, gives us a lively idea of an eaſtern lady at one of theſe zeenahs or feſtivals.

The ſtreets of theſe cities, the better to ſhade them from the ſun, are uſually narrow, with ſometimes a range of ſhops on each ſide. If from theſe we enter into one of the principal houſes, we ſhall firſt paſs through a porch or gateway, with benches on each ſide; few 5 When Jeſus ſaw their faith, he ſaid unto the ſick of the palſy, Son, thy ſins be forgiven thee.

6 But there were certain of the ſcribes ſitting there, and reaſoning in their hearts,

7 Why doth this man thus ſpeak blaſphemies? who can forgive ſins but God only?

8 And immediately, when Jeſus perceived in his ſpirit that they ſo reaſoned within themſelves, he ſaid unto them, Why reaſon ye theſe things in your hearts?

9 Whether is it eaſier to ſay to the ſick of the palſy, Thy ſins be forgiven thee; or to ſay, Ariſe, and take up thy bed, and walk?

10 But, that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive ſins, (he ſaith to the ſick of the palſy,)

11 I ſay unto thee, Ariſe, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine houſe.

12 And immediately he aroſe, took up the bed, and went forth before them all; inſomuch that they were all amazed, and glorified God, ſaying, We never ſaw it on this faſhion.

Ver. 7. Job xiv. 4. Iſai. xliii. 25.—V. 9. Matth. ix. 5.

perſons, not even the neareſt relations, having further admiſſion, except upon extraordinary occaſions. From hence we are received into the court or quadrangle, which lying open to the weather, is according to the ability of the owner, paved with marble, or ſuch materials as will carry off the water into the common ſewers. When much people are to be admitted, as upon the celebration of a marriage, the circumciſing of a child, or occaſions of the like nature, the company is rarely or never received into one of the chambers. The court is the uſual place of their reception, which is ſtrewed accordingly with matts and carpets for their more commodious entertainment: And as this is called el wooſt, or the middle of the houſe, (literally anſwering to the το μεσον of St. Luke v. 19) it is probable that the place, where our Saviour and the apoſtles were frequently acuſtomed to give their inſtructions, might have been in the like ſituation, or in the area or quadrangle of one of theſe houſes. In the ſummer ſeaſon, and upon all occaſions when a large company is to be received, this court is commonly ſheltered from the inclemency of the weather by a velum, umbrella, or veil; which being expanded upon ropes from one ſide of the parapet wall to the other, may be folded or unfolded at pleaſure. The Pſalmiſt ſeems to allude either to the tents of the Bedoweens, or to ſome covering of this kind, in that beautiful expreſſion, of ſpreading out the heavens, like a veil or curtain.

The court is for the moſt part ſurrounded by a cloiſter, over which, when the houſe has one or more ſtories, (and they ſometimes have two or three) there is a gallery erected, of the ſame dimenſions with the cloyſter; having a balluſtrade, or elſe a piece of carved or latticed work going round about it, to prevent people from falling into the court. From the cloyſters and galleries we are conducted into large ſpacious chambers, one of them frequently ſerving a whole family; From whence it is, that the cities of theſe countries, which are generally much inferior in bigneſs to thoſe of Europe, yet are ſo exceeding populous, that great numbers of the inhabitants are ſwept away by the plague, or any other contagious diſtemper. Theſe chambers, in houſes of better faſhion, from the middle of the wall downwards, are covered and adorned with velvet, or damaſk hangings, of white, blue, red, green, or other colours, (Eſth. i. 6.) ſuſpended, upon hooks, or taken down at pleaſure; but the upper part is embelliſhed with more permanent ornaments, being adorned with the moſt ingenious wreathings and devices in ſtucco or fret-work. The ceiling is generally of wainſcot, either very artfully painted, or elſe thrown into a variety of pannels, with gilded mouldings and ſcrolls of their Koran intermixed. The prophet (Jer. xxii. 14.) exclaims againſt the eaſtern houſes that were ceiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion. The floors are laid with painted tiles or plaiſter of terrace; but as theſe people make little or no uſe of chairs, (either ſitting croſs-legged, or lying at length) they always cover or ſpread them over with carpets, which, for the moſt part, are of the richeſt materials. Along the ſides of the wall or floor, a range of narrow beds or mattraſſes is often placed upon theſe carpets; and for their further eaſe and convenience, ſeveral velvet or damaſk bolſters are placed upon theſe carpets or mattraſſes; indulgences, that ſeem to be alluded to by the ſtretching themſelves upon couches, and by ſewing of pillows to arm-holes, as we have it expreſſed, Amos vi. 4. Ezek. xv. 18. and 20.

At one end of each chamber there is a little gallery, raiſed three, four, or five feet above the floor, with a balluſtrade in the front of it, with a few ſteps likewiſe leading up to it. Here they place their beds; a ſituation frequently alluded to in the Holy Scriptures; which may likewiſe illuſtrate the circumſtance of Hezekiah's turning his face, when he prayed, towards the wall, (i. e. from his attendants) 2 Kings xx. 2. that the fervency of his devotion might be the leſs taken notice of and obſerved. The like is related of Ahab, 1 Kings xxii. 2. though probably not upon a religious account, but in order to conceal from his attendants the anguiſh he was in for his late diſappointment. The ſtairs are ſometimes placed in the porch, ſometimes at the entrance into the court; but never upon the outſide of the houſe. The top of the houſe, which is always flat, is covered with a ſtony plaiſter of terrace; from whence, in foreign language, it has attained the name of terrace. This is uſually ſurrounded by two walls, the outermoſt whereof is partly built over the ſtreet, partly makes the partition with the contiguous houſes; being frequently ſo low, that one may eaſily climb over it. The other, which I ſhall call the parapet wall, hangs immediately over the court, being always breaſt high, and anſwers to the מעקה, or lorica, Deut. xxii. 8. which we render the battlements. Inſtead of this parapet wall, ſome terraces are guarded, like the galleries, with balluſtrades only, or latticed work; in which faſhion probably, as the name ſeems to import, was the שבכה, or net, or lattice, as we render it, that Ahaziah (2 Kings i. 2.) might be careleſly leaning over, when he fell from thence into the court. For upon theſe terraces, ſeveral offices of the family are performed; ſuch as the drying of linen or flax, (Joſh. ii. 6.) and the preparing of figs and raiſins; where likewiſe they enjoy the cool refreſhing breezes of the evening, converſe with one another, and offer up their devotions. In the feaſt of tabernacles, booths were erected upon them, Neh. viii. 16. As theſe terraces are thus frequently uſed, and trampled upon, not to mention the ſolidity of the materials wherewith they are made, they will not eaſily permit any vegetable ſubſtances to take root or thrive upon them; which, perhaps, may illuſtrate the compariſon, Iſai. xxxvii. 27. of the Aſſyrians, and Pſ. cxxix. 6. of the wicked, to the graſs that grows upon the houſe-tops, which withereth before it is grown up.

When any of theſe cities are built upon level ground, one may paſs along the tops of the houſes from one end to the other. Such in general is the method and contrivance of theſe houſes. If then it may be preſumed, that our Saviour was preaching in one of theſe houſes, one may, by attending to the ſtructure of it, give no ſmall light to one circumſtance of that hiſtory, which has given great offence to ſome unbelievers, ſuppoſing unſurmountable difficulties would attend ſuch an action. Which miſtake they might perhaps fall into by not attending to the original, which will bear this conſtruction; When they could not come at Jeſus for the preſs, they got upon the roof of the houſe, and drew back the veil where he was; or, they laid open and uncovered that part of it, eſpecially, which was ſpread over the place (οπου ην) where he was ſitting, and having removed and plucked away (according to St. Jerome) whatever might incommode them in their intended good office, or having tied (according to the Perſian verſion) the four corners of the bed or bedſtead with cords, where the ſick of the palſy lay, they let it down before Jeſus.

For, that there was not the leaſt force or violence offered to the roof, and conſequently that εξορυξαντες, (breaking up) no leſs than απεστεγασαν, (they uncovered) will admit of ſome other interpretations than what have been given to them in our verſion, appears from the parallel place in St. Luke, where δια των κεραμων καθηκαν αυτον, per tegulas demiſerunt illum, (which we tranſlate they let him through the tiling, as if that had actually been broken up already) ſhould be rendered, they let him down over, along the ſide, or by the way of the roof. We have a paſſage in Aulus Gellius exactly of the ſame purport, where it is ſaid, that "if any perſon in chains ſhould make his eſcape into the houſe of the Flamen Dialis, he ſhould be forthwith looſed: and that his fetters ſhould be drawn up through the impluvium, upon the roof, or terrace, and from thence be let down into the highway, or the ſtreet.

When the uſe then of theſe phraſes, and the faſhion of theſe houſes, are rightly conſidered, there will be no reaſon to ſuppoſe that any breach was actually made in the tegula, or κεραμοι: ſince all that was to be done in the caſe of the paralytic, was to carry him up to the top of the houſe, (either by forcing their way through the crowd up the ſtair-caſe, or elſe by conveying him over ſome of the neighbouring terraces) and there, after they had drawn away the στεγη, or veil, to let him down, along the ſide of the roof through the opening (or impluvium) into the midſt (of the court) before Jeſus. See Shaw's Trav. 4to, p. 207. Bp. Pearce's Vindication of the Miracles, part iv. p. 26. and the notes on Matth. ix. 1. Inſtead of, for the preſs, Dr. Waterland reads, becauſe of the throng.

Ver. 7. Why doth this man thus ſpeak blaſphemies?] The word blaſphemy, in profane writings, ſignifies ſlander, calumny, or any kind of opprobrious language; but in Scripture it commonly denotes opprobrious ſpeeches againſt God's being, attributes, or operations; ſuch as when we aſcribe to God the infirmities of men, or to men the perfections and operations of God: It ſignifies alſo irreverent ſpeeches addreſſed immediately to God.

Ver. 9. Whether is it eaſier to ſay, &c.] To ſay, and to perform, were the ſame to Chriſt. What he here ſaid, he did; remitting ſin, and curing diſeaſes by his word. To forgive ſins is comparatively a more difficult, though inviſible miracle, and therefore he added the outward cure to confirm it. See the Reflections on Matth. ix.

Ver. 12. We never ſaw, &c.] We never ſaw any thing like this. Wat. Heylin, and MS. By the ſea-ſide, in the next verſe, is meant, By the lake of Genneſareth.

13 And he went forth again by the ſea-ſide; and all the multitude reſorted unto him, and he taught them.

14 And as he paſſed by, he ſaw Levi the ſon of Alpheus ſitting at the receipt of cuſtom, and ſaid unto him, Follow me. And he aroſe and followed him.

15 And it came to paſs, that as Jeſus ſat at meat in his houſe, many publicans and ſinners ſat alſo together with Jeſus and his diſciples; for there were many; and they followed him.

16 And when the ſcribes and Phariſees ſaw him eat with publicans and ſinners, they ſaid unto his diſciples, How is it that he eateth and drinketh with publicans and ſinners?

17 When Jeſus heard it, he ſaith unto them, They that are whole have no need of the phyſician, but they that are ſick: I came not to call the righteous, but ſinners, to repentance.

18 And the diſciples of John and of the Phariſees uſed to faſt: and they come, and ſay unto him, Why do the diſciples of John and of the Phariſees faſt, but thy diſciples faſt not?

19 And Jeſus ſaid unto them, Can the children of the bride-chamber faſt, while the bridegroom is with them? as long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot faſt.

20 But the days will come, when the bridegroom ſhall be taken away from them; and then ſhall they faſt in thoſe days.

21 No man alſo ſeweth a piece of new cloth on an old garment: elſe the new piece that filled it up, taketh away from the old, and the rent is made worſe.

22 And no man putteth new wine into old bottles: elſe the new wine doth burſt the bottles, and the wine is ſpilled, and the bottles will be marred: but new wine muſt be put into new bottles.

23 And it came to paſs, that he went through the corn-fields on the ſabbath-day; and his diſciples began, as they went, to pluck the ears of corn.

24 And the Phariſees ſaid unto him, Behold, why do they on the ſabbath-day that which is not lawful?

25 And he ſaid unto them, Have ye never read what David did, when he had need, and was an-hungred, he, and they that were with him?

26 How he went into the houſe of God in the days of Abiathar the high-prieſt, and did eat the ſhew-bread, which is not lawful to eat but for the prieſts, and gave alſo to them which were with him?

27 And he ſaid unto them, The ſabbath was made for man, and not man for the ſabbath:

28 Therefore the Son of man is Lord alſo of the ſabbath.

Ver. 26. In the days of Abiathar] About the time of Abiathar. Wat. and MS. In the hiſtory, the prieſt from whom David received the ſhew-bread is called Ahimelech; and it is generally agreed that he was the high-prieſt, becauſe Doeg accuſed him of enquiring of the Lord for David, (1 Sam. xx. 10.) a thing which none but the prieſt, having on him the ephod, could do. If that be true, Ahimelech muſt have been the high-prieſt, becauſe he himſelf confeſſed that he had often enquired of the Lord formerly without blame, ver. 15. accordingly Joſephus calls him the high-prieſt ſeveral times. But to make this matter eaſy, Hammond ſuppoſes that επι Αϐιαθαρος, the phraſe here uſed, ſhould be tranſlated, before the days of Abiathar, as ἐπὶ μετοικεσιας, Matth. i. 11. ſeems to ſignify before the captivity. Lightfoot thinks it ſhould be tranſlated, In the days of Abiathar, the ſon of the high-prieſt, as τȣ Ηλι ſignifies the ſon of Eli, Luke iii. 23. Whitby is of opinion, that αρχιερευς, in this paſſage, ſignifies a chief prieſt, an eminent man of the order; which ſenſe, it muſt be acknowledged, the word has often in Scripture. Beza ſuſpects the genuineneſs of the reading; yet the copy from which the Syriac was taken, reads Abiathar, as all the copies at preſent do. Grotius ſuppoſes that Abiathar, being a more celebrated perſon than his father, is mentioned rather than him. Poſſibly Abiathar was preſent when David came, whoſe requeſt he might adviſe his father to grant: if ſo, it was abundantly proper to mention him in this affair. He is called Abiathar the high-prieſt, although when David applied to him he did not poſſeſs that dignity, it being common to denominate people in every part of their life, by ſuch eminent offices as they have held in any part thereof. Perhaps it may illuſtrate the matter to obſerve, that Ahimelech, the father of Abiathar, was not ſlain with the prieſts of Nob: For though Saul threatened him, and all his father's houſe with death, (1 Sam. xxii. 16.) it is not ſaid he was killed. We are only told that Doeg fell upon the prieſts, and ſlew fourſcore and five of them. Beſides, had Ahimelech been ſlain, the high-prieſthood would have been taken from his family, which it was not: for Solomon's depoſition of Abiathar, Ahimelech's ſon, is declared to have been an accompliſhment of the word of the Lord concerning the houſe of Eli. Till this period, therefore, Eli's deſcendants enjoyed the high-prieſthood. But, what puts the matter beyond doubt, Ahimelech is ſaid to have been high-prieſt in David's reign. 1 Chron. xviii. 16. where he is called the ſon of Abiathar, who was high-prieſt, being alive when David received the ſhew-bread. So our Lord ſays expreſly. Probably, being old, he was incapable of officiating, which was the reaſon that his eldeſt ſon Ahimelech ſupplied his place, and enquired of the Lord for David. It is true, in the hiſtory of this affair, Ahimelech is called the ſon of Ahitub, (1 Sam. xxii. 20.) but every where elſe he is called the ſon of Abiathar. Either, therefore, Ahimelech's father had two names, which was no uncommon thing in thoſe days, or there is an error of his name in the text of Samuel, which might ariſe from the hiſtory's mentioning his contemporary Ahitub, the father of Zadok, of the line of Eleazer, or from ſome other cauſe unknown to us. And what has increaſed the difficulty of this affair is, that Ahimelech, the ſon of Abiathar, had a ſon named Abiathar, who, after the ſlaughter at Nob, fled to David, became his companion, and after his father Ahimelech's death, was made high-prieſt; in which office he continued till he was depoſed by Solomon for conſpiring with Adonijah, as we are told 1 Kings ii. 50—53. See Macknight; and reſpecting the ſhew-bread, &c. the notes on Exod. xxv. 23—30.

Ver. 27, 28. And he ſaid unto them, The ſabbath was made for man] The ſabbath was contrived for the benefit and relief of man, being inſtituted in commemoration of the creation of the world, finiſhed in ſix days, and to perpetuate to lateſt ages the knowledge of this grand truth,—that the world was made by God,—in oppoſition both to atheiſm and idolatry. It was inſtituted alſo, in order that men, abſtaining from all ſorts of labour, but ſuch as are neceſſary to the exerciſes of piety and charity, might have leiſure for meditating on the works of creation, and that by theſe meditations they might acquire not only the knowledge of God, but a reliſh of ſpiritual and divine pleaſures, flowing from the contemplation of God's attributes, from the exerciſe of the love of God, and from obedience to his commands. It is thus that men are prepared for entering into that

CHAP. III.

Chriſt healeth the withered hand, and many other infirmities: rebuketh the unclean ſpirits: chooſeth his twelve apoſtles: convinceth thoſe of blaſphemy who charged him with caſting out devils by Beelzebub; and ſheweth who are his brother, ſiſter, and mother.

heavenly reſt, of which the earthly ſabbath is an emblem: Further, among the Iſraelites the ſabbath was appointed to keep up the remembrance of their deliverance from Egypt, and for the comfort of their ſlaves and beaſts; humanity to both being eſpecially incumbent upon a people who had once groaned under the heavieſt bondage. From all which it is evident, that to burden men, much more to hurt them through the obſervation of the ſabbath, is to act quite contrary to the deſign of God in appointing it. Therefore, ſays Chriſt, the Son of man is Lord alſo of the ſabbath; "Since the ſabbath was inſtituted for the benefit of man, the obſervation of it in caſes of neceſſity, may be diſpenſed with by any man whatſoever; but eſpecially by Me, who am the lawgiver of the Jewiſh commonwealth, and can make what alterations in its inſtitutions I think fit." Our Lord inſiſted largely on this argument, drawn from the conſiderations of his own dignity, when he was perſecuted for a pretended profanation of the ſabbath, by the cure which he performed at Betheſda. See John v. 16—30. Macknight, and the note on Matth. xii. 8. Dr. Clarke explains the 27th verſe thus: "Duties of a ritual nature were appointed only for the preſent uſe of man, to be ſubſervient to the more convenient practice of the great duties of religion." Sermon iii. vol. 10. Inſtead of Lord alſo of the ſabbath, Dr. Waterland and the MS. read, Lord even of the ſabbath.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CALLING OF ST. MATTHEW.

The number of the Apoſtles was not yet full; one place is left void for a future poſſeſſor; who can fail to expect that it is reſerved for ſome eminent perſon?—and behold! Matthew the publican is the man! Wonderful choice of Chriſt! Thoſe other diſciples, whoſe calling is recorded, were from the fiſher-boat; this from the receipt of cuſtom: They were unlettered, this infamous. The condition was not itſelf ſinful, but as the taxes which the Romans impoſed on God's free people were odious, ſo the collectors, the farmers of them, were abominable; beſides, that it was hard to hold that ſeat, without oppreſſion, without exaction: One who knew it thoroughly, branded it with thoſe odious titles; ſee Luke xix. 8. and yet, behold one of theſe publicans called to the family, to the apoſtleſhip of God! Who can deſpair, from the conſciouſneſs of his unworthineſs, when he ſees this pattern of the free bounty of Him who calleth us?

Behold Matthew, buſy in his compting-houſe, and ſo deeply engaged in his worldly concerns, that he did not even obſerve the Saviour paſſing by, ſo far was he from thinking of him. But Jeſus, as He paſſed by, ſaw Levi ſitting at the receipt of cuſtom: as if this proſpect had been ſudden and caſual, Jeſus ſaw him in paſſing by: But oh, bleſſed Saviour, what ſaweſt thou in that publican, which might either allure thine eye, or not offend it? What, but an hateful trade, an evil eye, a griping hand,—heaps of ſpoil?—Yet now thou ſaidſt, follow me. Thou that ſaidſt once to Jeruſalem,—Thy birth and nativity is of the land of Canaan, thy father was an Amorite, thy mother an Hittite; thy navel was not cut, &c. Yet when I paſſed by and ſaw thee, polluted in thine own blood, I ſaid uuto thee, Live; yea, I ſaid unto thee, when thou waſt in thy blood, Live;—Now alſo, when thou paſſedſt by, and ſawedſt Matthew ſitting at the receipt of cuſtom, thou ſaidſt to him, Follow me. The life of this publican was ſo much worſe than the birth of that forlorn Amorite, as follow me, was more than live. What canſt thou ſee in us, O God, but deformities, horrible ſins, deſpicable miſeries?—Yet doth it pleaſe thy mercy to ſay unto us, both live, and follow me!

The juſt man is the firſt accuſer of himſelf; whom have we here to blazon the ſhame of Matthew, but his own mouth? Matthew the Evangeliſt tells us of Matthew the publican. (See Matth. ix. 9.) His fellows call him Levi, as willing to cover with their finger the ſpot of his unpleaſing profeſſion, which himſelf will not ſmother, but publiſhes it to all the world, in a thankful recognition of the mercy that called him; liking well that his unworthineſs ſhould ſerve for a foil, to ſet off the glorious luſtre of His grace by whom he was called. What matters it how vile we are, O God, ſo thy glory may ariſe in our abaſement?

That word, follow me, was enough, ſpoken by the ſame tongue which ſaid to the corps at Nain, Young man, I ſay unto thee, Ariſe. He who ſaid at firſt, Let there be light! ſays now, follow me. That power ſweetly inclines, which could forcibly command. The force is not more irreſiſtible than the inclination: When the ſun ſhines upon the iſicles, can they chooſe but melt and fall?—When it looks into a dungeon, can the place chooſe but be enlightened? Do we ſee the jet drawing up ſtraws to it, the loadſtone, iron;—and do we marvel if the omnipotent Saviour, by the influence of his grace, attract the heart of a publican? He aroſe, and followed him. We are all naturally averſe from thee, O God. Do thou but bid us follow thee, draw us by thy powerful word, and we ſhall run after thee. Alas! thou ſpeakeſt, and we ſit ſtill; thou ſpeakeſt by thine outward word to our ear, and we ſtir not; Speak thou by the ſecret and effectual word of thy ſpirit to our heart; the world cannot hold us down, Satan cannot ſtop our way; we ſhall ariſe, and follow thee.

It was not a more buſy than profitable trade, that Matthew abandoned, to follow Chriſt into poverty. He now contemned his heaps of caſh, in compariſon of that better treaſure, which he foreſaw lie open in this happy attendance. If any commodity be valued of us, too dear to be parted with for Chriſt, we are more fit to be publicans than diſciples. Our Saviour invites Matthew to a diſcipleſhip, Matthew invites him to a feaſt; the joy of his call makes him begin his abdication of the world in a banquet.

Here was not a more chearful thankfulneſs in the inviter, than a gracious humility in the gueſt. The new ſervant bids his Maſter, the publican his Saviour; and is honoured with ſo bleſſed a preſence. I do not find where Jeſus was ever bidden to any table, and refuſed; if a Phariſee, if a publican invited him, he made no ſcruple to go; not for the pleaſure of the diſhes,—for what was that to Him, who began his work in a whole lent of days?—but, (as it was his meat and drink to do the will of his Father) for the benefit which might ariſe from his improving converſation. If he ſat with ſinners, he converted them; if with converts, he confirmed and inſtructed them; if with the poor, he fed them; if with the rich in ſubſtance, he made them richer in grace: at whoſe board did he ever ſit, and left not his hoſt a gainer? The poor bridegroom entertains him, and hath his water-pots filled with wine; Simon the Phariſee entertains him, and hath his table honoured with the public remiſſion of a penitent ſinner; Zaccheus entertains him, and ſalvation comes that day to his houſe, with the author of it; Matthew is recompenced for his feaſt with an apoſtleſhip; and Martha and Mary, for theirs, beſides divine inſtruction, receive their brother from the dead. O Saviour! whether thou entertaineſt us, or we entertain thee, in both of them is bleſſedneſs!

Where a publican is the feaſt-maſter, it is no marvel if the gueſts be publicans and ſinners. Whether they came only out of the hope of that mercy, which they ſaw their fellow had found, or whether Matthew invited them to be partakers of that plentiful grace whereof he had taſted, I enquire not; publicans and ſinners will flock together; the one hateful for their trade, the other for their vicious life. Common contempt hath wrought them to an unanimity, and ſends them to ſeek mutual comfort in that ſociety, which all others eſteem abominable and contagious. Moderate correction humbleth and ſhameth the offender; whereas a cruel ſeverity makes men deſperate, and drives them to thoſe courſes, whereby they are more dangerouſly infected. How many have gone into the priſon faulty, and returned flagitious! If publicans were not ſinners, they were not at all beholden to their neighbours.

What a table-full is here! the Son of God ſurrounded with publicans and ſinners! O happy publicans and ſinners, who have found out their Saviour! O merciful Saviour, who diſdained not publicans and ſinners! What ſinner can fear to kneel before thee, when he ſees publicans and ſinners ſit with thee! Who can fear to be deſpiſed of thy meekneſs and mercy, which did not abhor to converſe with the outcaſts of men? Thou didſt not deſpiſe the thief confeſſing upon the croſs; nor the ſinner waſhing thy feet with her tears; nor the Canaanite crying unto thee in the way, nor the bluſhing adultereſs, nor the odious publican, nor the forſwearing diſciple; nor the perſecutor of diſciples, nor thine own executioners! How can we then be unwelcome to thee, if we come with tears in our eyes, faith in our hearts, reſtitution in our hands? O Saviour! our breaſts are too often ſhut againſt thee; thy boſom is ever open to us. We are as great ſinners as the conſorts of theſe publicans;—Why ſhould we deſpair of room at thy table?

The jaundice-eyed Phariſees behold evil in all the actions of Chriſt: where they ſhould have admired his mercy, they cavil at his holineſs. They ſaid to his diſciples, (ver. 16.) How is it that your Maſter eateth and drinketh with publicans and ſinners? They durſt not ſpeak thus to the maſter; whoſe anſwer they knew would ſoon have convinced them: This wind, they hoped, might ſhake the weak faith of the diſciples. They ſpeak where they may be moſt likely to do hurt. All the crew of Satanical inſtruments have learned this craft of their old tutor in Paradiſe. We cannot reverence that man whom we think unholy; Chriſt would have loſt the hearts of his followers, if they had entertained the leaſt ſuſpicion of his impurity; which the murmur of theſe envious Phariſees would fain inſinuate. "He cannot be worthy to be followed, who is unclean; he cannot be clean, who eateth with publicans and ſinners." Proud and fooliſh Phariſees! ye faſt, while Chriſt eateth; ye faſt in your houſes, while Chriſt eateth in other men's; ye faſt with your own ſect, while Chriſt feaſts with ſinners:—But if ye faſt in pride, while Chriſt eats in humility, if ye faſt at home, for merit or popularity, while Chriſt feaſts with ſinners, for compaſſion, for edification, for converſion; your faſt is unclean, his feaſt is holy; ye ſhall have your portion with hypocrites, when thoſe publicans and ſinners ſhall be glorious.

When theſe cenſurers thought the diſciples had offended, they ſpeak not to them, but to their Maſter; Why do thy diſciples that which is not lawful? Now, when they thought Chriſt had offended, they ſpeak not to Him, but to the diſciples. Thus, like true miſchief-makers, they endeavour at a breach in the family of Chriſt, by ſeparating the one from the other. The quick eye of our Saviour, from whoſe piercing glance nothing can be hid, ſoon diſcerns their fraud; and therefore he takes the words out of the mouths of his diſciples into his own. They had ſpoken of Chriſt to the diſciples; Chriſt anſwers for the diſciples concerning himſelf. The whole need not a phyſician, but the ſick. According to the two qualities of pride, ſcorn and ſelf-ſufficiency, theſe inſolent Phariſees over-rated their own holineſs, and contemned the noted unholineſs of others; as if themſelves were not tainted with ſecret ſins, as if others could not be

AND he entered again into the ſynagogue; and there was a man there which had a withered hand.

2 And they watched him, whether he would heal him on the ſabbath-day; that they might accuſe him.

3 And he ſaith unto the man which had the withered hand, Stand forth.

4 And he ſaith unto them, Is it lawful to do good on the ſabbath-days, or to do evil? to ſave life, or to kill? but they held their peace.

5 And when he had looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardneſs of their hearts, he ſaith unto the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he ſtretched it out: and his hand was reſtored whole as the other.

6 And the Phariſees went forth, and ſtraightway took counſel with the Herodians againſt him, how they might deſtroy him.

7 But Jeſus withdrew himſelf with his diſciples to the ſea: and a great multitude from Galilee followed him, and from Judea,

8 And from Jeruſalem, and from Idumea, and from beyond Jordan: and they about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, when they had heard what great things he did, came unto him.

9 And he ſpake to his diſciples, that a ſmall ſhip ſhould wait on him, becauſe of the multitude, leſt they ſhould throng him.

be cleanſed by repentance. The ſearcher of hearts meets with their arrogance, and finds thoſe ſelf-righteous ſinful, thoſe ſinners juſt. The Spiritual Phyſician finds the ſickneſs of thoſe ſinners wholeſome, the health of thoſe Phariſees deſperate; that wholeſome, becauſe it calls for the help of the Phyſician; this deſperate, becauſe it thinks it needs it not. Every ſoul is ſick, thoſe moſt that feel it not; thoſe that feel it complain; thoſe that complain have cure; thoſe that feel it not, will find themſelves dying ere they can wiſh to recover. O bleſſed Phyſician! by whoſe ſtripes we are healed; by whoſe death we live; happy they who are under thy hands, ſick, as of ſin, ſo of ſorrow for ſin. It is as impoſſible they ſhould die, as it is impoſſible for thee to want either ſkill, or power, or mercy. Sin hath made us ſick unto death; make thou us but as ſick of our ſins, and we are as ſafe as thou art gracious!

Chap. III. Ver. 3. And he ſaid unto the man—ſtand forth] Our Lord ordered the man to ſhew himſelf to the whole congregation, that the ſight of his diſtreſs might move them to pity him, and that they might be the more ſenſibly ſtruck with the miracle, when they ſaw the withered hand reſtored to its former dimenſions and activity in an inſtant. See my 10th diſcourſe on the miracles, vol. i. p. 425.

Ver. 5. And when he had looked, &c.] Our Saviour looked about upon all, in ſuch a manner, as to ſhew both his indignation at their wickedneſs, and his grief for their impenitence. He knew that his arguments did not, could not prevail with them, becauſe they were reſiſting the conviction of their own minds; and he was both angry at their obſtinacy, and grieved on account of the conſequences of it; ſhewing theſe juſt affections of his righteous ſpirit by his looks, that if poſſible an impreſſion might be made either on them, or on the ſpectators. He might in this likewiſe propoſe to teach us, the juſt regulation of the paſſions and affections of our nature, which are not ſinful in themſelves, otherwiſe, He who was without ſin could not have been ſubject to them. The evil of them lies in their being excited by wrong objects, or by right objects in an improper degree. "I am reſolved, ſays Bp. Beveridge, by the grace of God, ſo to be angry, as not to ſin, and therefore to be angry at nothing but ſin." See his Private Thoughts, 8vo. vol. i. p. 211. At the ſame time that Jeſus teſtified his diſpleaſure with the Phariſees, he comforted the infirm man; for he commanded him to ſtretch out his contracted hand, and with the command communicated power to obey. In an inſtant his hand was made ſound as the other; ſo that he ſtretched it out immediately, in the ſight of all preſent, who thus were eye-witneſſes of the miracle. The Evangeliſts ſay no more; they leave their readers to imagine the wonder and aſtoniſhment of the numerous ſpectators, and the joy of the man, who had recovered the uſe of ſo neceſſary a member.

Ver. 7, 8. Jeſus withdrew himſelf] The immenſe multitude which followed our Lord did not all come together purely out of curioſity; it was the principle no doubt which moved many; but others came to be healed of their diſeaſes and infirmities; and as our Lord's fame had ſpread not only through the whole land of Iſrael, but into the neighbouring heathen countries, Idumæa, Tyre, Sidon, Syria, and the reſt, we may be ſure that the diſeaſed who came at this time to be cured by him were not a few; and that they with their attendants made a conſiderable part of the croud, which was now ſo great, that, to avoid being trodden down by thoſe who came to touch him, in order to be healed, Jeſns was obliged to go into one of his diſciples boats; out of which, as on other occaſions of a like nature, he no doubt taught them the doctrines of ſalvation; for it was his conſtant cuſtom to join preaching with the working of miracles, the latter giving efficacy to the former. Idumæa, ver. 8. comprehended not the ancient poſſeſſion of the Edomites only, but the ſouthern parts of Judea. After our Lord's time, the whole of Judea was ſometimes called Idumæa by the Greeks and Romans, who named even the Jews themſelves Idumæans, from the country which they poſſeſſed. See Macknight and Grotius.

Ver. 10. They preſſed upon him, &c.] The phraſe ἐπιπίπτειν αὐτῷ ſtrongly expreſſes this; They were ready to drive each other upon him! ſo that thoſe neareſt him could hardly ſtand, being preſſed forward by thoſe behind. The Syriac verſion joins the laſt clauſe of this verſe to what follows; as many as had—torments (or ſcourges) and unclean ſpirits, fell down, &c. The word rendered plagues is μαςιγας, literally, ſcourges. Inſtead of thou art the Son of God, at the end of the next verſe, the famous Leiceſter MS. reads, Thou art God, the Son of God;—Σὺ εἶ Ὁ Θεος, υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ. See Doddridge.

Ver. 12. He ſtraitly charged them] He ſtrictly, &c. Wat. πολλὰ ἐπετίμα αὐτοῖς, which ſeems to imply a ſtrictneſs of charge, with ſome appearance of ſeverity.

Ver. 14. And he ordained twelve] See on Luke vi. 12. Our Saviour ordained the twelve to be always with him, that they might learn from his mouth the doctrine which they were in due time to preach to the world;—that they might ſee his glory, John i. 14. the tranſcendant glory of the virtues which adorned his human life, and might be witneſſes to all the wonderful works which he ſhould perform, (Acts x. 39—41.) and by which his miſſion from God was to be clearly demonſtrated. The twelve were thus to be qualified for ſupplying the people with that ſpiritual food which their teachers neglected to give them;—and that before and after their Maſter's death. Accordingly, when they had continued with Jeſus as long as was neceſſary for this end, he ſent them out by two and two into Judea, on the important work of preparing the people for His reception, who was the true Shepherd. Hence he named them Apoſtles, that is, "Perſons ſent out." But their name was more particularly applicable to them, and their office was raiſed to its perfection, after Chriſt's aſcenſion, when he ſent them out into all the world with the doctrine of the Goſpel, which he enabled them to preach by inſpiration; giving them power at the ſame time to confirm it by the moſt aſtoniſhing miracles. That this was the nature of the new dignity which Jeſus now conferred on the twelve diſciples, is evident from John xx. 21. where we find him confirming them in the apoſtolical office; as my Father hath ſent me, ſo ſend I you. "I ſend you upon the ſame errand, and with the ſame authority: I ſend you to reveal the will of God for the ſalvation of men; and I beſtow on you both the gift of tongues, and the power of working miracles, that you may be able to preach the doctrine of ſalvation in every country, and to confirm it as divine, in oppoſition to all gainſayers. Perhaps the number of twelve Apoſtles was fixed upon, rather than any other, to ſhew that God intended to gather the ſcattered remnant of the twelve tribes by their miniſtry. After their election, the twelve accompanied Jeſus conſtantly, lived with him on one common ſtock as his family, and never departed from him, unleſs by his expreſs appointment. See Macknight.

Ver. 21. For they ſaid, He is beſide himſelf] For they ſaid, He fainted away. Wat. and the verſion of 1729. Macknight obſerves, that moſt tranſlators render this verſe as we do; but the meaning which they give is falſe, and ſuch as ſuggeſts a very unbecoming idea of our Lord, who on no other occaſion behaved ſo as to give his friends room to ſuſpect that he was mad. The original runs thus: Καὶ ἀκουσαντες οἱ παρ᾽ αὐτȣ, ἐξῆλθον κρατῆσαι αὐτον. ἔλεγον γὰρ. Ὅτι ἐξέστη.—Οἱ παρ᾽ αὐτȣ. They that were with him, namely, in the houſe, (ver. 19. ἀκούσαντες, hearing, viz. the noiſe which the mob made at the door, they went out, κρατῆσαι αυτον, to reſtrain, or quell,—not Jeſus, for he was in the houſe, (ver. 19.) But the multitude, or mob, [αυτον, it, viz. ὀχλος,] either by diſperſing them, or keeping them out; for they ſaid, εξεςη, (viz. ὀχλος) the multitude or mob is mad. This ſenſe the verb κρατεω has without diſpute, Rev. vii. 1. where we read κρατȣντας τȣς τεσσαρας ανεμȣς,—holding, detaining, reſtraining the four winds of the earth. Dr. Doddridge renders the words, he is tranſported too far. One can hardly think, ſays he, that Chriſt's friends would ſpeak of him ſo contemptibly and impiouſly as our verſion repreſents; and if that ſenſe muſt neceſſarily be retained, it would be much more decent to render the clauſe, "It, (that is, the multitude, mentioned in the verſe) is mad, thus unſeaſonably to break in upon him." But 2 Cor. v. 13. is the only paſſage in the New Teſtament where the word has this ſignification: It generally ſignifies to be greatly tranſported; or as we expreſs it, in a word derived from this, to be thrown into an extaſy. See ch. ii. 12. v. 42. vi. 51. Luke viii. 56. Acts ii. 2, 12. xii. 16. And though the LXX ſometimes uſe it for fainting away, as in Gen. xlv. 26. Joſh. ii. 11. Iſai. vii. 2. I do not find that it ever ſignifies that faintneſs which ariſes from exceſs of labour, or want of food: But our Lord's attendants here ſeem to have feared, leſt his zeal and the preſent fervency of his Spirit ſhould have been injurious to his health.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. III.

There is ſomething peculiarly beautiful in the account which St. Mark gives us of our Lord's indignation in ver. 5. Even his anger was compaſſionate; he was angry, and yet grieved; angry at the ſin, grieved for the ſinner. Even when we, through our fatal obſtinacy and hardneſs of heart, give him the juſteſt cauſe for anger, yet at the ſame time is he afflicted for us; more pitiful and compaſſionate towards us, more anxious and earneſt for our welfare and recovery, than the ſhepherd for his loſt and wandering ſheep; than the father for his prodigal and abandoned ſon. Our hardneſs of heart very juſtly excites his anger; our condemnation and deſtruction conſequent upon this perverſeneſs, raiſe in his heart the tendereſt concern.

How much ſhould this caution us, not to abuſe his compaſſion and mercy, leſt he be at length angry indeed, and utterly turn away his face in wrathful indignation from us! How much ſhould it prevent deſpair, and incline us to haſten to his feet, when we know that we have given him juſt cauſe of anger! To our comfort recollecting, that though he be angry, yet he is alſo grieved at our offences, and willing to receive us, when, humbled in heart, we return unto him.

Our Lord's example alſo in this reſpect ſhews us, how our zeal in his cauſe ſhould be moderated; teaching us to be angry at, and expreſs our reſentment ſolely againſt the ſin, while we grieve for the ſinner; truly ſorry for that hardneſs of heart, which muſt involve thoſe in deſtruction who reſiſt all the motions of grace, all the offers of Chriſt; and who, like the Phariſees, when fully convinced, will yet contradict the evidence of their ſenſes; will yet deny the Lord that bought them, and through baſe and malevolent principles oppoſe the Goſpel of light and love. Therefore, worthy of all our obſervance is that reſolution of Bp. Beveridge quoted in the note on this verſe. "For oh what a ſedate and contented ſpirit, ſays the good man, will this reſolution breathe in me! How eaſy and quiet ſhall I be under all circumſtances! Whilſt others are peeviſh and fretful, and torment themſelves with every petty trifle which doth but croſs their inclinations, or ſeem to be injurious to them, or fall into the other extreme of a ſtoical inſenſibility, I ſhall, by this reſolution, maintain a medium betwixt both, and poſſeſs my ſoul in peace and patience."

When we conſider how much the church in all ages has been indebted to the labours of the Apoſtles, and how much we ourſelves owe to them, we ſhall ſee great reaſon for thankfulneſs to our wiſe and gracious Maſter, who was pleaſed to aſſign this work to his ſervants, and ſo eminently to qualify them for it. It is obſervable, that before he ſent them forth, he choſe them to be with him, in a more conſtant attendance on his perſon and miniſtry. May all who

CHAP. IV.

The parable of the ſower, and the meaning thereof. We muſt communicate the light of our knowledge to others. The parable of the ſeed growing ſecretly, and of the muſtard-ſeed. Chriſt ſtilleth the tempeſt on the ſea.

AND he began again to teach by the ſea-ſide: and there was gathered unto him a great multitude, ſo that he entered into a ſhip, and ſat in the ſea; and the whole multitude was by the ſea, on the land.

2 And he taught them many things by parables, and ſaid unto them in his doctrine,

3 Hearken; Behold, there went out a ſower to ſow:

4 And it came to paſs as he ſowed, ſome fell by the way-ſide, and the fowls of the air came and devoured it up.

5 And ſome fell on ſtony ground, where it had not much earth; and immediately it ſprang up, becauſe it had no depth of earth.

6 But when the ſun was up, it was ſcorched; and becauſe it had no root, it withered away.

7 And ſome fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up, and choaked it, and it yielded no fruit.

8 And other fell on good ground, and did yield fruit, that ſprang up and increaſed, and brought forth, ſome thirty, and ſome ſixty, and ſome an hundred.

9 And he ſaid unto them, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

10 And when he was alone, they that were about him, with the twelve, aſked of him the parable.

11 And he ſaid unto them, Unto you it is given to know the myſtery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all theſe things are done in parables:

Ver. 1. Matth. xiii. 1. Luke viii. 4.—V. 2. Ch. xii. 38.—V. 8. John xv. 5. Col. i. 6.—V. 10. Matth. xiii. 10.—V. 11. 1 Cor. v. 12. Col. iv. 5. 1 Theſſ. iv. 12. 1 Tim. iii. 7.

ſucceed them as preachers of the Goſpel, be ſuch as have intimately known Chriſt themſelves, and have been accuſtomed to ſpiritual converſe with him! that ſo they may with the greater ability recommend him to others.

All eccleſiaſtical functions are denoted by preaching, becauſe this is a principal function of biſhops and paſtors; and becauſe it is by means of the word, and of inſtruction, that the kingdom of God is ſpread and eſtabliſhed. How then ſhall they preſume to call themſelves miniſters of Chriſt, who either wholly omit, or perform in the moſt neglectſul manner, this important duty!

How terrible, yet adorable is the judgement of God, who ſometimes calls to the prieſthood one, who he knows will find therein the occaſion of his damnation! ver. 19. One of the advantages which God draws from the perfidiouſneſs of one of the twelve Apoſtles is, to prevent the ſcandal of wicked miniſters in the church, at which the weak are apt to be troubled. A paſtor who betrays the intereſts of Chriſt and his church, is not leſs, on this account, the ſucceſſor of the Apoſtles; for we muſt always diſtinguiſh perſonal vices from the authority of Chriſt, and ſubmit to him in the moſt unworthy of his miniſters. He himſelf ſubmits to authority, though lodged in wicked hands; we ſhould therefore ſuffer the bad with patience, ſhould adore Chriſt and his authority abaſed in them; yet ſo, as that the ſacraments loſe not any of their effect thereby, and hence ſhould believe that it is Jeſus Chriſt who does all therein, even by the hands of the moſt unworthy workmen. Ver. 10. And when he was alone] Many writers of harmonies, thinking this inconſiſtent with the acknowledged circumſtances of the hiſtory, have ſuppoſed, that the interpretation of the parable was not given now, but on ſome other occaſion, though, for the ſake of perſpicuity, it is related together with the parable; yet the nature of the thing, as well as the teſtimony of St. Matthew, ch. xiii. 10. prove ſufficiently, that the queſtion which occaſioned this interpretation was put immediately after the parable was delivered; for the queſtion took its riſe from the concluding words of the parable, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear; which were no ſooner pronounced, than the diſciples came from their ſeveral ſtations in the veſſel, and aſked the reaſon why he ſpake in parables, ſince he deſired his hearers to underſtand what he ſaid? To remove this difficulty, therefore, we may ſuppoſe that in addreſſing Jeſus, the diſciples ſpake with ſuch a tone of voice as they uſed in converſation, and that Jeſus anſwered in the ſame key; ſo that the people upon the ſhore not hearing diſtinctly what paſſed, Jeſus and his diſciples were to all intents and purpoſes alone; or after finiſhing the parable he might, as on former occaſions of this kind, (ſee Luke v. 1—3.) order his diſciples to thruſt out a little further from the land, that the people might have time to conſider what they had heard; and the diſciples embracing this opportunity, might ſpeak to him in private concerning the manner of his preaching. Either of theſe ſuppoſitions ſeem fully to come up to the import of St. Mark's phraſe; which, however, ſome would render, and when he was in private, they that were about him, or his diſciples, with the twelve, &c. See Luke ix. 18.

Ver. 11, 12. Unto them that were without] Τοῖς ἔξω, the people out of the veſſel,—the multitude on the ſhore. See ἔξω, uſed in a ſimilar ſenſe in the hiſtory of Peter's denial of his maſter, Matth. xxvi. 69. The following words at firſt ſight ſeem to import, that Jeſus ſpoke to the people obſcurely, in parables, on purpoſe that they might not underſtand what he ſaid, for fear they ſhould have been converted and pardoned. Nevertheleſs it is evident from St. Mark himſelf, that this was not our Lord's meaning; for at the concluſion of the whole he ſays expreſly, with many ſuch parables ſpake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it; but if Jeſus ſpake to the people in parables as they were able to hear, his anſwer to the diſciples here recorded by St. Mark, who makes this obſervation on his preaching, cannot reaſonably be underſtood in any ſenſe inconſiſtent therewith. The true interpretation of the paſſage depends on a juſt view of St. Mark's ſcope, which our tranſlators ſeem to have miſſed; for, remembering that in the parallel paſſage, Matth. xiii. 14. the words of Iſaiah vi. 9, 10. are quoted, and finding ſome of the phraſes of that prophecy in St. Mark, they never doubted but Iſaiah was cited there likewiſe, and interpreted the paſſage accordingly; for they gave the Greek μήποτε the ſignification of the Hebrew פן pen, in the prophecy, ſuppoſing it to be the correſponding word, and by that means made St. Mark contradict what he himſelf has told us in ver. 33. Nevertheleſs, if it ſhall be found that there is no citation here, properly ſpeaking, but only an alluſion to a citation, which our Lord made in the beginning of his diſcourſe, and which a preceding hiſtorian had recorded, we may allow, that though פן pen in the prophecy ſignifies leſt, yet μήποτε, in our Lord's anſwer recorded by St. Mark, may have a different, but equally natural ſignification; viz. If it be ſo,—if peradventure, agreeably to its uſe in other paſſages. (See Luke iii. 15. 2 Tim. ii. 25.) That Iſaiah is not cited in the branch of Chriſt's anſwer recorded by St. Mark, is evident, becauſe there is not the leaſt hint of any citation. Beſides, the ſlighteſt compariſon of the paſſages themſelves will ſhew them to be different. In the prophecy, God orders Iſaiah to declare concerning the Jews in after-times, that they ſhould hear the Meſſiah preach, but not underſtand him; and ſee his miracles, but not conceive a juſt idea of the power whereby they were performed: and to propheſy of them, that they ſhould harden their hearts, and deafen their ears, and cloſe their eyes, leſt they ſhould ſee with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and underſtand with their hearts, and be converted and healed. In Matthew our Lord aſſigns the completion of that prophecy as the reaſon why he ſpake to the people in parables. They were become ſo ſtupid and wicked, that they could not endure to hear the doctrines of the Goſpel plainly preached to them. In St. Mark he added, that becauſe this was the ſtate of their minds, he wrapped up his doctrine in parables, with an intention that they might ſee as much of it as they were able to receive, but not perceive the offenſive particulars, which would have made them reject both him and his doctrines; and that they might hear as much as they were able to hear, but not underſtand any thing to irritate them againſt him; and all with a deſign to promote their converſion and ſalvation. From our Lord's uſing two or three of the prophet's phraſes in theſe verſes, we cannot conclude that he cited him, or even that he uſed thoſe phraſes in the prophet's ſenſe of them. He had cited him in the beginning of his diſcourſe, and therefore, though he fixed a different ſenſe to his words, he might uſe them by way of alluſion, to inſinuate that it was the wickedneſs of the Jews, predicted by Iſaiah, which had rendered 12 That ſeeing they may ſee, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not underſtand; leſt at any time they ſhould be converted, and their ſins ſhould be forgiven them.

13 And he ſaid unto them, Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables?

14 The ſower ſoweth the word.

15 And theſe are they by the way-ſide, where the word is ſown; but when they have heard, Satan cometh immediately, and taketh away the word that was ſown in their hearts.

16 And theſe are they likewiſe which are ſown on ſtony ground; who, when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladneſs;

17 And have no root in themſelves, and ſo endure but for a time: afterward, when affliction or perſecution ariſeth for the word's ſake, immediately they are offended.

18 And theſe are they which are ſown among thorns; ſuch as hear the word, 19 And the cares of this world, and the deceitfulneſs of riches, and the luſts of other things entering in, choak the word, and it becometh unfruitful.

20 And theſe are they which are ſown on good ground; ſuch as hear the word, and receive it, and bring forth fruit, ſome thirty-fold, ſome ſixty, and ſome an hundred.

21 And he ſaid unto them, Is a candle brought to be put under a buſhel, or under a bed? and not to be ſet on a candleſtick?

22 For there is nothing hid which ſhall not be manifeſted; neither was any thing kept ſecret, but that it ſhould come abroad.

23 If any man have ears to hear, let him hear.

24 And he ſaid unto them, Take heed what ye hear: with what meaſure ye mete, it ſhall be meaſured to you: and unto you that hear ſhall more be given.

25 For he that hath, to him ſhall be given: and he that hath not, from him ſhall be taken even that which he hath.

26 And he ſaid, So is the kingdom of God, as if a man ſhould caſt ſeed into the ground, 27 And ſhould ſleep, and riſe night and day, and the ſeed ſhould ſpring and grow up, he knoweth not how.

28 For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herſelf; firſt the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear.

dered this kind of teaching the only probable method of converting them. Upon the whole, the expreſſions aſcribed to Jeſus in St. Mark's Goſpel are by no means the ſame with thoſe found in Matthew; but they contain an additional ſentiment on the ſame ſubject, by way of further illuſtration. It is true, Chriſt's teaching the people by parables, placed in this light, appears to have been a favour, rather than a judicial ſtroke; notwithſtanding it appears from our Lord's own words, that it was of the latter kind; but the anſwer is, that this manner of teaching, without doubt, implied the higheſt blame in the Jews, whoſe wickedneſs had rendered it neceſſary, and conveyed an idea of puniſhment on the part of Chriſt, who for their wickedneſs deprived them of better means of inſtruction; ſo that it was really a puniſhment: at the ſame time it was a favour likewiſe, as it was a leſs puniſhment than they deſerved, and a puniſhment in order to reclaim them. I acknowledge, that if our Lord had not ſpoken in anſwer to the diſciples, who deſired to know the reaſon of his conduct, what he ſaid on this occaſion might have been compared with other texts; in which, according to the genius of the Hebrew language, the words lead us to think of the intention of the agent, while in the mean time nothing but the effect of his action is deſcribed. See Matth x. 34, 35. Nevertheleſs the circumſtances of the paſſage under conſideration forbid this method of interpretation. To conclude, it muſt be no ſmall recommendation of the ſenſe offered above, that it is much more to the honour of Chriſt, than the common interpretation. For though it cannot be pretended that he always beſtowed on every perſon the moſt efficacious means of inſtruction poſſible for the divine wiſdom to contrive,—becauſe if that had been the caſe, none could have reſiſted his teaching; yet we may venture to affirm, that when he taught men, he never did it but with a view to inſtruct them, and to promote their ſalvation: ſo far was he from forming his diſcourſes darkly, on purpoſe to keep them in ignorance, and hinder their converſion. For it is beyond the power of the moſt captious diſputant to deny, that the great end of all Chriſt's labours was the illumination, converſion, and ſalvation of mankind. Macknight. Inſtead of done in parables, the MS. reads delivered in parables.

Ver. 21, 22. Is a candle brought, &c. candleſtick] Is a lamp, &c.—ſtand. Wat. When Jeſus had ended his interpretation of the parable of the ſower, he did not direct his diſcourſe to the people, but continued ſpeaking to the Apoſtles, ſhewing them, by the ſimilitude of a lighted lamp, the uſe they were to make of this, and of all the inſtructions which he ſhould give them. As lamps are kindled to give light unto thoſe who are in an houſe, ſo the underſtandings of the Apoſtles were illuminated, that they might fill the world with the light of truth. He told them further, that though ſome of the doctrines of the Goſpel were then concealed from the people, on acccount of their prejudices, he had revealed them to his Apoſtles, that they might all in due time be preached openly and plainly through the world; for which reaſon it became his Apoſtles, to whom God had given both a capacity and an opportunity of hearing theſe doctrines, to liſten to them with attention.

Ver. 24. For with what meaſure, &c.] The ſenſe is, "God will proportion his lights to the meaſure of our docility;" a momentous truth! to which we can never ſufficiently attend.

Ver. 26—29. So is the kingdom of God] In this parable we are informed, that as the huſbandman does not by any efficacy of his own cauſe the ſeed to grow, but leaves it to be nouriſhed by the ſoil and ſun; ſo Jeſus and his Apoſtles, having taught the men the doctrines of true religion, were not by any miraculous force to conſtrain their wills, far leſs were they by the terrors of fire and ſword to interpoſe viſibly for the furthering thereof; but would ſuffer it to ſpread by the ſecret influences of the Spirit, till at length it ſhould obtain its full effect. Moreover, as the huſbandman cannot, by the moſt diligent obſervation, perceive the corn in his field extending its dimenſions as it grows, ſo the miniſters of Chriſt cannot ſee the operations of the Goſpel upon the minds of men. The effects, however, of its operation, when theſe are produced, they can diſcern; juſt as the huſbandman can diſcern when the corn is fully grown, and fit for reaping. In the mean time, the deſign of the parable is not to lead the miniſters of Chriſt to imagine, that religion will flouriſh, without due pains taken about it. It was formed to teach the Jews in particular, that neither the Meſſiah nor his ſervants would ſubdue men by the force of arms, as they ſuppoſed he would have done; and alſo to prevent the Apoſtles from being diſpirited, when they did not ſee immediate ſucceſs following their labours. In ver. 28. the word αυτοματη is emphatical: it is generally, in good authors, applied to artificial machines. Doddridge paraphraſes it very well, "The earth, by a certain curious kind of mechaniſm, which the greateſt philoſophers cannot fully comprehend, does, as it were ſpontaneouſly, without any aſſiſtance from man, carry the ſeed through the whole progreſs of vegetation, and produces, firſt the blade, &c." The reader may ſee a very elegant illuſtration hereof in Dr. Watts's Philoſophical Eſſays, numb. ix. ſect. 2. See alſo my 2d diſcourſe on this parable, in vol. 3. Inſtead of when the fruit is brought forth, ver. 29. Dr. Waterland reads, when the fruit yields itſelf.

30 And he ſaid, Whereunto ſhall we liken the kingdom of God? or with what compariſon ſhall we compare it?

31 It is like a grain of muſtard-ſeed, which, when it is ſown in the earth, is leſs than all the ſeeds that be in the earth.

32 But when it is ſown, it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and ſhooteth out great branches; ſo that the fowls of the air may lodge under the ſhadow of it.

33 And with many ſuch parables ſpake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it.

34 But without a parable ſpake he not unto them: and when they were alone, he expounded all things to his diſciples.

35 And the ſame day, when the even was come, he ſaith unto them, Let us paſs over unto the other ſide.

36 And when they had ſent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ſhip. And there were alſo with him other little ſhips.

37 And there aroſe a great ſtorm of wind, and the waves beat into the ſhip, ſo that it was now full.

38 And he was in the hinder part of the ſhip, aſleep on a pillow: and they awake him, and ſay unto him, Maſter, careſt thou not that we periſh?

39 And he aroſe, and rebuked the wind, and ſaid unto the ſea, Peace, be ſtill: and the wind ceaſed, and there was a great calm.

40 And he ſaid unto them, Why are ye ſo fearful? how is it that ye have no faith?

41 And they feared exceedingly, and ſaid one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the ſea obey him?

Ver. 39. He aroſe, and rebuked the wind] Nothing can be more grand and ſtriking than the preſent miracle. "Amidſt all the diſtreſs and confuſion of the ſtorm, the divine Maſter appears (according to Mr. Hervey's deſcription) ſedately riſing from a gentle ſlumber; he ſees the perplexity and horror of his companions without the leaſt emotion or alarm. What compoſure in his mein! what dignity in his attitude! what majeſty, ſweetened with compaſſion, in his aſpect! ſuch as could ariſe from no other cauſe, but a conſcious and undoubted certainty that not a ſoul of the crew ſhould be loſt, not a hair of their heads ſhould periſh, and that all this mighty uproar of nature ſhould end in a demonſtration of his mightier power, and a confirmation of his diſciples faith. He looks abroad into the mutinous ſky, and the turbulent deep: He waves, with an authoritative air, his ſacred hand, and adds the great commanding words, Peace! be ſtill!

> Confuſion heard his voice, and wild uproar
> Stood rul'd.——

The conſternation of his diſciples is turned into wonder, and their pangs of fear into extaſies of joy. They acknowledge the omnipotence, and adore the goodneſs of Jeſus. No one can help obſerving what majeſty there is in our Lord's command, Σιωπα. ϖεφιμωσο. 'Tis admirable! 'tis inimitable! 'tis worthy of God! I think we may obſerve a peculiarly proper word addreſſed and adapted to each element; the firſt enjoining a ceſſation of the winds, the ſecond a quieſcence of the waves; ſilence in all that roared, compoſure in all that raged; as though (to give a ſhort paraphraſe on the grand injunction) it had been ſaid, "Winds, be huſhed! waves, be calm!" The effect on the diſciples is deſcribed with all the force of imagination, and all the energy of diction. To repreſent in colours what the evangelical hiſtorian has left upon record, would be a ſubject fit for the immortaal Raphael, and perhaps not to be equalled by his maſterly pencil." Compare the parallel paſſages, particularly ch. vi. 51. Hervey's Theron and Aſpaſio, vol. i. p. 236. and my 6th ſermon, vol. i. on the miracles.

REFLECTIONS ON THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER.

When we conſider that the ſeed in this parable ſignifies the word of God, according to our Saviour's explanation, (ver. 14.) it may ſeem ſtrange that any particle of ſuch divine ſeed ſhould prove fruitleſs. The word of God is the ſeed of univerſal nature; the ſeed whence all things ſprung into exiſtence: It made the world, and it ſupports it; and when this divine word, in itſelf ſo efficacious, is addreſſed to rational beings, it is ſo much their intereſt, as well as their duty, to comply with it, that it is aſtoniſhing they ſhould refuſe obedience.

But here is the great misfortune; that freedom of will, which conſtitutes our dignity above other parts of the creation, by our perverſeneſs is become our diſgrace and our bane. That generous, voluntary obedience to which we were ordained, implying neceſſarily a poſſibility of diſobedience, that fatal poſſibility has proved our ruin; and although God daily renews his call, that we ſhould return to our duty and allegiance, yet we ſee the greater part of mankind totally neglect Him.

God ſpeaks to men by various ways; a principal one is that of preaching. God hath given power and commandment to his miniſters to declare his will, to publiſh his laws: They are intruſted with the divine ſeed of his word; and woe be to them, if they uſe it deceitfully; woe be to them if they mingle it with the tares of human traditions, or proſtitute it to any worldly purpoſes! Such profanation of it may indeed ſometimes be committed by ignorant or deſigning men, but the ſacred Scriptures are happily in the hands of the laity, and it ſhould be their care to ſearch thoſe Scriptures, and try if the doctrine they hear be agreeable thereto; whether it be of God, or whether men ſpeak of themſelves.

While miniſters faithfully do their duty, God ſpeaks by their mouths, under their great maſter, Jeſus Chriſt. They are the ſowers ſent into the field, to ſcatterthe good ſeed of his word: This is their part; that of the people is, to receive it with the proper diſpoſitions, which can be judged of only by the fruit it brings forth. The people will all find themſelves deſcribed in this parable; which repreſents four ſorts of hearers, and each man is concerned to judge himſelf what claſs he belongs to.

The firſt ſort are compared to the way-ſide, the common road, upon which when the ſeed fell, the birds came, and devoured it; our Lord interprets this of thoſe, who, hearing the word, underſtand it not; ſee Matth. xiii. 10. by which he means not that they are ignorant of the ſenſe, but that they do not exerciſe their underſtanding about it. They do not mind; they do not conſider it as the rule of their conduct. Their heads are like a highway, or common throughfare, in which nothing reſts, but all paſſes out as it entered; they perſevere in a wilful, ſtubborn ignorance, and all the tremendous truths of religion make no impreſſion on them; like Gallio they are for none of theſe things, as if they had no part or concern in them.

Why then do they come to the church? To what purpoſe do they enter that ſchool of wiſdom? Merely to comply with the cuſtom, to follow the multitude, to paſs away an hour or two which would be burdenſome at home; or perhaps to criticiſe on what they hear, and remark the preacher's faults, inſtead of their own.

If I ſhould add, that many come to our churches to ſhew themſelves, to make a wanton oſtenſtation of their perſon and dreſs, to take out new leſſons of vanity, to learn faſhions and practiſe them; If I ſhould ſay this, is it not true? and if it be true, is it not abominable? But fools make a mock at ſin, and turn juſt rebukes into a jeſt. The preacher muſt be very cautious upon theſe ſubjects, who does not incur their ridicule. But this is a very ſerious matter, and we muſt renounce the name of Chriſtians, if we do not lay it to heart. Our Maſter, Chriſt, who was mildneſs itſelf, moſt dove-like mildneſs, changed his wonted indulgence into ſeverity and indignation, againſt thoſe who profaned the church. Though his general demeanor to tranſgreſſors was ſo meek and gentle, ſo condeſcending and familiar, that his adverſaries reproached him as the friend of publicans and ſinners, yet, when he found ſinners polluting the holy place, his juſt zeal ſo far tranſported him, that he made a ſcourge of ſmall cords, and drove them all out of the temple.

This uncommon indignation of Chriſt argues, that it is no ſmall crime to abuſe this houſe of God to any purpoſes different from, and as they often prove, oppoſite to, thoſe of its inſtitution. It is the houſe of prayer; a holy place, wherein we are to humble ourſelves before God, to implore his mercy, and acknowledge his goodneſs; to learn his will, and celebrate his ſacraments: and if any come thither for other ends, let them be warned by this admonition, and not preſume for the future to approach thoſe ſacred walls, but with ſuch modeſty, ſobriety, and devout recollection of mind, as become the holy offices performed there.

The ſecond ſort of hearers are compared to ſtony places, (ver. 5.) of whom our Lord ſays, Theſe are they who hear the word, and immediately receive it with gladneſs; but have no root in themſelves, &c.

CHAP. V.

Chriſt delivering the poſſeſſed of the legion of devils, they enter into the ſwine: he healeth the woman who had the bloody iſſue, and raiſeth from death Jairus's daughter.

AND they came over unto the other ſide of the ſea, into the country of the Gadarenes.

2 And when he was come out of the ſhip, immediately there met him out of the tombs, a man with an unclean ſpirit,

3 Who had his dwelling among the tombs; and no man could bind him, no not with chains:

4 Becauſe that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked aſunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces: neither could any man tame him.

5 And always night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himſelf with ſtones.

6 But when he ſaw Jeſus afar off, he ran and worſhipped him,

7 And cried with a loud voice, and ſaid, What have I to do with thee, Jeſus, thou Son of the moſt high God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not.

Ver. 1. Matth. viii. 28. Luke viii. 26.

(ver. 17.) Such are the ſecond ſort: They receive, they reliſh the word; they delight in it; they partly apply it to themſelves, and reduce it to practice: But all proves ſuperficial, and conſequently vain; for they are as ſtony ground, in which the ſeed cannot take root. By this metaphor of ſtones, we may here underſtand boſom-ſins, habitual vices, in which they indulge themſelves; ſuch as covetouſneſs, or uncleanneſs, or ſloth, or rank ill-nature, or ſome other reigning vice, which they will not do themſelves the violence to ſurmount. Of this we find a remarkable inſtance in Herod, of whom it is ſaid, that "he revered John, knowing him to be a juſt and holy man, and therefore protected him; having reformed many things upon his remonſtrances, which he uſed to receive very graciouſly." This ſeemed a hopeful converſion; For a prince, bred in the pride and luxury of courts, to become attentive to the auſtere Baptiſt, to hear gladly his mortifying leſſons of penitence; and not only to hear, but begin to put them in practice,—for it is ſaid that he did many things,—this was very promiſing, and one might expect from it ſome extraordinary reformation. But he had ſtill a ſtony place in his heart: Herodias was there; and the good ſeed could not take root in it.—You know the ſad event. So fallacious is that gladneſs which is often felt upon hearing the word; many are pleaſed with it, who never profit by it!

For, as the ſoul of man was made for truth, it naturally takes delight in it; and while the truth does not directly oppoſe our favourite errors, we receive it with joy; we let it ſprout and put forth leaves, and make a ſhew of reformation; but when it reaches the boſom-ſin, the darling vice, which we will not part with, then it meets a rock; then it can make no farther progreſs; we ſhut our eyes againſt the light; we chooſe darkneſs and falſhood, becauſe our deeds are evil. And therefore they deceive themſelves, who, when they are touched and affected with a ſermon, think that all is done, and that they have diſcharged their duty. Quite the contrary; nothing is done, if they ſtop here. God indeed, has done his part, the ſeed is ſown in their hearts; but it is their part to cultivate that ſeed, to make room for its growth, to caſt out all the ſtones, or the thorns, that may hinder its increaſe.

For the thorns are the third obſtacle mentioned to the fertility of the good ſeed. This is explained at ver. 18, 19. When we ſpeak of the cares of this world as ſinful, there preſently occur many objections to what is offered: "No man, it is ſaid, can live without care; and if any ſhould, he would be juſtly blamed for his negligence: Six days ſhalt thou labour, ſaith God; and labour there relates to the mind, as well as the body; and the moſt general labour of the mind is carefulneſs. Wherein then does its ſinfulneſs conſiſt? or how can any man diſcharge the office of his calling without it?" To this we anſwer, that care to pleaſe God, and work out our ſalvation in the ſtate to which he hath called us,—that is, to do the buſineſs which God hath appointed us, as the buſineſs God hath appointed us,—is an indiſpenſable duty; and it is not care in the general, but the care of this world, that is criminal; that is, care merely for the ſake of this world, and excluſive of our regard to God; care, whereof worldly goods are the ſole motive and end: Such care, as we ſhould not engage in, but for the temporal profit we expect from it.

Morality conſiſts not in the outward action, but in the motive to it; that is, the reaſon why we do it; the end for which we perform it. The ſervant of God, and the ſervant of mammon, may appear both alike careful and induſtrious; but from very different principles: The one fulfils the deſires of his covetouſneſs, while the other obeys the commands of God. As our motives, or principles of action, are of a ſecret nature, and commonly lie hid in the intricacies of the human heart, men very frequently deceive themſelves in this matter, and miſtake their worldly-mindedneſs for Chriſtian induſtry. The frequency of this ſelf-deceit is, as I ſuppoſe, the reaſon why our Lord adds to the cares of this world,—the deceitfulneſs of riches; and in other places warns us ſo earneſtly, with a double caution, That we ſhould take heed and beware of covetouſneſs, becauſe the temptation to it commonly ſolicits men under the diſguiſe of duty, of frugality, of providing for their families, and fulfilling their vocation.

That we may not be deceived by worldly care, in this diſguiſe of a virtuous diligence, our Lord has given us this character whereby to know it; that it choaks the good ſeed of the word, ſtops its influence, and hinders the due and natural effect it would have upon our lives. For inſtance, The word ſaith, Love your neighbour as yourſelf, and and deal by him as you yourſelf would be dealt by: If this take root in our hearts, it will produce a moſt amiable integrity, diſintereſtedneſs, and generoſity in our dealings; but worldly cares come, and ſtifle this good ſeed, making men ſelfiſh, griping, diſingenuous, and over-reaching. The word again commands, that we ſeek the kingdom of God and his righteouſneſs in the firſt place, and depend ſecurely upon Providence for our ſupport. Hence the Chriſtian induſtry is full of faith in God; ſedulous to pleaſe him, and only him. So intent upon duty, that it is indifferent to all beſide; ſo confiding in the divine protection, that it is void of all care for itſelf; and reſts in a perpetual inward peace, by reaſon of its habitual reſignation to all the orders of Providence. A care of this world, on the contrary, is diſquieting and vexatious; it ſeeks the world in the firſt place, as its principal affair, and where it predominates, true religion muſt be excluded; for true religion can never be an inferior or ſecondary purſuit: It muſt be the firſt, or none: It muſt root out the thorns, or be choaked by them.

The laſt kind of ſoil on which the ſeed is ſaid to have fallen, is good ground; which is interpreted to repreſent thoſe, who with an honeſt and good heart, having heard the word, keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience. See Luke viii. 15. To theſe happy auditors are aſſigned three properties, worthy our notice and imitation: They receive the word with an honeſt and good heart;—they keep the word they have heard; and—they bring forth fruit with patience: They are ſincere in hearing, faithful in retaining, and patient in practiſing their duty.

The firſt part of this character, namely, ſincerity in receiving the word, is well exemplified and expreſſed by Cornelius, who was directed by an heavenly viſion to ſend for St. Peter, and after having got together a ſmall congregation of his friends and relations, he at their head thus addreſſed himſelf to the Apoſtle for inſtruction: Now are we all here preſent before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God. So ſpoke that honeſt and good heart, which was rightly prepared to receive the word;—we are here preſent before God. A devout ſenſe of the divine preſence diſpels all ſecular cares, recollects the attention, ſtills every faculty of mind, and compoſes it in a religious ſilence. Such ſhould be our diſpoſition when we read the word of God in the Scriptures, or hear it faithfully diſpenſed by his miniſters. We ſhall then feel its efficacy; for it will make a great impreſſion on us; it will ſink deep into our hearts, and taking root there, and being warmly cheriſhed by ſucceſſive meditations, it will ſpring forth in holy purpoſes, with ardent and inceſſant deſires to accompliſh it.

This is what we are to underſtand by the ſecond property before-mentioned of an honeſt and good heart, namely, that it keeps the word. It ſuffers not itſelf to be diſſipated in pleaſures, diſtracted with cares, or engroſſed by any ſenſual affection; but, attentive to the truth received, retains it as a ſacred depoſit, cultivates it (as was ſaid) with aſſiduous meditation, and puts forth all its force to co-operate with it in the production of virtue. Thoſe who have their heart thus diſpoſed are Chriſt's favourite auditors, and he has pronounced upon them a memorable benediction. See Luke xi. 28.

The third and moſt eſſential quality of a good heart is, that it brings forth fruit with patience. This is the completion of its character, the perfection of its goodneſs and felicity. If, ſays our Lord, ye continue in my word,—then are ye my diſciples indeed; and ye ſhall know the truth, and the truth ſhall make you free: Then you become the children of God, and endeared to Chriſt by every kind of relation. So he himſelf aſſures us, in thoſe ever-memorable words wherewith the third chapter of this Evangeliſt is cloſed: Whoſoever ſhall do the willl of my Father who is in heaven, the ſame is my brother, and ſiſter, and mother. Bleſſed therefore, eternally bleſſed, are all they that hear the word of God, and keep it, and bring forth fruit with patience.

10 And he beſought him much, that, he would not ſend them away out of the country.

11 Now there was there nigh unto the mountains, a great herd of ſwine feeding.

12 And all the devils beſought him, ſaying, Send us into the ſwine, that we may enter into them.

13 And forthwith Jeſus gave them leave. And the unclean ſpirits went out, and entered into the ſwine: and the herd ran violently down a ſteep place into the ſea, (they were about two thouſand;) and were choaked in the ſea.

14 And they that fed the ſwine fled, and told it in the city, and in the country. And they went out to ſee what it was that was done.

15 And they come to Jeſus, and ſee him that was poſſeſſed with the devil, and had the legion, ſitting, and clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid.

16 And they that ſaw it, told them how it befel to him that was poſſeſſed with the devil, and alſo concerning the ſwine.

17 And they began to pray him to depart out of their coaſts.

18 And when he was come into the ſhip, he that had been poſſeſſed with the devil, prayed him that he might be with him.

19 Howbeit, Jeſus ſuffered him not, but ſaith unto him, Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compaſſion on thee.

20 And he departed, and began to publiſh in Decapolis, how great things Jeſus had done for him: and all men did marvel.

22 And behold, there cometh one of the rulers of the ſynagogue, Jairus by name; and when he ſaw him, he fell at his feet, 23 And beſought him greatly, ſaying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death: I pray thee, come, and lay thy hands on her, that ſhe may be healed; and ſhe ſhall live.

Ver. 22. There cometh one of the rulers—Jairus] The rulers of the ſynagogue were three perſons choſen out of ten, who were obliged conſtantly to attend the public worſhip, over which they preſided, and determined ſuch diſputes as happened in the ſynagogue. The ſynagogue over which this ruler preſided was perhaps at Capernaum. Generally ſpeaking, the rulers were Chriſt's bittereſt enemies; yet there were ſome of them of a different character, John xii. 42. In particular this ruler muſt have had a very favourable opinion of Jeſus, and an high notion of his power, or he would not have applied to him for help in the preſent extremity, and by publickly acknowledging his power, have done him ſo much honour. His faith may have been built on the miracles which he knew Jeſus had performed; for our Lord had by this time reſided at Capernaum ſeveral months. See Macknight and L'Enfant.

Ver. 23. Lieth at the point of death] St. Luke agrees with St. Mark in this circumſtance; but St. Matthew differs from it. According to the latter, Jairus ſaid (ch. ix. 18.) my daughter is even now dead, ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν; but he might utter both the expreſſions: for as his daughter lay expiring when he came away, he might think ſhe could not live many minutes; and therefore, having told Jeſus that ſhe was lying at the point of death, he added, that in all probability ſhe was dead. Nevertheleſs, if this ſolution ſeem inconſiſtent with the ruler's petition, Come, and lay thine hands on her, that ſhe may be healed, and with the dejection that appeared in his countenance, when his ſervants told him that his daughter had actually expired, we may fully remove the difficulty by tranſlating the clauſe in St. Matthew, My daughter is almoſt dead, a ſenſe which, according to the analogy of the Greek language, it will eaſily bear. See a ſimilar expreſſion, Luke v. 7. We may juſt obſerve further, that ἄρτι does not only ſignify what is now come to paſs, but what is juſt at hand; and ſo it may imply no more than that ſhe was conſidered as juſt dead, and that there was no hope of her recovery, but by a miracle. See Macknight, Gerhard, and Doddridge.

Ver. 25. Which had an iſſue of blood] Who had had a bloody flux. Wat. The circumſtances in the next verſe are mentioned by the Evangeliſt, to ſhew that the woman's diſeaſe was incurable, and that ſhe herſelf knew it to be ſo. Circumſtances, which at one and the ſame time demonſtrate the greatneſs of the woman's faith, and the greatneſs of the miracle. See Dr. Friend's Hiſtory of Phyſic, page 37.

Ver. 27, 28. The preſs—and touched his garment] The throng, &c. Wat. and MS. and ſo ver. 30. Her diſeaſe being reckoned unclean, ſhe was aſhamed to mention it before the multitude; and having formed the higheſt idea of Chriſt's power, ſhe reſolved to try this method of cure, believing that no more was neceſſary to effect it: however, becauſe her diſtemper was of ſuch a nature as to render them whom ſhe touched unclean, ſhe durſt not handle the perſon of ſo great a prophet, nor any part of his garment, but its border or hem (ſee Matth. xxiii. 5.) ſhewing at the ſame time both the ſtrength of her faith, and the greatneſs of her humility. I ſhall be whole, is in the original σωθήσομαι, I ſhall be ſaved; and there are many other places in which the word is uſed in the ſame ſenſe; as to be ſure it may with great propriety be applied to a reſcue from any imminent danger, or preſſing calamity, eſpecially in an extraordinary way. Comp. ver. 23. ch. vi. 53. Luke viii. 36. xvii. 19. xviii. 42. John xi. 12. and Acts iv. 9.

Ver. 29. And ſhe was healed of that plague] Μάστιγος,—of that waſting and dangerous diſtemper, with which ſhe had been chaſtiſed for ſo long a time. The MS. before me reads, And her bloody flux was ſtopped. It was neceſſary that the miniſtry of the ſon of God ſhould be rendered illuſtrious by all kinds of miracles, and that the whole people of the country where he lived ſhould have both the higheſt idea, and the firmeſt perſuaſion of his power. It was for advancing theſe great ends, that the ſucceſs of this woman's attempt equalled the faith and humility by which ſhe was guided.

Ver. 30—34. And Jeſus immediately knowing, &c.] It was for the reaſons alledged in the laſt note, that Jeſus would by no means allow himſelf, that virtue had gone out of him, turned him about in the preſs, and ſaid, Who touched my clothes?

31 And his diſciples ſaid unto him, Thou ſeeſt the multitude thronging thee, and ſayeſt thou, Who touched me?

32 And he looked round about to ſee her that had done this thing.

33 But the woman, fearing and trembling, knowing what was done in her, came and fell down before him, and told him all the truth.

34 And he ſaid unto her, Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague.

35 While he yet ſpake, there came from the ruler of the ſynagogue's houſe, certain which ſaid, Thy daughter is dead: why troubleſt thou the Maſter any further?

36 As ſoon as Jeſus heard the word that was ſpoken, he ſaith unto the ruler of the ſynagogue, Be not afraid; only believe.

37 And he ſuffered no man to follow him, ſave Peter, and James, and John the brother of James.

38 And he cometh to the houſe of the ruler of the ſynagogue, and ſeeth the tumult, and them that wept and wailed greatly.

39 And when he was come in, he ſaith unto them, Why make ye this ado, and weep? the damſel is not dead, but ſleepeth.

40 And they laughed him to ſcorn: but when he had put them all out, he taketh the father and the mother of the damſel, and them that were with him, and entereth in where the damſel was lying.

41 And he took the damſel by the hand, and ſaid unto her, Talitha cumi; which is, being interpreted, Damſel (I ſay unto thee) ariſe.

42 And ſtraightway the damſel aroſe, and walked; for ſhe was of the age of twelve years. And they were aſtoniſhed with a great aſtoniſhment.

43 And he charged them ſtraightly, that no man ſhould know it; and commanded that ſomething ſhould be given her to eat.

the opinion which this woman entertained of his power and goodneſs to paſs ſilent and unapplauded: Therefore he immediately turned about in the crowd, and aſked who it was that had touched his cloaths. He knew the perſon; for no virtue or miraculous cure could be derived from him, unleſs by his own conſent; but he ſpake in this manner, that the woman might, of her own accord, make a confeſſion of the whole matter, by which the ſtrength of her faith, and the greatneſs of her cure would appear, to the glory of God, and that he might have an opportunity to inſtruct and comfort her. Accordingly, when the perſons neareſt to him cleared themſelves, and Jeſus inſiſted upon knowing who it was that had done the thing, the woman, finding it impoſſible to conceal herſelf any longer, came to him, trembling, and told him all. Perhaps the uncleanneſs of her diſtemper was the reaſon of her fear, thinking he would be offended with her for touching him: But the divine Phyſician, far from being angry, ſpake kindly to her, commending the honeſty of her diſpoſition, and the ſtrength of her faith; for he told her, that it was on account of theſe, he had conſented to make her whole. This incidental miracle appears very grand, when the relation it bears to the principal one is conſidered. Jeſus is going to give a ſpecimen of that Almighty Power, by which the reſurrection of all men to immortality ſhall be effected at the laſt day; and behold, virtue little inferior to that which is capable of raiſing the dead to life, iſſues from him through his garment, and heals a very obſtinate diſeaſe, which, having baffled the power of medicine for twelve years, had remained abſolutely incurable, till the preſence of Jeſus, who is the reſurrection and the life, chaſed it away! The cure, though complete, was performed in an inſtant, and the woman knew it by the immediate eaſe which ſhe felt, by the return of her ſtrength, by the chearfulneſs of her ſpirits, and by all the other agreeable ſenſations which accompany ſudden changes from painful diſeaſes to perfect health. St. Mark expreſſes this ſhortly and elegantly; ἔγνω τῷ σώματι, ſhe felt in her body. See the learned and excellent Ader's 12th Enarration, in his Treatiſe on Scripture Diſeaſes, and the 14th of my diſcourſes on the miracles. Dr. Waterland reads the laſt words of ver. 34. Thy faith hath made thee well, [hath cured thee, M. S.] go,—and be healed of thy trouble.

Ver. 37. And he ſuffered no man to follow him, &c.] When Jeſus came to the houſe, though a great many friends and others accompanied him, he ſuffered none of them to go in with him, except his three diſciples, Peter, James, and John, with the father and mother of the maid; and even theſe he admitted for no other reaſon, than that the miracle might have proper witneſſes, who ſhould publiſh it in due time for the benefit of the world. See the note on Matth. xvii. 1.

Ver. 38. And he cometh to the houſe, &c.] Namely, from the ſtreet, for that was the proper time to hinder the crowd from accompanying him. See Luke viii. 51. It ſeems the mother of the damſel, on ſeeing that Jeſus was nigh, had gone out to the ſtreet to conduct him in, or waited for him in the porch of her houſe to receive him. See on ch. ii. 4. With the attendance above-mentioned, Jeſus went up ſtairs where the damſel was lying, for they uſed to lay their dead in upper rooms. See Acts ix. 37. Here he found a number of people in an outer apartment making lamentation for her, according to the cuſtom of the Jews, with muſic. See Matth. ix. 23. The company at the ruler's houſe when Jeſus came in, being employed in making ſuch lamentation for the damſel, as they uſed to make for the dead, it is evident, they all believed that ſhe was actually departed: Wherefore, when Jeſus told them that ſhe was not dead, ver. 39. he did not mean that her ſoul was not ſeparated from her body, but that it was not to continue ſo, which was the idea the mourners affixed to the word death. Her ſtate he expreſſed by ſaying that ſhe ſlept; uſing the word in a ſenſe ſomewhat analagous to that which the Jews put upon it, when in ſpeaking of a perſon's death they called it ſleep, to intimate their belief of his exiſtence and happineſs in the other world, together with their hope of a future reſurrection to a new life. On this occaſion the phraſe was made uſe of with ſingular propriety, to inſinuate, that notwithſtanding the maid was already dead, ſhe ſhould not long continue ſo. Jeſus was going to raiſe her from the dead, and would do it with as much eaſe as they awaked one that was aſleep. See John xi. 11—13.

Ver. 40. And they laughed him to ſcorn] The mourners not underſtanding Jeſus, laughed him to ſcorn when they heard him ſay, the damſel is not dead; for having ſeen all the marks and proofs of death about her, they were abſolutely certain that ſhe was dead; and yet, if they had given themſelves time to conſider, they might have underſtood that he ſpake in this manner, to intimate that he was going to raiſe her from the dead; and the rather, as he had been ſent for by her parents to heal her miraculouſly. But his words were ambiguous; and the mourners naturally enough took them in the wrong ſenſe: Thus, while Jeſus predicted the miracle, to ſhew that it did not happen by accident, he delivered himſelf in ſuch terms, as modeſtly to avoid the reputation which might have accrued to him from ſo ſtupendous a work. The diſpoſitions expreſſed by the mourners rendered them not worthy to behold the miracle. Jeſus therefore put them even out of the anti-chamber; or he might have done this to be freed from the noiſe of their lamentation. After clearing the anti-chamber, he entered where the corpſe was lying, accompanied by none but the diſciples above-mentioned, and the father and mother of the damſel; they being, of all perſons, the moſt proper witneſſes of the miracle, which in reality ſuffered nothing by the abſence of the reſt; for as they were all ſenſible that the child was dead, they could not but be certain of the miracle, when they ſaw her alive again, though they might not know to whom the honour of her reſurrection was due. It ſeems Jeſus was not ſollicitous of appropriating it to himſelf; probably alſo, they went in thus ſlenderly attended, that the witneſſes might have an opportunity to examine the whole tranſaction narrowly, and ſo be able to report it afterwards, upon the fulleſt aſſurance, and with every circumſtance of credibility. It deſerves particular attention, with what perfect decorum our Lord conducted himſelf on this occaſion, and how entirely he appears maſter of himſelf, and ſuperior to any views of human applauſe. See Macknight, and Lardner's anſwer to Woolſton, p. 89.

Ver. 42, 43. And ſtraightway the damſel aroſe, &c.] The damſel was raiſed, not in the languiſhing condition of thoſe who come to life after having fainted away, but ſhe was in a ſtate of confirmed good health, being hungry: This circumſtance effectually ſhewing the greatneſs and perfection of the miracle, Jeſus brought it to paſs on purpoſe in her reſurrection. To make the witneſſes ſenſible of it Chriſt is contemned of his countrymen: he giveth the twelve power over unclean ſpirits. Divers opinions of Chriſt. John Baptiſt is beheaded, and buried. The apoſtles return from preaching. The miracle of five loaves and two fiſhes. Chriſt walketh on the ſea: and healeth all that touch him.

AND he went out from thence, and came into his own country; and his diſciples follow him.

2 And when the ſabbath-day was come, he began to teach in the ſynagogue: and many hearing him were aſtoniſhed, ſaying, From whence hath this man theſe things? and what wiſdom is this which is given unto him, that even ſuch mighty works are wrought by his hands?

Ver. 1. Matth. xiii. 54. Luke iv. 16.—V. 2. John vi. 42.

likewiſe, he ordered ſome meat to be given her, which ſhe took, probably, in the preſence of the company. Her parents, ſeeing her fleſh and colour, and ſtrength and appetite returned thus ſuddenly, with her life, were unmeaſurably aſtoniſhed at the miracle; nevertheleſs, Jeſus ordered them to ſpeak nothing of it: But it was known to all the people in the houſe that the maid was dead; the women who were hired to make lamentation for her, according to the cuſtom of the country, knew it: Even the multitude had reaſon to believe it, after the ruler's ſervant came and told him publickly in the ſtreet that his daughter was dead; Moreover, that ſhe was reſtored to life again, could not be hid from the domeſtics, nor from the relations of the family, nor from any having communication with them: Wherefore, our Lord's injunction to tell no man what was done, could not mean that the parents were to keep the miracle a ſecret; that was impoſſible to be done; but they were not officiouſly to blaze it abroad, nor even to indulge the inclination which they might feel to ſpeak of a matter ſo aſtoniſhing. The reaſon was, the miracle ſpake ſufficiently for itſelf: Accordingly St. Matthew tells us, that it made a great noiſe, ch. ix. 26. The fame hereof went abroad into all that land: For, as Jeſus's miracles were generally done in public, they could not fail to be much ſpoken of; wherefore, when the fame of any of them in particular is mentioned, it implies, that the reports concerning it ſpread far abroad, that the truth of it was inquired into by many; and that upon inquiry, the reality of the miracle was univerſally acknowledged. This being the proper meaning of the obſervation, the Evangeliſts by thus openly and frequently appealing to the notoriety of the facts, have given us all the aſſurance poſſible of the reality of the miracles which they have recorded.

REFLECTIONS ON THE RAISING OF JAIRUS's DAUGHTER.

How troubleſome did the people's importunities ſeem to Jairus! He came to ſue to Jeſus for his dying daughter; the thronging multitude intercepted him; every man is moſt ſenſible of his own neceſſity; there is no ſtraining courteſy, in the challenge of our intereſt in Chriſt; there is no incivility in our ſtrife for the greateſt ſhare in his preſence and benediction.

The only child of this ruler lay a dying when he came to ſollicit Chriſt's aid, and died whilſt he ſolicited. There was hope in her ſickneſs; in her extremity there was fear; in her death, deſpair and impoſſibility (as they thought) of help: Thy daughter is dead; trouble not the maſter: When we have to do with a mere finite power, this word would be but juſt. But ſince thou haſt to do with an omnipotent agent, know, O thou faithleſs meſſenger, that death can be no bar to his power: How well would it have become thee rather to have ſaid, "Thy daughter is dead; but who can tell whether thy God and Saviour will not be gracious to thee, that the child may revive? Cannot He, in whoſe hands are the iſſues of death, bring her back again?"

Here was more complaiſance than faith; trouble not the Maſter; infidelity is all for eaſe, and thinks every good work tedious: That which nature accounts troubleſome, is pleaſing and delightful to grace. Is it any pain for an hungry man to eat? O Saviour, it was thy meat and drink to do thy Father's will; and His will was, that thou ſhouldeſt bear our griefs, and take away our ſorrows; it cannot be thy trouble, which is our happineſs, that we may ſtill ſue to thee.

The meſſenger could not ſo whiſper his ill news, but Jeſus heard it; Jairus hears what he feared, and was now dejected with ſuch ſad tidings: He that reſolved not to trouble the Maſter, meant to take ſo much more trouble to himſelf, and would now yield a hopeleſs ſorrow: He, whoſe work it is to comfort the afflicted, rouſeth up the dejected heart of the penſive father; Fear not, believe only, and ſhe ſhall be made whole. The word was not more chearful than difficult. Fear not?—Who can be inſenſible of ſo great an evil? Where death hath once ſeized, who can doubt but he will keep his hold? No leſs hard was it not to grieve for the loſs of an only child, than not to fear the continuance of the cauſe of that grief.

In a perfect faith there is no fear; by how much more we fear, by ſo much leſs we believe: Well are theſe two then united, fear not; believe only. O Saviour, if thou didſt not command us ſomewhat beyond nature, it were no thanks to us to obey thee: Whilſt the child was alive, to believe that it might recover was no hard taſk; but now that ſhe was fully dead, to believe that ſhe ſhould live again, was a work not eaſy for Jairus to apprehend, though eaſy for thee to effect: Yet muſt that be believed, elſe there is no capacity for ſo great a mercy. As love, ſo faith is ſtronger than death. How much natural impoſſibility is there in the return of theſe bodies of ours from the duſt of the earth, into which, through many degrees of corruption, they are at the laſt mouldered. Fear not, O my ſoul, believe only; it muſt, it ſhall be done.

The ſum of Jairus's firſt ſuit was for the health, not for the reſurrection of his daughter; now that ſhe was dead, he would, if he durſt, have been glad to have aſked her life:—And now, behold, our Saviour bids him expect both her life and her health: Thy daughter ſhall be made whole; alive from her death, whole from her diſeaſe. Thou didſt not, O Jairus, thou daredſt not aſk, ſo much as thou receivedſt. How glad wouldeſt thou have been, ſince this laſt news, to have had thy daughter alive, though weak and ſickly; now thou ſhalt receive her, not living only, but ſound and vigorous. Thou doſt not, O Saviour, meaſure thy gifts by our petitions, but by our wants, and thine own mercies.

This work might have been as eaſily done by an abſent command; the power of Chriſt was there, whilſt himſelf was away; but he will go perſonally to the place, that he may be confeſſed the author of ſo great a miracle. O Saviour! thou loveſt to go to the houſe of mourning; thy chief pleaſure is the comfort of the afflicted; What a confuſion there is in worldly ſorrow? The mother ſhrieks; the ſervants cry out; the people make lamentation; the minſtrels howl, and ſtrike dolefully; ſo that the ear might queſtion whether the ditty or the inſtrument were more heavy: If ever expreſſions of ſorrow ſound well, it is when death leads the choir. Soon doth our Saviour charm this noiſe, and diſmiſs theſe unſeaſonable mourners, whether formal or ſerious. He had life in his eye, and would have them know, that he conſidered theſe formal ceremonies as too early, and long before their time. Give place; for the maid is not dead, but ſleepeth. Had ſhe been dead, ſhe had but ſlept: now ſhe was not dead, but aſleep, becauſe he meant this nap of death ſhould be ſo ſhort, and her awakening ſo ſpeedy. Death and ſleep are alike to Him, who can caſt whom he will into the ſleep of death, and awaken when and whom he pleaſeth out of that deadly ſleep.

Before, the people and domeſticks of Jairus held Jeſus for a prophet; now they took him for a dreamer;—not dead but aſleep?—They that came to mourn, cannot now forbear to laugh. "Have we piped at ſo many funerals, and ſeen and lamented ſo many corpſes, and cannot we diſtinguiſh between ſleep and death?—The eyes are ſet,—the breath is gone,—the limbs are ſtiff and cold;—who ever died, if ſhe do but ſleep?"—How eaſily may our reaſon or ſenſe delude us in divine matters! Thoſe who are competent judges in natural things, are ready to laugh God to ſcorn, when he ſpeaks beyond their compaſs, and are by him juſtly laughed to ſcorn for their unbelief. Vain and faithleſs men! as if that unlimited power of the Almighty could not make good his own word, and turn either ſleep into death, or death into ſleep, at pleaſure. Ere many minutes,—and they ſhall be aſhamed of their error and incredulity.

There were witneſſes enow of her death; there ſhall not be many of her reſtoration, ver. 37.—The eyes of thoſe incredulous ſcoffers were not worthy of this honour; our infidelity makes us incapable of the ſecret favours, and the higheſt counſels of the Almighty.

But art thou, O Saviour, ever the more diſcouraged by the deriſion and cenſure of theſe ſcorners? Becauſe fools jeer thee, doſt thou forbear thy work? It is enough for thee that thine act ſhall ſoon honour thee, and convince them.—He took her by the hand, and called, ſaying, Maid, ariſe; and her ſpirit came again, and ſhe aroſe ſtraitway.

How could that touch, that call, be otherwiſe than effectual? He who made that hand, touched it; and he who ſhall once ſay, ariſe, ye dead, ſaid now, maid, ariſe. Death cannot but obey him, who is the Lord of life: the ſoul is ever equally in his hand, who is the God of ſpirits; it cannot but go and come at his command. When he ſays, Maid, ariſe, the now diſſolved ſpirit knows his office, his place, and inſtantly reſumes that room which by His appointment it had left.

O Saviour! if thou do but bid my ſoul to ariſe from the death of ſin, it cannot lie ſtill: If thou bid my body to ariſe from the grave, my ſoul cannot but glance down from her heaven, and animate it. In vain ſhall my ſin or my grave offer to with-hold me from thee.

The maid revives;—not now to languiſh for a time upon her ſick bed, and by ſome faint degrees to gather an inſenſible ſtrength, but at once ſhe ariſes from her death and from her couch; at once ſhe puts off her fever, with her diſſolution; ſhe finds her life and her feet at once; at once ſhe finds her feet and ſtomach: He commanded to give her meat. Omnipotency doth not uſe to go the pace of nature: all God's immediate works are like himſelf, perfect. He that raiſed her ſupernaturally, could have ſo fed her; but it was never the purpoſe of his power to ſet aſide the uſe of proper and ordinary means.

3 Is not this the carpenter, the ſon of Mary, the brother of James and Joſes, and of Juda, and Simon? and are not his ſiſters here with us? And they were offended at him.

4 But Jeſus ſaid unto them, A prophet is not without honour but in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own houſe.

5 And he could there do no mighty work, ſave that he laid his hands upon a few ſick folk, and healed them.

6 And he marvelled becauſe of their unbelief. And he went round about the villages, teaching:

7 And he called unto him the twelve, and began to ſend them forth by two and two; and gave them power over unclean ſpirits;

8 And commanded them that they ſhould take nothing for their journey, ſave a ſtaff only; no ſcrip, no bread, no money in their purſe:

9 But be ſhod with ſandals; and not put on two coats.

10 And he ſaid unto them, In what place ſoever ye enter into an houſe, there abide, till ye depart from that place.

11 And whoſoever ſhall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, ſhake off the duſt under your feet, for a teſtimony againſt them. Verily I ſay unto you, It ſhall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrha in the day of judgement, than for that city.

12 And they went out, and preached that men ſhould repent.

13 And they caſt out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were ſick, and healed them.

14 And king Herod heard of him; (for his name was ſpread abroad:) and he ſaid, That John the Baptiſt was riſen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do ſhew forth themſelves in him.

15 Others ſaid, That it is Elias. And others ſaid, That it is a prophet, or, as one of the prophets.

16 But when Herod heard thereof, he ſaid, It is John, whom I beheaded: he is riſen from the dead.

17 For Herod himſelf had ſent forth and laid hold upon John, and bound him in priſon for Herodias' ſake, his brother Philip's wife: for he had married her.

18 For John had ſaid unto Herod, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife.

19 Therefore Herodias had a quarrel againſt him, and would have killed him; but ſhe could not.

20 For Herod feared John, knowing that he was a juſt man, and an holy, and obſerved him; and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly.

Chap. VI. Ver. 6. He marvelled, becauſe of their unbelief] He wondered at their perverſeneſs in rejecting him upon ſuch unreaſonable grounds as the meanneſs of his parentage. The Jews in general ſeem to have miſtaken their own prophecies, when they expected that the Meſſiah would exalt their nation to the higheſt pitch of wealth and power; for this was an end unworthy of ſo grand an interpoſition of Providence. When the eternal Son of God came down from heaven, he had ſomething infinitely more noble in view; namely, that by ſuffering and dying, he might deſtroy him who hath the power of death, that by innumerable benefits he might overcome his enemies, that by the bonds of truth he might reſtrain the rebellious motions of mens wills; that by the ſword of the Spirit he might deſtroy their predominant luſts, and that by giving them the ſpiritual armour, he might put them into a condition to fight for the incorruptible inheritance, and exalt them to the joyful poſſeſſion of the riches and honour of immortality: Wherefore, as theſe characters of the Meſſiah were in a great meaſure unknown to the Jews, he who poſſeſſed them was not the object of their expectation; and though he laid claim to their ſubmiſſion by the moſt ſtupendous miracles, inſtead of convincing them, theſe miracles made him who performed them obnoxious to the hotteſt reſentment of that proud, covetous, ſenſual people. It ſeems they could not bear to ſee one ſo low in life as Jeſus was, doing things which they fancied were peculiar to that idol of their vanity, a glorious, triumphant ſecular Meſſiah. Our Lord, therefore, having made this ſecond trial, with a view to ſee whether the Nazarenes would endure his miniſtry, and to ſhew to the world that his not reſiding among them was owing to their ſtubbornneſs and wickedneſs, He left them; and in this example the evil and puniſhment of miſimproving ſpiritual advantages is clearly ſet forth before all who hear the Goſpel. See Macknight.

Ver. 7. By two and two] Jeſus ordered his Apoſtles to go in this manner, that they might encourage each other in their work, and confirm each other's teſtimony. See Matth. x. 2, &c.

Ver. 13. And anointed with oil many that were ſick] This was in conformity with the Jewiſh cuſtom, who made uſe of the impoſition of hands, and the ceremony of anointing the ſick with oil, when they offered up their prayers to heaven in their behalf. See James v. 4. Grotius, and L'Enfant.

Ver. 15. Others ſaid, That it is Elias] Here is little difficulty in accounting for the opinion of thoſe, who, upon Chriſt's appearing in this part of the country, began to take notice of his miracles; and being ſtruck with them, imagined that he was Elijah, or ſome of the prophets; for as they expected that Elijah would actually deſcend from heaven, and uſher in the Meſſiah, (Matth. xvi. 14.) and that one of the prophets was to be raiſed from the dead for the ſame end, they might fancy Elijah was come, or that ſome of the old prophets appeared upon the ſtage anew. See Macknight, and the notes on Matth. xiv.

Ver. 20. For Herod feared John, &c.] For Herod, knowing John to be a juſt and holy man, ſtood in awe of him, and protected him; he even did many things by his advice, and heard him with pleaſure. Heylin. For Herod reverenced John, knowing that he was a righteous and holy man, and he heard him with attention and pleaſure, and did many things. Doddridge. No ſtronger proof can be deſired of that great veneration which Herod had conceived for John, than his being pleaſed with, and liſtening to, the advice of one, in a ſtation of life ſo very far below him. And how univerſal this authority of the Baptiſt was with the people, is evident from the conduct of the prieſts, who, ſome time after his death, were afraid the people would have ſtoned them, ſhould they have ventured to ſay he was an impoſtor, Luke xx. 6. Joſephus likewiſe makes honourable mention of him, Antiq. l. xviii. c. 5. as one who taught the people the neceſſity of virtue and true holineſs; and adds, that his influence over them was ſo great, that Herod himſelf was fearful of him, leſt he ſhould excite a revolt, and therefore confined him. Poſſeſſed of ſuch credit, both with the prince and the people, what conduct would the ſecret aſſociate of a pretended Meſſiah at this time have purſued? Jeſus, who aſſumed the character of the Meſſiah himſelf, had not appeared ſo long on the public ſtage; his credit remained yet to be eſtabliſhed, and upon his ſucceſs, at leaſt, muſt the event of their joint undertaking unavoidably depend. The crafty forerunner, therefore, would now, more than ever, have employed all his art to keep up that influence he had already acquired; at once cunningly inſtilling into the people ſuch notions as were beſt calculated to ſerve his ſecret deſigns, and practiſing every artifice upon Herod, to preſerve his protection and kindneſs uninterrupted. The more popular he was,

21 And when a convenient day was come, that Herod on his birth-day made a ſupper to his lords, high captains, and chief eſtates of Galilee;

22 And when the daughter of the ſaid Herodias came in, and danced, and pleaſed Herod, and them that ſat with him, the king ſaid unto the damſel, Aſk of me whatſoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee.

23 And he ſware unto her, Whatſoever thou ſhalt aſk of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom.

24 And ſhe went forth, and ſaid unto her mother, What ſhall I aſk? and ſhe ſaid, The head of John the Baptiſt.

25 And ſhe came in ſtraightway with haſte unto the king, and aſked, ſaying, I will that thou give me by and by, in a charger, the head of John the Baptiſt.

26 And the king was exceeding ſorry; yet for his oath's ſake, and for their ſakes which ſat with him, he would not reject her.

27 And immediately the king ſent an executioner, and commanded his head to be brought: and he went and beheaded him in the priſon, 28 And brought his head in a charger, and gave it to the damſel: and the damſel gave it to her mother.

29 And when his diſciples heard of it, they came, and took up his corpſe, and laid it in a tomb.

30 And the apoſtles gathered themſelves together unto Jeſus, and told him all things, both what they had done, and what they had taught.

31 And he ſaid unto them, Come ye yourſelves apart into a deſart place, and reſt a while: for there were many coming and going, and they had no leiſure ſo much as to eat.

32 And they departed into a deſart place by ſhip privately.

33 And the people ſaw them departing, and many knew him, and ran afoot thither out of all cities, and out-went them, and came together unto him.

34 And Jeſus, when he came out, ſaw much people, and was moved with compaſſion toward them, becauſe they were as ſheep not having a ſhepherd: and he began to teach them many things.

35 And when the day was now far ſpent, his diſciples came unto him, and ſaid, This is a deſart place, and now the time is far paſſed:

36 Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themſelves bread: for they have nothing to eat.

37 He anſwered and ſaid unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they ſay unto him, Shall we go and buy two hundred penny-worth of bread, and give them to eat?

38 He ſaith unto them, How many loaves have ye? go and ſee. And when they knew, they ſay, Five, and two fiſhes.

the more cautious he would certainly have been of incurring Herod's jealouſy or diſpleaſure, for fear of blaſting at once all their preconcerted deſigns, when they were at length in ſo fair a way for ſucceſs. But how oppoſite to all this was the conduct of John the Baptiſt! At this critical point of time, in his own peculiar ſtation, when both his own and his confederate's intereſt abſolutely required him to act in the manner juſt deſcribed; he even proceeded to reprove Herod himſelf for the wickedneſs of his life, and charged him with the unlawfulneſs of his moſt darling pleaſures in ſo particular an inſtance,—his marriage with Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, that he could expect nothing leſs in return, from Herod's violence of temper, and Herodias's influence, than impriſonment and death. And accordingly we find, that Herod immediately impriſoned John on account of Herodias; as well as, according to Joſephus, for fear he might attempt to bring on a revolt; and Herodias, as it was natural to expect ſhe would, ſoon after accompliſhed his death. An impoſtor, in John's particular ſituation, could not but have reflected at the firſt thought of ſo dangerous a ſtep as that which occaſioned the Baptiſt's death, that it was not his own immediate aſſiſtance only, of which his aſſociate would be deprived by his deſtruction, though this alone would have been ſufficient to prevent him from adopting it; but he would beſides have conſidered, that his own impriſonment and death would probably ſtrike ſuch a panic into the people, however zealous they had before been in his favour, as would reſtrain them from liſtening afterwards to Jeſus, or paying the ſame regard they might have done to his pretenſions. Nay, nothing was more probable than that John's public miniſtry being put to ſo ignominious an end, would even deſtroy that good opinion of John himſelf, which they had hitherto entertained, and induce them to believe, that notwithſtanding his fair outſide, he could be no better than an impoſtor; for, by what arguments could John think it was poſſible that the Jews could perſuade themſelves he was really ſent to be the divine forerunner of this triumphant Meſſiah, when they ſhould have ſeen him ſeized by Herod's order, impriſoned, and put to death? Beſide, therefore, John's regard to his own ſucceſs, his liberty, and even his life itſelf, which no impoſtor can be thought deſirous of expoſing to certain deſtruction for no reaſon; his connection with Jeſus, if they were deceivers, and the neceſſary dependance of both upon the mutual ſucceſs and aſſiſtance of each other, muſt unqueſtionably have reſtrained John from provoking, at this time, the inveterate hatred of Herodias, and drawing on himſelf Herod's violent ſuſpicion and diſpleaſure. So that the remarkable behaviour of John in this important particular, and at ſo critical a conjuncture, affords us one of the ſtrongeſt preſumptive proofs imaginable, that neither he nor Jeſus could poſſibly be deceivers. As St. Mark informs us that the people knew whither our Saviour was going, the above tranſlation appears perfectly right; they knew the place: accordingly it follows, and ran thither on foot. Πεζῇ here may ſignify by land, as Blackwall hath ſhewn; for it appears from Matth. xiv. 14. that there were many with our Lord in the deſart, who cannot be ſuppoſed to have walked thither; and as for their travelling with ſuch ſpeed, as to arrive at the place before Jeſus, it may eaſily be accounted for, if in ſailing he met with a contrary wind. Some think, when he received the news of the Baptiſt's death, he was in Peræa, whither he had gone after leaving Nazareth; ſee ver. 6. wherefore, as this country lay at the bottom of the lake weſtward, in going from thence to the deſart of Bethſaida, Jeſus had to ſail the whole length of the lake northwards. If ſo, the people on the ſhore might eaſily run afoot to the place before him; they might do the ſame upon the ſuppoſition that Jeſus now ſailed from Capernaum, becauſe either a contrary wind or a calm would retard the motion of his veſſel, ſo as to give the multitude time to arrive at the place before him. The truth is, John vi. 1. repreſents our Lord as ſailing croſs the lake on this occaſion; a circumſtance which agrees better with his looſing from Capernaum on the weſt than on the ſouth coaſt. It is therefore probable, that after ſending the diſciples away, Jeſus left the country of Nazareth, and returned to Capernaum, where he waited their return from their miſſion; and that from Capernaum he ſailed with them to the deſart of Bethſaida. See Macknight, and Blackwall's Sacred Claſſics, vol. 2.

39 And he commanded them to make all ſit down by companies, upon the green graſs.

40 And they ſat down in ranks by hundreds, and by fifties.

41 And when he had taken the five loaves and the two fiſhes, he looked up to heaven, and bleſſed, and brake the loaves, and gave them to his diſciples, to ſet before them; and the two fiſhes divided he among them all.

42 And they did all eat, and were filled.

43 And they took up twelve baſkets full of the fragments, and of the fiſhes.

44 And they that did eat of the loaves, were about five thouſand men.

45 And ſtraightway he conſtrained his diſciples to get into the ſhip, and to go to the other ſide before unto Bethſaida, while he ſent away the people.

46 And when he had ſent them away, he departed into a mountain to pray.

47 And when even was come, the ſhip was in the midſt of the ſea, and he alone on the land.

48 And he ſaw them toiling in rowing: for the wind was contrary unto them; and about the fourth watch of the night he cometh unto them, walking upon the ſea, and would have paſſed by them.

49 But when they ſaw him walking upon the ſea, they ſuppoſed it had been a ſpirit, and cried out.

50 (For they all ſaw him, and were troubled.) And immediately he talked with them, and ſaith unto them, Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid.

51 And he went up unto them into the ſhip; and the wind ceaſed: and they were ſore amazed in themſelves beyond meaſure, and wondered.

52 For they conſidered not the miracle of the loaves: for their heart was hardened.

53 And when they had paſſed over, they came into the land of Genneſaret, and drew to the ſhore.

54 And when they were come out of the ſhip, ſtraightway they knew him.

55 And ran through that whole region round about, and began to carry about in beds thoſe that were ſick, where they heard he was.

56 And whitherſoever he entered, into villages, or cities, or country, they laid the ſick in the ſtreets, and beſought him that they might touch, if it were but the border of his garment: and as many as touched him were made whole.

Ver. 39, 40. He commanded them, &c.] When the loaves and the fiſhes were brought, our Lord commanded his Apoſtles to make the whole multitude ſit down by companies, each conſiſting of two rows, with their faces oppoſite, and their backs turned to the backs of the next companies. This diſpoſition appears from the words before us. St. Luke, ch. ix. 14. repreſents it thus: Make them ſit down by fifties in a company, Συμπόσιον, the word uſed by St. Mark, ſignifies "a company of gueſts at table;" but κλισία, the word in St. Luke, denotes properly "as many of them as lie on one bed," according to the eaſtern manner of eating. By Chriſt's order, therefore, the people were to ſit down to this meal in companies, conſiſting ſome of fifty perſons, ſome of a hundred, according as the ground would admit. The members of each company were to be placed in two rows, the one row with their faces towards thoſe of the other, as if a long table had been between them. The firſt company being thus ſet down, the ſecond was to be placed beſide the firſt in a like form, and the third by the ſecond, till all were ſet down; the direction of the ranks being up the hill, and the two ranks of every diviſion formed into one company, by being placed with their faces towards each other, ſo they were diſtinguiſhed from the neighbouring companies by lying with their backs turned to their backs; and the whole body of the multitude thus ranged, would reſemble a garden-plot, divided into ſeed-beds, which is the proper ſignification of πρασιον, the name given by St. Mark to the ſeveral companies, after they were formed. The difference of numbers found in the companies aroſe probably from the ſituation of the ground; they were ranged on the declivity of a hill, where it happened that on one ſide ranks of twenty-five perſons only could be admitted, and conſequently the companies there conſiſted of no more than fifties each, and the ranks of twenty-five. St. Luke deſcribes their diſpoſition from that which was moſt prevalent, the greateſt part of the people lying together by fifties in a company. By this regulation the number was more eaſily aſcertained, and the people better and more regularly fed. We may obſerve further, that as the people were fed on a mountain, and lay, as we have remarked, with their heads pointing up the hill, reclining on their elbows, they were almoſt in a ſitting poſture, and had their eyes fixed on Jeſus, who ſtood below them in a place which was more plain, at a little diſtance from the ends of the ranks. Without doubt, therefore, they all heard his thankſgiving and prayer for the miracle, ſaw him give the diſciples the food, and were aſtoniſhed above meaſure, when they perceived, that inſtead of diminiſhing, it increaſed under his creating hands. Moreover, being ſet down in companies, conſiſting ſome of fifty, ſome of a hundred perſons, according as the ground would admit, and every company being divided into two ranks, which lay fronting each other, the ranks of all the companies were parallel, and pointed towards Jeſus; and ſo were ſituated in ſuch a manner, that the diſciples could readily bring the bread and fiſh to them, who ſat at the extremities of the ranks. By this diſpoſition too, there muſt have been ſuch a ſpace between the two ranks of each company, that every individual in it could eaſily ſurvey the whole of his own company, as well thoſe above as thoſe below him; and therefore when the viands were brought from one to another, they would all follow them with their eyes, and ſee them ſwelling not only in their own hands, but in the hands of their companions likewiſe, to the amazement and joy of every perſon preſent. The Evangeliſts indeed give very ſhort accounts of our Lord's miracles; nevertheleſs, the nature of thoſe miracles, and the few circumſtances which they have mentioned, often ſuggeſt many aſtoniſhing ideas, which inattentive readers altogether overlook. See my 16th diſcourſe on the miracles, vol. ii. p. 280. Macknight, and Pierce's 5th diſſertation on the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

Ver. 52. For they conſidered not, &c.] Ὀυ γὰρ συνῆκαν: They had not a proper idea of his miraculous power, demonſtrated in that wonderful miracle; becauſe if they had, his walking on the ſea, and making the ſtorm to ceaſe, would not have affected them with ſo great a ſurprize; as the former was a more certain and glorious miracle, demonſtrating even a creating power, which is plainly hinted by the Evangeliſt in this place. Beſides, they ought to have been ſo convinced of Chriſt's omnipotence by the miracle of the loaves, which had been wrought but a few hours before, that no new inſtance ſhould have ſurprized them. Dr. Heylin, in this view, renders the verſe, for they had not been ſufficiently affected by the miracle of the loaves, through the inſenſibility of their hearts. Inſtead of, their heart was hardened, Dr. Waterland and the MS. read, was ſlow of underſtanding.

REFLECTIONS ON HEROD's MURDER OF THE BAPTIST.

We have obſerved in the Reflections on Matth. xiv. with a particular reference to the caſe of Herod, how certainly conſcience will do its duty upon any eminent breach of ours, and make every flagrant act of wickedneſs, even in this life, a puniſhment to itſelf.—That guilt and anguiſh are inſeparable, and that the puniſhment of a

CHAP. VII.

The Phariſees find fault with the diſciples, for eating with unwaſhen hands. They break the commandment of God by the tradition of men. Meat defileth not the man. He healeth the Syrophenician woman's daughter of an unclean ſpirit, and one that was deaf, and ſtammered in his ſpeech.

man's ſin begins always from himſelf, and from his own reflections, is a truth every where ſuppoſed, appealed to, and inculcated in Scripture. See Rom. ii. 15. Jer. ii. 19. Prov. xviii. 14. Iſai. xxxiii. 14. Pſalm. xxxviii. There is nothing in the repreſentations here referred to, particular to the times and perſons on which they point; nothing but what happens alike to all men, in all caſes, as is the genuine and neceſſary reſult of offending againſt the light of our conſciences; nor is it poſſible indeed, in the nature of the thing, that matters ſhould be otherwiſe: It is the way in which guilt does and muſt always operate; for moral evil can no more be committed, than natural evil can be ſuffered, without anguiſh or diſquiet. Whatever doth violence to the plain dictates of our reaſon concerning virtue and vice, duty and ſin, will as certainly diſcompoſe and afflict our thoughts, as a wound will raiſe a ſmart in the fleſh that receives it. Good and evil, whether natural or moral, are but other words for pleaſure and pain; at leaſt, though they may be diſtinguiſhed in the notion, yet are they not to be ſeparated in the reality; but the one of them, wherever it is, will conſtantly and uniformly excite and produce the other. Pain and pleaſure are the ſprings of all human actions, the great engines by which the wiſe author of our nature governs and ſteers them to the purpoſes for which he ordained them. By theſe, annexed to the perception of good and evil, he inclines us powerfully to purſue the one, and to avoid the other; to purſue natural good, and to avoid natural evil, by delightful or uneaſy ſenſations, which immediately affect the body; to purſue moral good, and to avoid moral evil, by pleaſing or painful impreſſions made on the mind.

Hence then the ſatisfactions or ſtings of conſcience ſeverally ariſe; they are the ſanctions, as it were, and enforcements of that eternal law of good and evil, to which we are ſubjected; the natural rewards and puniſhments originally annexed to the obſervance or breach of that law by the great promulger of it; and which, being thus joined, and twiſted together by God, can ſcarce by any arts, endeavours, or practices of men, be put aſunder.

There is no need of arguments to evince this truth: the univerſal experience and feeling of mankind bear witneſs to it; for, did ever any man break the power of a darling luſt, reſiſt a preſſing temptation, or perform any act of a conſpicuous and diſtinguiſhing virtue, but that he ſoon found it turn to account, health to his navel, and marrow to his bones? On the contrary, did any man ever indulge a criminal appetite, or allow himſelf ſedately in any practice which he knew to be unlawful, but he felt an inward ſtruggle, and ſtrong reluctance of mind, before the attempt,—and bitter pangs of remorſe attending it? What though no human eye was privy to the action,—was not conſcience inſtead of a thouſand witneſſes?

Men who ſet up for freedom of thought, and for diſengaging themſelves from the prejudices of education, jolly and voluptuous livers, may pretend to diſpute this truth, and perhaps, in the gaiety of their hearts, may venture even to deride it. Herod perhaps did ſo; but, notwithſtanding all his efforts, conſcience ſtill operated, and he could not avoid its ſtinging remonſtrances. Such men, indeed, cannot get rid of their inward convictions; they muſt ſometimes feel them, though they will not own it: there is no poſſibility of reaſoning ourſelves out of our own experience, or of laughing down a principle woven ſo cloſely into the make and frame of our nature.

Look upon one of theſe men, who would have been thought to have made his ill practices and ill principles perfectly conſiſtent, and you will find a thouſand things, in his actions and diſcourſes, teſtifying againſt him, that he deceiveth himſelf, and that the truth is not in him. If he be indeed, as he pretends, at eaſe in his enjoyments,—from whence come thoſe diſorders and unevenneſſes in his life and conduct; thoſe viciſſitudes of good and bad humour, mirth and thoughtfulneſs; that perpetual purſuit of little, mean, inſipid amuſements; that reſtleſs deſire of changing the ſcene, and the objects of his pleaſures; thoſe ſudden eruptions of paſſion and rage upon the leaſt diſappointments? Certainly, all is not right within, or elſe there would be a greater calm and ſerenity without. If his mind were not in an unnatural ſituation, and under contrary influences, it would not be thus toſſed and diſquieted. For what reaſon doth he contrive for himſelf ſuch a chain and ſucceſſion of entertainments, and take ſuch care to be delivered from one folly, one diverſion to another, without intermiſſion? Why,—but becauſe he dreads to leave any void ſpace of life unfilled, leſt conſcience ſhould find work for his mind at thoſe intervals? He hath no way to fence againſt guilty reflections, but by ſtopping up all the avenues at which they might enter. Hence his ſtrong addiction to company, his averſion to darkneſs and ſolitude, which recollects his thoughts, and turns the mind inward upon itſelf by ſhutting out external objects and impreſſions. It is not becauſe the pleaſures of ſociety are always new and grateful to him, that he always purſues them thus keenly; for they ſoon loſe their reliſh, and grow flat and inſipid by repetition. They are not his choice, but his refuge: for the truth is, he dares not long converſe with himſelf and with his own thoughts; and the worſt company in the world is better to him, than that of a reproving conſcience.

We have a ſtrong proof of this in Tiberius, that complete pattern of wickedneſs and tyranny. He had taken as much pains to conquer the fears of conſcience as any man, and had as many helps and advantages towards it; and yet, as great a maſter of the art of diſſimulation as he was, he could not diſſemble the inward ſenſe of his guilt, no more than Herod, nor prevent the open eruptions of it upon very improper occaſions; witneſs that letter which he wrote to the ſenate, from his impure retirement at Capræ. There cannot be a livelier image of a mind filled with wild diſtraction and deſpair than the beginning of it affords us: "What, or how, at this time, I ſhall write to you, fathers of the ſenate, or what indeed I ſhall not write to you, may all the powers of heaven confound me, yet worſe than they have already done, if I know, or can imagine!"—The obſervation of Tacitus upon this paſſage is very appoſite to the preſent purpoſe. "Thus, ſays he, was this emperor puniſhed by a reflection on his own infamous life and guilt; nor was it in vain that the greateſt maſter of wiſdom, Plato, affirmed, that were the breaſts of tyrants once laid open to our view, we ſhould ſee there nothing but ghaſtly wounds and bruiſes: the conſciouſneſs of their own cruelty, leudneſs, and ill conduct leaving as deep and bloody prints on their minds, as the ſtrokes of the ſcourge do on the back of a ſlave.—Tiberius, adds he, confeſſed as much, when he uttered theſe words; nor could his high ſtation, or even privacy and retirement itſelf hinder him from diſcovering to all the world the inward agonies and torments under which he laboured." Thus that excellent hiſtorian. Annal. l. 6.

Believe it, the tales of ghoſts and ſpectres were not, as is commonly ſaid, the mere inventions of deſigning men, to keep weak men in awe, nor the products only of a religious fear, degenerated into melancholy and ſuperſtition; but wicked men, haunted with a ſenſe of their own guilt, as the cruel tetrarch with the holy Baptiſt's murder, were uſed to affright themſelves with ſuch fantoms as theſe, and often miſtook ſtrong and terrible imaginations for real apparitions. See the book of Wiſdom, ch. xvii. 1—11.

Since therefore the wiſe author of our nature hath ſo contrived it, that guilt is naturally and almoſt neceſſarily attended with trouble and uneaſineſs, Let us, even from hence, be perſuaded to preſerve the purity, that we may preſerve the peace and tranquility of our minds. For pleaſure's ſake, let us abſtain from all criminal pleaſures and pollutions, becauſe the racking pains of guilt, duly awakened, are really an over-balance to the greateſt ſenſual gratifications. The charms of vice (how tempting ſoever they may ſeem to be) are by no means equivalent to the inward remorſe and trouble, and the tormenting reflections which attend it; which always keep pace with our guilt, and are proportioned to the greatneſs and daringneſs of our crimes: for mighty ſinners, here as well as hereafter, ſhall be mightily tormented, (Wiſd. vi. 6.) Sins of omiſſion, infirmity, and ſurpriſe, there will be; even the juſt man falleth ſeven times a day by them, and riſes again from them with ſtrength and chearfulneſs to his duty; but let us be ſure carefully to guard againſt all ſuch flagrant emotions, as do violence to the firſt and plaineſt dictates of our reaſon, and overbear the ſtrongeſt impulſes of our conſcience; for theſe will certainly leave a wound behind them, which we ſhall find it hard to bear, and harder, much harder to cure. Let no temptation, no intereſt, no influence whatſoever ſway us to do any thing whatſoever contrary to the ſuggeſtions of conſcience, in plain caſes, and points of moment. Let us no more dare to do in private, what that tells us ought not to be done, than if we were upon an open theatre, and the eyes of the whole creation were upon us. What ſignifies it that we eſcape the view and obſervation of men, when the watchful witneſs within ſees and records all our faults, and will certainly one day reprove us, and ſet our miſdeeds in order before us?

It hath been reckoned a good rule for an happy conduct of life, to be ſure of keeping our domeſtic concerns right, and of being eaſy under our own roof, where we may find an agreeable retreat and ſhelter from any diſappointments we meet with in the great ſcene of vexation, the world. And the ſame rule will, with greater reaſon hold, in relation to the peace of our conſciences. Let our firſt care be to keep all quiet and ſerene there: When this point is once gained at home, external accidents will not be able deeply to affect us; and unleſs it be gained, all the pleaſures, the abundance and pomp of life, will be inſipid and taſteleſs to us.

Wherefore, let us reſolve, all of us, to ſtick to that principle, which will keep us eaſy when we are alone, and will ſtick to us in an hour when all outward comforts fail us. Let thoſe in particular cheriſh it, who are in any degree placed above the reſt of their neighbours, by a ſuperiority of parts, power, riches, or any other outward diſtinctions. Let thoſe chiefly liſten to this reprover, who are otherwiſe ſet in great meaſure above reproof: The more deſtitute they are of the advice and correction of others, the more careful ſhould they be to attend to the ſuggeſtions and whiſpers of this inward monitor and friend. Though they value not the cenſures paſſed by the vulgar on their actions, yet ſurely they cannot ſlight their own: Nor do they ſtoop beneath themſelves, when they ſtoop to themſelves only, and to the inward dictates and perſuaſions of their own minds. The marks of diſtinction they bear, though they may enable them ſometimes to ſin with impunity, as to men, yet will they not ſecure them from the laſhes of an avenging conſcience; which will find them out in their moſt ſecret retirements, cannot be forbid acceſs, nor diſmiſſed without being heard; will make their way to them, as they did to Herod and Tiberius, through buſineſs or pleaſure; nay, even through guards and crowds, and all the vain forms and ceremonies with which they may be ſurrounded.

THEN came together unto him the Phariſees, and certain of the ſcribes, which came from Jeruſalem.

2 And when they ſaw ſome of his diſciples eat bread with defiled (that is to ſay, with unwaſhen) hands, they found fault.

3 For the Phariſees, and all the Jews, except they waſh their hands oft, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders.

4 And when they come from the market, except they waſh, they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, as the waſhing of cups and pots, and of braſen veſſels and tables.

5 Then the Phariſees and ſcribes aſked him, Why walk not thy diſciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwaſhen hands?

6 He anſwered and ſaid unto them, Well hath Eſaias propheſied of you, hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me.

7 Howbeit, in vain do they worſhip me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.

8 For, laying aſide the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the waſhing of pots and cups: and many other ſuch like things ye do.

9 And he ſaid unto them, Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition.

10 For Moſes ſaid, Honour thy father and thy mother; and, Whoſo curſeth father or mother, let him die the death:

11 But ye ſay, If a man ſhall ſay to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to ſay, a gift, by whatſoever thou mighteſt be profited by me; he ſhall be free.

12 And ye ſuffer him no more to do aught for his father or his mother;

13 Making the word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered: and many ſuch like things do ye.

14 And when he had called all the people unto him, he ſaid unto them, Hearken unto me every one of you, and underſtand:

15 There is nothing from without a man, that entering into him, can defile him: but the things which come out of him, thoſe are they that defile the man.

16 If any man have ears to hear, let him hear.

17 And when he was entered into the houſe from the people, his diſciples aſked him concerning the parable.

18 And he ſaith unto them, Are ye ſo without underſtanding alſo? Do ye not perceive, that whatſoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him;

19 Becauſe it entereth not into his heart, but into the belly, and goeth out into the draught, purging all meats?

20 And he ſaid, That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man.

21 For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders,

22 Thefts, covetouſneſs, wickedneſs, deceit, laſciviouſneſs, an evil eye, blaſphemy, pride, fooliſhneſs:

23 All theſe evil things come from within, and defile the man.

24 And from thence he aroſe, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, and entered into an houſe, and would have no man know it: but he could not be hid.

Theophylact tranſlates it, up to their elbows; affirming that πυγμῇ denotes the whole of the arm, from the bending to the ends of the fingers: But this ſenſe of the word is altogether unuſual; for πυγμῇ properly is, "the hand, with the fingers contracted into the palm, and made round,—the fiſt." Theophylact's tranſlation, however, exhibits the Evangeliſt's meaning; for the Jews, when they waſhed, held up their hands, and contracting their fingers, received the water that was poured on them by their ſervants, (who had it for a part of their office, 2 Kings iii. 11.) till it ran down their arms, which they waſhed up to their elbows. To waſh with the fiſt, therefore, is to waſh with great care. See Mintert on the word ΠΥΓΜΗ, and Lightfoot's Horæ Hebraicæ.

Διδασκαλία, in general, ſignifies any leſſon; and the purpoſe to which our Lord here applies it, plainly ſhews that it muſt refer to ritual injunctions. See Doddridge, and Bp. Ver. 27. And to caſt it unto the dogs] Bp. Hall obſerves upon this circumſtance of the preſent ſtory,—"The time was, that the Jews were children, and the Gentiles dogs; but now the caſe is happily altered: The Jews are the dogs;—ſo their dear and divine countryman calls the conciſion; we Gentiles are the children. What certainty is there in an external profeſſion, that gives us only to ſee, not to be? at leaſt the being that it gives, is doubtful and temporary. We may be children to-day, and dogs to-morrow. The true aſſurance of our condition, is in the covenant of God on his part, in faith and obedience on ours. How they of children became dogs, it is not hard to ſay. Their preſumption, their unbelief, transformed them; and to perfect their brutiſhneſs, they ſet their fangs upon the Lord of life. See Pſ. xxii. 16. How we of dogs became children, I know no reaſon, but the depth of the riches and goodneſs of God. That which at the firſt ſingled them out from the nations of the world, hath at laſt ſingled us out from the world and them. It is not in him that willeth, nor in him that runneth, but in God that ſheweth mercy. How ſhould we bleſs the goodneſs of God, that of dogs we are made children! How ſhould we fear his juſtice, ſince they of children are made dogs! Let us not be high-minded, but tremble: If they were cut off who crucified the Lord in his humbled eſtate, what may not thoſe expect, who crucify him daily in his glory." See the Reflections on Matth. xv.

Ver. 32, 33. And had an impediment in his ſpeech] Μογιλαλον. He was not abſolutely dumb, but ſtammered to ſuch a degree, that few underſtood his ſpeech, ver. 35. However, the circumſtance of his being able to ſpeak in any manner, ſhews that his deafneſs was not natural, but accidental. He had heard formerly, and had learned to ſpeak; but was now deprived of hearing, perhaps, through ſome fault of his own, which might be the reaſon that Jeſus ſighed for grief when he cured him. The friends of this man brought him to Jeſus, and interceded for him, becauſe he was not able to intercede for himſelf: his deſire, however, of a cure, may have prompted him to do his utmoſt in ſpeaking, whereby all preſent were made ſenſible of the greatneſs of the infirmity under which he laboured. Our Lord's exuberant goodneſs eaſily led him to give this perſon the relief that his friends begged for him; yet he would not do it publickly, leſt the admiration of the ſpectators ſhould have been raiſed ſo high, as to produce bad effects; for the whole country was now following him, in expectation that he would ſoon ſet up his kingdom: or, as Gadara, where his miracle upon the demoniacs had been ſo ill received, was part of this region, (ſee Luke viii. 26.) he might ſhun performing the miracle publickly, becauſe it would have no effect upon ſo ſtupid a people. Whatever was the reaſon, he took the man with his relations aſide from the crowd; and becauſe the deaf are ſuppoſed to have their ears ſhut, and the dumb their tongues ſo tied or faſtened to the under part of their mouth, as not to be able to move it, (ſee ver. 35.) he put his fingers into the man's ears, and then touched or moiſtened his tongue with his ſpittle, to make him underſtand, that he intended to open his ears, and looſen his tongue. This, perhaps, was the only reaſon for theſe ſymbolical actions. Spiritual writers have given different interpretations of them: The reader will find ſome in my 8th diſcourſe on this miracle. "If any one ſhould aſk, ſays Dr. Doddridge, why our Lord uſed theſe actions, when a word alone would have been ſufficient, and when ſuch means, if they may be called means, could in themſelves do nothing at all to anſwer the end? I frankly confeſs I cannot tell;—nor am I at all concerned to know; yet I am ready to imagine it might be intended to intimate, in a very lively manner, that we are not to pretend to enter into the reaſons of all his actions; and that where we are ſure that any obſervance whatever is applied by him, we are humbly to ſubmit to it, though we cannot ſee why it was preferred to others, which our imagination might ſuggeſt. Had Chriſt's patients, like Naaman, (2 Kings v. 11, 12.) been too nice in their exceptions on theſe occaſions, I fear they would have loſt their cure: and the indulgence of a curious or a petulant mind would have been but a poor equivalent for ſuch a loſs."

Ver. 34. And looking up to heaven] Our Lord did this, that the deaf man, whom he could not inſtruct by language, might conſider from whence all benefits proceed. After this, he ſighed. Perhaps the circumſtances mentioned in the former note, or ſome others unknown to us, made this man a peculiar object of pity: or by this example of bodily deafneſs and dumbneſs, our Lord might be led to reflect on the ſpiritual deafneſs and dumbneſs of men; but whatever was the cauſe, Chriſt's ſighing on this occaſion evidently diſplayed the tender love he bore to mankind: for certainly it could be nothing leſs which moved him to condole our miſeries, whether general or particular, in ſo affectionate a manner. See more inſtances of his compaſſion, Luke xix. 41. John xi. 33. After this he ſaid, Ephphatha, "Be opened:" which Grotius applies by obſerving, that the internal impediments of the mind are removed by the Spirit of Chriſt, as thoſe bodily impediments were by the word of his power. He opens the heart, as he did Lydia's, and thereby opens the ear to receive the word of God, and opens the mouth in prayer and praiſe. See Critic. Sacra in Loc.

Ver. 36. And he charged them, &c.] See on Matth. viii. 4. Dr. Stanhope, in the 3d vol. of his Comment on the Epiſtles and Goſpels, p. 397. aſſigns the following reaſons for our Saviour's forbidding the publication of his miracles. 1. To decline, as much as was poſſible, the envy and oppoſition of the Phariſees. 2. To ſecure his life from their malice, till the appointed time. 3. To prevent any ſedition or tumults among the people. And, 4. To ſet us an example of humility, and of doing good for good's ſake; which forbids oſtentation, and ſeeking the eſteem and admiration of men; becauſe this were, in effect, to make new maſters to ourſelves, and by a baſe degeneracy of ſpirit, to become ſlaves to our fellow-creatures; and becauſe the true way to ſecure the honour and eſteem of men, is to decline it, when we beſt deſerve it.

Ver. 37. He hath done all things well] Καλῶς,—in a moſt amiable and graceful manner. They were ſtruck with his ſympathetic tenderneſs for the afflicted, and admired his modeſty in concealing the cure, and hiding it under the veil of ſecond cauſes. Happy would it be, if all his followers, and eſpecially his miniſters, would learn of him, who was thus meek and lowly; neither acting as in their own ſtrength, when they attempt a ſpiritual cure, nor proclaiming their own praiſe, when they have effected it. Then would they likewiſe do all things well; and there would be that beauty in the manner, which no wiſe man would intirely neglect, even in thoſe actions which are in themſelves moſt excellent and great. It is a high commendation of a miniſter to ſay, that he has done all things well; that is, both with exterior gravity, modeſty, and decency, and with interior application, piety and religion. It is the way to make the deaf hearken to the truth, and to draw from ſinners the acknowledgment and confeſſion of their miſeries. See ſermons on the miracles, vol. i. p. 362.

maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to ſpeak.

CHAP. VIII.

Chriſt feedeth the people miraculouſly: refuſeth to give a ſign to the Phariſees: admoniſheth his diſciples to beware of the leaven of the Phariſees, and of the leaven of Herod: giveth a blind man his ſight: acknowledgeth that he is the Chriſt, who ſhould ſuffer, and riſe again; and exhorteth to patience in perſecution for the profeſſion of the goſpel.

IN thoſe days the multitude being very great, and having nothing to eat, Jeſus called his diſciples unto him, and ſaith unto them,

Ver. 1 Matth. xv. 32.

REFLECTIONS ON THE CURE OF THE DEAF AND DUMB MAN.

Our Saviour's entrance into the coaſts of Tyre and Sidon was not without a miracle, neither was his departure; as the ſun neither riſes nor ſets without light. In his entrance he delivers the daughter of the faithful Syrophenician; in his egreſs he cures the deaf and dumb. He can no more want work, than that work can want ſucceſs. Whether the patient were naturally deaf and perfectly dumb, or imperfectly dumb and accidentally deaf, I labour not; ſure I am he was ſo deaf that he could not hear of Chriſt; ſo dumb, that he could not ſpeak for himſelf. Good neighbours ſupply his ears, his tongue; they bring him to Chriſt. Behold a miracle, led in by charity, acted by power, led out by modeſty.

It was a true office of love to ſpeak thus in the cauſe of the dumb; to lend ſenſes to him who wanted. This ſpiritual ſervice we owe to each other. Every ſoul is become deaf and dumb by increaſing corruptions and actual ſins. Some ears the infinite mercy of God hath bored; ſome tongues he hath untied by the power of regeneration; Theſe are wanting to their holy faculties, if they do not improve themſelves in bringing the deaf and dumb to Chriſt.

They do not only lend their hand to this man, but their tongue alſo; and ſay that for him, which he could not but wiſh to ſay for himſelf. Every man hath a tongue ready to ſpeak for himſelf; happy is he that keeps a tongue for other men. We are charged not with ſupplications only, but with interceſſions. Herein is both the largeſt improvement of our love, and the moſt effectual: No diſtance can hinder the fruit of our devotion:—What was their ſuit to Chriſt, (ver. 32.) but that he would put his hand upon the patient? Not that they would preſcribe the means, or imply the neceſſity of the touch, but becauſe they ſaw this was the ordinary courſe both of Chriſt and his diſciples, to heal by touching. Our prayers muſt be directed to the uſual proceedings of God; his actions muſt be the rule of our prayers; our prayers may not preſcribe his actions.

That gracious Saviour, who is wont to exceed our deſires, doth more than they ſue for; not only doth he touch the party, but takes him by the hand, and leads him from the multitude. He that would be healed of his ſpiritual infirmities, muſt be ſequeſtered from the throng of the world. There is a good uſe in ſolitarineſs, at proper ſeaſons; and that ſoul can never enjoy God, that is not ſometimes retired.

Perhaps this retirement was for an example to us of a careful avoidance of vain-glory in our actions; whence alſo it is, that our Saviour gives an after-charge of ſecrecy. He that could ſay, he that doeth evil hateth the light, now eſcheweth the light, even in good. To ſeek our own glory, is not glory. Here was alſo a due regard paid to opportunity by our Lord in his conduct: The envy of the Scribes and Phariſees might oppoſe his divine miniſtry; their exaſperation is wiſely declined by this retiring. He, in whoſe hands time is, knows how to make the beſt choice of ſeaſons. Wiſdom hath no better improvement than in diſtinguiſhing times, and diſcreetly marſhalling the circumſtances of our actions; which, whoſoever neglects, ſhall be ſure to ſhame his work, and mar his hopes.

Is there a ſpiritual patient to be cured? Take him aſide. To undertake him before the face of the multitude, is not to heal, but to wound him. Reproof and good counſel muſt be, like our alms, in ſecret; as, in ſome caſes, confeſſion, ſo our reprehenſion, muſt be auricular;—it being the beſt remedy, that is leaſt ſeen and moſt felt.

What means this variety of ceremony? O Saviour! thy word alone, thy nod alone, thy wiſh alone, yea, the leaſt act of thy will, might have wrought this cure. Why wouldeſt thou employ ſo much of thyſelf in this work? Was it to ſhew thy liberty, in not always equally exerciſing the power of thy deity; in that one while only thy command ſhall raiſe the dead, and eject devils; another while, thou wouldeſt accommodate thyſelf to the mean and homely faſhions of natural agents, and, condeſcending to our ſenſes and cuſtoms, take thoſe ways which may carry ſome more near reſpect to the cure intended? Or was it to teach us, how well thou likeſt that there ſhould be a ceremonious carriage of thy ſolemn actions, which thou pleaſeſt to produce cloathed with ſuch circumſtantial forms?

It did not content thee to put one finger into one ear: both ears equally need a cure; thou wouldeſt eſtabliſh the means of cure to both: The Spirit of God is the finger of God; then doſt thou, O Saviour, put thy finger in our ear, when thy Spirit enables us to hear effectually. Hence the great philoſophers of the ancient world, the learned rabbies of the ſynagogue, the great doctors of a falſe faith, are deaf to ſpiritual things. It is that finger of thy Spirit, O bleſſed Jeſus, which can open our ears, and make through them a paſſage into our hearts: Let that finger of thine be put into our ears, ſo ſhall our deafneſs be removed, and we ſhall hear, not the loud thunders of the law, but the gentle whiſperings of thy gracious motions to our ſouls.

Our Saviour was not content to open the ears only, but to untie the tongue: With the ear we hear, with the mouth we confeſs. There are thoſe whoſe ears are open, but their mouths are ſtill ſhut to God; they underſtand, but do not utter the wonderful things of God. There is but half a cure wrought upon theſe men; their ear is but open to hear their own judgement, except their mouth be open to confeſs their Maker and Redeemer. O God, do thou ſo moiſten my tongue with thy graces, that it may run ſmoothly (as the pen of a ready writer) to the praiſe of thy name.

Whilſt the finger of our Saviour was on the tongue, and in the ear of the patient, his eye was in heaven. Never man had ſo much cauſe to look up to heaven as he; there was his home, there was his throne: He only was from heaven, heavenly: What doth thine eye, O Saviour, in this, but teach ours where to be fixed? Every good and every perfect gift come down from above; O let not then our eyes or hearts grovel upon this earth; but let us faſten them above the hills, whence cometh our ſalvation. Thence let us acknowledge all the good we receive; thence expect all the good we want.

But why did the Saviour ſigh? Surely it was not for need. How could he chooſe but be heard of his Father, who was one with the Father? Not for any fear or diſtruſt;—but partly for compaſſion, partly for example. For compaſſion of thoſe manifold infirmities, into which ſin had plunged mankind;—a pitiable inſtance whereof was here preſented to him: for example, to fetch ſighs from us for the miſeries of others; ſighs of ſorrow for them, ſighs of deſire for their redreſs. This is not the firſt time that our Saviour ſpent ſighs, yea tears upon human diſtreſſes. We are not bone of his bone, and fleſh of his fleſh, if we ſo feel not the ſmart of our brethren, that the fire of our paſſion break forth into the ſmoak of ſighs. Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not?

Chriſt was not ſilent whilſt he cured the dumb; his ephphatha gave life to all his other actions. His ſighing, his ſpitting, his looking up to heaven, were the acts of a man; this command was the act of God. In his mouth the word cannot be ſevered from its ſucceſs. No ſooner are the Saviour's lips opened in his ephphatha, than the mouth of the dumb and the ears of the deaf are opened at once. Behold here united celerity and perfection. Natural agents work leiſurely, by degrees; Omnipotence knows no rules; the man hears now more freely than if he had never been deaf, and ſpeaks more plainly than if he had never been tongue-tied.

And can we blame him, if he beſtowed the firſt-fruits of his ſpeech upon the power that reſtored it? Or can we expect other than that our Saviour ſhould ſay, "thy tongue is free, uſe it to the praiſe of him who made it ſo; thy ears are open, hear him who bids thee proclaim thy cure upon the houſe-top?"—But now, behold, on the contrary, He that opens this man's mouth by his powerful word, by the ſame word ſhuts it again! Charging ſilence by the ſame breath wherewith he gave ſpeech;—tell no man! O Saviour! thou knoweſt the grounds for thine own commands. It is not for us to inquire, but to obey. We may not honour thee with a forbidden celebration; good meanings have often proved injurious.

Thoſe men whoſe charity employed their tongues to ſpeak for the dumb man, do now employ thoſe tongues to ſpeak of his cure, when they ſhould have been dumb. This charge, they imagine, proceeds from an humble modeſty in Chriſt, which reſpect to his honour bids them violate. I know not how, we itch after thoſe forbidden acts, which, if left to our liberty, we willingly neglect. This prohibition increaſeth the rumour; every tongue is buſied about this one. What can we make of this, but a well-meant diſobedience?

O God, I ſhould more gladly publiſh thy name at thy command. I know thou canſt not bid me to diſhonour thee: But if thou ſhouldeſt bid me to hide the profeſſion of thy name and wondrous works, I ſhould fulfil thy words, and not examine thine intentions. Thou knoweſt how to win more honour by our ſilence, than by our promulgation. A forbidden good differs little from evil. What makes our actions to be ſin, but thy prohibitions? Our judgement avails nothing; if thou forbid us that which we think good, it becomes as much a fault toward thee, as that which is originally evil: Take thou the charge of thy glory; give me grace to take charge of thy precepts.

4 And his diſciples anſwered him, From whence can a man ſatisfy theſe men with bread here in the wilderneſs?

5 And he aſked them, How many loaves have ye? And they ſaid, Seven.

6 And he commanded the people to ſit down on the ground: and he took the ſeven loaves, and gave thanks, and brake, and gave to his diſciples, to ſet before them; and they did ſet them before the people.

8 So they did eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left, ſeven baſkets.

9 And they that had eaten were about four thouſand: and he ſent them away.

10 And ſtraightway he entered into a ſhip with his diſciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha.

11 And the Phariſees came forth, and began to queſtion with him, ſeeking of him a ſign from heaven, tempting him.

12 And he ſighed deeply in his ſpirit, and ſaith, Why doth this generation ſeek after a ſign? verily I ſay unto you, There ſhall no ſign be given to this generation.

13 And he left them, and entering into the ſhip again, departed to the other ſide.

14 Now the diſciples had forgotten to take bread, neither had they in the ſhip with them more than one loaf.

15 And he charged them, ſaying, Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Phariſees, and of the leaven of Herod.

16 And they reaſoned among themſelves, ſaying, It is becauſe we have no bread.

17 And when Jeſus knew it, he ſaith unto them, Why reaſon ye, becauſe ye have no bread? perceive ye not yet, neither underſtand? have ye your heart yet hardened?

18 Having eyes, ſee ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember?

19 When I brake the five loaves among five thouſand, how many baſkets full of fragments took ye up? They ſay unto him, Twelve.

24 And he looked up, and ſaid, I ſee men as trees, walking.

25 After that, he put his hands again upon his eyes, and made him look up: and he was reſtored, and ſaw every man clearly.

In ordinary caſes it may be ſupplied out of the ancient forms of ſwearing, thus: God do ſo to me, and more alſo, if a ſign ſhall be given. But in the mouth of God ſuch an oath muſt be ſupplied thus: Let me not be true, if they ſhall enter into my reſt,—if a ſign ſhall be given, &c. Or, as in Ezek. xiv. 16. I live not, if ſons or daughters be delivered. See the LXX, and Bos's Ellipſes. Some MSS. and verſions read, ου δοθήσεται, ſhall not be given. See Wetſtein.

Ver. 15. And the leaven of Herod] See the note on Matth. xxii. 16. It ſeems evident from hence, that the Herodians were of the ſect of the Sadducees; for what St. Mark calls the leaven of Herod, St. Matthew, in the parallel paſſage, calls the leaven of the Sadducees. Herodian, therefore, was but another name for ſuch ſort of Sadducees as maintained the expediency of ſubmitting to the innovations introduced by Herod and the Romans; for it may eaſily be thought, that thoſe who favoured Herod and the powers who ſupported him, were generally of this ſect. At the ſame time all the Sadducees were not Herodians, ſome of them ſhewing little of that complaiſance to the reigning powers, for which their brethren were ſo remarkable: and this accounts ſufficiently for the diſtinction between the Herodians and Sadducees, found Matth. xxii. 16, &c.

Ver. 17. Heart yet hardened] Heart yet ſlow of underſtanding. MS. Still inſenſible. Heylin.

Ver. 18. And do ye not remember] Continue this on with what follows, and it ſeems to connect more properly. Do ye not remember when I broke the five loaves, how many baſkets, &c? as in Matth. xvi. 9. See Bowyer's conjectures on Mark.

Ver. 22—26. And they bring a blind man, &c.] Two things are remarkable in this miracle: Firſt, our Lord led the man out of the town, before he would heal him; and when the cure was performed, he forbad him to return thither, or ſo much as to tell it unto any, who lived in the town. The reaſon was, the people had of a long time been ſolicitous to have him acknowledged as the Meſſiah; and every new miracle which they beheld, moved them afreſh to make the attempt. Nor could the inhabitants of Bethſaida complain of being ill uſed, though they were not permitted to be witneſſes of the cure, ſince they had brought this mark of Chriſt's diſpleaſure upon themſelves, by their ingratitude, impenitence, and infidelity. See Matth. xi. 21. And as for the man, he could not think it any hardſhip to be hindered from returning into the city, ſince it was not the place of his abode, ver. 26. Secondly, in giving ſight to this blind man, Jeſus did not, as on other occaſions of the like nature, impart the faculty all at once, but by degrees; for at firſt the man ſaw things but obſcurely; then, by a ſecond impoſition of Chriſt's hands, he had a clear ſight of every object in view. Our Lord's intention in this might be to make it evident, that in his cures he was not confined to one method of operation, but could diſpenſe them in what manner he pleaſed. In the mean time, though the cure was performed by degrees, it was accompliſhed in ſo ſmall a ſpace of time, as to make it evident that it was not produced by any natural efficacy of our Lord's ſpittle or touch, but merely by the exertion of his miraculous power. The blind man's expreſſion, after the firſt impoſition of Chriſt's hands, may eaſily be accounted for, on ſuppoſition that he was not born blind, but had loſt his ſight by ſome accident; for if that was the caſe, he might have retained the idea both of men and of trees; in which light his words I ſee men as trees, walking, expreſs the indiſtinctneſs of his viſion very properly. See Macknight, Doddridge, and ch. vii. 33.

ples, into the towns of Ceſarea Philippi: and by the way he aſked his diſciples, ſaying unto them, Whom do men ſay that I am?

28 And they anſwered, John the Baptiſt: but ſome ſay, Elias; and others, One of the prophets.

29 And he ſaith unto them, But whom ſay ye that I am? And Peter anſwereth and ſaith unto him, Thou art the Chriſt.

30 And he charged them that they ſhould tell no man of him.

31 And he began to teach them, that the Son of man muſt ſuffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief prieſts and ſcribes, and be killed, and after three days riſe again.

32 And he ſpake that ſaying openly. And Peter took him, and began to rebuke him.

33 But when he had turned about, and looked on his diſciples, he rebuked Peter, ſaying, Get thee behind me, Satan: for thou ſavoureſt not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men.

34 And when he had called the people unto him, with his diſciples alſo, he ſaid unto them, Whoſoever will come after me, let him deny himſelf, and take up his croſs, and follow me.

35 For whoſoever will ſave his life, ſhall loſe it; but whoſoever ſhall loſe his life for my ſake and the goſpel's, the ſame ſhall ſave it.

36 For what ſhall it profit a man, if he ſhall gain the whole world, and loſe his own ſoul?

37 Or what ſhall a man give in exchange for his ſoul?

38 Whoſoever therefore ſhall be aſhamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and ſinful generation; of him ſhall the Son of man be aſhamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels.

Ver. 27. Whom do men ſay that I am?] See on Matth. xvi. 13, &c. It is remarkable that the noble confeſſion of St. Peter, recorded in St. Matthew, is ſuppreſſed here; which is a ſtrong preſumption that either St. Peter dictated this Goſpel, or reviſed it, according to the ancient tradition. See more in the Diſſertation on the Goſpels.

Ver. 32. And he ſpake that ſaying openly] Plainly and freely, παῤῥησία: Our Lord thought fit to foretel his own ſufferings plainly, to bear down any towering imaginations which might have ſprung up in the Apoſtles minds from the preceding diſcourſes; for their faith was now ſo confirmed, that they could bear the diſcovery, without being in danger of forſaking it. See John x. 24. xi. 14.

Ver. 33. Get thee behind me, Satan] Our Lord is not recorded to have given ſo ſharp a reproof to any other of his Apoſtles, on any other occaſion. He ſaw it was needful for the pride of Peter's heart, puffed up with the commendation he had juſt given him. See Matth. xvi. 17. Perhaps the term Satan may not only bear the meaning "Thou art my enemy, while thou fancieſt thyſelf moſt my friend;" but alſo "Thou art acting the very part of Satan, both by endeavouring to hinder the redemption of mankind, and by giving me the moſt deadly advice which can ever ſpring from the adverſary himſelf of mankind." St. Peter had adviſed our Lord to favour himſelf, ſee on Matth. xvi. 23. From whence we may learn (ſays one) firſt, that whoever ſays to us, in ſuch a caſe, "favour thyſelf," is acting the part of the devil: 2dly. that the proper anſwer to ſuch an adviſer is, get thee behind me; 3dly. that otherwiſe he will be an offence to us; an occaſion of our ſtumbling, if not falling; 4thly. that this advice always proceeds from the not reliſhing the things of God, but the things of men: Yea, ſo far is this advice, favour thyſelf, from being fit for a Chriſtian either to give or take, that if any man will come after Chriſt, his very firſt ſtep is, to deny, or renounce himſelf;—in the room of his own will, to ſubſtitute the will of God, as the one principle of action.

Ver. 38. Whoſoever therefore, &c.] Jeſus fitly inculcated the neceſſity of ſelf-denial, from the conſideration of a judgement to come; the moſt aweful and important event in the whole compaſs of our duration, and which, the word of God directs us to believe, will be attended with the moſt aweful circumſtances. His intention was, that we ſhould fortify ourſelves with this reflection, that it is eligible to endure a little now, when that little will preſerve us from enduring unſpeakably more hereafter, and lead us to the poſſeſſion of infinite and endleſs joys. Wherefore, if our great Maſter ſhould ever honour any of us ſo far, as to call us forth to ſuffer for him, let us do it bravely, and be true to God, to religion, and our own ſouls; having our eyes always ſteadily fixed on the bright crown, the white robe, the triumphant palm, by which the noble army of martyrs are diſtinguiſhed from the other inhabitants of the celeſtial abode. The firſt verſe of the next chapter ſhould properly be joined to this. See its connection in the note on Matth. xvi. 28.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. VIII.

How apt is unbelief to raiſe, and to ſtick at difficulties, as if they were too great for Chriſt to ſurmount, (ver. 4.) and how prone to miſconſtrue his diſpenſations, and to forget the years of the right hand of the Moſt High! How unreaſonably doth it reject the plaineſt and propereſt evidence which Chriſt hath given, and want to be gratified in ſome extraordinary way of its own ſuggeſting! ver. 11. But faith, and not fancy, is to be encouraged; and all this unbelief, whether in the total, or only in a particular degree, argues ſuch hardneſs of heart, as calls for lamentation and ſevere reproof. Yet, alas! how great is its remainder in God's own people, during their preſent ſtate of infirmity? ver. 17. How doth an evil leaven work in them, and attempt to inſinuate itſelf into them; and what need have they to be warned, and to be continually watchful againſt it; and that with reſpect to corrupt doctrine, as well as practice, becauſe of the bad influence which principles have upon the heart and life! This works and prevails, to the ruin of obſtinate ſinners; for if they perſiſt in infidelity and impenitence, Chriſt will never gratify their curioſity or humour to reclaim them. He will turn away from them in righteous indignation, and leave them to the heavy judgement which they deſerve.

But, on the contrary, how ready is this Lord of love to bear with his people's infirmities; to help, and heal, and ſave thoſe who are ſenſible of their wants, and apply by faith to him for mercy! He ſometimes relieves them in an inſtant, at others in a more gradual way, ver. 23. Sometimes in a public, at others in a more private manner; as may be moſt for His glory, and their good: and all his gracious diſcoveries to them, are at the moſt ſeaſonable times, when they are fitteſt to receive them, and moſt likely not to abuſe them. But, if Satan gets an advantage, and they, through his influence, and the carnal workings of their own hearts, make a wrong uſe of them, Chriſt will ſhow his diſpleaſure, and ſharply rebuke them, how much ſoever he loves them: ver. 33.

The hand of our bleſſed Saviour, ver. 23. may be conſidered as an emblem of his healing grace, and of the conduct of his miniſters. He here uſes it to three purpoſes. 1. That he may be a guide to the blind man, whilſt he continues blind. 2. That he may apply the remedy to him. 3. That he may give him impoſition of hands, ver. 25. A man may imitate Chriſt herein, 1. By treating the perſon ſpiritually blind with a charitable mildneſs before his cure. 2. By applying to him the remedy of evangelical truths with all diſcretion. 3. By praying and doing good offices for him.

Retirement, of ſome ſort or other, is abſolutely neceſſary after converſion, ver. 26. When a man has once received the knowledge of the truth, he muſt long meditate upon it in private, feed on it in ſilence, and let it take deep root in his heart before he ſpeaks of it. There is an eagerneſs to impart it to others, which does not proceed from God, and may be prejudicial to beginners.

How low were the diſciples notions about the nature of Chriſt's kingdom! and how ſlow of underſtanding, believing, and conſenting to the plaineſt notices which he gave them of his ſufferings and death! ver. 32. But we muſt receive an humbled, as well as an exalted Saviour. If we would have him for our own, we muſt be ready to ſuffer with him; and not be aſhamed to own him, by a profeſſed ſubjection to him, however we may be reproached for it, as ever we hope to be glorified with him, and to be owned by him, when he ſhall come in the illuſtrious pomp and grandeur of the laſt day. What are all the ſufferings and ſhame of this preſent ſtate, compared with the glory that ſhall be then revealed? What is all the gain which we can make in this life, compared to the eternal loſs of our ſouls? Fatal and dreadful experience this, when, after having enjoyed pleaſures, riches, or empire a few years, men find, by loſing all in a moment, that all is nothing, and that whatever they poſſeſſed here, is altogether unprofitable for the other life!

How tremendous and alarming is our Lord's threatening, ver. 38!

CHAP. IX.

Jeſus is transfigured: he inſtructeth his diſciples concerning the coming of Elias: caſteth forth a dumb and deaf ſpirit: foretelleth his death and reſurrection: exhorteth his diſciples to humility: bidding them not to prohibit ſuch as be not againſt them, nor to give offence to any of the faithful.

AND he ſaid unto them, Verily I ſay unto you, that there be ſome of them that ſtand here, which ſhall not taſte of death, till they have ſeen the kingdom of God come with power.

2 And after ſix days, Jeſus taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and leadeth them up into an high mountain apart by themſelves: and he was transfigured before them.

3 And his raiment became ſhining, exceeding white as ſnow; ſo as no fuller on earth can whiten them.

4 And there appeared unto them Elias with Moſes: and they were talking with Jeſus.

5 And Peter anſwered and ſaid to Jeſus, Maſter, it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moſes, and one for Elias.

6 For he wiſt not what to ſay; for they were ſore afraid.

7 And there was a cloud that overſhadowed them: and a voice came out of the cloud, ſaying, This is my beloved Son: hear him.

8 And ſuddenly, when they had looked round about, they ſaw no man any more, ſave Jeſus only with themſelves.

9 And as they came down from the mountain, he charged them that they ſhould tell no man what things they had ſeen, till the Son of man were riſen from the dead.

10 And they kept that ſaying with themſelves, queſtioning one with another what the riſing from the dead ſhould mean.

11 And they aſked him, ſaying, Why ſay the ſcribes that Elias muſt firſt come?

12 And he anſwered and told them, Elias verily cometh firſt, and reſtoreth all things; and how it is written of the Son of man, that he muſt ſuffer many things, and be ſet at nought.

13 But I ſay unto you, That Elias is indeed come, and they have done unto him whatſoever they liſted, as it is written of him.

14 And when he came to his diſciples, he ſaw a great multitude about them, and the ſcribes queſtioning with them.

15 And ſtraightway all the people, when they beheld him, were greatly amazed, and running to him, ſaluted him.

We may flatter ourſelves, if we pleaſe, here below, and by trivial reaſons excuſe ourſelves from giving teſtimony to the word of Chriſt, and to himſelf in his ſervants; the day of the Lord will diſperſe all thoſe thin clouds with which we cover ourſelves, and expoſe to open view the baſe intereſts which we ſhall have preferred to thoſe of God and his Goſpel. How much happier will it be to repreſent to ourſelves that aweful day in all its terrors, whenever a regard to an adulterous and ſinful generation would lead us to be aſhamed of Chriſt and of his word! So ſhall we be bold to confeſs and acknowledge that Son of man below, who will reward us fully above for all we ſuffer for his ſake, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels.

Ver. 10. With themſelves] To themſelves. Wat. and MS. And they kept the matter ſecret; yet they queſtioned, or debated, &c. Heylin. Dr. Doddridge renders it, And they laid hold on that word, diſputing among themſelves, &c. See Matth. ix. 25. xiv. 3. Mark xii. 12. and Rev. xx. 2. Sir David Dalrymple obſerves, that it ſhould not be here "what the riſing of the dead ſhould mean,"—for in thoſe days that tenet was received; but "what this reſurrection ſignified;"—what was meant by this riſing of the Son of man from the dead. Being much ſurpriſed at the ſudden departure of Elias, and of their maſter's ordering them to keep this tranſaction a ſecret, the diſciples had no ſooner finiſhed their diſpute about what the riſing from the dead ſhould mean, than addreſſing themſelves to Jeſus, they propoſed this doubt, ver. 11. "Since Elias is ſo ſoon diſmiſſed, and ſince thou haſt ordered us to keep his appearance a ſecret, how come the Scribes to teach on all occaſions that Elias muſt appear before the Meſſiah erects his kingdom?" Suppoſing that Elias was to have an active hand in modelling and ſettling the kingdon, they never doubted that he would have abode a while on earth; and knowing that the Scribes affirmed openly that Elias was to appear, they could ſee no reaſon for concealing the thing. That this is the connection of the diſciples queſtion is plain from Matth. xvii. 9. 10. Jeſus not only acknowledged the neceſſity of Elias's coming before the Meſſiah, according to Malachi's prediction; but he aſſured his diſciples, that he was already come; and deſcribed the treatment that he had already met with from the nation in ſuch a manner, as to make them underſtand that he ſpake of John the Baptiſt, ver. 12, 13. and Matth. xvii. 13. At the ſame time he told them, that though the Baptiſt's miniſtry was excellently calculated for producing all the effects aſcribed to it by the prophets, they needed not be ſurpriſed to find, that it had not had all the ſucceſs which might have been expected from it; and that the Baptiſt had met with much oppoſition and perſecution, ſince both the perſon and preaching of the Meſſiah himſelf was to meet with the ſame treatment. Our Saviour, in the 12th verſe, alludes to Malachi iv. 6. where ſee the note. What is meant by the reſtoring of all things, is ſhewn by the angel, Luke i. 16, 17. and that this was the true reſtoration of all things, to be accompliſhed by Elias, is evident from the LXX, who, in tranſlating the original paſſage, make uſe of the word found here in the Evangeliſt, ἀποκατάϛησει καρδίαν, Reducet Cor. Nevertheleſs, by the reſtoration of all things, the Jews ſeem to have underſtood the revival of the kingdom of David in their nation, to be accompliſhed by the aſſiſtance of Elias. Hence the Apoſtles queſtion to Jeſus before his aſcenſion into heaven, Lord, wilt thou at this time reſtore—ἀποκαθιϛάνεις—the kingdom of Iſrael? Acts i. 16. Dr. Waterland reads the 12th and 13th verſes:—ver. 12. It is true, Elias is to come firſt, to rectify all things; and it is written, &c. Ver. 13.—Elias is indeed come, as it is written of him; and they have done unto him whatſoever they liſted. Dr. Heylin renders the 12th verſe, He anſwered, It is true that Elias muſt firſt come, and ſet all things to right; and that he muſt ſuffer much, and be deſpiſed, as it is alſo written concerning the Son of man. See Wetſtein.

Ver. 14. Queſtioning with them] Συζητοῦντας, "Diſputing, by aſking queſtions in the Socratic way." See the former chapter, ver. 11. The Scribes had taken the opportunity of their maſter's abſence to interrogate and confound the diſciples.

Ver. 15. Were greatly amazed] When the people looked on him as he was coming, they were ſtruck into aſtoniſhment at thoſe unuſual rays of majeſty and glory, which yet remained on his countenance. It ſeems, that as Moſes's face ſhone ſeveral hours after he had been with God on the mount, ſo ſomething of the glory of the transfiguration remaining in our Lord's countenance, and on his raiment, might aſtoniſh the multitude, and attract their veneration. See Heylin and Macknight.

16 And he aſked the ſcribes, What queſtion ye with them?

17 And one of the multitude anſwered and ſaid, Maſter, I have brought unto thee my ſon, which hath a dumb ſpirit;

18 And whereſoever he taketh him, he teareth him: and he foameth, and gnaſheth with his teeth, and pineth away: and I ſpake to thy diſciples, that they ſhould caſt him out; and they could not.

19 He anſwered him, and ſaith, O faithleſs generation, how long ſhall I be with you? how long ſhall I ſuffer you? bring him unto me.

20 And they brought him unto him: and when he ſaw him, ſtraightway the ſpirit tare him; and he fell on the ground, and wallowed, foaming.

21 And he aſked his father, How long is it ago ſince this came unto him? And he ſaid, Of a child.

22 And oft-times it hath caſt him into the fire, and into the waters, to deſtroy him: but if thou canſt do any thing, have compaſſion on us, and help us.

23 Jeſus ſaid unto him, If thou canſt believe, all things are poſſible to him that believeth.

24 And ſtraightway the father of the child cried out, and ſaid with tears, Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief.

25 When Jeſus ſaw that the people came running together, he rebuked the foul ſpirit, ſaying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf ſpirit, I charge thee, Come out of him, and enter no more into him.

26 And the ſpirit cried, and rent him ſore, and came out of him: and he was as one dead; inſomuch that many ſaid, He is dead.

27 But Jeſus took him by the hand, and lifted him up; and he aroſe.

28 And when he was come into the houſe, his diſciples aſked him privately, Why could not we caſt him out?

29 And he ſaid unto them, This kind can come forth by nothing, but by prayer and faſting.

30 And they departed thence, and paſſed through Galilee; and he would not that any man ſhould know it.

31 For he taught his diſciples, and ſaid

Ver. 17—19 And one of the multitude anſwered, and ſaid] From the man's narrative before us, in anſwer to what Jeſus ſaid to the Scribes, What queſtion ye with them? it appears that the Scribes had been diſputing with the diſciples about the cure of this youth, which they had unſucceſsfully attempted. Perhaps their want of ſucceſs had given the Scribes occaſion to boaſt, that a devil was found, which neither the diſciples nor their maſter were able to caſt out; but the diſciples affirming that this devil, however obſtinate, was not able to withſtand their Maſter, the debate was drawn out to ſome length: and to ſay the truth, as Jeſus had already given many undeniable demonſtrations of his power, the behaviour of the Scribes in this, as in every inſtance, diſcovered the moſt criminal infidelity: wherefore he treated them no worſe than they deſerved, in calling them a faithleſs and perverſe generation, altogether intolerable, becauſe they had reſiſted demonſtrations of his power, ſufficient to have convinced the moſt abandoned. He anſwered him, and ſaith;—He anſwered the man, by ſaying to the Scribes, O faithleſs and perverſe generation! (ſee Luke ix. 41.) how long ſhall I be with you ere you, be convinced? How long ſhall I ſuffer you? Muſt I always bear with your infidelity? A reproof much more applicable to the Scribes than to the diſciples, whoſe wrong notions proceeded rather from weakneſs of capacity, than from perverſeneſs of diſpoſition. At the ſame time, that he might give a freſh demonſtration of the greatneſs of his power before them all, and put the folly of the Scribes in particular to ſhame, he ordered the youth to be brought to him. Compare Luke ix. 41. Inſtead of teareth him, Dr. Waterland and the MS. read eth him down.

Ver. 20—24. The ſpirit tare him] Caſt him into convulſions. Wat. Doubtleſs Jeſus could eaſily have prevented this attack; but he wiſely permitted it, that the minds of the ſpectators might be impreſſed with a more lively notion of the young man's diſtreſs. It was for the ſame reaſon alſo that he aſked his father how long he had been in that deplorable condition? who informed him, that he had been ſo even from his childhood. The afflicted father, greatly diſcouraged by the inability of our Lord's diſciples, and diſpirited by the ſight of his ſon's miſery, and by the remembrance of its long continuance, was afraid this poſſeſſion might ſurpaſs the power even of Jeſus himſelf, as the Scribes averred; and ſo could not help expreſſing his doubts and fears. If thou canſt do any thing, &c. wherefore, to make him ſenſible of his miſtake, Jeſus ſaid unto him, ver. 23. in alluſion to the expreſſions of diffidence which he had uttered, if thou canſt believe, &c. The father hearing this, cried out with tears, that he believed, and beſought Jeſus to ſupply, by his goodneſs and pity, whatever deficiency he might find in his faith, ver. 24. As Chriſt's miracles were the proof of his miſſion, it may ſeem ſtrange that on this and ſeveral other occaſions, (ſee Matth. ix. 28.) before he would work the deſired miracles, he required the ſubjects of them to believe on him. Perhaps theſe were the reaſons: 1. His enemies frequently deſired to ſee ſigns or miracles, feigning a diſpoſition to believe (Matth. xvi. 1.): But the perſons they brought to be cured, and the ſigns they demanded, being generally ſuch as they hoped would prove ſuperior to his power, their true intention was, that failing in the attempt, he ſhould expoſe himſelf. For Jeſus, therefore, to have wrought miracles in ſuch circumſtances, would have ſerved ſcarce any purpoſe, unleſs it was to gratify the unreaſonable curioſity of his enemies, or rather their malignant diſpoſition; a conduct, which inſtead of convincing, muſt have enraged them, and prompted them to contrive ſome more ſpeedy method of deſtroying him. We know Lazarus's reſurrection had this effect, which is an inconteſtable demonſtration that the obſtinacy of Chriſt's enemies was not to be overcome by any evidence, how clear or ſtrong ſoever; and therefore he wiſely avoided performing miracles before this ſort of perſons, who could not be profited by them. As for inſtance, in his own country, where he did not many mighty works, becauſe of their unbelief. Matth. xiii. 58. For the ſame reaſon, when any one came to him, begging miraculous cures, whether for himſelf or for others, it was very proper to aſk, if the cure was ſought to gratify a vain curioſity, and with ſecret hopes that Jeſus would fail in the attempt, or from a real perſuaſion that he was able to perform it. Our Lord, it is true, was intimately acquainted with the thoughts and intentions of all men, and ſo had no need to put this queſtion for his own information; but he did it to ſignify, that he would not work miracles merely to gratify the evil diſpoſitions of unreaſonable men. 2. It ſhould be conſidered, that while the ſecular power did not interpoſe its authority to ſupport the credit of our Lord's miracles, the more univerſally the faith of them prevailed in the country where, and at the ſame time when they were wrought, the greater muſt their evidence be to us in after-times. Becauſe ſuch a general perſuaſion demonſtrates, that our Lord's miracles were publickly performed; that many perſons were preſent at them; that the eye-witneſſes entertained no doubt of them; and that they related them to others, who giving their teſtimony, believed them to be real. In this view of the matter, it concerns us not a little to know the opinion which our Lord's countrymen entertained of him, and of his works. We may therefore juſtly ſuppoſe, that one of the reaſons of his aſking thoſe who came to him, if they believed he was able to perform the cures they ſolicited, might be, to make us, who lived in after-times, ſenſible how far the reports of his miracles were ſpread, how firmly they were believed, how great was the number of thoſe who believed them, and how highly he himſelf was reverenced on account of them. This obſervation ſhews the wiſdom and propriety of the expreſſion which our Lord often made uſe of in conferring his miraculous cures; Matth. viii. 13. As thou haſt believed, ſo be it done unto thee. Matth. ix. 22. Thy faith hath made thee whole. Luke viii. 50. Believe only, and ſhe ſhall be made whole. Luke xviii. 42. Thy faith hath ſaved thee. For the cures following leave us no room to ſuſpect, that the declarations which they gave of their faith in his miracles were feigned or doubtful. See more on Luke viii. 48.

Ver. 38. Maſter, we ſaw one, &c.] Some commentators have ſuppoſed, that this was one of the Baptiſt's diſciples, who, though he did not follow Chriſt with the reſt, had been taught by his maſter to acknowledge him as the Meſſiah, and entertained ſo great a veneration for him, that he attempted to caſt out devils in his name. Or if the character given of this perſon, he followeth not with us, (ſee Luke ix. 49.) and the Apoſtles prohibition, we forbad him, are thought inconſiſtent with the above-mentioned opinion, we may ſuppoſe that he was an exorciſt, like the ſeven ſons of Sceva, (Acts xix. 13.) who, having ſeen the miracles which the Apoſtles had performed in their Maſter's name, while out on their firſt miſſion, thought there might be ſome great occult virtue in it, and ſo made uſe of it in his exorciſms, as Sceva's ſons did in theirs, but with better ſucceſs; for God might ſee reaſon now to grant that efficacy to ſuch adjurations, which he afterwards denied, when the evidences of the Goſpel were propoſed ſo much more diſtinctly and fully, after the deſcent of the Spirit: Or the devils may have obeyed the commands of perſons, who, without Chriſt's commiſſion, made uſe of his name, out of malice to him, and in hopes of bringing reproach on him through their miſconduct. Nor is Chriſt's anſwer to John, ver. 39. inconſiſtent with theſe ſuppoſitions. See on ver. 40.

Ver. 40. For he that is not againſt us, &c.] This is one of thoſe maxims which take different ſenſes, as they are applied to different ſubjects. The circumſtances determine the ſignification. Our Lord had formerly ſaid, Matth. xii. 30. He that is not with me, is againſt me; thereby giving his hearers a juſt and neceſſary admonition, that on the whole, the war between him and Satan admitted of no neutrality, and that thoſe who were indifferent would finally be treated by him as his enemies. But here, in another view, he very conſiſtently uſes a different and ſeemingly oppoſite proverb, the counterpart of the former; directing his followers to judge of mens characters in the moſt candid manner, and charitably to hope, that they who did not oppoſe his cauſe, wiſhed well to it; a conduct peculiarly reaſonable, when his cauſe lay under ſo many diſcouragements. Probably many who now concealed their regard to him, were afterwards animated courageouſly to profeſs it, though at the greateſt hazard. See Doddridge and Heylin.

Ver. 43. Offend thee] Make thee offend. Wat. and MS.

Ver. 44. Where their worm dieth not] Theſe expreſſions ſeem to be borrowed from Iſai. lxvi. 24. And they ſhall go forth, and look upon the carcaſes of the men that have tranſgreſſed againſt me; for their worm ſhall not die, neither ſhall their fire be quenched; and they ſhall be an abhorring to all fleſh. In this paſſage the prophet is deſcribing the miſerable end of hardened ſinners, by a ſimilitude taken from the behaviour of conquerors, who, after having gained the battle, and beaten the enemy out of the field, go forth to view the ſlain. Thus at the laſt day, the devil, with all his adherents, being finally and completely vanquiſhed, the ſaints ſhall go forth to view them doomed by the juſt judgement of God to eternal death. And this their puniſhment is repreſented by two metaphors, drawn from the different way of burying the dead, in uſe among the Jews. Bodies of men interred in the earth, are eaten up of worms, which die when their food faileth; and thoſe that are burned, are conſumed in fire, which extinguiſhes itſelf when there is no more fuel added to feed it. But it ſhall not be ſo with the wicked; their worm ſhall not die, and their fire ſhall not be quenched. Theſe metaphors, therefore, as they are uſed by our Lord, and by the prophet Iſaiah, paint the eternal puniſhments of the damned in ſtrong and lively colours. Dr. Doddridge obſerves, that there may indeed be an alluſion here to Iſai. lxvi. 24. but that the expreſſion would have been juſt and proper without it. And it is remarkable that ſome of the ancients expreſſed the ſame thought by ſaying, that "the marrow of the back bone did, in a wicked man, turn into a huge and fierce ſerpent;" thereby intimating, by a much finer figure than Ælian, who reports it, underſtood, that their own thoughts ſhould be their torment, and they ſhould be unable to diſarm it by thoſe artifices which had prevailed in the preſent life. Dr. Rymer ſuppoſes, that both the worm and the fire are meant of the body, and refer to the two different ways of funeral among the ancients, interment and burning. So that our Lord may ſeem here to prevent an objection againſt the permanent miſery of the wicked in hell, ariſing from the frail conſtitution of the body; as if he ſhould have ſaid, "The body will not then be as it is at preſent, but will be incapable of conſumption or diſſolution. In its natural ſtate, the worms may devour the whole, and die for want of nouriſhment; the fire may conſume it, and be extinguiſhed for want of fuel: But there ſhall be perpetual food for the worm that corrodes it; perpetual fire for the fuel that torments it." The words in Judith xvi. 17. greatly illuſtrate this interpretation; where it is ſaid, The Lord Almighty will take vengeance on the wicked in the day of judgement, putting fire and worms into their fleſh; and they ſhall feel them, and weep for ever. The moſt ſuperficial reader muſt be ſenſible that our Lord's repeating ſo frequently his declaration concerning the duration of future puniſhment, (ſee ver. 46, 48.) has in it ſomething very aweful, and implies that mankind ſhould attend to it, as a matter of infinite importance to them. It likewiſe affords a leſſon to all miniſters of the Goſpel, directing them to enforce the principles of religion which they inculcate, by frequently and earneſtly holding forth to the view of their hearers, the terrors of a future judgement.

our Saviour infers, that it is better to deny oneſelf the greateſt earthly ſatisfactions, and to part with every thing moſt precious,—repreſented by the figures of an hand, a foot, an eye, than by theſe things to cauſe the weakeſt of his friends to ſtumble, as ſome of the diſciples had lately done. The amputation of our hands and feet, and the plucking out of our eyes, when they cauſe us to offend, import alſo, that we ſhould deny ourſelves ſuch uſe of our members and ſenſes as may lead us into ſin. Thus the hand and the eye are to be turned away from thoſe alluring objects which raiſe in us luſt and ambition; the foot muſt be reſtrained from carrying us into evil company, unlawful diverſions, and forbidden pleaſures; nor can we complain of theſe injunctions as ſevere, ſince by tempting others to ſin, as well as ſinning ourſelves, we are expoſed to the eternal puniſhments of hell. See on Matth. v. 29. It is obſervable, that what is called the kingdom of God in this verſe, is called life in thoſe preceding; from whence it appears, that this kingdom, and life, are the ſame.

Ver. 49. For every one ſhall be ſalted] This difficult text has been interpreted very variouſly: I ſhall lay before the reader only ſuch explanations of it as appear to me moſt reaſonable. I. The proper tranſlation of this paſſage, ſays Mr. Macknight, is, Every one ſhall be ſalted for the fire, πᾶς πυρὶ ἁλισθήσεται, namely, by you my apoſtles; for πυρὶ here is the dative, not the ablative; as it is likewiſe 2 Pet. iii. 7. where the ſame conſtruction is found, πυρὶ τηρουμενοι, reſerved for the fire.—"Every one ſhall be ſalted for the fire of God's altar;" i. e. ſhall be prepared to be offered a ſacrifice to God, holy and acceptable: For though the propoſition be univerſal, it muſt be limited by the nature of the ſubject, thus, "Every one who is offered a ſacrifice unto God, ſhall be ſalted for the fire, as every ſacrifice is ſalted with ſalt;" nor is it any objection againſt this interpretation, that the word ἁλισθήσεται will thus ſtand conſtrued with different caſes in the ſame ſentence; for both ſacred and profane writers make uſe of ſuch conſtructions; nay, they often affix different ſenſes to the ſame word in one ſentence. See James iv. 8. But the reader will have no doubt of the meaning of the paſſage, when he conſiders that our Lord is not giving a reaſon of the unquenchableneſs of hell-fire, as is commonly ſuppoſed, but a reaſon why his apoſtles and followers ſhould cut off their hands, and pluck out their eyes, if theſe members prove the occaſions of ſin, either to themſelves or others. This I think is plain from the clauſe that follows: If the ſalt have loſt its ſaltneſs; if you, who are the ſalt of the earth, and whoſe office it is to ſeaſon others, have loſt your ſaltneſs, i. e. your grace and goodneſs, wherewith will you ſeaſon it?—Have ſalt in yourſelves, &c. According to this interpretation, the argument ſtands thus: "That ye, my apoſtles, do mortify yourſelves, is abſolutely neceſſary, not only on account of your future well-being, but for the ſake of mankind, who are to be ſalted by you for the fire;" that is, ſeaſoned with piety and virtue, by means of your doctrine and example, and ſo put in a fit condition for being offered unto God; in oppoſition to the condition of the wicked, who, being an abhorrence unto all fleſh, muſt be conſumed by the worm that never dies, and the fire that is not quenched. The neceſſity of men's being thus ſeaſoned with grace, in order to their becoming acceptable ſacrifices unto God, you may learn from its being typically repreſented under the law, by the prieſt's ſalting the ſacrifices for the fire of the altar with ſalt. Having therefore this high honour, of ſalting mankind for the altar of heaven conferred upon you, it is fit that you contain in yourſelves the ſpiritual ſalt of all the graces, and particularly the holy ſalt of love and peace, in order that you may be, as much as poſſible, free from the corruption of ambition and pride, contention, and every evil work." II. Dr. Doddridge, following many learned commentaries, tranſlates and paraphraſes the paſſage thus: "For as the fleſh burned on the altar has ſalt rubbed upon it, in conſequence of which it burns ſo much the more fiercely; ſo every one of thoſe unhappy creatures, the victims of divine juſtice, ſhall be, as it were, ſalted with fire; and inſtead of being conſumed by it, ſhall, in thoſe wretched abodes, continue immortal in the midſt of their flames. Whereas every acceptable ſacrifice ſhall be ſeaſoned with another kind of ſalt, even that of divine grace; which purifies the ſoul, and preſerves it from corruption." Sinners are repreſented as victims of divine juſtice, Iſai. xxxiv. 6. Jer. xii. 3. xlvi. 10, &c. and good men, as in this place, are exhibited as acceptable ſacrifices, conſecrated to God. See Rom. xii. 1. xv. 16, &c. The verſion of 1729, which is followed by Dr. Waterland and the MS. tranſlates the verſe, Such a one ſhall be conſumed by fire; but the offering that is ſalted, ſhall be preſerved from corruption: But it does not any where appear that ἁλισθήσεται, bears the ſenſe of conſumed. The learned reader will find in Wolfius a multitude of different interpretations of this text.

Ver. 50. But if the ſalt have loſt, &c.] But if the ſalt is become inſipid. Wat. See on Matth. v. 13. and on Lev. ii. 13. The ancients looked upon ſalt, as the ſymbol of friendſhip and peace, in reference to which Eſchines ſpeaks of the ſalt of the city, meaning thereby the public peace and proſperity; and from hence, ſays Euſtathius, to intimate the peace and friendſhip which ſhould ſubſiſt between all thoſe who partook of the ſame feaſt, ſalt, before all other was ſet before the gueſts; for, continues he, as ſalt things, being compacted in many drops of water, every one in itſelf fluid and unſteady, becomes one ſolid body; ſo they, who from diſtant places, unite in a league of friendſhip, meet together both in place and friendly diſpoſition. See Hammond.

REFLECTIONS ON THE TRANSFIGURATION.

How glorious and delightful muſt have been the view which the apoſtles had of our bleſſed Redeemer, when he was transfigured before them; clothed, as it were, with the divine Shechinah, and ſhining with a luſtre like that of the ſun! How pleaſing and how edifying muſt it have been to them, to ſee with him Moſes and Elijah, thoſe two eminent ſaints, who had ſo many ages ago quitted our world, and whoſe names they had often read in the ſacred records with wonder and reverence! And how great an happineſs was it for theſe two illuſtrious prophets, in their glorified fleſh to ſee that glorified Saviour, who before his incarnation had ſpoken to them! To ſpeak to that Man of God, of whom they were glorified, and to become prophets not to men but to God: And what conſolation, what confirmation was it to the diſciples, to behold ſuch examples of their future glory! They ſaw in Moſes and Elijah what they themſelves ſhould be: How could they ever fear to be miſerable, who ſaw ſuch predecents of their enſuing happineſs! How could they fear to die, who ſaw in others the bleſſedneſs of their own change! In this view, how truly may we ſay to death, Rejoice not mine enemy, though I fall, yet ſhall I riſe; yea, I ſhall riſe in falling! We ſhall not all ſleep, we ſhall be changed, ſaith St. Paul. Elijah was changed, Moſes ſlept: Both appeared, to teach us, that neither our ſleep nor change can keep us from appearing with Chriſt. When therefore thou, O Chriſtian, ſhalt receive the ſentence of death on mount Nebo; or when the fiery chariot ſhall come, and ſweep thee from this vale of mortality; remember thy glorious and future appearance with thy Saviour, and thou canſt not but be comforted, and chearfully triumph over that laſt enemy.

This transfiguration of our Lord is one of the moſt ſurpriſing occurrences that ever befel him: The four following may be reckoned up as the principal wonders of his life; his incarnation, temptation, transfiguration, and agony. The firſt, worthy of all admiration, that God ſhould become man; the ſecond, that God and man ſhould be tempted, and tranſported by Satan; the third, that man ſhould be glorified upon earth; the laſt, that he who was man and God, ſhould ſweat blood, under the ſenſe of God's wrath for man: and all theſe either had the angels for witneſſes, or the immediate voice of God; that it may be no wonder that the earth marvels at thoſe things, whereat the angels of heaven ſtand amazed.

O Saviour! if thou wert ſuch in Tabor, what art thou in heaven? If this were the glory of thy humanity, what is the preſence of thy godhead? But how glorious the reflection! He ſhall change our vile bodies, that they may be like his glorified body: Behold our pattern, and rejoice. Theſe very bodies, that are now like the earth, ſhall once be bright as the ſun; and we, who now ſee clay in one another's faces, ſhall then ſee nothing but heaven in each other's countenances. We who now adorn our periſhing bodies with clothes, ſhall then be clothed upon with immortality, out of the wardrobe of heaven. Let us therefore look upon this fleſh, not ſo much with contempt of what it was and is, as with a joyful hope of what it ſhall be; and when our courage is aſſaulted with a change of theſe bodies, from healthful to weak, from living to dead, let us comfort ourſelves with the aſſurance of this change from duſt to incorruption. We are not ſo ſure of death, as of transfiguration.

Well might Peter ſay, It is good for us to be here! Well might he be contented to reſign his entertainments and his hopes elſewhere, that they might prolong theſe delightful moments, feaſting their eyes with theſe divine viſions, and their minds with theſe more than human diſcourſes. But if a glimpſe of this heavenly glory did ſo raviſh this worthy diſciple, how ſhall we be affected with the contemplation, yea, fruition of the divine Preſence! Here was but Tabor, there is heaven; here were but two ſaints, there many millions of ſaints and angels; here was Chriſt transfigured, there he ſits at the right hand of Majeſty; here was a repreſentation, there a gift and poſſeſſion of bleſſedneſs. Oh that we could now forget the world, and fixing our eyes upon this better Tabor, ſay, It is good to be here! Alas, how hath our corruption bewitched us, to affect the ſhipwrecks of this world, to doat upon the miſery of this fading life, rather than fly up to that bleſſed contemplation, wherein we ſhall ſee God in himſelf; God in us; ourſelves in Him. There ſhall be no ſorrow, no pain, no complaint, no fear, no death. There, no malice to riſe againſt us, no miſery to afflict us. There, O there one day is better than a thouſand: There is reſt from our labours, peace from our enemies, freedom from our ſins. How many clouds of diſcontent darken the ſunſhine of our joy, while we are here below; complaint of evils paſt, ſenſe of preſent, fear of future, have ſhared our lives amongſt them. There we ſhall be always joyful, always ſatisfied with the viſion of that God, in whoſe preſence there is fulneſs of joy. Shall we ſee that heathen Cleombrotus abandoning his life, and caſting

CHAP. X.

Chriſt diſputeth with the Phariſees touching divorcement: bleſſeth the children that are brought unto him: reſolveth a rich man how he may inherit life everlaſting: telleth his diſciples of the danger of riches: promiſeth rewards to them that forſake any thing for the goſpel: foretelleth his death and reſurrection: biddeth the two ambitious ſuitors to think rather of ſuffering with him: and reſtoreth to Bartimeus his ſight.

AND he aroſe from thence, and cometh into the coaſts of Judea, by the farther ſide of Jordan: and the people reſort unto him again; and, as he was wont, he taught them again.

2 And the Phariſees came to him, and aſked him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? tempting him.

3 And he anſwered and ſaid unto them, What did Moſes command you?

4 And they ſaid, Moſes ſuffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away.

5 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, For the hardneſs of your heart, he wrote you this precept.

6 But from the beginning of the creation, God made them male and female.

7 For this cauſe ſhall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife;

8 And they twain ſhall be one fleſh: ſo then they are no more twain, but one fleſh.

9 What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put aſunder.

10 And in the houſe his diſciples aſked him again of the ſame matter.

11 And he ſaith unto them, Whoſoever ſhall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery againſt her.

12 And if a woman ſhall put away her huſband, and be married to another, ſhe committeth adultery.

13 And they brought young children to him, that he ſhould touch them: and his diſciples rebuked thoſe that brought them.

14 But when Jeſus ſaw it, he was much diſpleaſed, and ſaid unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of ſuch is the kingdom of God.

15 Verily I ſay unto you, Whoſoever ſhall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he ſhall not enter therein.

16 And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and bleſſed them.

17 And when he was gone forth into the way, there came one running, and kneeled to him, and aſked him, Good Maſter, what ſhall I do, that I may inherit eternal life?

himſelf down from the rock, upon an uncertain notion of immortality?—And ſhall not we, Chriſtians, abandon the wicked ſuperfluities of life, the pleaſures of ſin, for that life, which we know more certainly than this? At what do we heſitate?—Is there a heaven, or is there none?—Have we a Saviour there, or have we none?—We know that there is a heaven, as ſure as that there is an earth below us; we know we have a Saviour there, as ſure as there are men whom we converſe with upon earth. Miſerable then will be our folly and infidelity, if we do not condemn the beſt offers of the world, and lifting up our eyes and hearts to heaven, ſay, It is good to be there.

We may eaſily conceive with what aſtoniſhment the three diſciples ſtood compaſſed in the bright cloud, expecting ſome miraculous event of ſo heavenly a viſion; (ver. 7.) When ſuddenly they heard a voice ſounding out of that cloud, This is my beloved Son, hear him. They need not be told whoſe that voice was; the place, the matter evinced it; no angel in heaven could or durſt have ſaid ſo. How gladly doth Peter, many years after, and but a little before his death, ſpeak of it! 2 Pet. i. 16—18. Twice hath God ſpoken theſe words to his Son from heaven, once in his baptiſm, and now again in his transfiguration. Other ſons are beloved as of favour; this is the beloved, as in the unity of his eſſence. Others are ſo beloved, that he is pleaſed with themſelves; this ſo beloved, that in and for him, he is pleaſed with mankind. Incomprehenſible and extenſive love of God the Father to the Son, that for his ſake he is pleaſed with the world! O perfect and happy complaiſance! out of Chriſt, there is nothing but enmity betwixt God and the ſoul; in him, there can be nothing but peace: When the beams are met in one center, they do not only heat, but burn. Our weak love is diffuſed to many; God hath ſome, the world more; and therein wives, children, and friends: But this infinite love of God hath all the beams united in one only object, the Son of his love; neither doth he love any thing but in the participation of his love, in the derivation from him. O God and Father of our lord Jeſus Chriſt, let me be found in thy beloved Son, and how canſt thou but be pleaſed with me?

This one voice proclaims Chriſt at once the Son of God, the Reconciler of the world, the Teacher and Lawgiver of his church: as the Son of God, he is eſſentially intereſted in his love; as the Reconciler of the world, in whom God is well pleaſed, he moſt juſtly demands our love and adherence; as the Teacher and Lawgiver, he juſtly claims our attention, our obedience: even ſo, Lord, teach us to hear and obey thee as our Teacher, to love and believe in thee as our Redeemer, and as the eternal Son of the Father to adore thee!

Suddenly, when they had looked round about, they ſaw no man, ſave Jeſus only, ver. 8. and that doubtleſs, in his wonted form; all was now gone; Moſes, Elias, the cloud, the voice, the glory. Tabor itſelf cannot be long bleſſed with that divine light, and thoſe ſhining gueſts. Heaven will not allow earth any long continuance of glory: only above is conſtant happineſs to be looked for and enjoyed, where we ſhall ever ſee our Saviour in his unchangeable brightneſs, where the light ſhall never be either clouded or varied. Moſes and Elias are gone; only Chriſt is left. The glory of the law and the prophets was but temporary, that only Chriſt may remain unto us intire and conſpicuous. They came but to give teſtimony to Chriſt; when that is done, they are vaniſhed.

Neither could theſe diſciples find any loſs of Moſes and Elias, when they had Chriſt ſtill with them. Had Jeſus been gone, and left either Moſes or Elias, or both, that preſence, though glorious, could not have comforted them. Now that they are gone, and he is left, they cannot be capable of diſcomfort. O Saviour, it matters not who is away, while thou art with us. Thou art God all-ſufficient; what can we want, when we want not thee? Thy preſence ſhall make Tabor itſelf an heaven; yea, no place of deepeſt diſtreſs can make us miſerable, if accompanied with the fruition of thee.

Ver. 12. And if a woman ſhall put away her huſband] Though it is certain that the Jewiſh law did not put it in a woman's power to divorce her huſband; yet it is plain from Joſephus, that it was done not only by ſeveral ladies of diſtinguiſhed rank, but even that his own wife did it, having probably learned of the Roman women, who, in this age; are known to have practiſed it in the moſt ſcandalous manner. See Juv. Sat. vi. ver. 222, &c. Compare 1 Sam. xxv. 44. 1 Cor. vii. 13. and Lardner's Credibility, part i. vol 2. p. 890.

Ver. 15. Whoſoever ſhall not, &c.] That is, ſays Dr. Clarke, "Whoſoever ſhall not receive the doctrine of the Goſpel with humility and ſincerity, with ſimplicity and probity of mind, he ſhall not be acknowledged a diſciple of Chriſt at all." See ſermon xi. vol. 7.

Ver. 17—19. There came one running] St. Luke, xviii. 18. calls this perſon ἀρχων τις, a certain ruler, by which may be meant either a ruler of the ſynagogue, or a member of the ſanhedrim. This perſon expected to have found Jeſus in the city of Ephraim; but when 18 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Why calleſt thou me good? there is none good, but one, that is God.

19 Thou knoweſt the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not ſteal, Do not bear falſe witneſs, Defraud not, Honour thy father and mother.

20 And he anſwered and ſaid unto him, Maſter, all theſe have I obſerved from my youth.

21 Then Jeſus, beholding him, loved him, and ſaid unto him, One thing thou lackeſt: go thy way, ſell whatſoever thou haſt, and give to the poor, and thou ſhalt have treaſure in heaven: and come, take up the croſs, and follow me.

22 And he was ſad at that ſaying, and went away grieved: for he had great poſſeſſions.

23 And Jeſus looked round about, and ſaith unto his diſciples, How hardly ſhall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!

24 And the diſciples were aſtoniſhed at his words. But Jeſus anſwereth again, and ſaith unto them, Children, how hard is it

Ver. 19. Exod. xx. Rom. xiii. 9.—V. 21. Matth. vi. 19. Luke xii. 33. xvi. 9.

he underſtood he had juſt left that place to go to Jeruſalem, he ran after him, and coming up to him, he kneeled to him, in token of reſpect, and addreſſed him upon an important queſtion, with the title of good maſter, or, as the words might better be rendered, good teacher, or infallible doctor. See on Matth. xxiii. 7. This young ruler, in his addreſs, pretended to do great honour to Jeſus, by kneeling to him, and giving him the title of infallible, and aſking him ſuch an important queſtion, with an air as if he would have acquieſced in his deciſion, whatever it might be. Nevertheleſs, the whole ſeems to have been nothing but a piece of hypocriſy; for he was ſo far from believing Jeſus to be a teacher from God, or infallible, that he does not ſeem to have been perſuaded of his divine miſſion, as is evident from the diſpoſition with which he received our Lord's counſel, ſell that thou haſt. Jeſus therefore firſt of all rebuked him for the flattery and falſhood of his addreſs, ver. 18. Why calleſt thou me good? There is none good, i. e. infallible, but one,—that is God. "There is no teacher good, or infallible, but God, or thoſe by whom God delivers his will to men. Why therefore doſt thou uſe ſuch a title in ſpeaking to me, whom thou doſt not believe to be commiſſioned by God?" See Matth. xix. 17. However, becauſe he had expreſſed a deſire of knowing the way to eternal life, and poſſeſſed ſome virtuous diſpoſitions, Jeſus anſwered his queſtions, by directing him to keep the commandments of the ſecond table of the law, ver. 19. which he mentioned on this occaſion, not becauſe they are of greater importance than the precepts of the firſt, but becauſe there is a neceſſary connection between the duties of piety towards God, and of juſtice, temperance, and charity towards men, and becauſe theſe latter are not ſo eaſily counterfeited as the former. As St. Mark ſeems to put the words defraud not for the tenth commandment, Dr. Hammond and Archbp. Tillotſon ſuppoſe it to be a key to the ſenſe of thoſe words, thou ſhalt not covet; the meaning of which they agree is, as if it had been ſaid, "Thou ſhalt not be ſo deſirous of thy neighbour's poſſeſſions, as to be willing to injure the owner, by depriving him of them, that thou mayeſt ſecure them to thyſelf." But St. Paul ſtrongly intimates, that the ſenſe of that command is much more extenſive, Rom. vii. 7. and as the preceding commandments had forbidden to invade the life, the bed, the property, or reputation of another; ſo this requires a guard on thoſe irregular appetites and paſſions, which might by inſenſible degrees lead men to murder, adultery, theft, or falſe-witneſs. See Hammond on the place, and Tillotſon's works, vol. 2.

Ver. 20—22. All theſe have I obſerved, &c.] The phraſe ἐκ νεότητός, may indeed be very exactly rendered from my youth; but as he was yet but a young man, Matth. xix. 20. it is probably here put for infancy or childhood. It is plain he did not underſtand the ſpiritual meaning and intent of the law, according to our Lord's explication of it in his ſermon on the mount, or he would not have pleaded his exact obedience. But the Jews in general ſeem to have thought, that if they abſtained from groſs crimes, ſacrifices might atone for ſmaller neglects or offences; and this compound ſeems to have been that rightoouſneſs of their own, in which, to their final ruin, they truſted for juſtification before God, in neglect of the righteouſneſs which is of God by faith. Comp. Rom. x. 3. and Philip iii. 9. This ruler, however, though not a perſon of the higheſt probity and virtue, had moſt probably maintained a fair external character; and as he had acquired that character amidſt the temptations of youth, of wealth, and greatneſs, he was ſo far praiſe-worthy, and on that account might be loved by Jeſus, ver. 21. Or he may have been loved by him on account of the ſweetneſs of his diſpoſition, viſible even in his countenance; a thing amiable, though found in a character tainted with pride, and the love of the world; and to this the words of the Evangeliſt ſeem beſt to agree. Then Jeſus, beholding him,—looking ſteadfaſtly upon him—loved him. But notwithſtanding the young ruler had maintained a fair character, and was bleſſed with great ſweetneſs of diſpoſition, he was not only puffed up with an high opinion of his own righteouſneſs, but altogether faulty in reſpect of his affection for worldly and ſenſual enjoyments; a ſin which perhaps had eſcaped his own obſervation. Wherefore Jeſus, willing to make him ſenſible of the ſecret ſore of his mind, touched it gently, to ſhew him that he lacked a great deal ſtill, and had by no means arrived at that pitch of virtue which he boaſted, but was worldly-minded in a great degree. Jeſus required him to ſell his eſtate, to diſtribute the price of it to the poor, and to become a preacher of the Goſpel; promiſing him a much greater eſtate in return,—treaſure in heaven. He could not refuſe to do this, if he was the good man he pretended to be, ſince he had in words acknowledged Chriſt's divine miſſion, and had deſired to know what more, beſides obedience to the moral law, was neceſſary to render him perfect in goodneſs. When our Lord ſays, one thing thou lackeſt, we are not to ſuppoſe that he meant but one thing; ſo that nothing can be concluded from hence againſt the neceſſity of an acquaintance with ſome truths, of which this youth, hopeful and amiable as he was, appears to have been ignorant; but it was to be charged on that want of ſincere piety which his conduct preſently diſcovered, that he did not come to the knowledge of them by a continued and ſubmiſſive attendance on the teaching of Chriſt. See John vii. 17. When the ruler heard what was neceſſary to render him perfect in goodneſs,—the point at which he pretended to aim,—he was greatly diſconcerted, inſomuch that, without making any reply, he went away grieved; for he had a great eſtate, which he could not by any means think of parting with. See the note on Matth. xix. 21. It is ſtrange, ſays Dr. Doddridge, that the learned and accurate Dr. Clarke ſhould ſuppoſe, "that Chriſt did not demand this in order to his being in a ſtate of acceptance with God, but in order to his giving a teſtimony of exalted piety, or at leaſt as neceſſary at that time to his being a preacher of the Goſpel." Our Lord's manner of propoſing the trial, and his reflection on the young man's going away, plainly ſhew, that it was, in thoſe circumſtances, neceſſary to his ſalvation; and indeed it is moſt apparent, that though God does not abſolutely require every man to diſtribute all his goods to others, and ſo in effect to become one of the number of poor to be relieved out of his own poſſeſſions; Yet, ſince virtue and piety demand an habitual readineſs, not only to ſacrifice our poſſeſſions, but our lives, at the command of God; and providence does in fact call ſome out to trials as ſevere as this; the young man's refuſal plainly ſhewed, that he valued his worldly poſſeſſions more than eternal life; and our Lord, with conſummate wiſdom, took this direct and convincing way of manifeſting both to himſelf and others, that ſecret inſincerity and carnality of temper, which prevailed, under all theſe ſpecious pretences and promiſing appearances. It has been conjectured by ſome, from the circumſtance of his being called a young man, (ſee Matth. xix. 22.) that this ruler was unmarried; on which account our Lord's command was leſs grievous to him than if he had had a wife and children. It may be proper juſt to hint, that there are ſome who view this paſſage of Scripture in a rather different light; ſuppoſing the young man, however attached to the world, yet ſincere in his application to Chriſt. They obſerve, that he propoſed his important queſtion with the higheſt deference and reſpect to our bleſſed Lord, as well as with the greateſt eagerneſs to know his ſentiments. He came running, he kneeled, and he addreſſed him under the title of good Muſter, which was a title of peculiar and unuſual reſpect, it being ſcarcely to be met with any where elſe in the Scriptures. It is true, continue they, upon our Saviour's informing him of the qualifications neceſſary to be acquired, and of the commands requiſite to be kept, to intitle him to eternal life, that he anſwered, He had kept all theſe things from his youth; yet there is nothing in theſe words which neceſſarily leads us to conclude they were ſpoken arrogantly, or with a vain and groundleſs oſtentation. St. Paul, who was remarkable for the low and humble thoughts he entertained of himſelf, hath uſed terms not greatly unlike them, 2 Cor. i. 12. Acts xxii. 16. Had they been the language of arrogance and falſe preſumption, our Saviour moſt probably would have charged him with this crime, either expreſly, or by ſome diſtant hint, as we uſually find him treating perſons of ſuch characters; yet as nothing of this kind appears, but indeed the very contrary, our Saviour looking upon this young man immediately after he had uttered theſe words, and loving him, we cannot, without offering an indignity to our Saviour's character, ſuppoſe him to entertain the leaſt degree of approbation towards an inſolent aſſuming hypocrite, vainly juſtifying himſelf for righteouſneſs, though really deſtitute of all true goodneſs. The ſame obſervations are in general applicable to his third queſtion, What lack I yet? It is evident therefore, ſay they, that this young perſon was deſirous of being acquainted with our Saviour's ſentiments concerning his firſt queſtion, from the high opinion he had of him. See Matth. xix. 18—19. on Luke xviii. 23. and the Reflections.

for them that truſt in riches, to enter into the kingdom of God!

25 It is eaſier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

26 And they were aſtoniſhed out of meaſure, ſaying among themſelves, Who then can be ſaved?

27 And Jeſus looking upon them, ſaith, With men it is impoſſible, but not with God: for with God all things are poſſible.

28 Then Peter began to ſay unto him, Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee.

29 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, Verily I ſay unto you, There is no man that hath left houſe, or brethren, or ſiſters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my ſake, and the goſpel's, 30 But he ſhall receive an hundred-fold now in this time, houſes, and brethren, and ſiſters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with perſecutions; and in the world to come eternal life.

31 But many that are firſt, ſhall be laſt; and the laſt, firſt.

32 And they were in the way going up to Jeruſalem; and Jeſus went before them: and they were amazed; and as they followed, they were afraid. And he took again the twelve, and began to tell them what things ſhould happen unto him,

33 Saying, Behold, we go up to Jeruſalem; and the Son of man ſhall be delivered unto the chief prieſts, and unto the ſcribes; and they ſhall condemn him to death, and ſhall deliver him to the Gentiles:

34 And they ſhall mock him, and ſhall ſcourge him, and ſhall ſpit upon him, and ſhall kill him: and the third day he ſhall riſe again.

35 And James and John, the ſons of Zebedee, come unto him, ſaying, Maſter, we would that thou ſhouldeſt do for us whatſoever we ſhall deſire.

36 And he ſaid unto them, What would ye that I ſhould do for you?

37 They ſaid unto him, Grant unto us that we may ſit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left hand in thy glory.

38 But Jeſus ſaid unto them, Ye know not what ye aſk: can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptiſm that I am baptized with?

39 And they ſaid unto him, We can. And Jeſus ſaid unto them, Ye ſhall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of; and with the baptiſm that I am baptized withal, ſhall ye be baptized:

40 But to ſit on my right hand and on my left hand, is not mine to give; but it ſhall be given to them for whom it is prepared.

41 And when the ten heard it, they began to be much diſpleaſed with James and John.

42 But Jeſus called them to him, and ſaith unto them, Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles, exerciſe lordſhip over them; and their great ones exerciſe authority upon them.

43 But ſo ſhall it not be among you: but whoſoever will be great among you, ſhall be your miniſter:

44 And whoſoever of you will be the chiefeſt, ſhall be ſervant of all.

45 For even the Son of man came not to be miniſtered unto, but to miniſter, and to give his life a ranſom for many.

Ver. 27. With men it is impoſſible, &c.] That is, ſays Dr. Clarke, "To us, humanly ſpeaking, the dangers and temptations of proſperity are ſo great, that only the grace of God, which he affords to the ſincere and obedient, can enable men to overcome them." See his ſermons, vol. vii. ſerm. 5.

Ver. 29. There is no man that hath left, &c.] Our Lord is not here ſpeaking of ſuch as have actually ſeparated themſelves from the perſons, and parted with the poſſeſſions here mentioned; for if that had been his meaning, he would not have ſaid, that wives and children were to be forſaken, having himſelf, on a former occaſion, expreſly prohibited divorce on any account, except fornication. He is ſpeaking of thoſe, who, for his ſake and the Goſpel's, have renounced the pleaſures and ſatisfaction which relations and poſſeſſions uſually afford. See Luke xiv. 33. Our Lord promiſes to all ſuch great rewards, He ſhall receive, &c. ver. 30. "He who hath forſaken all for my ſake, ſhall be no loſer in the iſſue; becauſe God, who deſigns to admit him into heaven, will give him the comforts neceſſary to ſupport him in his journey thither, and will raiſe him up friends, who ſhall be as ſerviceable to him as the neareſt kindred whom he hath forſaken. By the ſpecial benignity of Providence he ſhall have every thing valuable, which relations or poſſeſſions can miniſter to him: and beſides, ſhall have perſecutions, whoſe heat ſhall nouriſh virtues in him of ſuch excellent efficacy, as to yield him, even in this preſent world, joys an hundred times better than all earthly pleaſures: but above all, in the world to come, he ſhall have everlaſting life. His afflictions contributing to the growth of his graces, which are the wings of his ſoul, he ſhall in due time be raiſed on them even up to heaven, leaving all ſorrows behind him, and ſhall fly ſwiftly into the boſom of God, the fountain of life and joy, where he ſhall have full amends made him for all the evils he may have undergone on account of Chriſt and his Goſpel." See on Matth. xix. 30.

Ver. 32. They were in the way going up, &c.] The rulers at Jeruſalem had iſſued out a proclamation againſt our Lord, immediately after the reſurrection of Lazarus, and probably promiſed a reward to any that would apprehend him, John xi. 57. This ſeems to have been the reaſon why the diſciples were amazed. The alacrity which their Maſter ſhewed in ſo dangerous an expedition ſurprized them, and they were afraid, being ſtruck with a fearful apprehenſion of the conſequences while they followed him. They all expected indeed that the kingdom was immediately to appear, Luke xix. 11. but recollecting what had been ſaid to them concerning the difficulty of rich mens entering into it, and comparing that declaration with the behaviour of the rulers, who had hitherto oppoſed and perſecuted Jeſus, they became very apprehenſive of the dangers they ſhould be expoſed to at Jeruſalem. In ſuch circumſtances our Lord knew that a repetition of the prophecy concerning his own ſufferings was proper, becauſe it ſhewed the diſciples that they were intirely voluntary; and as he told them expreſly, that they had been predicted by the prophets, and conſequently decreed of old by God, the oppoſition he was to meet with, though it would end with his death, inſtead of weakening their faith, ought to have increaſed it; eſpecially as he informed them at the ſame time, that he would riſe again the third day. See Macknight, the next verſes, and the note on Matth. xx. 18.

Ver. 33, 34. Shall condemn—ſhall deliver, &c.] Will condemn, &c. Wat.

46 And they came to Jericho: and as he went out of Jericho with his diſciples, and a great number of people, blind Bartimeus, the ſon of Timeus, ſat by the highway-ſide, begging.

47 And when he heard that it was Jeſus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and ſay, Jeſus, thou ſon of David, have mercy on me.

48 And many charged him that he ſhould hold his peace: but he cried the more a great deal, Thou ſon of David, have mercy on me.

49 And Jeſus ſtood ſtill, and commanded him to be called: and they call the blind man, ſaying unto him, Be of good comfort, riſe; he calleth thee.

50 And he, caſting away his garment, roſe, and came to Jeſus.

51 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto him, What wilt thou that I ſhould do unto thee? The blind man ſaid unto him, Lord, that I might receive my ſight.

52 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole. And immediately he received his ſight, and followed Jeſus in the way.

Ver. 46. Blind Bartimeus, the ſon of Timeus] Bar-timeus and the ſon of Timeus, are the ſame; one of them therefore has probably been inſerted from the margin. Sir D. D.

Ver. 50. He caſting away his garment] That is, his upper garment, that it might not hinder him a moment in his approach to Chriſt. The blind-man herein furniſhes us with an inſtructive leſſon, that we ſhould riſe no leſs eagerly, no leſs gladly caſt away our cloak, lay aſide every weight, and the ſin which doth ſo eaſily beſet us, and without all delay or heſitation follow Chriſt in the way, running with patience the race that is ſet before us, whenever he calls us by his word and Spirit. Our repentance muſt not be deferred from day to day; but to-day, if we will hear his voice, we muſt take care not to harden our hearts. See Clarius, and the ſermons on the miracles, vol. i. p. 382.

Ver. 51. That I might receive my ſight] That I may have my ſight. Heylin. That I may recover my ſight. Doddridge. Who obſerves, that this is the exact meaning of ἀναβλέψω, which ſeems to import, that he was not born blind, but loſt his ſight by ſome diſeaſe or accident, which made him ſo much the more ſenſible of the calamity. It appears, however, from John ix. 11, 18. that the word is ſometimes uſed in a greater latitude.

Ver. 52. Hath made thee whole] Σέσωκέσε. hath ſaved thee, which ſeems evidently to refer to ſomething more than a mere bodily cure.

REFLECTIONS ON THE YOUNG RULER, WHO APPLIED TO CHRIST, Ver. 17—22.

When our Saviour dwelt upon earth, he found a young man in the coaſts of Judea, who preferred the riches of this world to all the treaſures of heaven;—and yet Jeſus, caſt an eye of love upon him. This love was not properly a divine love, for that would have changed his nature, refined his carnal devices, and conferred grace and ſalvation upon him. We muſt underſtand it therefore only in this ſenſe, That the affections of his human nature were drawn out towards ſomething that was valuable and excellent in this young Iſraelite. He approved of thoſe accompliſhments which he beheld in him, and felt a ſort of complacency in his perſon and character. He had an innocent, an human deſire of his welfare: He gave him divine inſtructions for this end, and pitied him heartily that he was ſo far gone in the love of the world, as to forego the offer of heaven.

The qualities which might attract our Saviour's love were probably ſuch as theſe: he was young and ſprightly, and it is probable that he had ſomething very agreeable in his aſpect. His carriage was courteous and obliging; for he kneeled before our Lord, and ſaluted him with much civility. He had a religious education, much outward ſobriety and virtue, ſo that he was ready to think himſelf a complete ſaint. All theſe commands, ſays he, have I kept from my youth; yet he was willing to receive further inſtructions, if any thing elſe were neceſſary in order to eternal life. Add to all this, that he was rich and powerful; he was a ruler among the Jews, and had large poſſeſſions; which made his humility and other virtues appear the more amiable, becauſe they are ſo ſeldom found in perſons of an exalted ſtation.

From this remarkable perſon then, that had ſo many good qualities, and yet miſſed of heaven, we may learn not to diſclaim any thing that is worthy and excellent, though it is mixed with much iniquity; but to pay reſpect and love, as our Lord Jeſus did, to perſons who have any thing valuable in them, though their virtues are imperfect, and fall ſhort of ſaving grace. We may learn alſo, that God chooſes not as man would chooſe, nor ſaves all thoſe upon whom a wiſe and good man may well beſtow his love. We are taught further, that many lovely accompliſhments joined together are not ſufficient to attain eternal life, unleſs we renounce this world, and follow Chriſt; and we are divinely warned of the danger of riches, how great a ſnare they ſometimes prove to perſons of a hopeful character.

Let ſuch, whether endowed with any natural excellencies of body or mind, ſeriouſly reflect, while they are in their bloom and vigour. Youth and beauty, ſtrength and health, wit and reaſon, judgement, memory, or ſweet diſpoſition, are all the gifts of God, and certainly render perſons ſo far amiable, as they are poſſeſſed of them; yet who can fail mourning with much compaſſion over thoſe who, flouriſh in the poſſeſſion of any of theſe endowments, and yet have no ſaving acquaintance with God in Chriſt, no right to eternal life! What pity is it, that the flower of age ſhould be employed only to ſoothe vanity, to adorn guilty paſſions, to dreſs up the ſcenes of ſin! That flower will wither in old age, and it leaves no perfume behind, but what ariſes from virtue and goodneſs.

Who can fail pitying the young, the vigorous, the comely figures of human nature, who neglect to ſeek after divine grace, who are ruined and made wretched to all eternity, by their exceſſive love of the pleaſures, or the pomp, or the riches of this world! Who can fail pitying thoſe endowed with a lively imagination, without ſanctifying grace! What a lovely wilderneſs of blooming weeds! fair indeed in various colours, but uſeleſs and unſavoury: The perſons, whoſe happy talents give a reliſh to the common comforts of life, diffuſing joy and pleaſure, enlivening the dulleſt hours, courted and beloved by all; but how diſmal is their ſtate, if they neglect holineſs, and are not beloved of God! Can they imagine that their gay fancy will brighten the gloom of hell, divert the anguiſh of a tortured mind, or relieve the heavy and everlaſting miſery of themſelves or their companions, in the hideous regions of future puniſhment!

Who can fail to pity the man of ſtrong reaſon and great ſagacity, who hath traced nature in her moſt ſecret receſſes, but has ſpent no time in ſearching the deep things of God? Reaſon is a faculty of ſupreme excellence among the gifts of nature, and it is dreadful to think, that it ſhould ever be engaged in oppoſition to divine grace. How great, and wretched, are the men of reaſon, who ſtrain the nerves of their ſoul to overturn the doctrine of Chriſt! who labour with all their intellectual powers to ſhake the foundations of the Goſpel, to diminiſh the authority of the Scriptures, and to unſettle the hope of feeble Chriſtians!

There are others who employ the beſt powers of the ſoul in purſuing the intereſts of this life. They are wiſe in contrivance to gratify their appetites, to fill their coffers; wiſe to ſecure all their wealth and honours to their poſterity after death; but make no proviſion for their own ſouls. They are wiſe to ſet in order their houſes, in the day of their health, and to prepare all things for their dying hour, except the concerns of their own eternity. Theſe are delayed from day to day, and left at the utmoſt hazard; and ſtill they think the next month, or the next year, it is time enough to prepare for heaven; when perhaps a ſummons is ſent ſuddenly from on high, Thou fool, this night is thy ſoul required of thee! What confuſion and fear will ſeize them at that hour!—They have laid out all their wiſdom upon the little buſineſs of this life, and trifled with affairs of everlaſting concern. They muſt leave all the fruits of their wiſdom behind, and be branded for eternal fools!

Who again can fail pitying thoſe, who are bleſſed with a large memory, the noble repoſitory of the mind, to receive divine truths, to be ſtored with the ideas of God and his grace, to ſupply the heart and tongue upon all occaſions for worſhip, for conference, and for holy joy? What pity is it ſo wonderous a capacity ſhould be crowded with vile images, with wanton ſcenes, with profane jeſts, with idle ſtories; or, at beſt, filled with the tranſitory things of this life! night and day the buyers and ſellers paſſing through this temple, which ſhould be conſecrated to God, and no room left for the thoughts of heaven there? Shall theſe buſy ſwarms of cares and vanities for ever fill up ſo large a chamber of the ſoul? Shall impertinences for ever be thruſt into this treaſury, ſuch as will ſtand in no ſtead when we are diſmiſſed from the body, but will vaniſh all at once in that hour, and leave our ſpirits poor and naked; or, if they follow us to the future world, it will be but as ſo much fuel gathered for our burning?

Once more, who can fail to pity thoſe who are born with a ſweet diſpoſition, and ſeem to be caſt in a ſofter mould than the reſt of men? Who can fail mourning, to think that any of theſe ſhould periſh for ever, who have tenderneſs and goodneſs in their very form and aſpect! They are the favourites of all men; alas! why will they not ſtrive to become the favourites of God too!—Good humour is the companion of their nature, and the law of kindneſs is on their lips. But is this enough to depend upon for eternal life?—There is ſo much natural goodneſs in their ſituation, as leads them on by a ſweet inſtinct to the practice of many charities; but that is not ſaving grace. If Jeſus Chriſt himſelf were upon earth, in his humble ſtate as man, he would look upon ſuch, and love them; but the holy God looks down from heaven, and beholds them as the object

CHAP. XI.

Chriſt rideth with triumph into Jeruſalem: curſeth the fruitleſs fig-tree: purgeth the temple: exhorteth his diſciples to ſtedfaſtneſs of faith, and to forgive their enemies: and defendeth the lawfulneſs of his actions, by the witneſs of John, as a man ſent from God.

AND when they came nigh to Jeruſalem, unto Bethphage, and Bethany, at the mount of Olives, he ſendeth forth two of his diſciples,

2 And ſaith unto them, Go your way into the village over againſt you: and as ſoon as ye be entered into it, ye ſhall find a colt tied, whereon never man ſat; looſe him, and bring him.

3 And if any man ſay unto you, Why do ye this? ſay ye that the Lord hath need of him; and ſtraightway he will ſend him hither.

4 And they went their way, and found the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met; and they looſe him.

5 And certain of them that ſtood there, ſaid unto them, What do ye, looſing the colt?

6 And they ſaid unto them even as Jeſus had commanded: and they let them go.

7 And they brought the colt to Jeſus, and caſt their garments on him; and he ſat upon him.

8 And many ſpread their garments in the way: and others cut down branches off the trees, and ſtrawed them in the way.

9 And they that went before, and they that followed, cried, ſaying, Hoſanna! Bleſſed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!

10 Bleſſed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hoſanna in the higheſt!

11 And Jeſus entered Jeruſalem, and into the temple: and when he had looked round about upon all things, and now the eventide was come, he went out unto Bethany with the twelve.

12 And on the morrow, when they were come from Bethany, he was hungry:

13 And ſeeing a fig-tree afar off, having leaves, he came, if haply he might find any thing thereon: and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet.

of his juſt hatred, while they live in a ſtate of vanity and ſin, drunken with ſenſual pleaſures, and at enmity with God.

This ſweetneſs of temper, that ſprings from the blood, and a happy mixture of humours, or at beſt from the mere natural frame of ſpirits, will never paſs before the great tribunal for holineſs and inward religion. With all this charming appearance of virtues, theſe colours that look like heaven, they will be doomed to hell, and perpetual miſery, unleſs nobler qualities be found in them; love to God, mortification to this world, the knowledge and faith of Jeſus Chriſt. If theſe be not the ſprings of our charity and love to men, we ſhall not be ſecure from the condemning ſentence of the eternal judge.

Think then a little with yourſelves, ſuch of you, my readers, as poſſeſs theſe rich endowments of the mind, after that you have been honoured here on earth, can you bear to be doomed to ſhame and puniſhment everlaſting? Shall this wit and this reaſon be there employed to expreſs your hatred againſt your God, and to forge perpetual blaſphemies againſt the majeſty of heaven? Shall this ſprightly fancy, this penetrating judgement, this large memory, ſerve for no purpoſe, but to aggravate your guilt, and your damnation? Shall theſe fine talents ſharpen your miſery, and give edge to the keeneſt reflections of conſcience—that immortal tormentor? Yet this muſt be the certain portion of thoſe, who ſpend their life, and lie down in death, with theſe talents unſanctified; for the anguiſh and torture of ſinful ſouls muſt riſe and grow for ever, in proportion to the glory of their abuſed endowments. And ſay, O ye of ſoft and gentle natures, how will you bear the inſult and rage of malicious ſpirits? How will your temper, that had ſomething ſo lovely in it, ſuſtain to be baniſhed for ever from the world of love? You that delighted on earth in the works of concord and peace, how will you endure the madneſs and contention, the envy and ſpite of wicked angels? What will ye do, when your tender diſpoſitions ſhall be hourly ruffled by the uproar and confuſion of thoſe dark regions; when, inſtead of the ſociety of God and bleſſed ſpirits, you ſhall be eternally vexed with the perverſe tempers of your fellow-ſinners, the ſons of darkneſs?—Oh that it were poſſible by any means to awaken your ſouls to jealouſy and timely fear! that ſo many natural excellencies as God hath diſtributed amonſt you, might not be waſted in ſin, abuſed to diſhonour, and aggravate your everlaſting miſery; but that, on the contrary, as furniſhed with every good quality, ſo you might be bleſſed with divine grace, and be at once beloved by God and by man!

Such an one was our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in the days of his fleſh; from his very childhood in favour with God and with man: In the whole compoſition of his nature, in the mildneſs of his deportment, and in all the graces of converſation, he was the chiefeſt of ten thouſands, and altogether lovely. Such too was John, the man who attained that glorious appellation, the diſciple whom Jeſus loved,—that is, with a diſtinguiſhing and particular love.

O how happy are the perſons who moſt nearly reſemble this apoſtle! who are thus privileged, thus divinely bleſſed! How infinitely are they indebted to God, their benefactor and their father, who has endowed them with ſo many valuable accompliſhments on earth, and aſſures them of the happineſs of heaven! It is he, O ye bleſſed amongſt men, who hath made you fair or wiſe. It is he who hath given you ingenuity or riches, or perhaps hath favoured you with all theſe; and yet hath weaned your hearts from the love of this world, and led you to the purſuits of eternal life. It is he who hath caſt you in ſo refined a mould, and given you ſo ſweet a diſpoſition; who has inclined you to ſobriety and virtue, raiſed you to honour and eſteem, made you poſſeſſors of all that is deſirable in this life, and appointed you a nobler inheritance in that which is to come. What thankfulneſs does every power of your natures owe to your God, that heaven looks down upon you, and loves you, and the world around you fix their eyes upon you, and love you? That God hath formed you to ſo bright a reſemblance of his own Son, his firſt-beloved, and has ordained you joint-heirs of heaven with him?

Watch hourly againſt the temptations of pride; remember the fallen angels, and their once exalted ſtation; and have a care leſt ye alſo be puffed up, and fall into the condemnation of the devil. Walk before God with exacteſt care, and in deepeſt humility: Let that divine veil be ſpread over all your honours, that as ye are the faireſt images of Chriſt, ye may be dreſſed like him too; for he who is the higheſt Son of God, was alſo the holieſt of the ſons of men. He who is perſonally united with the Godhead, and is one with his Creator, was the humbleſt of every creature. See Watts's works, vol. i. p. 72.

Ver. 13. And ſeeing a fig-tree, &c.] The time of the year when this event happened was undoubtedly three or four days before the paſſover at which our Saviour was crucified; and the paſſover that year fell in the beginning of April. Upon this it is inquired, "How could Chriſt expect to find figs on the tree at that ſeaſon of the year? And what is the meaning of the Evangeliſt's, ſaying, the time of figs was not yet? I. In the firſt place it is aſked, "How could Chriſt expect to find ripe figs on the tree in the latter end of March?" The plain anſwer is, becauſe figs are ripe ſo ſoon in Judea; all the difficulty here has ariſen from mens not conſidering the difference of the climate. Judea is a country vaſtly hotter than England, and there the fruits are brought forth and ripened much ſooner than they are in our colder climate. The barley in Judea was ripe in March, and the wheat in April; we cannot therefore wonder if there were ripe figs in the beginning of April too. But this is not all; it can be directly proved, concerning fig-trees in particular, that in 14 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto it, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever. And his diſciples heard it.

15 And they come to Jeruſalem: and Jeſus went into the temple, and began to caſt out them that ſold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the ſeats of them that ſold doves;

16 And would not ſuffer that any man ſhould carry any veſſel through the temple.

17 And he taught, ſaying unto them, Is it not written, My houſe ſhall be called of all nations the houſe of prayer? but ye have made it a den of thieves.

18 And the ſcribes and chief prieſts heard it, and ſought how they might deſtroy him: for they feared him, becauſe all the people was aſtoniſhed at his doctrine.

19 And when even was come, he went out of the city.

20 And in the morning, as they paſſed by, they ſaw the fig-tree dried up from the roots.

21 And Peter calling to remembrance, ſaith unto him, Maſter, behold, the fig-tree which thou curſedſt is withered away.

22 And Jeſus anſwering ſaith unto them, Have faith in God.

23 For verily I ſay unto you, That whoſoever ſhall ſay unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou caſt into the ſea; and ſhall not doubt in his heart, but ſhall believe that thoſe things which he ſaith ſhall come to paſs; he ſhall have whatſoever he ſaith.

24 Therefore I ſay unto you, What things ſoever ye deſire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye ſhall have them.

Judea they brought forth good figs, which were ripe as early as the paſſover, in the beginning of April. The proof, in ſhort, is this: Figs were ripe before ſummer,—ſummer is harveſt-time,—harveſt-time began at the paſſover,—therefore figs were ripe before the paſſover. Each of theſe propoſitions ſhall be briefly proved. 1. "Figs were ripe before ſummer. That there are two ſeaſons of the year for figs is plain from hence, that the Scripture mentions the firſt time of figs, Hoſea ix. 10. Micah vii. 1. Theſe firſt ripe figs were fully ripe, for they would fall from the tree, if it was ſhaken by the wind, as it is written Nahum iii. 12. That theſe firſt-ripe figs were very good, we are informed by the prophet Jeremiah xxiv. 2. Theſe fig-trees had leaves before the ſummer in that country, as it is expreſly ſaid, Matth. xx. 32. But concerning the fig-tree it ſhould be noted, that it puts forth its fruit firſt, and its leaves afterwards; conſequently if its leaves, much more doth its fruit come forth before ſummer; and that the fig-tree in Judea brought forth fruit before, is expreſly ſaid, Canticles ii. 11—13. Iſaiah is more expreſs, ch. xxviii. 4. where what our tranſlators call the haſty fruit, is the firſt ripe fruit, as they have well tranſlated the ſame word in the places before quoted. Thus it appears, that the firſt ripe figs were very good, were fit to be eaten, and were ripe before ſummer. 2. The word ſummer, in ſcripture, ſignifies the time of harveſt. Compare Jer. viii. 20. and Dan. ii. 35. Thoſe who have travelled into Egypt, the next country to Judea, inform us, that the ſummer in Egypt begins in March; from whence we may conclude, that the ſummer in Judea began about the ſame time of the year. They then in Egypt cut down their corn, and immediately thraſhed it; and that they immediately thraſhed it alſo in Judea, is plain from their having loaves made of new corn for an offering at pentecoſt. 3. That the harveſt in Judea began at the paſſover is plain, becauſe the Jews were required, on the ſecond day after the paſſover, to bring a ſheaf of the firſt fruits of their barley harveſt, for an offering to God, Lev. xxiii. 10, 11. Seven weeks after the paſſover was pentecoſt, in the beginning of which ſeven weeks it is expreſly ſaid, the corn began to be reaped, Deut. xvi. 9. See alſo Lev. xxiii. 15—17. and Ruth ii. 23. 4. From all this it follows, that figs in Judea were ripe before the paſſover; for figs were ripe and good before the ſummer, or harveſt; but the harveſt began at the paſſover; therefore figs were ripe and good before the paſſover;—as was to be proved. From hence it appears, that Chriſt might reaſonably expect to find good ripe figs on a fig-tree three days before the paſſover, as the Evangeliſt has told us he did. It was the uſual time for the firſt ripe figs, and therefore it was natural to expect that there ſhould be figs upon this tree; and this was the more natural, becauſe, as the Evangeliſt obſerves, there were leaves upon the tree, before which leaves the fruit always came forth, if the tree bore any fruit at all. The leaves then were naturally a token that fruit was to be found on the tree alſo, and thus it was natural to expect it. II. We now eaſily ſee how to account for the expreſſion of St. Mark before us, which has been thought ſo extremely difficult; for the time of figs was not yet. While it was ſuppoſed that this expreſſion ſignified "the time for trees to bring forth fruit was not yet come," it looked very unaccountable that Chriſt ſhould reckon a tree barren, though it had leaves, and curſe it as ſuch, when he knew the time of bearing figs was not yet come: It ſeemed unaccountable that Chriſt ſhould come to ſeek figs on this tree, when he knew that figs did not uſed to be ripe ſo ſoon in the year. But ſince the true ſenſe of the phraſe "The time of figs," has been diſcovered to the world by the learned Bp. Kidder, the matter is eaſy. The expreſſion does not ſignify the time of the coming forth of figs, but the time of gathering in ripe figs, as is plain from the parallel expreſſions. Thus the time of the fruits, Matth. xxi. 34. moſt plainly ſignifies the time of gathering in ripe fruits, ſince the ſervants were ſent to receive thoſe fruits for their maſter's uſe. St. Mark and St. Luke expreſs this ſame matter only by the word time, or ſeaſon;—At the ſeaſon he ſent a ſervant, &c. That is, at the ſeaſon or time of gathering in ripe fruit, ch. xii. 2. Luke xx. 10. In like manner, if any one ſhould ſay in our language, the ſeaſon of fruit—the ſeaſon of apples,—the ſeaſon of figs,—every one would underſtand him to ſpeak of the ſeaſon or time of gathering in theſe fruits when ripe. When therefore St. Mark ſays, that the time or ſeaſon of figs was not yet, he evidently means, that the time of gathering ripe figs was not yet come; and if the gathering time was not come, it was natural to expect figs upon all thoſe trees which were not barren; whereas, after the time of gathering figs, no one would expect to find figs on a fig-tree, and its having none then would be no ſign of barrenneſs. St. Mark, by ſaying, for the time of figs was not yet, does not deſign to give a reaſon for what he ſaid in the immediately following clauſe,—he found nothing but leaves; but he gives a reaſon for what he ſaid in the clauſe before that; He came, if haply he might find any thing thereon; and it was a good reaſon for our Saviour's coming and ſeeking figs on the tree, becauſe the time of gathering them in was not come. We have other like inſtances in the Goſpels, and indeed in the writings of all mankind, of another clauſe coming in between the aſſertion and the proof. Thus, in this very Evangeliſt,—ch. xvi. 3, 4. they ſaid among themſelves, who ſhall roll away the ſtone from the door of the ſepulchre, and when they looked, they ſaw the ſtone was rolled away, for it was very great; where, its being very great is not aſſigned as a reaſon of its being rolled away, but of the womens wiſhing for ſome one to roll it away for them. See Hallet's notes on Scripture, vol. ii. p. 114. the Chriſtian's Magazine, vol. vi. p. 123, &c. and Witſius's Meletemata.

Ver. 14. And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid to it] And Jeſus ſaid to it upon this occaſion. Doddridge. See the note on Matth. xi. 25.

Ver. 16. Any veſſel] Or utenſil; that is, any kind of burden. See the notes on John ii. 14. &c.

Ver. 21. Behold, the fig-tree, &c.] Our Lord had ſaid, ver. 14. No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever. This Peter, according to the Jewiſh manner of ſpeaking concerning things that are barren, calls curſing the fig-tree; Heb. vi. 8. and ſome ill-diſpoſed readers, not apprehending the proper force of the words, are apt to form a very unbecoming notion of Jeſus from this action; but they do ſo without the leaſt cauſe, ſince every thing he ſaid on this occaſion was decent. Moreover, the tranſaction itſelf was emblematical and prophetic, prefiguring the ſpeedy ruin of the Jewiſh nation, on account of its unfruitfulneſs, under greater advantages than any other people enjoyed at that day; and, like all the reſt of his miracles, it was done with a gracious intention, namely, to alarm his countrymen, and induce them to repent. It is obſervable that the deſtruction of the ſwine, and this blaſting of the fig-tree, are the only inſtances of punitive miracles in the whole courſe of our Saviour's miniſtry, notwithſtanding they do not appear to have been injurious. The caſe of the ſwine we have already conſidered; and with reſpect to the fig-tree, St. Matthew informs us, ch. xxi. 19. that it was in the way, that is, in the common road, and therefore, probably, no particular perſon's property; but if it was, being barren, the timber might be as ſerviceable to the owner as before. So that here was no real injury; but Jeſus was pleaſed to make uſe of this innocent miracle for the valuable purpoſes above ſuggeſted, as well as to teach his diſciples the efficacy of a ſtrong and lively faith. See Macknight, Ward's Diſſertations, p. 83. and the 18th Diſcourſe, vol. 2. of the Sermons on the Miracles.

Ver. 22. Have faith in God] Or, a divine faith; literally, the faith of God. And who could find fault, if the Creator and Proprietor of all things were to deſtroy, by a ſingle word of his mouth, a thouſand of his inanimate creatures, were it only to imprint this important leſſon more deeply on one immortal ſpirit? See on Matth. xvii. 20.

25 And when ye ſtand, praying, forgive if ye have aught againſt any: that your Father alſo which is in heaven may forgive you your treſpaſſes.

26 But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your treſpaſſes.

27 And they come again to Jeruſalem: and as he was walking in the temple, there come to him the chief prieſts, and the ſcribes, and the elders, 28 And ſay unto him, By what authority doeſt thou theſe things? and who gave thee this authority to do theſe things?

29 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, I will alſo aſk of you one queſtion, and anſwer me, and I will tell you by what authority I do theſe things.

30 The baptiſm of John, was it from heaven, or of men? anſwer me.

31 And they reaſoned with themſelves, ſaying, If we ſhall ſay, From heaven, he will ſay, Why then did ye not believe him?

32 But if we ſhall ſay, Of men, they feared the people: for all men counted John, that he was a prophet indeed.

33 And they anſwered and ſaid unto Jeſus, We cannot tell. And Jeſus anſwering ſaith unto them, Neither do I tell you by what authority I do theſe things.

CHAP. XII.

In a parable of the vineyard let out to unthankful huſbandmen, Chriſt foretelleth the reprobation of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles: he avoideth the ſnare of the Phariſees and Herodians about paying tribute to Cæſar: convinceth the Sadducees of their error, who denied the reſurrection: reſolveth the ſcribe, who queſtioned what was the firſt com-

REFLECTIONS ON OUR LORD'S CURSING THE FRUITLESS FIG-TREE.

When our Saviour had rode through the ſtreets of Jeruſalem, that evening he lodged not in the city; whether it was that he would not, leſt after the public acclamations of the people, ſuſpicions of plotting, or of a want of popularity might be raiſed againſt him; or whether he could not, for want of an invitation. Hoſanna! was more cheap than an entertainment; and accordingly he goes that evening without eating from Jeruſalem. O unthankful citizens, do you thus part with your no leſs meek than glorious King; whoſe title was not more proclaimed in your ſtreets, than was your own ingratitude? There is no wonder in men's unworthineſs; but there is more than wonder in thy mercy, O Saviour of men, who wouldeſt yet return thither on the morrow; and if thou mayeſt not ſpend the night with them, wilt yet ſpend with them the day.

Thou that giveſt food to all things living, art thyſelf hungry, (ver. 12.): Martha, Mary, and Lazarus, kept not ſo poor an houſe, but that thou mighteſt have eaten ſomething at Bethany: Whether thine haſte out-ran thine appetite, or whether on purpoſe thou forboreſt any repaſt, to afford opportunity for thine enſuing miracle, I neither preſume to conjecture or reſolve. This was not the firſt time that thou waſt hungry: as thou wouldeſt be a man, ſo thou wouldeſt ſuffer thoſe infirmities which belong to humanity. Hence thou knoweſt to pity what thou haſt felt. Are we pinched with want? we endure but what thou didſt, and have reaſon to be patient: Thou enduredſt what we do; we have reaſon to be thankful.

But what ſhall we ſay to this thine early hunger? The morning, as it is privileged from exceſs, ſo likewiſe from need; the ſtomach is not wont to riſe with the body: Surely, as thine occaſions were, no ſeaſon was exempted from thy want. Thou hadſt ſpent the day before in the holy labour of thy reformation; after a ſupperleſs departure, thou ſpenteſt the night in prayer; no meal refreſhed thy toil. Why do we think much to forbear a morſel, or to break a ſleep for thee, who didſt thus neglect thyſelf for us?

As if meat were no part of thy care, as if any thing would ſerve to ſtop the mouth of hunger; thy breakfaſt is expected from the next tree, ver. 13. A fig-tree grew by the way-ſide, full-grown, well-ſpread, thick-leaved, and ſuch as might promiſe enough to a remote eye; thither thou cameſt to ſeek that, which thou foundeſt not; and not finding what thou ſoughteſt, as diſpleaſed with thy diſappointment, curſedſt that plant, which deluded thy hopes; thy breath inſtantly blaſted that deceitful tree; what then could it do,—otherwiſe than the whole world muſt needs do under thy malediction,—but wither and die away?

O Saviour, I had rather wonder at thine actions, than diſcuſs them. If I ſhould ſay that, as man, thou either didſt not know, or didſt not conſider this fruitleſſneſs, it could no way prejudice thy divine Omniſcience. It were no greater diſparagement to thee to grow in knowledge, than in ſtature; nor was it any more diſgrace to thy perfect humanity, that thou, as man, kneweſt not all things at once, than that thou wert not in thy childhood at thy full growth. But herein I doubt not to ſay, it is more likely thou cameſt purpoſely to this tree; knowing the barrenneſs of it anſwerable to the ſeaſon, and fore-reſolving the event; thus to found the occaſion of ſo inſtructive a miracle: like as thou kneweſt Lazarus was dying, was dead, yet wouldeſt not ſeem to take notice of his diſſolution, that ſo thou mighteſt more glorioufly diſplay thy power in his reſurrection.

But why didſt thou curſe a poor tree for the want of that fruit, (ver. 14.) which the ſeaſon yielded not? If it pleaſed thee to call for that which it could not give, the plant was innocent; and if innocent, why curſed? O Saviour, it is fitter for us to adore, than to examine: We may be bold in inquiring after thee, and fond in anſwering for thee.

If that ſeaſon was not for ripe fruit, yet for ſome fruit it was; who knows not the nature of the fig-tree to be always bearing? That plant, if not altogether barren, yields a continual ſucceſſion of increaſe; whilſt one fig is ripe, another is green: This tree was defective in both; yielding nothing but an empty ſhadow.

Beſides, I have learned that thou, O Saviour, wert wont not to ſpeak only, but to work parables; and what was this other than a real parable of thine? All the while thou hadſt been in the world, thou hadſt given many proofs of thy mercy; the earth was full of thy goodneſs; but now, immediately before thy paſſion, thou thoughteſt fit to give a double demonſtration of thy juſt auſterity: How elſe ſhould the world have ſeen thou canſt be ſevere, as well as meek and merciful? And why mighteſt not thou, who didſt make all things, freely deſtroy a plant for thine own glory? Wherefore ſerve thy beſt creatures, but for the praiſe of thy mercy and juſtice? What great matter was it, if thou, who once ſaidſt, Let the earth bring forth the herb yielding ſeed, and the tree yielding the fruit of its own kind, ſhalt now ſay, Let this fruitleſs tree wither?

Yet was all this done in figure: In this act of thine, I ſee both an emblem and a prophecy. How didſt thou therein mean to teach thy diſciples how much thou hateſt an unfruitful profeſſion, and what judgement thou meanteſt to bring upon that barren generation? Once before hadſt thou compared the Jewiſh nation to a fig-tree in the midſt of thy vineyard, which, after three years expectation and culture, yielding no fruit, was by thee, the owner, doomed to a ſpeedy deſtruction. Now thou acteſt, what then thou ſaidſt. No tree abounds more with leaves and ſhade; no nation abounded more with ceremonial obſervations, and ſemblances of piety. Outward profeſſion, where there is want of inward truth and real practice, doth but help to draw down and to aggravate judgement: had this tree been utterly bare and leafleſs, it had perhaps eſcaped the curſe. Hear this, ye vain hypocrites, who, only ſolicitous for a fair outſide ſhew, never care for the ſincerity of a conſcientious obedience; and thus with your own hands draw and help forward the curſe upon you!

That which was the fault of this tree, was alſo the puniſhment of it,—fruitleſſneſs, ver. 30. Had the boughs been appointed to be torn down, and the body ſplit in pieces, the doom had been more eaſy; the juicy plant might yet have recovered, and have lived to recompence this deficiency. Now it ſhall be, what it was, fruitleſs. Horrible ſtate of that church, or that ſoul, which is puniſhed with her own ſin! Outward plagues are but favour, in compariſon of ſpiritual judgements.

Our Lord's malediction might have been perfectly conſiſtent with a long continuance; the tree might have lived long, though fruitleſs; but behold! no ſooner is the word paſſed, than the leaves flag and turn yellow,—the branches wrinkle and ſhrink,—the bark changes colour,—the root dies,—the plant withers.

O God! what creature is able to abide the blaſting of the breath of thy diſpleaſure? Even the moſt great and glorious angels of heaven could not ſtand one moment before thine anger, but periſhed under thy wrath everlaſtingly. How irreſiſtable thy power! How dreadful thy judgements! Lord, chaſten my fruitleſſneſs, but puniſh it not: at leaſt puniſh, but, oh curſe it not; leſt I wither, and be conſumed!

mandment: refuteth the opinion that the ſcribes held of Chriſt: bidding the people to beware of their ambition and hypocriſy: and commendeth the poor widow for her two mites, above all.

AND he began to ſpeak unto them by parables. A certain man planted a vineyard, and ſet an hedge about it, and digged a place for the wine-fat, and built a tower, and let it out to huſbandmen, and went into a far country.

2 And at the ſeaſon he ſent to the huſbandmen a ſervant, that he might receive from the huſbandmen of the fruit of the vineyard.

3 And they caught him, and beat him, and ſent him away empty.

4 And again, he ſent unto them another ſervant; and at him they caſt ſtones, and wounded him in the head, and ſent him away ſhamefully handled.

5 And again he ſent another; and him they killed, and many others; beating ſome, and killing ſome.

6 Having yet therefore one ſon, his wellbeloved, he ſent him alſo laſt unto them, ſaying, They will reverence my ſon.

7 But thoſe huſbandmen ſaid amongſt themſelves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance ſhall be our's.

8 And they took him, and killed him, and caſt him out of the vineyard.

9 What ſhall therefore the Lord of the vineyard do? He will come and deſtroy the huſbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others.

10 And have ye not read this ſcripture; The ſtone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner:

11 This was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes?

12 And they ſought to lay hold on him, but feared the people: for they knew that he had ſpoken the parable againſt them: and they left him, and went their way.

13 And they ſend unto him certain of the Phariſees, and of the Herodians, to catch him in his words.

14 And when they were come, they ſay unto him, Maſter, we know that thou art true, and careſt for no man: for thou regardeſt not the perſon of men, but teacheſt the way of God in truth: Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæſar, or not?

15 Shall we give, or ſhall we not give? But he, knowing their hypocriſy, ſaid unto them, Why tempt ye me? bring me a penny, that I may ſee it.

16 And they brought it: and he ſaith unto them, Whoſe is this image and ſuperſcription? And they ſaid unto him, Cæſar's.

17 And Jeſus anſwering ſaid unto them, Render to Cæſar the things that are Cæſar's, and to God the things that are God's. And they marvelled at him.

18 Then come unto him the Sadducees, which ſay there is no reſurrection; and they aſked him, ſaying, 19 Maſter, Moſes wrote unto us, If a man's brother die, and leave his wife behind him, and leave no children, that his brother ſhould take his wife, and raiſe up ſeed unto his brother.

20 Now there were ſeven brethren: and the firſt took a wife, and dying, left no ſeed.

21 And the ſecond took her, and died, neither left he any ſeed: and the third likewiſe.

22 And the ſeven had her, and left no ſeed: laſt of all the woman died alſo.

23 In the reſurrection therefore, when they ſhall riſe, whoſe wife ſhall ſhe be of them? for the ſeven had her to wife.

24 And Jeſus anſwering ſaid unto them, Do ye not therefore err, becauſe ye know not the ſcriptures, neither the power of God?

25 For when they ſhall riſe from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels which are in heaven.

26 And as touching the dead, that they riſe, have ye not read in the book of Moſes, how in the buſh God ſpake unto him, ſay-

Chap. XII. Ver. 10. Is become] Is made. Wat.

Ver. 11. This, &c.] By the Lord was it ſo made, and it is wonderful, &c.

Ver. 13. To catch him] Ἀγρεύσωσι is a metaphorical word, borrowed from the chaſe, and ſignifies to run down or take a prey in hunting. Some render it, to make a prey of; and Dr. Heylin, to enſnare. See Matth. xxii. 16.

Ver. 16. Superſcription] Inſcription. Wat. and Doddridge.

Ver. 19. Maſter, Moſes wrote, &c.] The Sadducees are thought by many to have agreed with the Samaritans in rejecting all the other parts of Holy Scripture but the five books of Moſes. See the Reflections at the end of Matth. xxii. But there are others who ſtrenuouſly maintain the contrary; and it is moſt reaſonable to believe, that they did not abſolutely reject the other books of the Old Teſtament, but only gave a great preference to the Pentateuch; and laying it down as a principle to receive nothing as an article of faith, which could not be proved from the law, if any thing was urged from other parts of Scripture that could not be deduced from Moſes, they would explain it in ſome other way: And this might be ſufficient to induce our Lord to bring his argument to prove the reſurrection from what Moſes had ſaid, and to confirm it by that part of Scripture which was moſt regarded by the Sadducees, and upon which they now had grounded their objection to it. See Serrarius, Lightfoot, and Doddridge.

Ver. 24. Do ye not therefore err, &c.?] Does not the error you are fallen into ariſe from your ignorance both of the Scriptures, and of the power of God? Heylin. This tranſlation is rather paraphraſtical: Wynne renders it more literally, Do ye not err on this account, (namely) becauſe ye know not the Scriptures, nor, &c.? In Matthew, what is here expreſſed by a queſtion, is delivered affirmatively: Ye do err. See ch. xxii. 29.

Ver. 26. As touching, &c.] As concerning. Wat. and MS.

ing, I am the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob?

27 He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living: ye therefore do greatly err.

28 And one of the ſcribes came, and having heard them reaſoning together, and perceiving that he had anſwered them well, aſked him, Which is the firſt commandment of all?

29 And Jeſus anſwered him, The firſt of all the commandments is, Hear, O Iſrael; The Lord our God is one Lord:

30 And thou ſhalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy ſoul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy ſtrength: this is the firſt commandment.

31 And the ſecond is like, namely this, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thyſelf: there is none other commandment greater than theſe.

32 And the ſcribe ſaid unto him, Well, Maſter, thou haſt ſaid the truth: for there is one God; and there is none other but he:

33 And to love him with all the heart, and with all the underſtanding, and with all the ſoul, and with all the ſtrength, and to love his neighbour as himſelf, is more than all whole burnt-offerings and ſacrifices.

34 And when Jeſus ſaw that he anſwered diſcreetly, he ſaid unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. And no man after that durſt aſk him any queſtion.

35 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, while he taught in the temple, How ſay the ſcribes that Chriſt is the ſon of David?

36 For David himſelf ſaid by the Holy Ghoſt, The LORD ſaid to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footſtool.

37 David therefore himſelf calleth him Lord; and whence is he then his ſon? And the common people heard him gladly.

38 And he ſaid unto them in his doctrine, Beware of the ſcribes, which love to go in long clothing, and love ſalutations in the market-places,

39 And the chief ſeats in the ſynagogues, and the uppermoſt rooms at feaſts:

40 Which devour widows houſes, and for a pretence make long prayers: theſe ſhall receive greater damnation.

41 And Jeſus ſat over againſt the treaſury, and beheld how the people caſt money into the treaſury: and many that were rich caſt in much.

42 And there came a certain poor widow, and ſhe threw in two mites, which make a farthing.

43 And he called unto him his diſciples, and ſaith unto them, Verily I ſay unto you, That this poor widow hath caſt more in, than all they which have caſt into the treaſury:

44 For all they did caſt in of their abundance; but ſhe of her want did caſt in all that ſhe had, even all her living.

See the note on Deut. vi. 4. on Matth. xxii. 37. and the Reflections at the end of that chapter.

Ver. 33. Is more than all whole burnt-offerings] That is, "is more acceptable to God, and important to mankind." See Hoſea vi. 6.

Ver. 34. Thou art not far from the kingdom of God] Jeſus applauded the piety and wiſdom of this reflection, by declaring, that the perſon who made it, was not far from the kingdom of God, or from being a Chriſtian. He had expreſſed ſentiments becoming a ſubject of God's kingdom, and ſuch as might have an happy influence in diſpoſing him to embrace the Goſpel, by which he would obtain a ſhare in all the bleſſings of the children of God. It is added, that no man, after that, durſt aſk him any queſtions: The plain meaning of which is, they aſked him no more ſuch captious queſtions; for the memory of this confuſion impreſſed their minds, during the ſhort remainder of Chriſt's continuance among them; and he was ſoon removed from them, ſo that they had no further opportunities of doing it when that impreſſion was worn off.

Ver. 37. And the common people heard him gladly] They heard him with great attention and pleaſure; for the clear and ſolid anſwers which he returned to the enſnaring queſtions of his foes, gave them an high opinion of his wiſdom, and ſhewed them how far he was ſuperior to their moſt renowned rabbies; whoſe arguments to prove their opinions, and anſwers to the objections that were raiſed againſt them, were, generally ſpeaking, but mean and trifling, compared to his. Beſides, the common people were neither ſo much prejudiced in behalf of the commonly-received opinions, nor ſo much intereſted as the Scribes or other teachers. See Macknight.

Ver. 38. Long cloathing] Long garments, or robes. Wat. MS.

Ver. 39. Rooms] Seats. Ibid.

Ver. 41. And Jeſus ſat over-againſt the treaſury] Jeſus was now in the treaſury, or that part of the women's court, where the cheſts were placed for receiving the offerings of thoſe who came to worſhip. Theſe cheſts, being thirteen in number, had each of them an inſcription fixed to the pillars of the portico which ſurrounded the court, and ſignifying for what uſe the offerings put into them were deſtined. Hence the propriety of St. Mark's expreſſion, Jeſus ſat over-againſt the treaſury; he ſat in the portico of the womens court, oppoſite to the pillars where the cheſts for receiving the offerings of the people were fixed. From theſe voluntary contributions they bought wood for the altar, ſalt, and other neceſſaries, not provided for any other way. It was in this court of the women, according to the Talmudiſts, that the libation of water from Siloam was made annually at the feaſt of tabernacles, as a ſolemn public thanſgiving and prayer for the former and latter rain; to which rite it is ſuppoſed that our Lord alluded, John vii. 38. See more in Macknight concerning this court, and the other parts of the temple.

Ver. 42—44. She threw in two mites, which make a farthing, &c.] Κοδράντης. This coin in value was no more than three-fourths of our farthing; wherefore the offering given by this poor widow was very ſmall in itſelf, though in another reſpect it was a great gift, being all that ſhe had, even all her living. We can hardly ſuppoſe, that at each of the cheſts there were officers placed to receive and count the money which the people offered, and to name the ſum aloud before they put it in; it is more reaſonable to believe, that each perſon put his own offering privately into the cheſt, through a ſlit in its top. Wherefore, by mentioning the particular ſum which the poor widow put in, as well as by declaring that it was all her living, our Lord ſhewed, that nothing was hidden from his knowledge; and at the ſame time, to encourage charity, and to ſhew that it is the diſpoſition of the mind, not the magnificence of the offering, which God regards, our Lord applauded this poor widow, as having given more in proportion than them all. They did caſt in of their abundance, out of their ſuperfluous ſubſtance,—ἐκ τοῦ περισσεύοντος αὐτοῖς; Their offerings, though great in reſpect to hers, bare but a ſmall proportion to their eſtates; Whereas ſhe caſt in of her want,—ἐκ τῆς ὑστερήσεως αὐτῆς. Her offering was the whole of her income for that day, and perhaps the whole of the money in her poſſeſſion at that

CHAP. XIII.

Chriſt foretelleth the deſtruction of the temple: the perſecutions for the goſpel: that the goſpel muſt be preached to all nations: that great calamities ſhall happen to the Jews; and the manner of his coming to judgement. The hour whereof being known to none, every man is to watch and pray, that we be not found unprovided, when he cometh to each one particularly by death.

AND as he went out of the temple, one of his diſciples ſaith unto him, Maſter, ſee what manner of ſtones, and what buildings are here!

2 And Jeſus anſwering, ſaid unto him, Seeſt thou theſe great buildings? there ſhall not be left one ſtone upon another, that ſhall not be thrown down.

3 And as he ſat upon the mount of Olives, over againſt the temple, Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew aſked him privately,

4 Tell us, when ſhall theſe things be? and what ſhall be the ſign when all theſe things ſhall be fulfilled?

5 And Jeſus anſwering them, began to ſay, Take heed leſt any man deceive you:

6 For many ſhall come in my name, ſaying, I am Chriſt; and ſhall deceive many.

7 And when ye ſhall hear of wars, and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled: for ſuch things muſt needs be; but the end ſhall not be yet.

8 For nation ſhall riſe againſt nation, and kingdom againſt kingdom: and there ſhall be earthquakes in divers places, and there ſhall be famines, and troubles: theſe are the beginnings of ſorrows.

9 But take heed to yourſelves: for they ſhall deliver you up to councils; and in the ſynagogues ye ſhall be beaten: and ye ſhall be brought before rulers and kings for my ſake, for a teſtimony againſt them.

10 And the goſpel muſt firſt be publiſhed among all nations.

REFLECTIONS ON THE WIDOW'S MITES.

The ſacred wealth of the temple conſiſted either in ſtuff, or in coin; for the one the Jews had an houſe, for the other a cheſt. At the concourſe of all the males thrice a year, upon occaſion of the ſolemn feaſts, the oblations of all kinds were liberal; our Saviour, as taking pleaſure in the proſpect, ſets himſelf to view thoſe offerings, whether for holy uſes or charitable.

Thoſe things we delight in, we love to behold; the eye and the heart will go together: and can we think, O Saviour, that thy glory hath diminiſhed aught of thy gracious reſpects to our beneficence? or that thine acceptance of our charity was confined to the earth? Even now, that thou ſitteſt on the right-hand of thy father's glory, thou ſeeſt every hand that is ſtretched out to the relief of thy poor ſaints here below; and if vanity have power to ſtir up our liberality out of a conceit to be ſeen of men, how ſhall faith encourage our bounty in knowing that we are ſeen of thee, and accepted by thee? Alas! what are we the better for the notice of thoſe periſhing impotent eyes, which can only view the outſide of our actions, or for that kind of applauſe which vaniſheth in the lips of the ſpeaker? Thine eye, O Lord, is piercing and retributive: as to ſee thee is perfect happineſs, ſo to be ſeen of thee is true contentment and glory.

And doeſt thou, O God, ſee what we give thee, and not ſee what we take away from thee? Are our offerings more noted than our ſacrileges? Surely thy mercy is not more quick-ſighted than thy juſtice! In both kinds our actions are viewed, our account is kept, and we are ſure to receive rewards for what we have given, and vengeance for what we have defalked and taken away. With thine eye of knowledge thou ſeeſt all we do; but what we do well, thou ſeeſt with thine eye of approbation. Thus didſt thou now behold theſe pious and charitable oblations.—How well wert thou pleaſed with this variety? Thou ſaweſt many rich men give much, and one poor widow give more than they, in leſſer room.

The Jews were now under the Roman preſſure. They were all tributaries, yet many of them rich, and thoſe rich men were liberal to the common cheſt. Hadſt thou ſeen thoſe many rich give little, we had heard of thy cenſure; thou expecteſt a proportion betwixt the giver and the gift, betwixt the gift and the receipt: where that fails, the blame is juſt. The nation (though otherwiſe ſufficiently faulty) was in this commendable. How bounteouſly open were their hands to the houſe of God! time was, when their liberality was fain to be reſtrained by proclamation, and now it needed no incitement. The rich gave much, the poor gave more. Jeſus ſaw a poor widow caſting in two mites.

It was miſery enough that ſhe was a widow; the married woman is under the careful proviſion of an huſband; if ſhe ſpend, he earns; but poverty was here added to the ſorrow of her widowhood; ſhe was not more deſolate than needy.

Yet this poor widow gives!—and what?—An offering like herſelf;—two mites. Alas! poor woman! who was poorer than thyſelf?—Wherefore was that Corban, but for the relief of ſuch as thou?—Who ſhould receive, if ſuch are the givers? Thy mites were ſomething to thee, nothing to the treaſury. How ill is that gift beſtowed, which unfurniſheth thee, and adds nothing to the common ſtock!—

Some thrifty neighbour might, perhaps, have ſuggeſted this probable diſcouragement; Jeſus publiſhes and applauds her bounty; He called to him his diſciples, &c. ver. 43. While the rich put in their offerings, we ſee no diſciples called; it was enough that Chriſt noted their gifts only:—But, when the widow comes, with her two mites, the domeſtics of Chriſt are immediately ſummoned to aſſemble, and taught to admire this munificence. A ſolemn preface makes way for her praiſe, and her mites are rendered more precious than the talents; ſhe gave more than they all; more, not only in reſpect of the mind of the giver, but alſo of the proportion of the gift, as hers; a mite to her being more than pounds to them. Pounds were little to them, two mites were all to her. They gave out of their abundance, ſhe out of their neceſſity. That which they gave, left the heap leſs, yet an heap ſtill; ſhe gives all at once, and leaves herſelf nothing. Thus did ſhe give not more than any, but more than they all.

O Father of mercies, who doſt not ſo much regard what is taken out, as what is left behind; thou lookeſt at once into the bottom of her heart, and the bottom of her purſe, and eſteemeſt her gift according to both. Thou neither ſeeſt as man, nor valueſt as man: man judgeth by the worth of the gift, thou judgeſt by the mind of the giver, and the proportion of the remainder. Alas! what have we but mites, and thoſe of thine own lending? It is the comfort of our meanneſs, that our affections are valued, and not our preſents; neither haſt thou ſaid, God loveth a liberal giver, but a chearful. If I had more, O God, thou ſhouldeſt have it; had I leſs, thou wouldeſt not deſpiſe it, who accepteſt the gift according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

Yea, Lord, what have I but two mites—a ſoul and a body? Mere mites, yea, not ſo much, compared to thine infinity. O that I could perfectly offer up them unto thee, according to thine own right in them, and not according to mine! How graciouſly wouldeſt thou be ſure to accept them! How happy ſhall I be in thine acceptance!

Chap. XIII. Ver. 7. Such things muſt needs be] "That is, not by any neceſſity impoſed of God; but, from the wickedneſs of the world, nothing better can be expected." Clarke's Sermons, vol. vi. ſerm. 18.

Ver. 9. In the ſynagogues ye ſhall be beaten] It is certain that whipping and beating were puniſhments inflicted in the ſynagogues. Thus Paul puniſhed the Chriſtians, Acts xxix. 19. xxvi. 11. And that it was cuſtomary to whip both their wiſe men and their diſciples, when guilty of any perverſeneſs, may be fully proved from Vitringa de Synag. vet. lib. iii. cap. ii. All that is mentioned in this verſe was exactly accompliſhed; for Peter and John were called before the ſanhedrim, Acts iv. 6, 7. James and Peter before Herod, Acts xii. 2, 3. and Paul before Nero, as well as before the Roman governors, Gallio, Felix, and Feſtus; and ſome were beaten, as Paul and Silas, &c. See the note on Matth. x. 17, 18.

liver you up, take no thought before-hand what ye ſhall ſpeak, neither do ye premeditate: but whatſoever ſhall be given you in that hour, that ſpeak ye: for it is not ye that ſpeak, but the Holy Ghoſt.

12 Now the brother ſhall betray the brother to death, and the father the ſon: and children ſhall riſe up againſt their parents, and ſhall cauſe them to be put to death.

13 And ye ſhall be hated of all men for my name's ſake: but he that ſhall endure unto the end, the ſame ſhall be ſaved.

14 But when ye ſhall ſee the abomination of deſolation, ſpoken of by Daniel the prophet, ſtanding where it ought not, (let him that readeth underſtand,) then let them that be in Judea, flee to the mountains:

15 And let him that is on the houſe-top, not go down into the houſe, neither enter therein, to take any thing out of his houſe:

16 And let him that is in the field, not turn back again for to take up his garment.

17 But woe to them that are with child, and to them that give ſuck in thoſe days!

18 And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter.

19 For in thoſe days ſhall be affliction, ſuch as was not from the beginning of the creation which God created, unto this time, neither ſhall be.

20 And except that the Lord had ſhortened thoſe days, no fleſh ſhould be ſaved: but for the elect's ſake, whom he hath choſen, he hath ſhortened the days.

21 And then, if any man ſhall ſay to you, Lo, here is Chriſt; or lo, he is there; believe him not:

22 For falſe Chriſts and falſe prophets ſhall riſe, and ſhall ſhew ſigns and wonders, to ſeduce, if it were poſſible, even the elect.

23 But take ye heed: behold, I have foretold you all things.

24 But in thoſe days, after that tribulation, the ſun ſhall be darkened, and the moon ſhall not give her light.

25 And the ſtars of heaven ſhall fall, and the powers that are in heaven ſhall be ſhaken.

26 And then ſhall they ſee the Son of man coming in the clouds, with great power and glory.

27 And then ſhall he ſend his angels, and ſhall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermoſt part of the earth to the uttermoſt part of heaven.

28 Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; When her branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that ſummer is near:

29 So ye, in like manner, when ye ſhall ſee theſe things come to paſs, know that it is nigh, even at the doors.

30 Verily I ſay unto you, that this generation ſhall not paſs, till all theſe things be done.

31 Heaven and earth ſhall paſs away: but my words ſhall not paſs away.

32 But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father.

33 Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is.

34 For the Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his houſe, and gave authority to his ſervants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch.

35 Watch ye therefore, for ye know not when the maſter of the houſe cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning;

Ver. 32. Hour] Seaſon. MS. Though we have given an explanation of this verſe, as well as the whole chapter, in the notes on the parallel paſſage of St. Matthew; yet an ingenious commentator having offered a different ſolution from that which we have given, we here ſubjoin it. "It may ſeem ſtrange, ſays he, that the Son, who declared that he would come before the generation then in being went off the ſtage, and who in the prophecy had been pointing out the various ſigns by which the diſciples might foreſee his approach, ſhould not have known the day and the hour, or the particular time of his own coming. This difficulty ſome endeavour to obviate by ſuppoſing, that our Lord ſpoke of himſelf here only as man; but the name Father following that of Son, ſhews that he ſpake of himſelf as the Son of God, and not as the Son of man. Beſides, the gradation in the ſentence ſeems to forbid this ſolution: for the Son being mentioned after the angels, and immediately before the Father, is thereby declared to be more excellent than they; which he is not in reſpect of his human nature; and therefore he cannot be ſuppoſed to ſpeak of himſelf in that nature. The proper tranſlation of the paſſage, I think, affords a better ſolution. The word οἶδεν here ſeems to have the force of the Hebrew conjugation hiphil, which, in verbs denoting action, makes that action, whatever it is, paſs to another; wherefore εἰδέω, which properly ſignifies, I know, uſed in the ſenſe of the conjugation hiphil ſignifies, I make another to know. The word has this meaning without diſpute, 1 Cor. ii. 2. I determined to know [εἰδέναι] nothing among you, but Jeſus Chriſt, and him crucified; that is, "I determined to make known, to preach nothing, &c." So likewiſe in the text, "But of that day and that hour none maketh you to know; none hath power to make you know it:" juſt as the phraſe Matth. xx. 23. is not mine to give, ſignifies is not in my power to give. —No, not the angels, neither the Son, but the Father; "Neither man nor angel, neither the Son himſelf, can reveal the day and hour of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, becauſe the Father hath determined that it ſhall not be revealed." The divine wiſdom ſaw fit to conceal from the apoſtles the preciſe period of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, that they might be laid under a neceſſity of watching continually; and this vigilance was eſpecially proper at that time, becauſe the ſucceſs of the Goſpel depended in a great meaſure upon the activity and exemplary lives of theſe who firſt publiſhed it. See Macknight. It is an excellent obſervation of Mr. Weſt, relating to the authors who have recorded this prophecy, which is expreſſed in terms ſo very plain and circumſtantial, that Matthew and Mark were inconteſtably dead before the event, as Luke alſo might probably be; and as for John, the only Evangeliſt who ſurvived it, it is remarkable, that he ſays nothing of it, leſt any ſhould aſſert that the prophecy was forged after the event happened. See Weſt on the Reſurrection, p. 393.

Ver. 35. At even] 'Οψὲ, evening, anſwers to the firſt watch of the night, which began at ſun-ſetting, at nine. Μεσονυκτίον, or midnight, anſwers to the ſecond watch, which ended at twelve; ἀλεκτοροφωνια, or the cock-crowing, anſwers to the third watch, which ended at three in the morning; πρωΐ, or the morning, anſwers to the fourth watch, which ended at ſix. See chap. xv. 1. and on Matth. xxviii. 1.

CHAP. XIV.

A conſpiracy againſt Chriſt: precious ointment is poured on his head by a woman. Judas ſelleth his Maſter for money. Chriſt himſelf foretelleth how he ſhall be betrayed by one of his diſciples: after the paſſover prepared, and eaten, He inſtituteth his ſupper: declareth aforehand the flight of all his diſciples, and Peter's denial. Judas betrayeth him with a kiſs: he is apprehended in the garden, falſely accuſed, and impiouſly condemned of the Jews council; ſhamefully abuſed by them, and thrice denied of Peter.

AFTER two days was the feaſt of the paſſover, and of unleavened bread: and the chief prieſts, and the ſcribes, ſought how they might take him by craft, and put him to death.

2 But they ſaid, Not on the feaſt-day, leſt there be an uproar of the people.

3 And being in Bethany, in the houſe of Simon the leper, as he ſat at meat, there came a woman, having an alabaſter-box of ointment of ſpikenard, very precious; and ſhe ſhe brake the box, and poured it on his head.

4 And there were ſome that had indignation within themſelves, and ſaid, Why was this waſte of the ointment made?

5 For it might have been ſold for more than three hundred pence, and have been given to the poor. And they murmured againſt her.

6 And Jeſus ſaid, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? ſhe hath wrought a good work on me.

7 For ye have the poor with you always, and whenſoever ye will ye may do them good: but me ye have not always.

8 She hath done what ſhe could: ſhe is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying.

9 Verily I ſay unto you, Whereſoever this goſpel ſhall be preached throughout the whole world, this alſo that ſhe hath done ſhall be ſpoken of, for a memorial of her.

10 And Judas Iſcariot, one of the twelve, went unto the chief prieſts, to betray him unto them.

11 And when they heard it, they were glad, and promiſed to give him money. And he ſought how he might conveniently betray him.

REFLECTIONS ON CHAP. XIII.

We are taught, from the whole of this remarkable prophecy, how vain and dangerous it is to truſt in external privileges, and to cry out, as theſe fooliſh wretched Jews did, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, are theſe buildings! when of this ſtately and magnificent ſtructure, within leſs than half a century after it was finiſhed, not one ſtone was left on another undemoliſhed.

Let us bleſs God that our own eyes have not ſeen ſuch deſolation and ruins, ſuch commotions in the natural and moral world, ſuch diſſentions in civil life, ſuch perſecutions and hatreds amongſt the neareſt relations, (ver. 12, 13.) under the pretence of propagating religion; for however propagated, it is nothing, without that love which is ſo often made the firſt victim to it: Yet too plainly do we ſee, in one of them or another, iniquity abounding, and the love of many waxing cold. To avoid this, we ſhould endeavour to revive in our own hearts a deep and laſting impreſſion of divine things; and remember, whenever we are tempted to let go our integrity, that he alone who endures to the end ſhall be ſaved.

If our Lord urges his diſciples to flee with ſuch ſpeedy and ſolicitous haſte from the ſword of God's temporal judgements, how much greater diligence ſhould we give to flee from the wrath to come! ver. 15, 16. What are any of the little intereſts of life, that out of regard to them we ſhould be willing to continue one moment longer expoſed to a danger, which may ſink us into everlaſting ruin and deſpair!

The unhappy Jews eagerly liſtened to the very name of Meſſiah, by whomſoever it was aſſumed, ver. 21, 22. while they rejected him whom God had ſent them, and who had ſo long, and with ſo much importunity been renewing to them the offers of life and ſalvation. May none of us ever know the ſad impatience with which condemned ſinners will wiſh, and wiſh in vain, for thoſe overtures and meſſages of grace which they now deſpiſe! In that ſenſe, whereſoever the carcaſe is, thither will the eagles be gathered together: Wherever there is the like unbelief and impenitence, there will be in its degree the like ruin. Chriſt has graciouſly told us theſe things before; may we humbly attend to the warning, that none of this terror and deſtruction may come upon us!

And, to render us ſtill more attentive, raiſe we our contemplation to that awful day, when all that was figuratively ſpoken of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem ſhall be literally accompliſhed: where will our hope and comfort, our light and ſafety then be, when the ſun ſhall be darkened, and the moon ſhall not give her light? Where indeed, unleſs the Almighty God, the everlaſting Jehovah, by whoſe voice they were created, and by whoſe hand they ſhall be daſhed in pieces again, ſhall condeſcend to be our light and our ſalvation. If indeed he be ſo, we ſhall hear the ſolemn ſummons to judgement with joy. What though the day and ſeaſon be unknown, it is enough for us that we know that all theſe interpoſing days and years, be they ever ſo numerous, will at length be paſt; for the promiſe of the great Redeemer is our ſecurity, and he will haſten it in its time.

We are by profeſſion the domeſtics of Chriſt, ver. 34. it is our duty therefore to attend to the offices he hath aſſigned us, though he ſeem at a diſtance; diligently to wait his coming, at whatever ſeaſon: His miniſters ought more eſpecially to wait it, and be ſolicitous that they may be found ſo doing; conducting themſelves like wiſe ſtewards of the myſteries of God, diſpenſing to every one their portion of food in due ſeaſon; and always remembering that every exhortation which they give to others, returns with redoubled weight upon themſelves; then will their account be honourable, and their reward glorious. Ver. 3. Ointment, &c.] Perfume of ſpikenard, very precious; and ſhe ſtirred or ſhook up the veſſel, &c. Wat. See Blackwall's Sac. Claſſicks, vol. ii. p. 166. The ſpikenard—πιστικῆς ναρδου, pure and unadulterated nard, was eſteemed a very valuable aromatic; and hence we find, that the word rendered very precious—πολυτελῦς, is omitted in the Cambridge manuſcript, perhaps as ſuperfluous; and having originally been placed in the margin by way of note, in proceſs of time might have crept into the text. As this ſpikenard was a liquid, there appears no reaſon for breaking the box; and therefore Sir Norton Knatchbull, Dr. Hammond, and others maintain, that συντρίψασα does not ſignify that ſhe brake the veſſel, but only that ſhe ſhook it, ſo as to break the coagulated parts of the rich balſam, and bring it to ſuch a liquidity, that it might be fit to be poured out; and accordingly Dr. Waterland tranſlates it. Dr. Doddridge, however, and others think the original doth not ſo naturally expreſs this, and therefore they imagine that the woman broke off the top of the veſſel in which the balſam was contained. See the note on Matth. xxvi. 7. and Stockius on the word συντρίβω.

13 And he ſendeth forth two of his diſciples, and ſaith unto them, Go ye into the city, and there ſhall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him.

14 And whereſoever he ſhall go in, ſay ye to the good-man of the houſe, The Maſter ſaith, Where is the gueſt-chamber, where I ſhall eat the paſſover with my diſciples?

15 And he will ſhew you a large upper room furniſhed and prepared: there make ready for us.

16 And his diſciples went forth, and came into the city, and found as he had ſaid unto them: and they made ready the paſſover.

17 And in the evening he cometh with the twelve.

18 And as they ſat, and did eat, Jeſus ſaid, Verily I ſay unto you, One of you which eateth with me ſhall betray me.

19 And they began to be ſorrowful, and ſay unto him one by one, Is it I? and another ſaid, Is it I?

20 And he anſwered and ſaid unto them, It is one of the twelve, that dippeth with me in the diſh.

21 The Son of man indeed goeth, as it is written of him: but woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! good were it for that man if he had never been born.

22 And as they did eat, Jeſus took bread, and bleſſed, and brake it, and gave to them, and ſaid, Take, eat: this is my body.

23 And he took the cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them: and they all drank of it.

24 And he ſaid unto them, This is my blood of the new teſtament, which is ſhed for many.

25 Verily I ſay unto you, I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine, until that day that I drink it new in the kingdom of God.

26 And when they had ſung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives.

27 And Jeſus ſaith unto them, All ye ſhall be offended becauſe of me this night: for it is written, I will ſmite the ſhepherd, and the ſheep ſhall be ſcattered.

28 But after that I am riſen, I will go before you into Galilee.

29 But Peter ſaid unto him, Although all ſhall be offended, yet will not I.

30 And Jeſus ſaid unto him, Verily I ſay unto thee, That this day, even in this night, before the cock crow twice, thou ſhalt deny me thrice.

31 But he ſpake the more vehemently, If I ſhould die with thee, I will not deny thee in any wiſe. Likewiſe alſo ſaid they all.

32 And they came to a place which was named Gethſemane: and he ſaith to his diſciples, Sit ye here, while I ſhall pray.

33 And he taketh with him Peter, and James and John, and began to be ſore amazed, and to be very heavy;

34 And ſaith unto them, My ſoul is exceeding ſorrowful unto death: tarry ye here, and watch.

35 And he went forward a little, and fell on the ground, and prayed, that, if it were poſſible, the hour might paſs from him.

36 And he ſaid, Abba, Father, all things are poſſible unto thee; take away this cup

Ver. 13. There ſhall meet you a man, &c.] This is ſet in oppoſition to the good-man, or maſter of the houſe, ver. 14. and conſequently means a ſervant of the loweſt rank, or a ſlave, (Luke xii. 36.) it being a ſervile office to draw water, as appears from Deut. xxix. 11. Joſh. ix. 21. As Samuel, having anointed Saul, for the confirmation of his faith gave him ſeveral predictions relating to ſome very contingent occurrences he was to meet with in his journey, (ſee 1 Sam. x. 2—7.) ſo our Lord ſeems by theſe predictions to have intended the ſame with regard to his diſciples; and alſo to give them a moſt important hint, that he foreſaw all the particular circumſtances which were to befal him at Jeruſalem, when he went up thither for the next and laſt time before his ſufferings. The ſending them to Jeruſalem in this manner ſeems to intimate, that he did not go thither himſelf that morning, ſo that it is probable he ſpent moſt of the day in retirement, for meditation and prayer.

Ver. 22. And as they did eat, &c.] And having eaten. See the note on Matth. xxvi. 26.

Ver. 24. New Teſtament] New Covenant. Wat.

Ver. 25. I will drink no more, &c.] "From this inſtant I will no more drink of the paſſover-cup, nor have that commemorative and typical ordinance continued any longer in my church, than till it be ſuppreſſed and fulfilled (Luke xxii. 16.) by the great ſalvation which I ſhall bring into the Goſpel kingdom upon my reſurrection from the dead, and which is to be afterwards commemorated by a new uſe of wine in the ſupper I have now inſtituted; nor will I ſo familiarly commune with you again, as I now do, in this New Teſtament ordinance, till we ſhall have the moſt intimate fellowſhip together, in the more excellent entertainments of the heavenly ſtate; which, for their ſuperior and always freſh delight, may, in the language of a feſtival be called new wine." See Guyſe, and the note on Matth. xxvi. 29.

Ver. 26. They went out] At the concluſion of the ſupper, Jeſus and his diſciples ſung a proper pſalm or ſong of praiſe together, as was cuſtomary at the cloſe of the paſſover, and then he ſet out for the mount of Olives; chooſing to retire thither, that he might prevent a riot in Jeruſalem, and bring no trouble upon the maſter of the houſe where he celebrated the paſſover.

Ver. 29. Although all ſhall be offended] It is moſt probable that Judas by this time had ſlipped away from the diſciples, to fulfil his vile contract with the ſanhedrim; and Peter miſſing him, vaunted, that though all his fellow-apoſtles ſhould follow Judas's example, he would ſtand by his Lord. We may obſerve, that if St. Mark's Goſpel was dictated or reviewed by St. Peter, as the ancients affirm, the latter, out of his deep penitence, repreſents the event with the higheſt aggravations; for nothing can be ſtronger than the expreſſions in ver. 31.

Ver. 30. Before the cock crow twice,—thou ſhalt] Thou wilt. Wat. and MS. See the note on Matth. xxvi. 33, &c. Dr. Owen, in his Obſervations on the Four Goſpels, p. 56. has obſerved further, that as the Jews, in the enumeration of the times of the night, took notice only of one cock crowing, which comprehended the third watch, (ſee on ch. xiii. 35.) ſo St. Matthew, to give them a clear information that Peter would deny his maſter thrice before three in the morning, needed only to ſay, that he would do it before the cock crew; but the Romans, for whom, and the other Gentiles, St. Mark wrote his Goſpel, reckoning by a double crowing of the cock,—the firſt of which was about midnight, and the ſecond at three,—ſtood in need of a more particular deſignation; and therefore St. Mark, to denote the ſame hour to them, was obliged to ſay, before the cock crew twice. Juvenal uſes exactly the ſame phraſe to ſpecify the ſame hour. from me: nevertheleſs, not what I will, but what thou wilt.

37 And he cometh, and findeth them ſleeping, and ſaith unto Peter, Simon, ſleepeſt thou? couldeſt not thou watch one hour?

38 Watch ye and pray, leſt ye enter into temptation. The ſpirit truly is ready, but the fleſh is weak.

39 And again he went away, and prayed, and ſpake the ſame words.

40 And when he returned, he found them aſleep again; (for their eyes were heavy:) neither wiſt they what to anſwer him.

41 And he cometh the third time, and ſaith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your reſt: it is enough, the hour is come; behold, the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of ſinners.

42 Riſe up, let us go; lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand.

43 And immediately, while he yet ſpake, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, and with him a great multitude with ſwords and ſtaves, from the chief prieſts, and the ſcribes, and the elders.

44 And he that betrayed him, had given them a token, ſaying, Whomſoever I ſhall kiſs, that ſame is he; take him, and lead him away ſafely.

45 And as ſoon as he was come, he goeth ſtraightway to him, and ſaith, Maſter, maſter; and kiſſed him.

46 And they laid their hands on him, and took him.

47 And one of them that ſtood by drew a ſword, and ſmote a ſervant of the high-prieſt, and cut off his ear.

48 And Jeſus anſwered and ſaid unto them, Are ye come out as againſt a thief, with ſwords and with ſtaves, to take me?

49 I was daily with you in the temple, teaching, and ye took me not: but the ſcriptures muſt be fulfilled.

50 And they all forſook him, and fled.

51 And there followed him a certain young man, having a linen cloth caſt about his naked body; and the young men laid hold on him:

52 And he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked.

53 And they led Jeſus away to the high-prieſt: and with him were aſſembled all the chief prieſts, and the elders, and the ſcribes.

54 And Peter followed him afar off, even into the palace of the high prieſt: and he ſat with the ſervants, and warmed himſelf at the fire.

Ver. 41. Sleep on now, &c.] Dr. Waterland reads this interrogatively, Do you ſleep on ſtill, and take repoſe? The paſſage, however, may be read with propriety agreeably to our verſion; as much as to ſay, "My previous conflict is now over, and you may ſleep on, becauſe I have no further occaſion for your watching. It is enough; the time is expired in which your watching would have been of any ſervice to me." The original word ἀπέχει ſometimes ſignifies an acquittal, or diſcharge from any debt or duty, and implies our Saviour's diſcharging his diſciples from the duty and obligation of watching, which he had laid them under by his commands, ch. xiii. 33, 37. See Matth. xxvii. 45. and Mill's Greek Teſtament.

Ver. 44. A token] A ſignal. Wat. Take him,—ſeize him, or lay faſt hold of him:—κρατήσατε αὐτὸν. See Heylin, and Matth. xxvi. 48.

Ver. 51, 52. There followed him a certain young man, &c.] Biſhop Pococke, in deſcribing the dreſſes of the people of Egypt, obſerves, "that it is almoſt a general cuſtom among the Arabs and Mohammedan natives of the country, to wear a large blanket, either white or brown, and in ſummer a blue or white cotton ſheet; which the Chriſtians conſtantly wear in the country. Putting one corner before over the left ſhoulder, they bring it behind and under the right arm, and ſo over their bodies, throwing it behind over the left ſhoulder, and ſo the right arm is left bare for action. When it is hot, and they are on horſeback, they let it fall down on the ſaddle round them; and about Faiume I particularly obſerved, that young people eſpecially, and the poorer ſort, had nothing on whatever, but this blanket; and it is probable the young man was cloathed in this manner, who followed our Saviour when he was taken, having a linen cloth caſt about his naked body; and when the young men laid hold on him, he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked." See his Deſcription of the Eaſt, vol. i. p. 190.

I am very much diſpoſed, ſays the author of the Obſervations on Scripture, to think as the biſhop does upon this point; and as he has made this remark, I ſhould not have thought of noting it, had I not apprehended ſome additional obſervations might not be altogether uſeleſs. The account here given relates to Egypt; but Egmont and Heyman inform us, that the inhabitants of Paleſtine are as ſlightly cloathed now as theſe Egyptians, and we may believe were ſo anciently. They obſerve, that "they ſaw ſeveral Arabian inhabitants of Jaffa (called Joppa in the New Teſtament) going almoſt naked, the greateſt part of them without ſo much as a ſhirt or drawers, though ſome wore a kind of mantle; as for the children there, they run about almoſt as naked as they were born, though they had all little chains about their legs, as an ornament, and ſome of ſilver." The ancients, or at leaſt many of them, ſuppoſed that the young man here mentioned by St. Mark, was one of the Apoſtles; though Grotius wonders how they could entertain ſuch an idea, and apprehends it was ſome youth who lodged in a country houſe near the garden of Gethſemane, who ran out in an hurry to ſee what was the matter, in his night-veſtment, or in his ſhirt, as we ſhould expreſs it. But the word Σινδόνα, uſed to ſignify what he had upon him, denotes alſo ſuch a cloth as they wrapped up the dead in, and occurs in no other ſenſe in the Old Teſtament; but the eaſtern people do not lay like corpſes wrapped up in a winding-ſheet, but in drawers, and one or two waiſtcoats, at Aleppo; and thoſe who go without drawers (as the Arabs of Barbary do, according to Dr. Shaw, and many of the Holy Land, if we believe Egmont and Heyman) ſleep in their raiment; and the hyke which they wear by day, ſerves them for a bed and covering by night. It might as well then be an Apoſtle, in his day-dreſs, as an ordinary youth, wrapped up in that in which he lay; and it is rather to be underſtood of an Apoſtle in his common cloathing, than of a perſon of figure in his drawers and waiſtcoat, in which ſuch perſons now lay; and which we may believe Dionyſius Alexandrinus meant by εν λινω εσθηματι, in his epiſtle quoted by Grotius. A late commentator takes notice, that though this youth is ſaid to fly away naked, upon his leaving the linen cloth in the hands of thoſe that ſecured him; yet it is by no means neceſſary to ſuppoſe he was abſolutely naked,—which is indeed very true: But is not this preciſely the thing, however, that the Evangeliſt deſigns to intimate,—in order to mark out the extreme fear of this young man, who rather choſe to quit his hyke, than run the riſque of being made a priſoner? though, by doing this, he became intirely expoſed. Dr. Lighfoot ſuppoſes, as I do, ſays this author, that he had nothing on under this linen cloth; which he inclines to attribute to mortification, and a ſuperſtitious auſterity. But if he was not an Apoſtle, as the doctor doth not ſuppoſe he was; yet he muſt be underſtood to have been a diſciple of Jeſus, or he needed not have been afraid. And from ch. ii. 18. we learn, that though the diſciples of John followed a rigorous inſtitute, thoſe of Chriſt did not. See the Obſervations, p. 403, &c. Inſtead of young men at the end of ver. 51. Dr. Heylin reads ſoldiers, as the original word frequently ſignifies in the beſt writers.

council, ſought for witneſs againſt Jeſus to put him to death; and found none.

56 For many bare falſe witneſs againſt him, but their witneſs agreed not together.

57 And there aroſe certain, and bare falſe witneſs againſt him, ſaying, 58 We heard him ſay, I will deſtroy this temple, that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another, made without hands.

59 But neither ſo did their witneſs agree together.

60 And the high-prieſt ſtood up in the midſt, and aſked Jeſus, ſaying, Anſwereſt thou nothing? what is it which theſe witneſs againſt thee?

61 But he held his peace, and anſwered nothing. Again the high-prieſt aſked him, and ſaid unto him, Art thou the Chriſt, the Son of the Bleſſed?

62 And Jeſus ſaid, I am: and ye ſhall ſee the Son of man ſitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

63 Then the high-prieſt rent his clothes, and ſaith, What need we any further witneſſes?

64 Ye have heard the blaſphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death.

65 And ſome began to ſpit on him, and to cover his face, and to buffet him, and to ſay unto him, Propheſy: and the ſervants did ſtrike him with the palms of their hands.

66 And as Peter was beneath in the palace, there cometh one of the maids of the high-prieſt, 67 And when ſhe ſaw Peter warming himſelf, ſhe looked upon him, and ſaid, And thou alſo waſt with Jeſus of Nazareth.

68 But he denied, ſaying, I know not, neither underſtand I what thou ſayeſt. And he went out into the porch; and the cock crew.

69 And a maid ſaw him again, and began to ſay to them that ſtood by, This is one of them.

70 And he denied it again. And a little after, they that ſtood by ſaid again to Peter, Surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilean, and thy ſpeech agreeth thereto.

71 But he began to curſe and to ſwear, ſaying, I know not this man of whom ye ſpeak.

72 And the ſecond time the cock crew. And Peter called to mind the word that Jeſus ſaid unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou ſhalt deny me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept.

Ver. 61. The Son of the Bleſſed?] This is a very ſublime and emphatical method of expreſſing the happineſs of God. It conveys ſuch an idea of the divine bleſſedneſs, that, comparatively ſpeaking, there is none happy but he. See the note on Matth. xxvi. 62, 63. It is plain from the parallel paſſage, Luke xxii. 67. that the anſwer of our Saviour ſet down by St. Mark, as well as St. Matthew, is an anſwer only to this queſtion, Art thou the Son of God? and not to that other, Art thou the Chriſt, or the Meſſiah? which preceded, and which he had anſwered before; and though St. Matthew and St. Mark connect them together, as if making but one queſtion, and omit all the intervening diſcourſe, yet it is plain from St. Luke, that they were two diſtinct queſtions, to which Jeſus gave two diſtinct anſwers; In the firſt whereof, according to his uſual caution, he declined ſaying in plain and expreſs words that he was the Meſſiah, though in the latter he owned himſelf to be the Son of God: which though they, being Jews, underſtood to ſignify the Meſſiah, yet he knew could be no legal or weighty accuſation againſt him before an heathen; and ſo it proved. There was, however, a great deal of craft in the queſtion, which conſiſted in this, that if Jeſus anſwered in the affirmative, they were ready to condemn him as a blaſphemer; but if in the negative, they propoſed to puniſh him as an impoſtor, who, by accepting the honours and titles of the Meſſiah from the people, had deceived them. Comp. 2 Sam. xv. 30. Eſth. vi. 12. and Jer. xiv. 3, 4. The expreſſion is elliptical, and ſhould be ſupplied thus: Επιϐαλων ιματιον τη κεφαλη αυτȣ, as is evident from Lev. xix. 19. LXX. Και ιματιον εκ δυο υφασμενον κιϐδηλον ȣκ επιϐαλεις σεαυτῳ. Beſides, it was the cuſtom of perſons in confuſion to cover their heads, as in the forementioned place of Jeremiah; They were aſhamed, and confounded, and covered their heads. Wetſtein defends, by a variety of inſtances, our verſion: But ſee Duport's excellent "Letters on Theophraſtus," p. 232.

RERLLECTIONS ON CHRIST'S APPREHENSION, &c.

Wherefore, O Saviour, didſt thou take thoſe three choſen diſciples with thee, but that thou expectedſt ſome comfort from their preſence? ver. 33. A ſeaſonable word may ſometimes drop from the meaneſt attendant; and the very ſociety of thoſe we truſt, carries in it ſome kind of contentment. Alas! what broken reeds are men! wrapped up in ſleep and ſecurity; whilſt thou art ſweating in thine agony! Admonitions, threats, intreaties, cannot keep their eyes open: Thou telleſt them of danger; they rather prefer dreams of eaſe; and though twice rouſed, careleſly ſleep out thy ſorrow, and their own danger.

What help haſt thou of ſuch followers!—In the mount of thy transfiguration they ſlept; yea, and fell on their faces, when they ſhould have beheld thy glory. In the garden of thine agony they fall upon the ground for drowſineſs; and when they ſhould compaſſionate thy ſorrows, loſe themſelves in a ſtupid ſleepineſs, ver. 37. Doubtleſs, even this diſregard made thy prayers but ſo much the more fervent. The leſs comfort we find on earth, the more we ſeek above; nor didſt thou ſeek more than thou foundeſt: An angel ſupplies the place of men; that ſpirit was vigilant, while thy diſciples were heavy. Happy exchange!

No ſooner is this good angel vaniſhed, than that domeſtic devil appears in view. Judas comes up, (ver. 33.) and ſhews himſelf at the head of thoſe miſcreant troops. He, whoſe too high honour it had been to follow ſo bleſſed a Maſter, affects now to be the wicked leader of this rabble; the fleece is now caſt off; the wolf appears in his own likeneſs; yet ſtill the bold traitor dares to mix hypocriſy with villany; and murders with his very ſalutations and kiſſes.

O Saviour, this is no news to thee: All thoſe who, under a ſhadow of godlineſs practice humility, do ſtill betray thee thus. Thou who hadſt ſaid, "one of you is a devil," didſt not now ſay, "get thee hence, Satan;" but, friend, wherefore art thou come. And yet, all this ſunſhine of mildneſs cannot thaw an obdurate heart. The ſign is given; Jeſus is taken, ver. 46.

Wretched traitor! why wouldeſt thou for this vile purpoſe be thus

CHAP. XV.

Jeſus brought bound and accuſed before Pilate. Upon the clamour of the common people, the murderer Barabbas is looſed, and Jeſus delivered up to be crucified: he is crowned with thorns, ſpit on, and mocked: fainteth in bearing his croſs: hangeth between two thieves: ſuffereth the triumphing reproaches of the Jews: but confeſſed by the centurion to be the Son of God: and is honourably buried by Joſeph.

AND ſtraightway in the morning the chief prieſts held a conſultation with the elders and ſcribes, and the whole council, and bound Jeſus, and carried him away, and delivered him to Pilate.

2 And Pilate aſked him, Art thou the king of the Jews? And he anſwering ſaid unto him, Thou ſayeſt it.

3 And the chief prieſts accuſed him of many things: but he anſwered nothing.

4 And Pilate aſked him again, ſaying, Anſwereſt thou nothing? behold how many things they witneſs againſt thee.

5 But Jeſus yet anſwered nothing; ſo that Pilate marvelled.

6 Now at that feaſt he releaſed unto them one priſoner, whomſoever they deſired.

7 And there was one named Barabbas, which lay bound with them that had made inſurrection with him, who had committed murder in the inſurrection.

8 And the multitude crying aloud, began to deſire him to do as he had ever done unto them.

Ver. 1. Pſ. ii. 2. Matth. xxvii. 1. Luke xxii. 66. xxiii. 1. John xviii. 28.—V. 4. Matth. xxvii. 13.—V. 5. Iſai. liii. 7.—V. 6. Matth. xxvii. 15. Luke xxiii. 17. John xviii. 39.

attended? And ye, fooliſh prieſts and elders, why ſent you ſuch a band, and ſo armed? One meſſenger had been enough for a voluntary priſoner. Had my Saviour been unwilling to be taken, all your forces, with all the legions of hell to help them, had been too little: When he did but ſay, I am he, that eaſy breath alone routed all your troops, and caſt them to the earth, (John xviii. 6.) whom it might as eaſily have caſt into hell! Had he but ſaid, "I will not be taken," what would your ſwords and ſtaves have done againſt Omnipotence?

Thoſe diſciples who failed of their vigilance, failed not of their courage: They had heard their maſter ſpeak of providing ſwords, and now they thought it was the time to uſe them: Shall we ſmite? They were willing to fight for Him now, with whom they were not careful to watch. But of all other, Peter was moſt forward: Inſtead of opening his lips, he unſheathes his ſword;—and inſtead of "Shall I?"—ſmites: ver. 47. He had noted Malchus, a buſy ſervant of the high-prieſt, too ready to ſecond Judas, and to lay his rude hands upon the Lord of life: Againſt this man, his heart riſes and his hand is lifted up; that ear, which had too officiouſly liſtened to the unjuſt and cruel charge of his wicked maſter, is now ſevered from that worſe head which it had miſ-ſerved.

I love and honour thy zeal, O bleſſed diſciple: Thou couldſt not brook the wrong done to thy divine Maſter! Had thy life been dearer to thee than His ſafety, thou hadſt not drawn thy ſword upon a whole troop. It was in earneſt that thou ſaidſt, Though all men,—yet not I;—though I ſhould die with thee, yet I will not deny thee, (ver. 29, 30.) Lo! thou art ready to die upon him that ſhould touch that ſacred perſon: What would thy life now have been, in compariſon of renouncing Him? Since thou wert ſo fervent, why didſt thou not rather fall upon the traytor who betrayed him, than upon the ſerjeant who arreſts him? Surely the ſin was ſo much greater in him, as the plot of miſchief is more than the execution; as a domeſtic is nearer than a ſtranger; as the treaſon of a friend is worſe than the forced enmity of a hireling. Was it that thou couldeſt not ſo ſuddenly apprehend the odious depth of that villainy, and inſtantly hate him who had been thy old companion; or was it that though Judas was more faulty, yet Malchus was more imperiouſly cruel? However, thy courage was now awakened with thyſelf; and thine heart no leſs ſincere than thine hand was raſh: Put up thy ſword again, &c. Matth. xxvi. 52. Good intentions are no warrant for our actions: Thou, O Saviour, canſt at once accept our meanings, yet cenſure our deeds: warm as was Peter's love, and juſt as was his quarrel, neither of them can ſhield him from thy rebuke: Thy meek tongue ſmites him gently, who had furiouſly ſmote thine enemy: Put up thy ſword.

It was Peter's ſword; but to be put up; not uſed. There is a ſword which Peter may uſe, but it is of another metal: Our weapons are, as our warfare, ſpiritual. When the prince of peace bade his followers ſell their coat and buy a ſword, he meant to inſinuate the need of theſe arms, not their improvement; and to teach them the danger of the time, not the manner of repulſing the danger. Can I chooſe but wonder how Peter could thus ſtrike unwarranted? How he, whoſe firſt blow made the fray, could eſcape hewing to pieces from that band of ruffians? This could not have been, O Saviour, had not thy power reſtrained their rage; had not thy ſeaſonable and ſharp reproof prevented their revenge.

Peter's ear is no leſs ſmitten now by the mild tongue of his maſter, than Malchus's ear by the ſword of Peter. "Weak diſciple, thou haſt zeal, but not according to knowledge. There is not more danger in this act of thine, than inconſideration and ignorance: The cup which my Father hath given me, ſhall I not drink it? Thou draweſt thy ſword to reſcue me from ſuffering: Alas! if I ſuffer not, what would become of thee? What would become of mankind? Where were that eternal and juſt decree of my Father, wherein I am a lamb ſlain from the beginning of the world?—Doſt thou go about to hinder thine own and the whole word's redemption? Canſt thou be ſo weak as to imagine, that this ſuffering of mine is not free and voluntary? Have I not given thee and the world many undeniable proofs of my omnipotence? Didſt thou not ſee how eaſy it had been for me to have blown away theſe poor forces of mine adverſaries? Doſt thou not know, that, if I would require it, all the glorious troops of heaven (any one whereof is more than troops of men) would preſently ſhew themſelves ready to attend and reſcue me? My power could have triumphed over the impetuous malice of mine enemies; but ſince that eternal decree of my Father muſt be accompliſhed, my mercy muſt rather be approved, mankind muſt be ranſomed; and this cannot be done without my ſuffering. Thus then, O Peter, thy well-meant valour is no better than a wrong to thyſelf, to the to the world, to me, to my Father."

O gracious Saviour, whilſt thou thus ſmiteſt thy diſciple, thou healeſt him whom thy diſciple ſmote, Luke xxii. 51. Many greater miracles hadſt thou done; none that diſplayed more of mercy and meekneſs than this laſt cure. Of all other, this ear of Malchus hath the loudeſt tongue to blazon the praiſe of thy clemency and goodneſs to thy enemies. Wherefore came that man, but in an hoſtile manner to attack thee?—Beſides his own, what favour was he intitled to for his Maſter's ſake? And if he had not been more forward than his fellows, why had he not eſcaped as unhurt as they?

Yet,—even amidſt the throng of thine apprehenders,—in the heat of their violence,—in the height of their malice,—and thine own inſtant peril of death,—thou healeſt that unneceſſary ear, which had been guilty of liſtening to blaſphemies againſt thee, receiving cruel and unjuſt charges concerning thee!

O Malchus! could thy ear be whole, and not thy heart broken and contrite with remorſe, for riſing up againſt ſo merciful and ſo powerful an hand? Couldſt thou chooſe but ſay, "O bleſſed Jeſu, I ſee it was thy Providence that preſerved my head, when my ear was ſmitten: It is thine Almighty power which hath miraculouſly reſtored that ear which I had juſt forfeited: This head of mine ſhall never be guilty of plotting any further miſchief againſt thee: This ear ſhall never entertain any more reproaches of thy name: This heart ſhall ever acknowledge and magnify thy tender mercies, thy divine omnipotence?"

Could thy fellows ſee ſuch a demonſtration of power and goodneſs with unrelenting hearts? Unthankful Malchus, and cruel ſoldiers! ye were wounded, and felt it not: God had ſtruck your breaſts with a fearful obduracy, and ye ſtill perſiſt in your bloody impious enterprize:—They that laid hold on Jeſus, led him away, &c.

Chap. XV. Ver. 1. And ſtraitway in the morning] The horrid tranſactions of this diſmal night being over, it was no ſooner day, than the Jews hurried the bleſſed Jeſus away to the Roman governor; for though the ſanhedrim had the power of trying and condemning men for crimes which the Jewiſh law had made capital; yet, like the court of inquiſition, they had not the power of putting ſuch ſentences in execution, without the approbation of the civil magiſtrate, or Roman governor;—for nothing but neceſſity could have brought the Jewiſh rulers to Pilate on this occaſion. They had bound Jeſus when he was firſt apprehended; but perhaps he had been looſed while under examination, or elſe they now made his bonds ſtricter than before; the better, as they might think, to ſecure him from a reſcue, as he paſſed through the public ſtreets in the day-time. See Matth. xxvii. 1, 2. Doddridge, and Biſcoe's Boyle's Lectures, p. 113. Inſtead of, And the whole council, Dr. Waterland reads, Even, &c.

Ver. 6. Now at that feaſt] Κατα εορτην, after the manner, or according to the nature of that feaſt. See Rom. iii. 5. Gal. iii. 15. 1 Cor. iii. 3. Now the feaſt of the paſſover being celebrated by the Jews in memory of their releaſe from Egypt, it was agreeable to the nature of the feaſt to make this releaſe at that time, and therefore cuſtomary. See Whitby, and on Matth. xxvii. 15.

9 But Pilate anſwered them, ſaying, Will ye that I releaſe unto you the King of the Jews?

10 (For he knew that the chief prieſts had delivered him for envy.)

11 But the chief prieſts moved the people to deſire, that he ſhould rather releaſe Barabbas unto them.

12 And Pilate anſwered, and ſaid again unto them, What will ye then that I ſhall do unto him whom ye call the King of the Jews?

13 And they cried out again, Crucify him.

14 Then Pilate ſaid unto them, Why, what evil hath he done? And they cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify him.

15 And ſo Pilate, willing to content the people, releaſed Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jeſus, when he had ſcourged him, to be crucified.

16 And the ſoldiers led him away into the hall, called Pretorium; and they call together the whole band.

17 And they clothed him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns, and put it about his head.

18 And began to ſalute him, Hail, King of the Jews!
